Digitized by the Internet Archive in 2012 with funding from internet archive

http://archive.org/details/nation208jannewy

For Reference

Not to be taken from this room

✓251522

Every person who maliciously cuts, defaces, breaks or injures any book, map, chart, picture, engraving, statue, coin, model, apparatus, or other work of literature, art, mechanics or object of curiosity, deposited in any public library, gallery, museum or collection is guilty of a misdemeanor.

Penal Code of California,
1915, Section 623.

251522

THE NATION

America's Leading Liberal Weekly Since 1865

DEC 1969 LIBRARY

INDEX TO VOLUME 208
JANUARY to JUNE, 1969

The following letters are used to indicate the type of article:

A	Art
C	Correspondence
D	Drama
E	Editorial Article
M	Music
MP	Moving Pictures
P	Poetry
S	Signed Article
T	Television

Book reviews and reviewers are indexed separately in the Book Review Section.

2- 31	Jan. 6	418-477	Apr. 7
34- 63	Jan. 13	450-479	Apr. 14
66- 95	Jan. 20	482-519	Apr. 21
98-127	Jan. 27	522-551	Apr. 28
130-159	Feb. 3	554-883	May 5
162-191	Feb. 10	586-615	May 12
194-223	Feb. 17	618-647	May 19
226-255	Feb. 24	650-679	May 26
258-287	Mar. 3	682-711	June 2
290-319	Mar. 10	714-743	June 9
322-351	Mar. 17	746-775	June 16
354-383	Mar. 24	778-807	June 23
386-415	Mar. 31	810-829	June 30

A

PAGE

Abbott, William L.
- Hawaiian nationalists: trapped in a mystique; S 146

ABM system. See Armament — Missiles
Abortion; liberalizing bill for New York State defeated by crippled legislator's appeal to sentiment; E 588
Accidents; avoidable industrial. R. Nader; S 166
- Farmington, W. Va., coal-mine explosion triggered black lung rebellion 531, 532

Adams, Representative Brock; insurgent's bid to replace Speaker J. W. McCormack by M. K. Udall 103-4
Adaptation. Reviewed by H. Clurman; D 281
Adonis, Joe; New Jersey gambling enterprises in 1940s 106, 107
Advertising; employment ads desexed through legislation and feminist pressure 242, 243
- Five myths of consumership. D. Smythe; S .... 82; see also C, 194
- Of cigarettes discontinued on Westinghouse TV and by Canadian broadcasting corp.; pressures on and by other networks; E 685

Aeschylus. Play Oresteia, adapted by T. Guthrie, reviewed by H. Clurman; D 60
Africa; African American labor center, AFL-CIO's new mission to continent. S. Meisler; S .... 48; see also C, 162
- Hostile white and black camps in south. I. Robertson; S 596

Agriculture
- California grape boycott. R. B. Taylor; S 591
- DDT and the constitution; move to ban pesticide. H. Henkin; S 308
- Do-nothing Johnson policies 43
- Findley-Conte bill to limit farm-subsidy payments; E 749
- Proposed tax changes on farm income 761
- See also Food

Ahmad, Aijaz
- Revolution deferred: "law and order" of new military regime in Pakistan; S 455

Ahmad, Eqbal
- America as superpower: how we look to the third world; S .... 265; see also C, 290 and 322

PAGE

AIFLD. See Labor — Union
Albania; pro-Chinese demonology; Stalinist regime's conspiratorial view of world. A. Tuckerman; S 566
ALFORD (Appalachian laboratories for occupational respiratory diseases); West Virginia U. research body on defensive in black lung rebellion .... 532 ff; see also C, 714
Ali, Tariq. See Tariq Ali
Alinsky, Saul D.
- John L. Lewis: something of a man; tribute to late president of mine workers; S 827

Alioto, Joseph L.; San Francisco mayor's ambitions for California governorship and U.S. presidency 111-113
Allen, Woody. Play Play it again, Sam, reviewed by H. Clurman; D 281
Alliance for labor action (ALA). See Labor —Union
Alloway, Lawrence
- Reviews of art
  - Centennial exhibition, Can man survive?, at Museum of natural history, New York City 713
  - Current gallery shows in New York; difficulties of presentation 444
  - De Kooning, W., exhibition at Museum of modern art 380
  - Metropolitan museum show Harlem on my mind 156, 317
  - Metropolitan museum show The new American painting and sculpture; protested by Art workers' coalition 837
  - Olitski, J. 676
  - Pollock, J. (P. Guggenheim collection, at Guggenheim museum) 221
  - Rosenquist, J. 581
  - Smith, D., sculpture show at Guggenheim museum 518
  - Whitney museum's exhibition Anti-illusion: procedures/materials 740

Alwan, Ameen
- Fern roots; P 738
- Nightmare in Calcutta; P 738

American civil liberties union; activities in investigation of 1968 Chicago demonstrations 422-423
- Successful suit to eliminate piety in army guidance manuals; E 325

American farm bureau; opposition to grape strike and boycott .... 591 ff.
American federation of labor—Conference of industrial organizations (AFL-CIO). See Labor—Union
American historical association; ferment at New York meeting over scholarship vs. commitment. J. Gilbert; S 77
American institute for free labor development (AIFLD). See Labor—Union
American Jewish committee; studies on plight of working poor 724, 725-726
American security council; rightist group's sponsorship of seminars 389
American telephone and telegraph company. Consumer be damned. The Ma Bell rental agency. W. P. Rokes; S 820
- Profitable defense contracts of Western electric subsidiary 659-660

AMSA; costly strategic airplane .... 658 ff.
Andreotti, Dante; success as head of San Francisco police department's community relations division, 1962-1967 .... 503 ff.
Andrews, Lewis M.
- Making a million under 30; critique of magazine Careers Today; S 315

Ammons, A. R.
- Dinah; P 26

Anderson, Jack
- North; P 644

Anderson, Representative John B.; anti-MIRV speech 813

PAGE

Andrews, Charles E., M.D., and W. K. C. Morgan, M.D.
- Quackery charged in R. G. Sherrill article on black lung among West Virginia coal miners; C .... 714, with Sherrill reply; see also 529

Angola. See Portugal
Another mother for peace; campaign contributions to some supposed peace Congressmen rejected; E 484
Ants. R. Bly; P 739
Apartheid. See South Africa, Republic of Apple, an. L. Bruce; P 410
Arab states. See Middle East
Arabs; in Jerusalem. H. Krosney; S .... 134; see also C, 322
Arenales, Emilio; retiring U.N. general assembly president's farewell reprimand; E 4
Arendt, Hannah, et al.
- Telegram to U.N. secretary-general U Thant protesting arrest of Spanish intellectuals; C 258

Ariadne auf Naxos. Concert performance by Boston symphony and Angel recording reviewed by D. Hamilton; M 413
Armament
- Arms chill in air as result of Vietnam; E 195
- Missiles
  - ABM and MIRV; E 813
  - ABM and other systems rationalized by phoenix of obsolescence. R. F. Kaufmann; S 656
  - ABM blues; opposition from siting states and from scientists; E 586
  - Drift toward doomsday, the: blind strategy of missile defense. M. J. Rosenberg; S .... 168; see also C, 522
  - Growing opposition in Senate to Sentinel ABM 196
  - 1962 Soviet-U.S. crisis aggravated by arbitrary State department 356
  - Selling ABM the hard way; misleading ad of Citizens committee for peace with security; E 812
  - Temporary halt of Sentinel announced by Secretary M. Laird; E 227
  - Think-tank scenarios as basis for pro-ABM agitation 788
  - White House cop-out on; Nixon's compromise ABM construction proposal; E 386

Arnold, Thurman; on myth of corporations as individuals 84
Arnstein, Flora J.
- Sea horses; P 345

Art. For reviews, see Alloway, L.; Kozloff, M.
Art workers' coalition; protest over Metropolitan museum show The new American painting and sculpture 837
Articulation. D. Ray; P 123
Aspinall, Representative Wayne L.; frustrated Secretary Udall's attempt to set aside vast acreage as national monuments; E 164
Assassination; Dec. 2 editorial, Bulletproof illusions, gives no answer. F. Victor; C, with editors' reply, 98
Assembly, freedom of; at issue in Chicago trial of eight "conspirators" in 1968 rioting. L. D. Nachman; S 752
Atlanta Constitution (newspaper); role in 1966 Georgia gubernatorial election. C. Pou; C .... 130; see also E, 198, on late editor R. McGill
Atomic energy; plants' contamination of Columbia river; E 454
- Proposed irrigation plants for Israel and Arab countries in unimplemented Strauss-Eisenhower plan; E 163

Atomic weapons
- AEC's proposed underground tests in Nevada challenged by H. Hughes; E 453

PAGE

  Alleged contamination of Okinawa waters 142-143; see also C, 354
  J. R. Raser scenario on human flaw in fail-safe ... 789
  Plutonium fire at Dow chemical's Rocky Flats, Colo., plant; E ... 781
  Risks of supposedly safe underground explosions; E ... 556
  See also Armament — Missiles
Auspitz, Josiah Lee; president of Ripon society ... 203 ff.
Automobiles; consumption of land in U.S. and now in Soviet Union ... 275
  Doubts raised by General motors' recall of 4.9 million cars with potential exhaust leakage; E ... 325
  Mass theft of: a heist a minute. L. Raskin; S ... 434
Aviation; jet-age diversions: world law and airplane hijackers. K. M. Ruppenthal; S ... 144
  Lawsuits for sonic-boom damage foreseen for SST overland flights; E ... 454
  Wasteful development of SST ... 657-658
Axelbank, Albert
  The urgent East: short fuse in Japan, where anti-Americanism may bring civil war; S ... 141; see also C, 354
Ayub, Khan, fall of Pakistani dictator ... 455 ff.

B

B-70; $1.5 billion wasted on supersonic bomber ... 656 ff.
Babbitt, Irving. Relata II reviewed by D. Hamilton; M ... 218
Bahamas; relations with Haiti ... 386
Bail. See Crime
Baland, Timothy
  Bird; P ... 317
  Cricket poem; P ... 342
Ballet. For reviews, see Clurman, H.
Banks and banking; drop in liquid assets ... 687
  High interest on credit-card sales in proposed uniform consumer credit code; E ... 388
Barlow, Virginia
  Marijuana arrests for political intimidation; C ... 509; see also E, 293
Bay, Dr. Alfred Paul
  Praise for M. Gordon article of Dec. 16, Emancipating the mental wards; C ... 258
Bazelon, David; on U.S. "paper economy" 688-689
Beaufort, South Carolina; publicity on hunger in; inadequate food-stamp program ... 655
Becker, Carl; on science and freedom ... 461-462
Becket, James
  Greek junta on trial; S ... 11
Behaviorism; ridiculed before birth by J. H. Newman ... 562-563
Bell, Marvin
  The mummies of Guanajuato; P ... 24
Bentley, Eric
  Translations of three ballads by W. Biermann ... 440
Berger, Henry W.
  Labor and State departments: marriage of convenience in Latin-American policy; S ... 46
Bergman, Ingmar. Film The shame reviewed by R. Hatch; MP ... 61
Berkeley, California; "little war" by police and national guard against occupants of "people's park"; E ... 716
  Park incident as planned crackdown by Governor Reagan and U. of California; E ... 747; see also C, 810
  "People's park": terror in a teapot. F. Berry, T. Brooks, and E. Commins; S ... 784
Berlin, West; "sticky situation" in denial of travel permits to West German electors; complication of Nixon visit; E ... 228
Bernhardt, H. William; public-relations firm for Biafra ... 303
Bernstein, Melvin H.
  Republican governors' association's illusion of power; S ... 17
Berry, Frederick, Thomas Brooke, and Eugene Commins
  The Berkeley "people's park": terror in a teapot; S ... 784
Berzon, Marsha L.
  Mississippi: signs of life. What the blacks found out in Holly Springs boycott; S ... 793
Bhutto, Zulfikar Ali; leader of masses in West Pakistan ... 455 ff.
Biafra: war of images vs. Nigeria. S. Meisler; S ... 301; see also C, 450
Biemiller, Andrew; labor lobbyist lukewarm on tax reform ... 718
Biermann, Wolf
  Comrades, which of us wouldn't be against war; P ... 440
  Devastating side effect of the Vietnam war; P ... 440
  Hanns Eisler, or The anatomy of a sphere; P ... 440
  The song of the worst thing; P ... 440
  Poet in the collective (East Germany). D. Kleinbard, S ... 440
Big time Buck White. Reviewed by H. Clurman; D ... 60
Bird. By T. Baland; P ... 317
Birds; disastrous effect on of DDT ... 310
Birth control; viewed as genocide by militant Negroes. R. Z. Hallow; S ... 535; see also C, 810
  See also Abortion
Birthday party, the. Reviewed by H. Clurman; MP ... 29
Black, Hillel; on profits from credit ... 686
Black Dwarf (periodical). See Tribune
"Black lung." See Coal industry
Black panther party; leaders harassed by law ... 74 ff.; 368-370, 492, 496
  Two members killed at UCLA by rival group, US. By R. Rogers; S ... 558
Black quartet, a. Reviewed by H. Clurman; D ... 612
Blackburn, Paul
  Caught giving away love; P ... 606
  Halfway down the coast; P ... 606
Blackstone, Sidney
  Desperate lack of playwrights; S ... 162; see also 90
Blatnik, Representative John A.; instrumental in Interior department's reversal of order against pollution of Lake Superior by Reserve mining company ... 796
Blumenfeld, Yorick
  The scenario society; prophetic simulation by war-games theorists, militant students, et al.; S ... 788
Bly, Robert Arts; P ... 739
Bohen, Fred; explosive document on public television from administrator of Public broadcast laboratory ... 635-636
Boles, Alan
  College press: upstarts in the ivy; S ... 429
Bonafede, Dom
  Blunder in Brazil: Washington backs the Pooh Bahs; S ... 663
Bongartz, Roy
  No more sombreros: the Chicano (Mexican-American) rebellion in California; S ... 271; see also C, 386 and 405
Books; cut in funds for in Nixon HEW budget; E ... 750
Boothby, Paul
  Editorial Verdict in New Orleans ugly in tone and misleading on prosecution of C. Shaw; C ... 450, with editorial reply; see also E, 324
Boston Herald-Traveler Corp.; radio and TV license not renewed by FCC; E ... 197
Botswana; part of South Africa's apartheid empire ... 596 ff.
Boulez, Pierre; leadership of New York philharmonic orchestra. D. Hamilton; M ... 549
Bourdet, Claude
  France without father following resignation of de Gaulle; S ... 589
  French referendum: the mask of de Gaulle; S ... 526
  Perils of G. Pompidou, victor in French presidential election; E ... 812
  Tribute to late historian-journalist A. Werth; S ... 358
  To succeed A. Werth as European correspondent; E ... 388
Bowering, George
  Man with broom; P ... 58
Boycotts; by Holly Springs, Miss., Negroes. M. L. Berzon; S ... 793
Boyer, Leonard
  Manchester, N. H., Union Leader caused imprisonment of pacifist W. Uphaus; C ... 482; see also 397
Boyle, Kay, et al.
  Contributions needed for striking professors of San Francisco state college; C ... 226
Boyle, W. A. (Tony); mine workers' president slow to advocate compensation payments for "black lung" ... 529 ff.
Bradley, Thomas; Los Angeles Negro councilman's challenge to S. Yorty in mayoralty race ... 404-405
  Racism as factor in defeat. P. Kerby; E ... 749
  Strong showing against Yorty ... 811
  Upset victory over S. Yorty in primary; E ... 485
Brandt, Joe; general manager of Daily World ... 632, 633
Brandt, Willy; West German socialist leader's image fading ... 424-425
Brazil
  Blunder in; Washington backs Pooh Bah generals. D. Bonafede; S ... 663
  Role of AIFLD in bringing military dictatorship ... 46
  Storm warning for military regime. F. B. Kent; S ... 178
  Tanks roll in coup by military. W. Dean; S ... 18
Brecht, Bertolt. Play The resistible rise of Arturo Ui (Minnesota theatre company production) revewed by H. Clurman; D ... 60
Brennan, William J. 3d; New Jersey assistant state attorney general put on defensive for charging "too comfortable" relationship of officials with organized crime. F. J. Cook; S ... 105
Brewster, Kingman, Jr.; Yale president's views on campus dissent and disruption; E ... 588
Brittany. See France
Brook, Donna
  Differences between sexual discrimination and racial bias; C ... 354; see also 241
Brooke, Senator Edward W.; anti-MIRV resolution ... 813
Brooke, Dr. David and Wendy. See Medicine
Brooks, Thomas. See Berry, F.
Brower, David; guiding spirit of Sierra club under fire. R. A. Jones; S ... 567
Brown, H. Rap; Negro activist right on naturalness of violence in U.S.; E ... 779
Brown, Irving; controversial director of African American labor center ... 48
Brown, Lloyd L.
  White labor, black labor: the fomented conflict; S ... 179
Brown, William P.
  Police as mirrors of prejudice; S ... 498
Bruce, Lennart
  An apple; P ... 410
Brzezinski, Zbigniew; elitist formula for opportunity in U.S. ... 300
Bucher, Commander Lloyd M. See Pueblo (ship)
Buckley, William F., Jr.; attack on oil-depletion allowance; allegation of Nation's dependence thereon erroneous; E ... 421
Buff, Dr. I. E.; crusade against "black lung" ... 531 ff.
Bullins, Ed. Play The gentleman caller reviewed by H. Clurman; D ... 612
Bunting, Major; Protestant extremist in Northern Ireland ... 629 ff.
Burchinal, Major general David A.; negotiations on Spanish bases tempered by State department; E ... 323
Bureaucracy; "co-optation" as defense against dissent ... 425 ff.
  Toward social ethic in; E ... 292
Burger, Chief justice Warren E.; compared with predecessor, E. Warren; E ... 682
  Public-relations man R. A. Viguerie's distribution of background material on, in White House envelopes; E ... 749
Burke, Kenneth
  Eye-crossing—from Brooklyn to Manhattan; P ... 700
Burkhead, Jesse
  C. Cohen's advocacy of faculty control untraditional and conservative; C ... 586; see also 324
Burns, Hugh; chairman of California senate's un-American activities committee's profitable insurance activities; E ... 134
Burstein, Rabbi Samuel M.
  Myth of international guarantees in Middle East; C ... 130; see also E, 35
Business
  Beneficiary of Pentagon procurement. R. F. Kaufman; S ... 328
  Danger on the job: the violence of omission in safety practices. R. Nader; S ... 166
  Discrimination against women as target of new feminists. J. Freeman; S ... 241
  Diversification through application of knowledge ... 458-459; see also C, 650
  Fomenter of conflict between white and black labor. L. L. Brown; S ... 179
  Gets lion's share of new building; E ... 557
  Golden ox of antitrust; penalties could swell U.S. revenues. M. Mintz; S ... 467
  Heights in hierarchy not reached via "cow colleges" ... 298
  Influence on Congress ... 392
  Influence on U.S. foreign policy ... 265
  Lake Superior as private dump. G. Hill; S ... 795
  Mass employment of retired military officers as executives; E ... 419
  Myths of in magazine Careers Today ... 316
  Profitable defense contracts ... 659-660
  Profits from credit ... 686
  Proposed revamping of tax deductions ... 762
  Slight effect on of proposed repeal of investment tax credit; E ... 554
  Take-over of land ... 276
  Tempted to leave troubled cities ... 367
  Unconcern with working poor ... 725

C

Cabora Bassa; projected hydroelectric complex on Zambezi river ... 598

Index

251522

PAGE

- Cahill, Thomas; San Francisco police chief's withdrawal of support from department's community relations division 503 ff.
- Caldwell, Ben. Play Prayer meeting, or The first militant minister, reviewed by H. Clurman; D 612
- Calendar; 20th century ends Dec. 31, 2000, and 1970s end Dec. 31, 1970. H. Cushman; C 194; see also E, 35
- California
  - Behind university riots; San Francisco state college as urban campus prototype. M. B. Freedman; S 38
  - Case of California rural legal assistance (CRLA) against Agriculture secretary Hardin for failure to introduce food-stamp program; E 452
  - Contributions needed for striking professors of San Francisco state college. K. Boyle et al.; C 226
  - Controversial Tulare Co. clinic, Salud. R. B. Taylor; S 7
  - Court decision forbidding hospitals to refuse admission to poor patients as victory for Dr. D. Brooks of Salud clinic; E 133
  - Grape boycott and the national labor relations act. R. B. Taylor; S 591
  - Insurance firms' interest in buying state college system; E 262
  - No more sombreros: the Chicano (Mexican-American) rebellion. R. Bongartz; S 271; see also C, 386 and 405
  - Observance of anniversary of M. L. King, Jr.'s, death blocked in state senate; E 453
  - Police politics 493, 496
  - Profitable insurance activities of H. Burns, chairman of state senate un-American activities committee; E 134
  - Public utilities commission's favorable rulings on rate increases; E 36
  - Reagan-planned crackdown on Berkeley "people's park" demonstrators; E 747; 784 ff; see also C, 810
  - "Revivalist" program proposed for schools under Governor Reagan; E 685
  - West coast parties: California weather breeder. M. Harris; S 110
  - Why the colleges blew up. K. Widmer; S 237
- Canada; prime minister P. E. Trudeau on need to give disaffected minorities a voice in government 101
- Canterbury tales. Reviewed by H. Clurman; D 253
- Caoussin, Ronan (Carléon); Breton nationalist interviewed 231-233
- Campbell, Judge William; called grand jury to investigate 1968 Chicago demonstrations 422-423
- Capital punishment; no U.S. executions in 1968; problem for Supreme court of 500 remaining condemned prisoners. E. Gertz; E 101
  - Opposed for assassin S. B. Sirhan as for others; E 589
- Capitalism; white and black both unresponsive to needs of poor. B. Fulks; C 194
- Careers Today; critique of new magazine. L. M. Andrews; S 315
- Caritas Internationalis; Catholic relief organization's aid to Biafra 303
- Carlile, Henry
  - Garage; P 28
- Carmines, Al. Musical Promenade reviewed by R. Hatch; D 837
- Cars. See Automobiles
- Carter, Alprentice (Bunchy); black panther killed at UCLA by rival group, US 558
- Cartoons; of 1968 14-15
- Case, Senator Clifford P.; anti-MIRV resolution 813
- Cassese, John; militant leader of New York City police benevolent association 494 ff.
- Castelo Branco, General Humberto; late dictatorial president of Brazil 663-664
- Catena, Gerardo (Jerry); Jersey Mafia boss's alleged relationship with public officials 107-108
- Catholic church
  - Anti-Franco priests in Spain; E 133
  - Authoritarianism of Archbishop R. E. Lucey opposed in Texas; E 3
  - Lost control of own progressive forces in Italy 752
  - Moves toward desegregation in South 603
  - Northern Irish adherents' battle for rights 628 ff.
  - Opposition among priests to Brazilian military regime 178
  - Strong proponent of Biafra 303
- Caught giving away love. P. Blackburn; P 606
- Celebration. Reviewed by H. Clurman; D 220
- Celler, Representative Emanuel; on deficiencies in anti-riot act of 1968 753
- Censorship; of dispatches from Nigeria 302
- Ceremonies in dark old men. Reviewed by H. Clurman; D 253
- Chafee, Navy secretary John H.; overruled admirals' recommendation of court-martial for Commander L. M. Bucher of Pueblo 620

PAGE

- Charity; problems of agencies collecting furniture, clothing, etc.; E 37
  - Proposals on tax deductions 762
- Charleston, South Carolina; hospital strike brings civil-rights spotlight on city 654, 655
- Chavez, César; leader of grape strike and boycott in California 591 ff.
- Che! Reviewed by R. Hatch; MP 806
- Chekhov, Anton. Film version of play The sea gull reviewed by H. Clurman; MP 220
- Chemical industry; campaign to whitewash DDT 309-310
- Chemicals; pollution of oceans; E 293
- Chess; complications of playing equipment 210; see also C, 290
- Chicago
  - Committee to defend the conspiracy formed for eight indicted protest leaders; contributions needed; C 746
  - Defense against Daley: "the conspiracy" of eight indictees on trial. L. D. Nachman; S 752
  - Indictments for conspiracy: Daley vs. the guerrilla theatre. R. Whitehead, Jr.; S 422
  - Mayor R. J. Daley stumbles; two machine aldermen defeated; E 389
  - Mayor Daley's revenge; conspiracy indictments against eight protest leaders; E 420
  - 1968 street confrontation illustrates character of reaction 626
- Chicanos. See Mexican Americans
- China, Communist
  - Hardening of U.S. policy toward 263
  - U.S. nuclear edge over 169 ff.
  - Ussuri river not issue in face-off with Soviet Union. C. P. Fitzgerald; S 465
  - Views voiced by protégé Albania at U.N. By A. Tuckerman; S 566
- Chisholm, Representative Shirley; Negro freshman in House 6-7
  - Speech against Vietnam war; E 450
- Christmas. M. Leib; P 155
- Chromosomes. See Genetics
- Cigarettes; advertising discontinued on Westinghouse TV and by Canadian broadcasting corp.; pressures on and by other networks; E 685
- Cimring, Harry
  - Credibility gap transferred from Johnson to Nixon; C 618
- Cipnic, Dennis J.
  - Objections to R. Hatch review of film I am curious (yellow); C 554; see also 381
- Cities. See New towns
- Cities, U.S.
  - At threshold of housing crisis; E 557
  - Black crime, black victims. R. Pearman; S 500
  - Concern over missile sites 168 ff.
  - Federal appropriation to tidy slums; ravages of urban renewal 522
  - Going by the book; adherence to traditional practices by police and other public servants. H. J. Trubitt; S 507
  - In politics of anti-poverty. R. H. Davidson; S 233
  - Politics of blue power. E. Cray; S 493
  - Still forgotten: the working poor. D. Duggan; S 724
  - Strategies of oppression for the ghetto wars. M. Oppenheimer; S 366
  - Welfare burden; E 67
- Cities in bezique. Reviewed by H. Clurman; D 158
- Citizens committee for peace with security; misleading pro-ABM ad; E 812
- City, the. D. Ignatow; P 349
- City center ballet. Reviewed by H. Clurman; D 210, 710, 742
- Civil defense. See United States—Defense, national
- Civil liberties; contrast between Denmark and U.S.; E 6
- Civil rights. See Negroes—Civil rights
- Claiborne, Robert
  - Advertising irrelevant for consumer industries; C 194; see also 82
  - Disagreement with J. McDermott thesis that knowledge is power; C 650; see also 458
- Clay, William; Negro freshman in House 6-7
- Clayton, James L.
  - Usury of war. Vietnam: the 200-year mortgage; S 661
- Cleaver, Eldridge, Negro militant interviewed before jumping bail. H. E. Weinstein; S 74
- Cleveland, Ohio—Mayor Stokes's struggle with police force 493
  - Negro opposition to housing project—racism or self-interest?; E 292
  - Rough going for Negro mayor C. Stokes's re-election campaign. A. Z. Silver; E 524
- Click. M. S. Levinson; P 282
- Clouzot ,Henri-Georges. Film La prisionère reviewed by R. Hatch; MP 444
- Clurman, Harold
  - Reviews of ballet
    - City center ballet 221, 710, 742

PAGE

    - Various ballet and dance groups 710
  - Reviews of motion pictures
    - Birthday party, the 29
    - Great Catherine 220
    - Killing of Sister George, the 29
    - Salesman 318
    - Sea gull, the (S. Lumet production) 220
  - Reviews of plays
    - Adaptation 281
    - Big time Buck White 60
    - Black quartet, a 612
    - Canterbury tales 253
    - Celebration 220
    - Ceremonies in dark old men 253
    - Cities in bezique 158
    - Cock-a-doodle dandy (APA production) 187
    - Contribution 548
    - Dames at sea 189
    - Dear world 253
    - Does a tiger wear a necktie? 346
    - Evening with Max Morath, an 548
    - Evening with Merlin Finch, an 125
    - Fire! 220
    - Forty carats 125
    - Gentleman caller, the 612
    - Great goodness of life (a coon show) 612
    - Hadrian VII 124
    - Hamlet (N. Williamson production) 643
    - House of Atreus, the (Minnesota theatre company production) 60
    - In the bar of a Tokyo hotel 709
    - In the matter of J. Robert Oppenheimer 379
    - Inner journey, the 477
    - Invitation to a beheading 477
    - Jimmy Shine 61
    - Miser, the (Lincoln center production) 675
    - Next 281
    - Play it again, Sam 282
    - Prayer meeting, or The first militant minister 612
    - Promises, promises 125
    - Red, white and Maddox 221
    - Resistible rise of Arturo Ui, the (Minnesota theatre company production) 60
    - 1776 443
    - Someone's comin' hungry at my pocket 478
    - Stop, you're killing me 477
    - Tango 157
    - To be young, gifted and black 548
    - Warning, the—a theme for Linda 613
    - Year Boston won the pennant, the 741
- Coal industry; forced to pay West Virginia miners compensation for "black lung." R. G. Sherrill; S 529; see also C, 714, with Sherrill reply
  - Negligence in safety and work standards for miners; incidence of "black lung." R. Nader; S 166
- Cobbs, Price. See Grier, William
- Cock-a-doodle dandy (APA production). Reviewed by H. Clurman; D 187
- Coffin, Tristram
  - Nixon's war in Vietnam; S 262
- Cohen, Carl
  - Democracy and the curriculum; S 334; see also C, 586 and 682
- Colitt, Leslie R.
  - Letter from Germany; reunification problems dramatized by TV program; S 283
- Colleges and universities. See Education
- Colorado; chemical and biological warfare materials at Denver arsenal; plutonium fire at Rocky Flats atomic plant; E 781
- Colorado, university of; report on unidentified flying objects; E 100
- Colt industries, inc.; employment of retired general in obtaining M-16 rifle contract 330
- Columbia river; contamination by atomic plants; E 454
- Columbia university; radicals' misunderstanding of institution's behavior 462
  - See also Education
- Commins, Eugene. See Berry, F.
- Committee to defend the conspiracy
  - Funds needed for eight protesters indicted in Chicago; C 746
- Communion. D. Ignatow; P 183
- Communism; bogey in paranoid U.S. foreign policy 266 ff.
  - Claims to power in Italy amid unrest 752
  - Daily World, family newspaper in U.S. By D. Smith; S 631
  - Setbacks in France 590
- Community action program; target in politics of anti-poverty 234 ff.
- Composers' showcase. Concerts reviewed by D. Hamilton; M 350
- Comrades, which of us wouldn't be against war. W. Biermann; P 440
- Condon, Dr. Edward U.; U. of Colorado report on unidentified flying objects; E 100 and 781
- Conservation; DDT and the constitution; move to ban pesticide. H. Henkin; S 308
  - Fratricide in the Sierra club. R. A. Jones; S 567; see also C, 650

PAGE

- Setback in frustration of S. L. Udall plan for large-scale creation of national-monument acreage; E 164
- Conservative party (New York); strengthened by J. Marchi victory in New York City Republican mayoralty primary; E 810
- Conservatives; American security council and other sponsors of seminars; E 389
  - Beneficiaries of new left's tactics 667-668
  - Prognosis of crackdown by in U.S. following Vietnam war: the wheel of panic. T. J. Lowi; S 624
  - Right-wingers unhappy with early Nixon appointments and policies; E 290
  - Violent rightist groups sometimes supported by police 368
- Consumer protection; American telephone and telegraph company's consumer-be-damned attitude. W. P. Rokes; S 820
  - Brief tenure of Miss W. M. Rogers, director of Good Housekeeping institute, as White House adviser on consumer affairs; E 260
  - Consumer be damned! Price fixing of light bulbs by General electric. W. F. Mattes; S 823
  - Truth in packaging: how much a pound? A. Q. Mowbray; S 730
- Consumership; five myths of. D. Smythe; S .... 82; see also C, 194
- Containerization; behind longshoremen's strike; E 4
- Conte, Representative Silvio O.; co-sponsor of bill to limit farm-subsidy payments; E.... 749
- Contraception. See Birth control
- Contribution. Reviewed by H. Clurman; D 548
- Cook, Fred J.
  - Mobsters in pasture: Nostra Jersey; organized crime in New Jersey; S 105
- Cooperman, Stanley
  - Recognition (for Henry Dumas); P 672
- Co-opting; taking over of radical programs and people by those they criticize .... 425 ff.
- Corporation for public broadcasting; establishment bias charged .... 634 ff.
- Cosa Nostra. See Crime
- Costa e Silva, President Arthur da. See Brazil
- Cowan, Edward
  - Oil on the waters from wells off Santa Barbara, Calif.; S 304
- Cray, Ed
  - The politics of blue power, as in Police benevolent association vs. Mayor Lindsay of New York City; S 493
- Credit; depression warning: out on the credit limb. M. Tanzer; S .... 686; see also C, 746
  - High interest in proposed uniform consumer credit code; E 388
- Cricket poem. T. Baland; P 342
- Crime
  - Among police 487
  - And moral education. R. Peters; S 49
  - Black crime, black victims. R. Pearman; S 500
  - Car theft: a heist a minute. L. Raskin; S 434
  - Mobsters in pasture: Nostra Jersey. F. J. Cook; S 105
  - Preventive detention for potential criminals: bail for the rich, jail for the poor. H. Subin; S 363
  - Stockade justice: the army's kangaroo courts. K. H. Purnell; S 432
  - Wiretapping against authorized by title III of omnibus crime control and safe streets act of 1968. S. Fly; S 697
  - See also Police
- Crist, Robb; psychodrama sessions at Midpeninsula free university 463-464
- Cross, Jennifer
  - Lucky for whom?: "games" sales promotions of gasoline and groceries; S .... 370; see also C, 482
- Crossword puzzles. F. W. Lewis. Back pages each issue
- Crozier, W. P.; former editor of Manchester Guardian compared with K. Martin 294
- Crump, E. H.; legacy of Memphis boss 401
- Csikszentmihalyi, Mihaly
  - The rigors of play; S .... 210; see also C, 290, with writer's reply
- Cuba; hijacking of U.S. planes to Havana. K. M. Ruppenthal; S 144
  - Weather change in? R. W. Dietsch; S 826
- Culture; laying on of among few gifted students at U.S. "cow colleges." J. McDermott; S 296
  - Slighted by federal government; department of cultural affairs urged; E 326
- Currencies. See Money
- Curtis, Representative Thomas B.; bill to reform Congress 391
- Cushman, Howard
  - 1970s end Dec. 31, 1970; 20th century ends Dec. 31, 2000; C .... 194; see also E, 35

PAGE

- Czapski, Michael; young Detroit policeman killed while investigating meeting of militant Negroes 486
- Czechoslovakia; Soviet invasion denounced by French and Italian units of World federation of trade unions (WFTU) 291
  - Soviet invasion justified by E. J. Kahn scenario 790

D

- Dahrendorf, Ralf; "systemic fascism" feared for West Germany; E 714
- Daily World; Communism's family newspaper in U.S. By D. Smith; S 631
- Daley, Mayor Richard J.; See Chicago
- Dames at sea. Reviewed by H. Clurman; D.... 189
- Dance, the. For reviews, see Clurman, H.
- Dassin, Jules. Film Up tight reviewed by R. Hatch; MP 62
- Davidson, Roger H.
  - The politics of anti-poverty; S 233
- Davies, John Paton, Jr.; security clearance after 15 years following dismissal from State department; E 101
- Davies, Peter Maxwell; British composer interviewed. D. Hamilton; M 284
- DDT and the constitution; move to ban pesticide. H. Henkin; S 308
- Dean, Warren
  - Brazil: the tanks roll in coup by military; S 18
- Dear world. Reviewed by H. Clurman; D 253
- Death. D. Goetz; P 767
- Debt. See Credit
- December. By J. Swift; P 382
- Decline and fall of a bird watcher. Reviewed by R. Hatch; MP 187
- DeCrow, Karen
  - Feminists neither aimless nor divided; C .... 354; see also 241
- Defoliation; effects in Vietnam observed by zoology professors E. W. Pfeiffer and G. H. Orians; E 484
- de Gaulle, President Charles. See France
- De Kooning, Willem. Exhibition at Museum of modern art reviewed by L. Alloway; A 380
- Democracy; and curriculum in U.S. universities. C. Cohen; S .... 334; see also C, 586, 604 (Cohen reply), and 682
- Democratic party
  - Exposure of conservative Democratic Congressmen's Republican voting record by liberal Democratic study group; E 451
  - Split in New York City widened by mayoralty primary race and victory of M. Procaccino; E 810
  - Troubles shown in analysis of 1968 elections; E 194
  - Watershed of politics: a Democrat speaks to the question. J. Unruh; S 199
- Denmark; permissive society compared with authoritarianism in U.S.; E 6
- Detention centers; bills to outlaw U.S. concentration camps; E 716
- Devastating side effect of the Vietnam war. W. Biermann; P 440
- Devlin, Bernadette; young M.P. from Northern Ireland 628, 631
- Dickson, David W.; provost of Federal city college, Washington, D.C. 594, 595
- Dietsch, Robert W.
  - Half an eye on $20 billion; small Bureau of the budget staff to oversee defense procurement; S 331
  - Weather change in Cuba?; S 826
- Dinah. By A. R. Ammons; P 26
- Dingell, Representative John D.; hearings on gasoline-station promotion "games" 370, 371
- Dirksen, Senator Everett M.; advocacy of bill ensuring immunity of newspapers from antitrust proceedings 817
- Disasters. See Accidents
- Dissent. See Radicals
- District of Columbia. See Washington, D.C.
- Dizenzo, Charles. Play An evening with Merlin Finch reviewed by H. Clurman; D.. 125
- Doar, John; advocate of black capitalism and president of New York City board of education 180
- Doctors. See Medicine
- Does a tiger wear a necktie? Reviewed by H. Clurman; D 346
- Dominican Republic; border incidents with Haiti 395-396
- Donner, Frank J.
  - Judicial overkill: use of the injunction against student disruption; S .... 718; see also C, 810
- Don't walk. P. Zweig; P 577
- Douglas, Justice William O.; rightist campaign to force resignation; E 716
- Douglass, James W.
  - Support appeal for anti-Vietnam marines T. J. Met and Y. C. Gray; C 98
- Dow, Philip
  - Self-portrait at thirty; P 62

PAGE

- Dow chemical company; plutonium fire at Rocky Flats, Colo., atomic plant; E 781
- Draft. See United States—Defense, national
- Dreifus, Claudia
  - Which memo?: the odor of fraud in A. Fargas induction case; S .... 176; see also C, 258
- Dresh, Mrs. Lee
  - Praise due Senator R. Yarborough for courageous stands; C 714
- Drucker, S.
  - Myth of U.S.-Soviet compatibility in Middle East; C .... 149; see also E, 35
- Drugs; damage suits against makers of Terramycin and Aureomycin 467
  - Movement among medical students to reject firms' gifts of equipment; E 325
- DuBridge, Lee A.; appointed Nixon science adviser; E 5
- Du Broff, Sidney
  - East of the wall: Germany no longer; S .. 269
  - Due process; rank-and-file demand in many fields for participation in decision making; E 2
- Duggan, Dennis
  - Still forgotten: the working poor; S 724
- Dulles, John Foster; as Secretary of State, dominated President Eisenhower 418
- Dutt, Utpal; leftist Indian actor, producer, playwright 804
- Duvalier, President François. See Haiti

E

- EC-121 (airplane). See Pueblo (ship).
- Education
  - Black studies: the real issue. J. Hatch; S.... 755
  - Blacks on campus: angry and alone together. K G. Gross; S 207
  - California: why the colleges blew up. K. Widmer; S 237
  - California U. "people's park" rioting at Berkeley; E .... 716 and 747; 784; see also C, 810
  - Campus missionaries: the laying on of culture; "cow college" faculties' concentration on gifted students while ignoring great majority. J. McDermott; S 297
  - Centralization as issue in 1968 French student riots 526, 527
  - College press: upstarts in the ivy. A. Boles; S 429
  - Color in the classroom: integration vs. decentralization. I. Kraft; S 71
  - Contributions needed for striking professors of San Francisco state college. K. Boyle et al.; C 226
  - Contributions of former director of education H. Howe in Health, education and welfare department. H. Golden; S 181
  - Cuts for books and libraries in Nixon HEW budget; E 750
  - Defense department and right-wing seminars of persuasion; General Westmoreland as participant; E 389
  - Democracy and the curriculum in universities. C. Cohen; S .... 334; see also C, 586, 604 (Cohen reply), and 682
  - E. Cleaver on role of militant Negro students. H. E. Weinstein; S 74
  - East German nursery schools and advanced-education grants 270
  - Education for relevance: first year at Federal city college, Washington, D.C. By D. Swanston; S 594
  - Effects of Defense department's stalling tactics on graduates' draft deferments; E.... 197
  - French bias in Martinique 783
  - Harvard U. student rebellion; lack of motivation until calling in of police; E 524
  - Implications of insurance firms' interest in buying California state college system; E 262
  - Isolation of new left dissidents. C. Gershman; S 666
  - Italian student disorders 751
  - Jewish college students like others; noninvolvement with tradition. H. Golden; S.... 404
  - Judicial overkill: overuse of injunction against student disruption. F. J. Donner; S .... 718; see also C, 810
  - Low state in Haiti 393
  - Midpeninsula free university, Menlo Park, Calif.: the jivy league. K. Power; S 463
  - Mississippi: signs of life. New members of state university law school. K. Vinson; S 791
  - Misuse of science in war projects; "research stoppage" planned by professors; E 228
  - Muzzle on speakers at state universities in Mississippi. C. Wilkie; E 132
  - Neglect of Mexican Americans in California 272-273
  - Nixon blast against student revolutionaries; dissenters double-crossed at Voorhees college, South Carolina; E 588

PAGE

  - Nixon doubletalk encourages Southern school systems, as in Worth county, Georgia, to back off from racial integration; E 132
  - Nixon's evasive statement on campus unrest; E 418
  - Overclass/underclass in U.S. society: knowledge is power. J. McDermott; S .... 458; see also C, 650
  - Panthers and tribesmen: black guns on UCLA campus. R. Rogers; S 558
  - Power over knowledge: what is a university? R. Sampson; S 560
  - Professors' move toward social ethic; E 292
  - Prophetic scenarios of student action 788
  - Rebellion as education. K. Widmer; S 537
  - "Revivalist" program proposed for California schools under Governor Reagan; E.... 685
  - Rules with reasons: the bases of moral education. R. Peters; S 49
  - San Francisco state college: urban campus prototype. M. B. Freedman; S 38
  - School-integration enforcement as Nixon's first test. G. Orfield; S 79
  - Student opposition to Brazilian military regime 178
  - Trustee, resign!; need for gradual democratizing of university and museum boards. G. G. Kirstein; S 727
  - Wide agitation by students for role in decision making; E 3
  - Yale president Brewster's views on campus dissent and disruption; E 588
- Eisenhower, Dwight D.; appraisal of late President and military leader; E 418
  - Supported 1967 L. L. Strauss technological peace plan for Middle East 163
  - Use of "military-industrial complex" in farewell speech; who coined phrase?; E 525
- Elder, Lonne. Play Ceremonies in dark old men reviewed by H. Clurman; D 253
- Elections, U.S.; campaign truth needed 201
  - 1968 may set trend; Democrats in trouble; E 194
  - See also specific constituencies
- Electrical and electronics engineers, institute of; symposium on role of citizen engineer; Congressmen's inability to judge Pentagon devices;; E 421
- Employment; discrimination against Negroes in space industry. J. Robertson; S 814
  - Discrimination against women as target of new feminists .... 242 ff.
- Engineers; expansion of social consciousness; E .... 421 and 454
- Environmental defense fund (EDF); effort to ban DDT in Wisconsin .... 308 ff.
- Espionage. See Pueblo (ship)
- Ethics; of drug firms' gifts to medical students; E 325
  - Questions raised by forced resignation of justice A. Fortas; E .... 650 and 716
  - Toward a social ethic among bureaucracies in U.S.; E 292
- European human rights commission; hearing on Greek junta. J. Becket; S 11
- Evening with Max Morath, an. Reviewed by H. Clurman; D 548
- Evening with Merlin Finch, an. Reviewed by H. Clurman; D 125
- Evolution; plans to teach only as theory in California 685
- Eye-crossing—from Brooklyn to Manhattan. K. Burke; P 700

F

- Fairbank, John K.; president of American historical association on selection of convention sites 78
- Falk, Richar A.
  - Elements of settlement of Vietnam war, Saigon notwithstanding; S 689
- Fallis, Howard
  - Nixon not more favorable than Johnson to oil industry, despite C. Welles article of Dec. 23; C 162
- Fanon, Frantz; Martinique background of late Negro ideologue 783
- Fargas, Antonio; possible target of fraud in induction case. C. Dreifus; S .... 176; see also C, 258
- Fascism; "systemic" variety, described by R. Dahrendorf, feared for West Germany; E.... 714
  - U.S. approach to seen in "little wars" by police and national guard against protesters; E 716
- FB-111; costly tactical bomber .... 658 ff.
- Federal bureau of investigation (FBI). See United States—Justice department
- Feiffer Jules. Play Little murders reviewed by R. Hatch; D 94
- Feir, Robert E.
  - Exceptions to C. Cohen's Democracy and the curriculum; C .... 586; see also 334

PAGE

- Feminists, the new; National organization for women and Women's liberation front. J. Freeman; S .... 241; see also C, 354
- Fenster, Leo
  - Mexican auto swindle: high costs and low production; S 693
- Ferlinghetti, Lawrence
  - The third world; P 92
- Fern roots. A. Alwan; P 738
- Films. See Motion pictures
- Findley, Representative Paul; bill to limit farm-subsidy payments; E 749
  - Candid on Vietnam; E 450
- Fiore, C. Richard; New Jersey assemblyman's alleged connections with organized crime .... 107 ff.
- Fire! Reviewed by H. Clurman; D 220
- Fitzgerald, C. P.
  - Sino-Russian face-off: the Ussuri river is not the issue; S 465
- Fitzsimmons, Frank; teamster leader against Vietnam war and for youth .... 758 ff.
- Fly, Sally
  - The Orwell law: new wiretaps on freedom by title III of omnibus crime control and safe streets act of 1968; S 697
- Flying saucers. See Unidentified flying objects (UFOs)
- Food; grocery sales promotions through "games." J. Cross; S 370
  - Stamp and other programs for poor stingily administered by Agriculture department; E 452; 655
  - Truth in packaging: how much a pound? A. Q. Mowbray; S 730
- Foot, Michael; British old leftist in debate with new leftists .... 721 ff.
- Foran, Thomas; U.S. attorney's prosecution of 1968 Chicago demonstrators 422, 423
- Ford foundation; set up Public broadcast laboratory (PBL) 635, 636
- Foreign aid; fails to produce reforms 267
  - To Brazil under military regimes 664
- Foreign exchange. See Money
- Forman, James; take-over of Riverside church pulpit to demand reparations for blacks; E.. 618
- Fort Lauderdale, Florida; marijuana crackdown; E .... 293; see also C, 509
- Fortas, Abe; resignation of Supreme court justice after exposure of ethical improprieties; episode as example of national failure of social conscience; E .... 650; see also C, 746
  - Wake of resignation brings rightist campaign against liberals, including justice W. O. Douglas; E 716
- Forty carats. Reviewed by H. Clurman; D 125
- Foundations; circulating elite of officers in government; E 131
  - Need for trustees of varied background 728-729
  - See also Ford foundation
- France
  - Brittany: revolution in a cemetery; resurgent nationalism in region. M. Mainwaring; S 229
  - Issues in student unrest. R. Sampson; S 560
  - Martinique's wretched economic conditions. P. Geismar; S 782
  - Mask of de Gaulle in referendum on regional structure. C. Bourdet; S 526
  - Perils for G. Pompidou, victor in presidential election. C. Bourdet; E 812
  - Proposal for four-power effort to break Middle East deadlock. A. Tuckerman; S .... 198; see also C, 322
  - Refusal to devalue franc 651
  - Without father following resignation of de Gaulle. By C. Bourdet; S 589
- Franco, Generalissimo Francisco. See Spain
- Frau ohne Schatten, die. Metropolitan opera performance and London Richmond recording reviewed by D. Hamilton; M 414
- Free democratic party (FDP); conservative group's surprise vote of West German socialist presidential candidate .... 423 ff.
- Freedman, Mervin B.
  - San Francisco state college: urban campus prototype; S 38
- Freedom; varieties in Denmark and U.S.; E 6
- Freeman, Jo
  - The new feminists; S .... 241; see also C, 354
- FRELIMO; Mozambique rebel group challenged by Cabora Bassa hydroelectric complex 598
- Friedland, David J.; New Jersey assemblyman's alleged relations with organized crime 108
- From the diggings. A. Stoutenberg; P 802
- Fulks, Bryan
  - Black capitalism, like white, unresponsive to needs of poor; C 194

G

- Gabor, Robert Thomas; director of Peace with freedom, inc., excluded from Kenya 48-49

PAGE

- Gallagher, Representative Cornelius E.; charged by Life with collaboration with Mafia figure J. Zicarelli 107
- Gambling; mobster control in New Jersey 106
- Games; in gasoline and grocery sales promotions. J. Cross; S .... 370; see also C, 482
  - See also Play; War games
- Garage. H. Carlile; P 28
- Gardner, W. David
  - Journal of abuse: Manchester, New Hampshire, Union Leader; S .... 397; see also C, 482
- Garrison, District attorney Jim. See Shaw, C.
- Gas, poison; U.S. army's indefensible proposal to ship surplus tonnage by rail, then dump it in Atlantic; E .... 653, 717, and 781
  - Use by Berkeley, Calif., police and national guard 787
  - Utah sheep killed; belated admission by army 717
- Gasoline. See Oil
- Gatch, Dr. Donald; publicized hunger in Beaufort, S.C. 655
- Gauule, President Charles de. See France
- Gearey, David A.; not draft dodger but conscientious objector. M. M. Krapatkin; C, with C. Dreifus reply, 258; see also 176
- Geismer, Peter
  - "Je suis français": the wretched of Martinique; S 782
- General electric. Consumer be damned!; price fixing of electric bulbs. W. F. Mattes; S 823
  - Space jobs for Negroes 815-816
- General motors corp. See Automobiles
- Genetics; XYZ chromosone count as defense in criminal assault case; projected genetic manipulation by scientists; E 36
- Genovese, Eugene; historian on radical scholarship 78
- Gentleman caller, the. Reviewed by H. Clurman; D 612
- Geometry. J. Harasymowicz (translated by V. Contoski); P 216
- Georgia. Atlanta Constitution editor C. Pou's defense of role in 1966 gubernatorial election, against statements in A. Schardt article of Dec. 23; C, with Schardt reply, 130
  - Worth county and others encouraged to back off from school-desegregation requirements; E 132
- Germany; reunification problems dramatized by RV program. L. R. Colitt; S 283
- Germany, East; east of the wall: Germany no longer. S. Du Broff; S 269
- Germany, West
  - Bonn politics: mutation left and right. J. A. Morris, Jr.; S 423
  - Foxes of Bonn, including Chancellor Kiesinger, move to right; E 652
  - Mass media on U.S. space program. H. Popper; C 34
  - Paranoid policy toward East Germany.... 269 ff.
  - Refusal to increase value of mark 651
  - "Systemic fascism" feared by R. Dahrendorf; E 714
  - See also Berlin, West
- Gerson, Simon; executive editor of Daily World .... 632 ff.
- Gertz, Elmer
  - No work for the hangman; with practical end of capital punishment in U.S., problem for Supreme court of 500 remaining in death row; E 102
- Gershman, Carl
  - Isolation of the new left; S 666
- Geyelin, Philip; uncovered Defense campaign to "sell" ABM; E 259
- Ghazals: homage to Ghalib. By A. Rich; P 188
- Ghettos. See Cities, U.S.
- Gilbert, James
  - Scholarship or commitment: ferment at American historical association meeting; S 77
- Ginsberg, Allen, and Peter Orlovsky. Film Me and my brother reviewed by R. Hatch; MP 254
- Ginzburg, Martin; crippled New York assemblyman's appeal helped defeat bill to liberalize abortion; E 588
- Gittings, James A.
  - Agreement with A. Axelbank article on short political fuse in Japan; C .... 354; see also 141
- God. See Religion
- Godard, Jean-Luc. Film Pierrot le fou reviewed by R. Hatch; MP 126
- Goedicke, Patricia
  - Learning; P 216
- Goetz, Dorianne
  - Death; P 767
- Goldberg, Jacob
  - Fable of Sam and Vanya; prisoner's dilemma in war games; C 778

Index

PAGE

- Golden, Harry
  - Jewish college students now like others; noninvolvement with tradition; S 404
  - Middle-class laymen's domination of Southern protestant churches; S 602
  - Tribute to H. Howe, former director of education for Health, education and welfare department; S 181
- Goldman, Michael
  - In the woods; P 118
  - A picture in the news; P 185
- Goldwater, Senator Barry; appeal explained 460
  - Lecture "honoraria" between terms; E 683
- Gonzales, Representative Henry; fight to retain and strengthen U.S. renegotiation board 114-115
- Good Housekeeping institute. See Rogers, W. M.
- Goodbye, Columbus. Reviewed by R. Hatch; MP 550
- Goodell, Senator Charles; courageous endorsement of J. V. Lindsay for re-election as New York mayor 810
- Goodman, Ryah Tumarkin
  - Small as a fist; P 30
- Goodpaster, General Andrew J.; second in command in Vietnam influences Nixon to continue war 262
- Goodwill industries; deficit in collecting articles for charity 37
- Gordon, Lincoln; as ambassador to Brazil, instigated and executed U.S. pro-dictatorship policy 663-664
- Gordon, Max. Dec. 16 article, Emancipating the mental wards, praised. Dr. A. P. Bay; C 258
- Gowon, Major General Yakuba. See Nigeria
- Graham, Rev. Billy; evangelist and friend of Nixon calls police God's agents of punishment; E 653
  - Still in business with the Lord; E 814
- Grapes; California boycott and the national labor relations act. R. B. Taylor; S 591
  - Strike and boycott in California not generally backed by "Anglos" 272
- Grazie Zia. Reviewed by R. Hatch; MP 126
- Gray, Young C. (Gary). See Met, Thomas J.
- Great Britain
  - England's new left: young and angry talent. M. C. Shefetz; S 720
  - Race relations in England. T. Land; S 116
  - Sordid role in Nigerian civil war; E 357
  - Ulster (Northern Ireland) after the bludgeons of religions riots. B. Kiely; S 628
- Great Catherine. Reviewed by H. Clurman; MP 220
- Great goodness of life. Reviewed by H. Clurman; D 612
- Greece; intellectual and economic swamp under military dictatorship; rescue by A. Onassis?; E 525
  - Junta on trial. J. Becket; S 11
- Green, Max
  - Internes sought for program of World without war council of the United States; C 650
- Greenlee, Dr. Charles; Negro's articles against birth control 535-536; see also C, 810
- Greeley, Rev. Andrew M.; on frustrations of working poor 726
- Gregor, Arthur
  - The poem; P 766
- Grier, William, and Price Cobbs; on black community's self-contempt 757, 758
- Grito, El; organ of Quinto Sol group 272, 274; see also C, 387
- Groceries. See Food
- Gross, Kenneth G.
  - Blacks on campus: angry and alone together; S 207
- Group for contemporary music. Concerts reviewed by D. Hamilton; M 350
- Gruening, Ernest
  - New approach to ending Vietnam war; S 570
  - Nixon's "blueprint" for continued war abroad; E 781
  - Senate's responsibility for continued war in Vietnam; E 748
  - Volunteers for Vietnam, not draftees; proposed amendment to draft act; E 165
  - Return to editorial staff of The Nation; E 37
  - Testimonial dinner for in Boston. M. Peretz; C 226
- Grumbach, Aileen
  - Watch on MacDougal; P 742
- Guatemala; 1954 rightist revolution supported by AFL and CIA 46-47
- Gude, John, et al.
  - Memorial fund for Martha's Vineyard hospital proposed as tribute to late Nation associate E. Huling; C 541
- Guggenheim, Peggy. J. Pollock paintings in collection, shown at Guggenheim museum, reviewed by L. Alloway; A 221
- Guru. Reviewed by R. Hatch; MP 582
- Guthrie, Tyrone. Play The house of Atreus, adapted from Aeschylus, reviewed by H. Clurman; D 60

PAGE

H

- Haaland, Carsten M.
  - Faulty conclusions in M. J. Rosenberg article Blind strategy of missile defense; C, with Rosenberg reply, 522; see also 168
- Haden, William "Bouie"; militant Pittsburgh Negro leader's opposition to birth control 536; see also C, 810
- Hadrian VII. Reviewed by H. Clurman; D 124
- Haiti; ripe for the U.S. marines? R. A. Joseph; S 392; see also C, 541
- Halberstam, David; formerly Vietnam correspondent for New York Times, not Time; C 290; see also 267
- Hales, David
  - Praise for R. A. Jones article on Sierra club; C 650; see also 567
- Halfway down the coast. P. Blackburn; P 606
- Hallow, Ralph Z.
  - The blacks cry genocide against birth control; S 535; see also C, 810
- Hamilton, David
  - Interview with British composer P. M. Davies; M 284
  - Reviews of Music
    - Ariadne auf Naxos, by R. Strauss (Boston symphony concert performance) 413
    - Composers' showcase concerts, Whitney museum 350
    - Group for contemporary music concerts, New York City 350
    - League of composers — ISCM concerts, New York 349
    - Meistersinger, The (Metropolitan opera production) 93
    - New York philharmonic orchestra, P. Boulez conducting 549
    - New York philharmonic's commissioned works by contemporary composers; M. Babbitt's Relata II 218
    - Rosenkavalier, Der, by R. Strauss (Metropolitan opera production) 413
  - Reviews of recorded music
    - Berlioz, Mahler ninth, C. Nancarrow, R. Strauss 613
    - Blomdahl, K.-B.; Stockhausen, K.; Bach; mass in B minor; Gounod: Roméo et Juliette; Delibes: Lakmé 739
    - Contemporary chamber music 677
    - Mozart opera, Mahler, and others 189
    - Operatic arias, Schubert lieder, Mousgsorsky's Boris Godunov 475
    - R. Strauss operas Die Frau ohne Schatten and Ariadne auf Naxos 414
- Hamlet (N. Williamson production). Reviewed by H. Clurman; D 643
- Hanley, James. Play The inner journey reviewed by H. Clurman; D 477
- Hanns Eisler, or The anatomy of a phere. W. Biermann; P 440
- Hansberry, Lorraine. Play and writings selections, To be young, gifted and black, reviewed by H. Clurman; D 548
- Happiness is mail at your new address. P. Klappert; P 608
- Harasymowicz, Jerzy
  - Geometry (translated by V. Contoski); P 216
- Hardin, Secretary of agriculture Clifford M.; could qualify as secretary of state 140
  - See also United States — Agriculture department
- Harlow, Bryce N.; possible originator of phrase "military-industrial complex" 525
- Harriman, W. Averell; succeeded by H. C. Lodge as chief U.S. negotiator in Vietnam peace talks; E 68
- Harris, Michael
  - West coast parties: California weather breeder; S 110
- Harris, Lieutenant Stephen; intelligence officer of Pueblo 326
- Hart, Senator Philip A.; hearings on newspaper monopolies 817
  - Hearings on truth in packaging 730, 731
  - Opposition to tax deduction for corporation's antitrust penalties 468
- Harvard university; inadequately motivated student rebellion strengthened by police presence; E 524
- Hatch, James V.
  - Left theatre in India; D 804
- Hatch, John
  - Black studies: the real issue; S 755
- Hatch, Robert
  - Reviews of motion pictures
    - Che! 806
    - Decline and fall of a bird watcher 187
    - Goodbye, Columbus 550
    - Grazie Zia 126
    - Guru 582
    - I am curious (yellow) 381; see also C, 554
    - If . . . 348
    - King, Murray 646
    - Last summer 837
    - Loves of Isadora (Duncan) 644
    - Martyrs of love 254

PAGE

    - Me and my brother 254
    - Midnight cowboy 774
    - Pierrot le fou 126
    - Prisionière, la 444
    - Red and the white, the 478
    - Round up 740
    - Shame, the 61
    - Stolen kisses 126
    - Teorema 582
    - Up tight 62
  - Reviews of plays
    - Little murders 94
    - Promenade 837
- Hawaii; nationalists trapped in a mystique. W. L. Abbott; S 146
- Hayakawa, S. I.; embattled president of San Francisco state college 38 ff.
- Heffer, Eric; British old leftist in debate with new leftists 721 ff.
- Heinemann, Dr. Gustav; Socialist elected president of West Germany 423 ff.
- Heinl, R. D., Jr.
  - Praise for R. A. Joseph article on Haiti; C 541; see also 392
- Heller, Celia S.
  - Sociologist's observation on Mexican Americans distorted in R. Bongartz article; C, with Bongartz reply, 386; see also 271
- Henkin, Harmon
  - DDT and the constitution; move to ban pesticide; S 308
  - Three days on Mifflin street; police violence against Madison, Wis., student ghetto; E 653
- Herbst, Josephine; tribute to late critic and reporter; E 229
- Herlihy, James. Play trilogy Stop, you're killing me reviewed by H. Clurman; D 477
- Hershey, General Lewis B.; roadblock to changes in draft law 164
- Highways. See Roads
- Hill, Gladwin
  - Lake Superior, private dump; S 795
- Himmelstrand, Ulf
  - Moral case for Nigeria vs. Biafra more clear-cut than in S. Meisler article; C 450; see also 301
- Hippies; gone from San Francisco's Haight-Ashbury; E 357
- Historians; ferment over scholarship vs. commitment at American historical association meeting. J. Gilbert; S 77
- Hodges, Graham R.
  - Draft-reform recommendations of New York state conference of United church of Christ; C 34
- Hoffa, James R.; relations of imprisoned Teamsters president with anti-Kennedy Manchester, N.H., Union Leader 401
- Hoffer, Eric; President Johnson's favorite philosopher 42
- Hoffman, Daniel
  - Moonshot; P 408
- Hofstein, David
  - Sabbath is gone; P 154
- Hollman, Frank; tough, conservative Memphis fire and police commissioner 401 ff.
- "Honorarium"; meaning abused by fee-collecting politicians; E 683
- Horman, Charles
  - Public television: the producers organize; S 634
- Hospitals. See Medicine
- House of Atreus, the (Minnesota theatre company production). Reviewed by H. Clurman; D 60
- Housing; consumption of land in U.S. and Soviet Union 275
  - Growth of mortgage debt 687-688
  - Threshold of crisis in and near cities; E 557
- Hoving, Thomas P.; Metropolitan museum of art director's involvement with social-comment show Harlem on my mind. L. Alloway; A 156, 317
- Howe, Harold; tribute to former director of education for Health, education and welfare department. H. Golden; S 181
- Hubbard, Fred; Negro defeated machine candidate in Chicago aldermanic election; E 389
- Huebner, Lee; Nixon aide and former Ripon society president 203 ff.
- Huggins, John Jerome; black panther killed at UCLA by rival group, US 558
- Hughes, Catharine
  - Where are the playwrights?; D 90; see also C, 162
- Hughes, Howard; challenge to AEC on underground Nevada tests; E 453
- Huling, Elizabeth; memorial fund for Martha's Vineyard hospital proposed as tribute to late Nation associate; J. Gude et al.; C 541
- Humphries, Rolfe
  - The screaming meemies; P 574

PAGE

  - Tribute to late poet-translator; E ... 557
- Hunger. See Poverty
- Huxtable, Ada Louise; New York Times article on city's housing crisis; E ... 557

I

- I am curious (yellow). Reviewed by R. Hatch; MP ... 381; see also C, 554
- Ibo tribe. See Nigeria
- Ichord, Representative Richard; chairman of new House committee on internal security 260
- Iden, C. S.
  - Friends committee on national legislation publishes lists of congressional votes on key military measures; C ... 618; see also E, 484
- If . . . Reviewed by R. Hatch; MP ... 348
- Ignatow, David
  - The city; P ... 349
  - Communion; P ... 183
- Imbrie, McCrea, and Neil Selden. Play Someone's comin' hungry at my pocket reviewed by H. Clurman; D ... 478
- In the bar of a Tokyo hotel. Reviewed by H. Clurman; D ... 709
- In the matter of J. Robert Oppenheimer. Reviewed by H. Clurman; D ... 379
- In the woods. M. Goldman; P ... 118
- India; left theatre in; play Teer (Arrow) reviewed. J. V. Hatch; D ... 804
- Indians, U.S.; extermination as offering to manifest destiny ... 268; see also C, 322
- Individuality; threats to in U.S. ... 627-628
- Industry. See Business
- Inflation; in U.S. brought by Vietnam war ... 264
  - Role in maintaining U.S. financial stability 688
  - South Vietnam ... 779
- Injunctions; overuse of against student disruption. F. J. Donner; S ... 718; see also C, 810
- Inner journey, the. Reviewed by H. Clurman; D ... 477
- Inouye, Senator Daniel; bill to outlaw detention centers; E ... 716
- Insurance industry; interest in buying California state college system; E ... 262
- Intellectuals; failure to understand fundamentals of power in supertechnological age ... 460 ff.; see also C, 650
- Interest; controversial charges in proposed uniform consumer credit code; E ... 388
- International confederation of free trade unions (ICFTU). See Labor—Union
- International law. See Law
- Invitation to a beheading. Reviewed by H. Clurman; D ... 11
- Ireland; Irish literary censorship. M. Sheehy; S ... 833
  - Unification movement with Northern Ireland (Ulster); religious riots in latter. B. Kiely; S ... 628
- Israel
  - Airliner attacked by Arab terrorists in Zurich airport to provoke reprisals; E ... 258
  - Crossroads of Jerusalem, the. H. Krosney; S ... 134; see also C, 322
  - Desalinization plant proposed by President Johnson no substitute for Strauss-Eisenhower plan for Middle East; E ... 163
  - Myths in on national security; E ... 34; see also C, 130 and 149
  - Nation uncritically pro-Zionist. A. Leibowitz; C ... 322
  - Retaliation raid on Lebanese civil aircraft 70
  - Role in keeping peace in Middle East. A. Tuckerman; S ... 198; see also C, 322
- Israel, Jerry
  - Substance of foreign policy, not structure of State department, as reason for crisis; C ... 226; see also 138
- Italy; storming of institutions in manifold eruptions. T. Terzani; S ... 751
- Ivory, James. Film Guru reviewed by R. Hatch; MP ... 582

J

- Jackson, L. Brewster
  - "Little groups of neighbors": draft boards in action; study by J. W. Davis, Jr., and K. M. Dolbeare; S ... 174
- Janscó, Miklós. Film The red and the white reviewed by R. Hatch; MP ... 478
  - Film Round up reviewed by R. Hatch; MP ... 740
- Japan; short fuse in; anti-Americanism may erupt in civil war. A. Axelbank; S ... 141; see also C, 354
- Japanese; success in Hawaii ... 147-148
- Japanese Americans; behind outlawing of detention centers; wartime experience; E ... 716
- Jerusalem. See Israel
- Jews; students in U.S. like others; noninvolvement with tradition. H. Golden; S ... 404
- Jimmy Shine. Reviewed by H. Clurman; D ... 61

PAGE

- Johnson, Avery
  - Deficient motivation in R. V. Sampson's Dec. 16 article, The bramble of power; C ... 34
- Johnson, Mrs. Claire Curran; testimony on New Jersey officials and organized crime 107
- Johnson, Rear admiral Frank; outflanked by National security agency in Pueblo espionage ... 326-327
- Johnson, President Lyndon B.
  - Directive for tax-reform studies ... 760
  - Emptiness of farewell address; E ... 98
  - Failures hurt Democratic party base 200-201
  - Falling out with Interior secretary S. L. Udall on question of large-scale creation of national monument acreage; E 164
  - Looking back at Johnson: the wasted years. R. G. Sherrill; S ... 42
  - Meeting with Ky of South Vietnam compared with Midway I. talk between Nixon and Thieu; E ... 778
  - Strategy for ending Vietnam war ... 690
- Jones, LeRoi. Play Great goodness of life (a coon show) reviewed by H. Clurman; D ... 612
- Jones, Robert A.
  - Fatricide in the Sierra club; S ... 567; see also C, 650
- Joseph, Raymond Alcide
  - Haiti: ripe for the marines?; S ... 392; see also C, 541

K

- Kahn, Herman; war-games scenarios ... 788 ff.
- Kamehameha III, King; unworthy idol of Hawaiian nationalists ... 146
- Kansas City, Missouri; black crime with black victims ... 501 ff.
- Karenga, Ron; head of US, militant Negro group ... 558
- Kaufman, Richard F.
  - Pentagon procurement: billion-dollar grab bag; S ... 328
  - The usury of war. Phoenix of obsolescence and rising costs of missile systems, supersonic planes, etc.; S ... 656
- Keats, H. T.
  - Peace in Middle East doesn't lie primarily in Jerusalem; C ... 322; see also 198
- Kelly, Dave
  - The pool; P ... 22
- Kennedy, Adrienne. Play Cities in bezique reviewed by H. Clurman; D ... 158
- Kennedy, Senator Edward M.; bill to amend draft act ... 166
  - Elected Senate Democratic whip over H. B. Long ... 102-103
  - Election as Democratic whip seen as shift in power, not shake-up; E ... 67
  - Sanity and courage on oil imports, Vietnam war, and space program; E ... 684; see also 814
- Kennedy, President John F.; baseless trial of C. Shaw in New Orleans for conspiracy to assassinate; E ... 324; see also C, 450, with editorial reply
- Kennedy, Robert F.; Wall Street Journal scenarios on following shooting ... 790
  - Would have disapproved death penalty for assassin, S. B. Sirhan; E ... 589
- Kennedy family; target of Manchester, N.H., Union Leader ... 400-401
- Kenya; controversial activities of U.S.-backed labor and cultural groups ... 48-49
- Kerby, Phil
  - Odds in Los Angeles: race, television, and mayoral candidate S. Yorty; S ... 403
  - Victory for specter of racism; S. Yorty over T. Bradley for Los Angeles mayoralty; E ... 749
- Kerr, Dr. Lorin E. UMW medical staffer on "black lung" ... 166, 530, 531, 535
- Kheel, Theodore; labor mediator out of New York City mayoralty race ... 333
- Kiely, Benedict
  - Ulster after the bludgeons; religious riots in Northern Ireland; S ... 628
- Kiesinger, Kurt Georg; West German chancellor's image problems ... 425
- Killing of Sister George, the. Reviewed by H. Clurman; MP ... 29
- Kim Il Sung, Premier. See Korea, North
- King, Rev. Martin Luther, Jr.; acceptance by court of J. L. Ray's guilty plea in murder will encourage conspiracy theories; E ... 356
  - Growth of rancor in U.S. since death; observance of anniversary blocked in California senate; E ... 453
  - Memory slandered by FBI wiretaps; E ... 780
  - Retreat of Memphis, Tenn., to xenophobia following assassination. H. P. Leifermann; S ... 401
- King, Murray. Reviewed by R. Hatch; MP 646
- Kipphardt, J. Heinar. Play In the matter of J. Robert Oppenheimer reviewed by H. Clurman; D ... 379

PAGE

- Kirstein, George G.
  - Trustee, resign!; need for transition in traditional boards of private educational and medical institutions; S ... 727
- Kirwan, Representative Mike; opposition to management of House Democratic campaign committee ... 104
- Klappert, Peter
  - Happiness is mail at your own address; P ... 608
- Kleinbard, David
  - W. Biermann as The poet in the collective (East Germany); S ... 440
- Knowledge. See Power
- Korea, North; leaders' intelligence underestimated in U.S.; message from the Pueblo; E ... 620
  - Signals from, as in Pueblo and EC-121 incidents, on determination to reunite Korea. B. Page; S ... 622
  - See also Pueblo (ship)
- Korea, South; U.S. military involvement in as danger to peace. B. Page; S ... 622
- Korean war; U.S. corporations' excess profits aired in U.S. tax court. S. Watzman; S ... 113
- Korman, Henry R.
  - Marxian socialism as only answer in guns-vs.-butter issue; C ... 541; see also E, 354
- Kozloff, Max
  - Reviews of art
    - Contemporary American sculptors ... 347
- Kraft, Ivor
  - Color in the classroom: integration vs. decentralization; no panacea; S ... 71
- Krosney, Herbert
  - The crossroads of Jerusalem; S ... 134; see also C, 322
- Kryter, Dr. Karl T.; on sonic boom and SST airplanes; E ... 453

L

- Labor
  - Demonstrations against Spanish government; E ... 133
  - Union
    - AFL-CIO study on tax reform ... 726
    - AFL-CIO's sponsorship of AIFLD in Latin America to support U.S. policies. H. W. Berger; S ... 46
    - African American labor center, AFL-CIO's new mission to Africa. S. Meisler; S ... 48; see also C, 162
    - Alignment with Democratic party slackening; E ... 194; 199-200
    - Alliance for labor action (ALA), formed by teamsters and auto workers, as new voice of labor. B. J. Widick; S ... 758
    - Backed J. W. McCormack against M. K. Udall in House speakership contest ... 104
    - Cause and effect of longshoremen's strike; E ... 4
    - Coal miners' strike in West Virginia brings miracle of disability payments. R. G. Sherrill; S ... 529; see also C, 714, with Sherrill reply
    - Contributions of Negro leader A. Philip Randolph; E ... 485
    - Exclusionist power ... 627
    - Faculty strikes at California state colleges ... 239
    - G. Meany's withdrawal of AFL-CIO backing from International confederation of free trade unions (ICFTU); World federation of trade unions (WFTU) no longer Soviet puppet; E ... 291; see also 601
    - Loss of authority in Italy ... 751
    - Meany and Reuther: labor's main bout. B. J. Widick; S ... 601
    - Organizing in Memphis, Tenn. ... 401 ff.
    - Proposed policemen's organization ... 487
    - Rank-and-file rejection of contracts in demand for role in decision making; E ... 3
    - Rank-and-file support of tax reform; E ... 718
    - Role of J. L. Lewis. By S. D. Alinsky; S ... 827
    - Seafarers use of funds from alien seamen for political purposes; E ... 68
    - United farm workers organizing committee strike and grape boycott in California. R. B. Taylor; S ... 591
    - White labor, black labor: the fomented conflict. L. L. Brown; S ... 179
- Lacerda, Carlos; Brazilian opposition leader's meetings with U.S. ambassador ... 665
- Laird, Defense secretary Melvin. See United States—Defense, national
- Lake Superior; private dump. G. Hill; S ... 795
- Land; questionable use of in U.S. and Soviet Union; William the conqueror's land census, the Domesday book, as good idea. J. T. Younger; S ... 275
- Land, Thomas
  - Hydroelectric battle plan; Cabora Bassa dam's complex in Mozambique as challenge to FRELIMO rebels; S ... 598

Index

PAGE
  Race relations in England; S 116
Language; angry, flamboyant words embitter racial relations when movement toward unity is needed; E 226
  Dirty words in college press 429
  Of new left spreads to established institutions .... 425 ff.
Lasch, Christopher; historian's plea for interest in new concepts 78
Last summer. Reviewed by R. Hatch; MP 837
Latin America
  Military regimes, as in Brazil, backed by U.S. By D. Bonafede; S 663
  University standards lowered by student power 337
  Unpopularity of U.S.; visitor N. A. Rockefeller as lightning rod; E 746
  U.S. experience in helped set policy in underdeveloped countries 267-268
  U.S. Labor and State departments' marriage of convenience on policy toward. H. W. Berger; S 46
Law
  Enforcement by police: illusion of security. G. E. Misner; S 488
  Exclusion power of bar associations 627
  New concepts of international law from North Korea's seizure of Pueblo and shooting down of EC-121 spy plane; E 523
  Recent prestige of Mississippi U. law school. K. Vinson; S 791
  Subverted by militant policemen. H. Toch; S 491
  World law and airplane hijackers. K. M. Ruppenthal; S 144
League of composers—ISCM. Concerts reviewed by D. Hamilton; M 349
Learning. P. Goedicke; P 216
Leary, Howard R.; embattled New York City police commissioner .... 494 ff.
Left, the. See Education; Radicals
Leib, Mani
  Christmas; P 155
  To a Gentile poet; P 155
Leibowitz, Aaron
  Nation uncritically pro-Zionist, as seen by slight change in E. Ahmad passage; C .... 322; see also 265
Leifermann, Henry P.
  A year later in Memphis: retreat to xenophobia following murder of M. L. King, Jr.; S 401
LeMay, General Curtis E.; advocate of strategic bombers 658, 659
Leonard, Jerris; dismaying choice as head of Justice department's civil rights division; E 162
Lesotho; part of South Africa's apartheid empire .... 596 ff.
Levine, Jack
  Tribute to late artist B. Shahn; E 390
Levine, Irving M.; American Jewish committee official on plight and frustrations of working poor 724, 725-726
Lewis, Arthur; Negro professor bearish on black studies 755
Lewis, Frank W.
  Crossword puzzles. See back pages
Lewis, John L.; tribute to late president of mine workers. S. D. Alinsky; S 827
Levinson, Michael S.
  Click; P 282
Liberals; what role in trial of Chicago "conspirators"? 754
Liberia; flag-of-convenience nation for ocean-polluting tankers 306
Libraries; cuts for in Nixon budget; E 750
Life; feature on organized crime in New Jersey 107
Light bulbs; price fixing by General electric. W. F. Mattes; S 823
Lincoln center, New York City; problems attributable to trustees' lack of foresight 729
Lindsay, John V.; against the field in New York City mayoralty campaign. J. Wilson; S 332
  Urged to run for re-election as mayor of New York; E 100
  See also New York City
Loans. See Interest
Lodge, Henry Cabot; appointment of hawk as chief U.S. negotiator in Vietnam peace talks; E 68
Loeb, Henry; tough, conservative mayor of Memphis .... 401 ff.
Loeb, William; publisher of abusive Manchester, N.H., Union Leader. W. D. Gardner; S .... 397; see also C, 482
Long, Senator Russell B.; succeeded by E. M. Kennedy as Democratic whip; backed by E. J. McCarthy; E 67
  Unhorsed as Senate Democratic whip by E. M. Kennedy 102-103
Long Island rail road. See Railroads
PAGE
Los Angeles: odds in mayoral race between incumbent S. Yorty, TV newscaster B. Ward, and Negro councilman T. Bradley. By P. Kerby; S 403
  Upset victory of T. Bradley in primary; E 485
  Victory of racist specter in Bradley's defeat by Yorty. By P. Kerby; E 749
Louarn, Alan Al; Breton nationalist interviewed 230-231
Loves of Isadora (Duncan). Reviewed by R. Hatch; MP 644
Lowi, Theodore J.
  Prognosis of rightist crackdown in U.S. following Vietnam war: the wheel of panic; S 624
Lowry, W. McNeil; advocacy in Ford foundation of federal department of cultural affairs 326
Lucey, Archbishop Robert E. See Catholic church
Lumber industry; effects of defoliation in Vietnam 484
Lumet, Sidney. Film version of The sea gull reviewed by H. Clurman; MP 220
Lynde, Major general Nelson M. (ret.); employment by Colt industries in obtaining M-16 rifle contract 330
Lynn, Kenneth; resignation from Federal city college faculty, Washington, D.C. 594, 595

M

McCarran act, 1950; bills to repeal title II, authorizing detention centers; E 716
McCarthy, Senator Eugene J.; backing of Senator R. Long for Democratic whip unjustified; E 67
  Radical followers' lack of power base .... 460-461; see also C, 650
McCord, Sidney; unzealous counsel of New Jersey legislature's self-investigating committee on tie-ins with organized crime .. 108-9
McCormack, House speaker John W.; failure to back bills to reform Congress 391
  Remains speaker of House, defeating bid by M. K. Udall 103-104
McDermott, John
  Campus missionaries: the laying on of culture; "cow college" faculties' concentration on gifted students at expense of great majority; S 296
  Overclass/underclass in U.S. society: knowledge is power; S .... 458; see also C, 50
McGee, Reece; on failures of western individualism; example in A. Fortas episode 650, 651
McGill, Ralph; tribute to late editor of Atlanta Constitution; E 198
McKay, Floyd
  Senator R. W. Packwood's "Kaffeeklatsch" constituency; Dorchester conferences in Oregon; S 205
McLean, Louis J.; National agricultural chemical association lawyer defending use of DDT in Wisconsin 309-310
MacLeod, Robert B.
  Support needed for rebel postman J. P. Stark; C .... 66; see also 13
McLuhan, Marshall; contributed to myth of consumership in mass media 84
McNally, Terrence. Play Next reviewed by H. Clurman; D 281
McNamara, Robert S.; as Defense secretary, cited high cost of missile defense .... 169; see also C, 522
  Disapproved expenditures on supersonic bomber B-70 .... 657, 658
  Financial loss in disposal of Ford holdings; contrast with Deputy Secretary of Defense D. Packard; E 66
Madden, Representative Ray J.; bill to reform Congress 391
Madison, Wisconsin; police violence against Mifflin St. student ghetto. H. Henkin; E 653
Mafia. See Crime
Mail; letter carrier's fight against junk mail. J. P. Stark; S .... 13; see also C, 66
Mainwaring, Marion
  Brittany: revolution in a cemetery; resurgent nationalism in French region; S 229
Malagasy Republic; part of South Africa's apartheid empire .... 596 ff.
Malawi; part of South Africa's apartheid empire .... 596 ff.
Man with broom. G. Bowering; P 58
Mankind's fouled nest. Oil on the waters. E. Cowan; S .... 304. DDT and the constitution. H. Henkin; S 308
Mansfield, Senator Mike; on Senate's responsibility for continued war in Vietnam. E. Gruening; E 748
Marchi, John; challenge to Mayor J. V. Lindsay for Republican nomination 333 Victory hollow; E 810
Marcus, Adrienne
  The things you do not say; P 278
PAGE
Marcus, Frank. Film of play The killing of Sister George reviewed by H. Clurman; MP 29
Marcuse, Herbert; ideologue of new left 667
Marijuana; severe sentences for possession, as of Florida reporter W. Willis; E .... 293; see also C, 509
Martekais, Pandelis; ex-prisoner's testimony against Greek junta 11-12
Marr, David
  Introduction to Nguyen Van Minh article, Jail notes of a young Vietnamese; S 359
Martin, Kingsley; memoir of late editor of New Statesman. A. Werth; S 294
Martinique; wretched conditions of French Caribbean territory. P. Geismar; S 782
Martyrs of love. Reviewed by R. Hatch; MP 254
Mattes, W. F.
  Consumer be damned! GE's great caper of bulb price fixing; S 823
May, Elaine. Play Adaptation reviewed by H. Clurman; D 281
Mayo, Robert P.; Budget bureau director on swollen defense procurement 331
Mboya, Tom; Kenya politician backed by U.S. labor groups 48-49
Me and my brother. Reviewed by R. Hatch; MP 254
Meany, George; AFL-CIO president. See Labor—Union
Mears, Helen
  White House and Pentagon mail interchangeable; C 778
Medicine
  Biological effects of DDT 309-310
  Court decision in California, forbidding hospitals to refuse admission of poor patients, victory for Dr. D. Brooks of Salud clinic; E 133
  Ethics of drug firms' gifts of equipment to medical students; E 325 Gradual democratization of traditional boards of private hospitals required. G. G. Kirstein; S 727
  Low state in Haiti 393
  M. Gordon article of Dec. 16, Emancipating the mental wards (in New York state), praised. Dr. A. P. Bay; C 258
  Practical agitation by Society of urban physicians against cutbacks of New York hospitals' services to poor; E 452
  Salud, socially oriented Tulare Co., Cal., clinic operated by Dr. D. Brooks and wife Wendy, as medical storm center. R. B. Taylor; S 7
Meisler, Stanley
  Biafra: war of images vs. Nigeria; S .... 301; see also C, 450
  New mission to Africa by AFL-CIO's African American labor center; S .... 48; see also C, 162
Melitis, Constantine; ex-prisoner's testimony against Greek junta 11-12
Melkonian, Martin
  Anti-Arab slurs in H. Krosney article The crossroads of Jerusalem; C .... 322; see also 134
Memphis, Tennessee; retreat to xenophobia following murder of M. L. King, Jr. By H. P. Leifermann; S 401
Merriam, Eve
  Spring, 1969; P 514
Message from Rabbi Nachman, a. H. Shapiro; P 375
Met, Thomas J., and Young C. (Gary) Gray; marines court-martialed for anti-Vietnam statements; support needed. J. W. Douglass; C 98
Metropolitan museum of art; show Harlem on my mind. L. Alloway; A .... 156; see also 730
  Show Harlem on my mind subordinates art to social problems. L. Alloway; A 317
  Show The new American painting and sculpture; protested by Art workers' coalition. L. Alloway; A 837
Metropolitan opera company; financial problems in mounting such works as Die Meistersinger. D. Hamilton; M 93
Mexican-American student federation (MASC); activities to further group consciousness .... 272-273; see also C, 386
Mexican Americans. No more sombreros: the Chicano rebellion in California. R. Bongartz; S .... 271; see also C, 386 and 405
  Role in Los Angeles mayoralty campaign 405
Mexico; auto swindle enforced by government through low production and high costs. L. Fenster; S 693
Meyer, Howard N.
  Navy deflected question of Pueblo's violating North Korean waters; C .... 322; see also E, 196
Middle East
  Fire control of crises by U.N. By A. Tuckerman: S 70

Index

PAGE

  Jerusalem as crossroads. H. Krosney; S ... 134; see also C, 322
  Myths in, cherished by Israel and Arab states; E ... 34; see also C, 130 and 149
  Promising Strauss-Eisenhower plan for peace based on technology neglected by State department; potentially troublesome desalinization plant for Israel no substitute; E ... 163
  Tactic of terror exemplified by Arab terrorists' attack on Israeli airliner in Zurich; E ... 258
  U.N. defusing the powder keg. A. Tuckerman; S ... 198; see also C, 322
Midnight cowboy. Reviewed by R. Hatch; MP ... 774
Midpeninsula free university; far-out institution near San Francisco. K. Power; S ... 463
Mikva, Representative Abner J.
  Games of chance in gasoline and food retailing should be outlawed; C ... 482; see also 370
  On size of U.S. armed forces ... 652
"Military-industrial complex"; most likely authorship of phrase; E ... 525
Mills, Representative Wilbur D.; hearings and proposals on tax reform ... 760 ff.
Milner, Ronald. Play The warning—a theme for Linda reviewed by H. Clurman; D ... 612
Minh, Nguyen Van
  "Who is the enemy?": jail notes of a young Vietnamese. Introduction by D. Marr; S ... 359
Minneapolis; law-and-order independent C. Stenvig victorious in mayoralty primary ... 724
Mintz, Morton
  Golden ox of antitrust; penalties could swell U.S. revenues; S ... 467
Mirsky, Jonathan
  Large-scale Vietnam war continues; talks with North Vietnamese delegates at Paris peace talks; E ... 556
MIRV. See Armament—Missiles
Miser, the (Lincoln center production). Reviewed by H. Clurman; D ... 675
Misner, Gordon E.
  Law enforcement by police: illusion of security; S ... 488
Missiles. See Armament—Missiles
Mississippi; muzzle on speakers at state universities. C. Wilkie; E ... 132
  Signs of life. 1. Faculty of state university law school. K. Vinson; S ... 791
  Signs of life. 2. What the blacks found out in Holly Springs boycott. M. L. Berzon; S ... 793
Mitchell, Secretary John N. See United States—Justice department
Mohn, Einor; teamsters official on youth and racial discrimination ... 758-759
Molière. Play The miser (Lincoln center production) reviewed by H. Clurman; D ... 675
Mondale, Senator Walter F.; bill to provide free food stamps for all poor ... 453
Mondlane, Dr. Eduardo; murdered head of FRELIMO ... 598
Money; international currency seesaw; E ... 651
Monkees, the; synthetic singing group engineered as consumer commodity ... 83
Monroney, Senator A. S. Mike; bill to reform Congress ... 391
Moody, Reynolds
  Justification for Moscow missile defenses; C ... 682
Moon flights. See Space
Moonshot. D. Hoffman; P ... 408
Moos, Malcolm; possible originator of phrase "military-industrial complex" ... 525
Moral education; the brass of in rules with reasons. R. Peters; S ... 49
Morath, Max, an evening with. Reviewed by H. Clurman; D ... 548
Morgan, W. Keith C., M.D. See Andrews, C., M.D.
Mormon church; communications monopoly ignored by FCC in renewing of KSL-TV license; E ... 197
Morris, Jacob; on inflation-inspired speculation ... 688
Morris, Joe Alex, Jr.
  Bonn (West German) politics: mutations left and right; S ... 423
Morse, Joshua M., III; dean revamped Mississippi U. law school. K. Vinson; S ... 791
Motion pictures
  Soviet-U.S. exchange of rare early films; E ... 421
  For reviews, see Clurman, H.; Hatch, R.
Movement for a democratic society; sparks trend toward social ethic in U.S. bureaucracies; E ... 292
Mowbray, A. Q.
  Truth in packaging: how much a pound?; S ... 730
Moynihan, Daniel Patrick; book Maximum feasible misunderstanding attacks community action in war on poverty ... 233 ff.

PAGE

  On working poor ... 725
  Turnabout on existence of hunger in U.S.; E ... 620
Mozambique. See Portugal
Mrozek, Slawomir. Play Tango reviewed by H. Clurman; D ... 157
Mummies of Gunajuato, the. M. Bell; P ... 24
Murder, a. L. Wolf; P ... 154
Museums. For reviews of shows, see Alloway, L.
Music; British composer P. M. Davis interviewed. D. Hamilton; M ... 284
  For reviews, see Hamilton, D.
Muskie, Senator Edmund S.; bill for cleaning up ocean oil pollution ... 307

N

Nabokov, Vladimir. Play Invitation to a beheading reviewed by H. Clurman; D ... 477
Nachman, Larry David
  Defense against Mayor Daley of Chicago: "the conspiracy" of eight indictees on trial; S ... 752
Nader, Ralph
  Danger on the job: the violence of omission in industrial safety; S ... 166
  Crusader organized investigating team that found Federal trade commission wanting; E ... 69
Nation, The; not dependent on oil-depletion allowance, despite statement of W. F. Buckley, Jr.; E ... 421
  Special issue, The cops, Apr. 21
National democratic party (NPD); rightist group's setback in West German presidential vote ... 423 ff.
National educational television (N.E.T.); in movement for public television ... 635-636
National guard. See United States—Defense, national National organization for woman (NOW); feminist group. J. Freeman; S ... 241; see also C, 354
Nationalism; threat to U.S. policy. E. Ahmad; S ... 265
Navarro, Joseph
  Critique of R. Bongartz on Mexican Americans; C ... 405; see also 271
Negroes
  Among opponents of Cleveland housing project—racism or self-interest?; E ... 292
  Black capitalism, like white, unresponsive to needs of poor. B. Fulks; C ... 194
  Black crime, black victims. R. Pearman; S ... 500
  Black freshmen in House. C. Raab; S ... 6
  Black studies: the real issue. J. Hatch; S 755
  Blacks on campus: angry and alone together. K. G. Gross; S ... 207
  Civil rights
    British legislation. T. Land; S ... 116
    Color in the classroom: integration vs. decentralization. I. Kraft; S ... 71
    First test for Nixon. G. Orfield; S ... 79
    Ineffectiveness of Johnson programs ... 43 ff.
    Nixon doubletalk encourages Southern school systems, as in Worth county, Georgia, to back off from integration; E ... 132
    South Carolina: the "movement" finally arrives. D. Nolan; S ... 654
  Cops and blacks: warring minorities. H. Toch; S ... 491
  Disproportionate number in armed forces and in Vietnam ... 175-176
  E. Cleaver on role of militant students. H. E. Weinstein; S ... 74
  Education for relevance: first year at Federal city college, Washington, D.C. By D. Swanston; S ... 594
  Elected F. Hubbard over machine candidate in Chicago aldermanic race; E ... 389
  Holly Springs, Miss., boycott. M. L. Berzon; S ... 793
  Leadership of A. P. Randolph; E ... 485
  "Little wars" against by police in U.S., as in Detroit, 1967; E ... 715
  Militants competing in angry language embitter racial relations; E ... 226
  Militants view birth control as genocide. R. Z. Hallow; S ... 535
  Nixon domestic program and; black capitalism and ghettos; E ... 522
  Outsiders in American tradition ... 266, 268
  Panthers and tribesmen: black guns on UCLA campus. R. Rogers; S ... 558
  Plight in Memphis, Tenn., following murder of M. L. King, Jr. By H. P. Leifermann; S ... 401
  Police strategies of oppression in ghetto wars. M. Oppenheimer; S ... 366
  Prejudice against mirrored by police. W. P. Brown; S ... 498
  Reparations demanded by J. Forman in take-over of Riverside church pulpit; E ... 618

PAGE

  San Francisco: deteriorating relations with police; E ... 482
  Segregation against in South supported by Protestant churches. H. Golden; S ... 602
  Space program no good for. J. Robertson; S ... 814
  Students' strike call at San Francisco state college ... 39
  Victims and slayers of police. R. L. Smith; S ... 486
  White labor, black labor: the fomented conflict. L. L. Brown; S ... 179
Nelson, Senator Gaylord; bill for unit pricing on retail packages ... 732
Nemec, Jan. Film Martyrs of love reviewed by R. Hatch; MP ... 254
Nevada; proposed AEC underground tests challenged by H. Hughes; E ... 453
New Hampshire; political influence of Manchester Union Leader. W. D. Gardner; S ... 397; see also C, 482
New Jersey; mobsters in pasture: Nostra Jersey; organized crime in state. F. J. Cook; S ... 105
New left. See Education; Radicals
New Statesman; British magazine under editor K. Martin. By A. Werth; S ... 294
New towns; in Soviet Union and U.S. ... 275-276
New York City
  At threshold of housing crisis; E ... 557
  Black crime with black victims ... 501
  Mayor J. V. Lindsay urged to run again; E ... 100
  Mayor Lindsay vs. the field in re-election campaign. J. Wilson; S ... 332
  Mayoralty primary results; victories of law-and-order candidates Procaccino and Marchi not decisive; Lindsay's chances; E ... 810
  Politics of blue power in police benevolent association vs. Lindsay administration. E. Cray; S ... 493
  Racial troubles at Franklin K. Lane high school ... 209-210
  School problems ... 73
  Society of urban physicians organized to fight cutbacks in hospital care for poor; E ... 452
  Welfare burden; E ... 68
New York State; bill to liberalize abortion defeated by appeal of birth-crippled legislator; E ... 589
New York philharmonic orchestra, P. Boulez conducting. Reviewed by D. Hamilton; M ... 549
Newark, New Jersey; threatened closing of library and museum; E ... 293
Newman, Cardinal John Henry; book The idea of a university analyzed ... 561-562
Newspapers. See Press, U.S.
Newton, Huey P.; Black panther leader jailed ... 74, 75, 77
Next. Reviewed by H. Clurman; D ... 281
Nigeria; sordid role of Soviet Union and Great Britain in civil war; E ... 357
  War with secessionist Biafra: war of images. S. Meisler; S ... 301; see also C, 450
Nightmare in Calcutta. A. Alwan; P ... 738
Nix, Robert N. C.; inadequacies of Philadelphia Negro congressman ... 6
Nixon, President Richard M.
  Air force academy speech as "blueprint" of continued war abroad. E. Gruening; E ... 781
  Appointment of hawk, H. C. Lodge, as chief negotiator in Vietnam peace talks; E ... 68
  Appointment of L. A. DuBridge as science adviser; E ... 5
  Battle for mind of on Vietnam war; E ... 98
  Berlin visit at time of "sticky situation" there; E ... 228
  Blast against student revolutionaries; E ... 587
  Campaign contribution of Chicago insurance magnate-philanthropist C. Stone ... 338
  Civil rights as first test. G. Orfield; S ... 79
  Control over Republican governors' association ... 17
  Cop-out on ABM missile construction; E ... 386
  Credibility-gap inheritor. H. Cimring; C ... 618
  Early appointments and policies sadden conservative backers; E ... 290
  Face-saving flight to Midway I. to meet President Thieu of South Vietnam; E ... 684
  Generally reassuring inaugural address; E ... 130
  Goes calling; politics of European trip; E ... 322
  Interest in Ripon society personnel ... 203
  Law and order theme reminiscent of 19th-century Mexican sellout to foreign interests. G. I. Sanchez; C ... 2
  Meeting with President Thieu of South Vietnam at Midway I. serves to prolong war and endanger popularity; E ... 778
  Nixon's war in Vietnam. T. Coffin; S ... 262
  Prompt political reaction on hunger issue; E ... 620
  Public-relations tone of thin domestic program; E ... 522
  Rhythm of evasion and postponement, as on campus unrest; E ... 418

Index

PAGE

  - State department as seventh crisis; diplomats in disarray. S. Simpson, S 138; see also C, 226
  - Tax-reform proposals 761 ff.
  - Trade-off in tax proposals; no fundamental structural reforms; E 554
  - Unwise appointment of Miss W. M. Rogers as consultant on consumer aairs; E 260
  - Urged to end Vietnam war. E. Gruening; S 570
  - Vietnam policy. R. M. Falk; S 689
- Nolan, David
  - South Carolina: the civil-rights "movement" finally arrives; events in Beaufort, Charleston, and Denmark; S 654
- Norman, James Ford. Play The year Boston won the pennant reviewed by H. Clurman;
- North. By J. Anderson; P 644
  D 741
- North Atlantic treaty organization (NATO); appeasement policy toward Greek junta 13
- North Dakota; opposition to further missile sites; E 586
- Nuclear weapons. See Atomic weapons

O

- O'Casey, Sean. Play Cock-a-doodle dandy (APA production) reviewed by H. Clurman; D 187
- Oceans; pollution by chemicals; E 293
- Of me. C. M. Rodgers; P 313
- Oil
  - Angolan production 597
  - Depletion allowance should be reduced 763
  - Import controls opposed by Senator E. M. Kennedy 684
  - Nation not dependent on depletion allowance, despite statement by W. F. Buckley, Jr.; E 421
  - Nixon not more favorable to industry than Johnson, despite C. Welles article of Dec. 23. H. Fallis; C 162
  - No bids by big companies to develop government oil-shale land; E 36
  - On waters off Santa Barbara, Calif., as one of many examples of mankind's fouled nest. E. Cowan; S 304
  - Rigged "games" promotions of gasoline sales. J. Cross; S 370; see also C, 482
- Ojukwu, Lieut. Col. Chukwuemeka Odumegwu. See Nigeria
- Okinawa; unpopularity of U.S. occupation of Japanese island 142 ff.
- Olitski, Jules. Reviewed by L. Alloway; A 676
- On resurrection. D. Ray; P 248
- On willpower. P. Zweig; P 577
- Onassis, Aristotle; may bail out failing Greek military dictatorship; E 525
- O'Neill, Captain Terence; moderate premier of Northern Ireland resigned following religion-inspired riots 628 ff.
- Opera. For reviews, see Hamilton, D.
- Oppenheimer, Martin
  - Expendable city, the: strategies of repression for the ghetto wars; S 366
- Oregon; Dorchester conferences, Senator R. W. Packwood's middle-class "Kaffeeklatsch" constituency. F. McKay; S 205
- Orfield, Gary
  - Civil rights: Nixon's first test; S 79
- Orians, G. H. See Pfeiffer, E. W.
- Orlen, Steven
  - Over Newark; P 610
  - The policeman and the drunk; P 512
- Orlovsky, Peter. See Ginsberg, Allen
- Over Newark. By S. Orlen; P 610

P

- Packaging; truth in: how much a pound? A. Q. Mowbray; S 730
- Packard, David; dilemma of Deputy Secretary of Defense's financial holdings; E 66
- Packwood, Senator Robert W.; Oregonian's middle-class "Kaffeeklatsch" constituency in Dorchester conferences. F. McKay; S 205
- Page, Benjamin
  - Signals from North Korea, as in Pueblo and EC-121 incidents, on determination to reunite Korea; S 622
- Paisley, Rev. Ian; rabid spokesman of Ulster Protestants 629
- Pakistan; revolution deferred: "law and order" of new military regime. A. Ahmad; S 455
- Panic; endemic after wars; rightist crackdown in U.S. foreseen. T. J. Lowi; S 624
- Park Chung Hee, President. See Korea, South
- Parker, Stephen
  - The return; P 156
- Pasolini, Pier Paolo. Film Teorema reviewed by R. Hatch; MP 582
- Peace and freedom party; coalition with black panthers 77

PAGE

- Peace and pacifism
  - Another mother for peace organization's campaign contribution to supposed peace congressmen; need for tabulations on key military appropriations measures; E 484; see also C, 618
  - Contributions of N. Thomas; E 5
  - Court-martial of anti-Vietnam marines T. J. Met and Y. C. Gray; support needed. J. W. Douglass; C 98
  - Internes sought for program of World without war council of the United States. M. Green; C 650
- Peace with freedom, inc.; private U.S. labor-cultural group's controversial activities in Kenya 48-49; see also C, 162
- Pearman, Robert
  - Black crime, black victims; S 500
- Peck, Sidney M.
  - Anti-Vietnam activist indicted for conspiracy in Chicago and beaten; photographic evidence needed; C 618
- Pentagon. See United States—Defense, national
- Peretz, Martin
  - Testimonial dinner in Boston for E. Gruening; C 226
- Peters, Richard
  - Rules with reasons: the bases of moral education; S 49
- Petersen, Don. Play Does a tiger wear a necktie? reviewed by H. Clurman; D 346
- Petri, Thomas; peace corps veteran and former executive director of Ripon society 203 ff.
- Pfeiffer, E. W., and G. H. Orians; zoology professors' observations on effects of defoliation in Vietnam; E 484
- Philadelphia; Negro-managed Progress aerospace enterprises 367, 815-816
- Phonograph records. For reviews, see Hamilton, D.
- Picture in the news, a. M. Goldman; P 185
- Pike, Representative Otis G.; chairman of subcommittee investigating Pueblo aair 326
- Pinter, Harold. Film of play The birthday party reviewed by H. Clurman; MP 29
- Pierrot le fou. Reviewed by R. Hatch; MP 126
- Piety. See Religion
- Pittman, John; co-editor of Daily World 633
- Pittsburgh; Negro militants' opposition to birth control 535-536; see also C, 810
- Pitzer, Dr. Kenneth S.; on dangers of underground atomic explosions; E 556
- Planned parenthood. See Birth control
- Play, the rigors of in U.S. By M. Csikszentmihali; S 210; see also C, 290, with writer's reply
- Play it again, Sam. Reviewed by H. Clurman; D 282
- Plays. For reviews, see Clurman, H.; Hatch, R.
- Playwrights; where are they? C. Hughes; D 90; see also C, 162
- Poem, the. A. Gregor; P 766
- Poems
  - Ants. R. Bly 739
  - Apple, an. L. Bruce 410
  - Articulation. D. Ry 123
  - Bird. By T. Baland 317
  - Caught giving away love. P. Blackburn; P 606
  - Christmas. M. Leib 155
  - City, the. D. Ignatow 349
  - Click. M. S. Levinson 282
  - Communion. D. Ignatow 183
  - Comrades, which of us wouldn't be against war. W. Biermann 440
  - Cricket poem. T. Baland. 342
  - Death. D. Goetz 767
  - December. By J. Swift 382
  - Devastating side effect of the Vietnam war. W. Biermann 440
  - Dinah. By A. R. Ammons 26
  - Don't walk. P. Zweig 577
  - Eye-crossing—from Brooklyn to Manhattan. K. Burke 700
  - Fern roots. A. Alwan 738
  - From the diggings. A. Stoutenberg 802
  - Garage. H. Carlile 28
  - Geometry. J. Harasymowicz (translate dby V. Contoski) 216
  - Ghazals: homage to Chalib. By A. Rich 188
  - Halfway down the coast. P. Blackburn 606
  - Hanns Eisler, or The anatomy of a sphere. W. Biermann 440
  - Happiness is mail at your new address. P. Klappert 608
  - In the woods. M. Goldman 118
  - Learning. P. Goedicke 216
  - Man with broom. G. Bowering 58
  - Message from Rabbi Nachman, a. H. Shapiro 375
  - Moonshot. D. Hoffman 408
  - Mummies of Guanajuato, the. M. Bell 24
  - Murder, a. L. Wolf 154
  - Nightmare in Calcutta. A. Alwan 738
  - North. By J. Anderson 644
  - Of me. C. M. Rodgers 313

PAGE

  - On resurrection. D. Ray 248
  - On willpower. P. Zweig 577
  - Over Newark. By S. Orlen 610
  - Picture in the news, a. M. Goldman 185
  - Poem, the. A. Gregor 766
  - Policeman and the drunk,the. S. Orlen 512
  - Pool, the. D. Kelly 22
  - Prayer wheel, the. P. Zweig 577
  - Real thing, the. J. Tagliabue 830
  - Recognition (for Henry Dumas). S. Cooperman 672
  - Return, the. S. Parker 156
  - Sabbath is gone. D. Hofstein 154
  - Sabbath is gone. D. Hofstein 154
  - Screaming meemies, the. R. Humphries 574
  - Sea horses. F. J. Arnstein 345
  - Self-portrait at thirty. P. Dow 62
  - Small as a fist. R. T. Goodman 30
  - Song of the worst thing, the. W. Biermann 440
  - Spring, 1969. E. Merriam 514
  - Taking off the face. P. Zweig 577
  - Things you do not say, the. A. Marcus 278
  - Third world, the. L. Ferlinghetti 92
  - Three poems. J. Tagliapue 216
  - To a Gentile poet. M. Leib 155
  - Two winter pieces. S. Touster 216
  - Very latest news, the. M. L. Rosenthal 550
  - Watch on MacDougal. By A. Grumbach 742
- Police
  - Brutality toward Berkeley "people's park" demonstrators; E 747; 784 ff.; see also C, 810
  - Called God's agents of punishment by evangelist Billy Graham; E 653
  - Conduct in "little wars" against Negroes and student demonstrators in U.S.; E 715
  - Cops and blacks: warring minorities. H. Toch; S 491
  - Deteriorating relations with minority communities in San Francisco; E 482
  - Formerly successful community relations division in San Francisco. A. A Rosenfeld; S 503
  - Going by the book; adherence to tradition. H. J. Trubitt; S 507
  - Indictment of eight in Chicago for conduct during 1968 Chicago demonstrations 422
  - Indifference to black crime against blacks 501 ff.
  - Law enforcement: illusion of security. G. E. Misner; S 488
  - Mugged by the sheriffs: an anecdote of illegal beating without redress. S. H. Wildstrom; S 496
  - Politics of blue power, as in Police benevolent association vs. Mayor Lindsay of New York City. E. Cray; S 493
  - Problem of the police problem. R. L. Smith; S 486
  - Racism in Memphis, Tenn. 401 ff.
  - Special issue, The cops, Apr. 21
  - Strategies of oppression for ghetto wars in U.S. cities. M. Oppenheimer; S 366
  - Violence against Madison, Wis., student ghetto, Mifflin St. By H. Henkin; E 653
- Policeman and the drunk, the. S. Orlen; P 512
- Pollock, Jackson. Paintings in P. Guggenheim collection, shown at Guggenheim museum, reviewed by L. Alloway; A 221
- Pollution; DDT and the constitution; move to ban pesticide. H. Henkin; S 308
  - Lake Superior, private dump. G. Hill; S 795
  - Of oceans by chemicals; E 293
  - Oil on the waters off Santa Barbara, Calif., and elsewhere. E. Cowan; S 304
- Pompidou, Georges
  - Heir apparent to de Gaulle as president of France 590
  - Perils for victor in French presidential election. C. Bourdet; E 812
- Pool, the. D. Kelly; P 22
- Pepper, Hans
  - German mass media allege that U.S. spends vast sums on space program; C 34
- Portugal; African possessions Angola and Mozambique as part of South Africa's apartheid empire 596 ff.
  - Crackdown on dissidents 261
  - Initiation of Cabora Bassa hydroelectric project on Zambezi river in Mozambique 598
- Positivism; and Nixon's law and order theme. G. I. Sanchez; C 2
- Pou, Charles
  - Defense of role as Atlanta Constitution editor in 1966 Georgia gubernatorial election, against statements in A. Schardt article of Dec. 23; C, with Schardt reply, 130
- Poverty
  - Alleviation not on agenda of consumership society 84
  - Cities' welfare burden; E 67
  - Cutback in New York City hospital services; E 452
  - Disproportionate number of poor in Vietnam forces 175 ff.
  - Funds for diverted by space program. J. Robertson; S 814

PAGE

Mobility of poor promoted by outlawing of state residency requirements for welfare; E 555
Nixon administration's prompt turnabout on hunger issue; E 621
Not remedied by capitalism, white or black. B. Fulks; C 194
Politics of anti-poverty, the. R. H. Davidson; S 233
Snafus in administration of amelioration programs; E 522; 655
Stamp and other food-distribution programs administered stingily by Agriculture department; E 452
Still forgotten: the working poor. D. Duggan; S 724
Power
Circulating elite in U.S. government and foundations; E 131
Need for those affected to participate in decisions; E 101
Power over knowledge: what is a university? R. V. Sampson; S 560
Praise for and reservations on R. V. Sampson article of Dec. 16, The bramble of power; C 2 and 34
Role of knowledge in. J. McDermott; S 458; see also C, 650
Power, Keith
Midpeninsula free university, Menlo Park, Calif.; the jivy league; S 463
Prayer wheel, the. P. Zweig; P 577
Prejudice; policemen as mirrors of. W. P. Brown; S 498
Press, U.S.
College press: upstart in the ivy. A. Boles; S 429
Conventional organs must be supplemented by technical journals to form judgment on events 459-460
Daily World, Communism's family newspaper. D. Smith; S 631
Dummies up on congressional "failing" newspaper probe. A. E. Rowse; S 816
Leavening effect in South of late R. McGill of Atlanta Constitution; E 198
Manchester, New Hampshire, Union Leader: journal of abuse. W. D. Gardner; S 397; see also C, 482
Role in myths of consumership. D. Smythe; S 82
Preventive detention. See Crime
Prisionière, la. Reviewed by R. Hatch; MP 444
Prisons. See Crime
Procaccino, Mario; leading Democratic contender for New York City mayoralty nomination 333
Victory not decisive; E 810
Profaci, Salvatore, Jr.; mysterious grave digging by New Jersey Mafia figure 108-9
Promenade. Reviewed by R. Hatch; D 837
Promises, promises. Reviewed by H. Clurman; D 125
Protestantism; in South dominated by middle-class laymen. H. Golden; S 602
Oppressive hegemony in Northern Ireland 628 ff.
Proxmire, Senator William; call for curb on military-industrial complex; E 354
On costs of bombers 658
Psychology; rejected by rebellious French students 561
Public broadcast laboratory (PBL); set up by Ford foundation; feud with National educational television 635-636
Public utilities; California rate increases granted; E 36
Pueblo (ship)
Disingenuous denial of spy function by U.S.; crew released by North Korea; E 2
Handling of capture by North Koreas as example of State department's ineptitude 138-139
Hearings on seizure reveal divided command and lack of coordination. J. Robertson; S 326
Message from incident on North Korea; Commander L. M. Bucher not to be court-martialed; E 620
Navy's ineptitude throughout affair; E 196; see also C, 322
Seizure paralleled in air by North Korea's shooting down of EC-121 intelligence plane; futility of espionage; E 523
Purnell, Karl H.
Stockade justice: the army's kangaroo courts; S 432
Pusey, Nathan; Harvard U. president unwise to summon police in student protest 525

Q

Quinto Sol; Mexican-American student intellectual group at Berkeley 272; see also C, 386

PAGE

R

Rabb, Charles
Small-town Congress; obsolescence on Capitol Hill; S 390
Rabinowitz, Victor; defense attorney in A. Vargas induction case 176
Racism; can be mislabeled self-interest; example of Cleveland housing; E 292
Radicals
College press: upstarts in the ivy. A. Boles; S 429
Conspiracy indictment of eight demonstrators as act of revenge by Mayor Daley of Chicago; E 420
E. Witten article of Dec. 16, Rhetoric of ambivalence in new left, misleading. Sgt. J. A. Van Jossen; C 66
England's new left: young and angry talent. M. C. Shefetz; S 720
Followers of E. McCarthy lacked power base 460-461; see also C, 650
Isolation of the new left. C. Gershman; S 666
Rebellion as education for university students. K. Widmer; S 537
Why dissent turns violent. K. Widmer; S 425
Radio; farce of civil-defense test announcements; E 621
Railroads; Long Island commuters jailed for not producing tickets; E 101
Long Island commuters' rebellion; E 3
Randolph, A. Philip; tribute to Negro labor leader on 80th birthday; E 485
Raser, John R.; scenario on human flaw in nuclear fail-safe 789
Raskin, Lee
Stolen cars: a heist a minute; S 434
Ray, David
Articulation; P 123
On resurrection; P 248
Ray, James Earl; plea of guilty in murder of M. L. King, Jr., accepted; will encourage conspiracy theories; E 356
Reagan, Governor Ronald; conservative chairman of Republican governors' association 17
Reaction to California state college revolts 240
See also California
Real estate; of churches should be taxed; E 619
Tax advantages 762
Real thing, the. J. Tagliabue; P 830
Recognition (for Henry Dumas). S. Cooperman; P 672
Recorded music. For reviews, see Hamilton, D.
Red, white and Maddox. Reviewed by H. Clurman; D 221
Red and the white, the. Reviewed by R. Hatch; MP 478
Rees, Representative Thomas M.; bill to reform Congress 390, 391
Reisz, Karel. Film The loves of Isadora reviewed by R. Hatch; MP 646
Reiter, Howard L.
Ripon society: left spur to the GOP; S 202
Religion
Churches' real estate should be taxed; 619
Compensation by churches for past injuries to Negroes demanded by J. Forman in takeover of Riverside church pulpit; E 618
Ineffectiveness of Graham-type evangelism; E 814
Middle-class laymen's domination of Southern Protestantism. H. Golden; S 602
Piety in army guidance manuals to be eliminated following American civil liberties union suit; E 325
Republican party
New strategy needed to build new coalition; E 194; 202
Remade in Oregon by Senator R. W. Packwood. By F. McKay; S 205
Republican governors' association's illusion of power. M. H. Bernstein; S 17
Ripon society as left spur. H. L. Reiter; S 202
Split in New York City by victory of J. Marchi in mayoralty primary; E 810
Research and development; misuse for war purposes; "research stoppage" planned by professors; E 228 and 292
Reserve mining company; pollution of Lake Superior. G. Hill; S 795
Resistible rise of Arturo Ui, the (Minnesota theatre company production). Reviewed by H. Clurman; D 60
Resor, Army secretary Stanley; program to "sell" ABM; E 259
Return, the. S. Parker; P 156
Reuss, Representative Henry S.; investigated poison-gas deaths of Utah sheep 717
Tax-reform proposals; E 718
Reuther, Victor G.
United auto workers not a contributor to Africa-based Peace with freedom; C 162; see also 48

PAGE

Reuther, Walter P.; auto workers' president's challenge to AFL-CIO president G. Meany. By B. J. Widick; S 601
Co-organizer of Alliance for labor action (ALA) 758
Rhodesia; backing of Cabora Bassa hydroelectric complex in Mozambique 598
Part of South Africa's apartheid empire 596 ff.
Rice, Rev. Msgr. Charles O.
Not involved in Pittsburgh Negroes' protest against birth control; C 810; see also 536
Rich, Adrienne
Ghazals: homage to Ghalib; P 188
Ridolfi, Sido L. ; New Jersey state senator's alleged relations with organized crime 108, 109
Right, the. See Conservatives
Rios, Barbara J.
Praise for M. Tanzer article on credit; other problems of poor; C 746; see also 687
Ripon society; left spur to Republican party. H. L. Reiter; S 202
Rivers, Representative L. Mendel; spirited champion of embattled Defense department 717
Riverside church, New York; take-over of pulpit by J. Forman to voice reparations demands for blacks; E 618
Roads; public demands voice in choice; E 4
Roberts, Owen J.; late justice's opinion on right of assembly in Hague v. C.I.O. 753
Robertson, Ian
Apartheid's empire; hegemony of South Africa across southern part of continent; S 596
Robertson, Jack
Remember the Pueblo; hearings on capture of spy ship reveal divided command and Navy's ineptitude; S 326
Space program no good for blacks; S 814
Rockefeller, John D., IV; West Virginia secretary of state on defensive in black lung rebellion 535
Rockefeller, Governor Nelson A.; victim of Nixon's public-relations diplomacy on unpopular Latin-American trips; E 746
Rockwell, Emma
M. L. King, Jr., ignored in U.S., honored on Venezuelan stamps; C 682; see also E, 453
Rodgers, Carolyn M.
Of me; P 313
Rogers, Ray
Panthers and tribesmen: black guns on campus of UCLA; S 558
Rogers, Secretary of state William P.; significance of appointment 138 ff.; see also C, 226
Rogers, Willie Mae; brief tenure of Good Housekeeping institute director as White House consultant on consumer affairs; E 260
Rokes, Willis Park
Consumer be damned! The Ma Bell rental agency; S 820
Romano, Octavio I.; Berkeley, Calif., anthropologist works to destroy myth of passive Mexican American 271-272; see also C, 386 and 405
Romney, George; poor primary showing in 1968 New Hampshire primary ascribable to Manchester Union Leader 398
Roosevelt, President Franklin D.; contrasted with L. B. Johnson 42-43
Rosenberg, Milton J.
The drift toward doomsday: blind strategy of missile defense; S 168; see also C, 522
Rosenfeld, Alvin A
The friendly fuzz: formerly successful community relations division of San Francisco police; S 503
Rosenkavalier, Der. Metropolitan opera production reviewed by D. Hamilton; M 413
Rosenquist, James. Reviewed by L. Alloway; A 581
Rosenthal, Representative Benjamin S.; brought about ouster of Miss W. M. Rogers, Good Housekeeping institute director, as White House adviser on consumer affairs; E 260
Rosenthal, M. L.
The very latest news; P 550
Roth, Philip. Film version of novel Goodbye, Columbus reviewed by R. Hatch; MP 550
Rothstein, Robert; on costs of ABM system 171
Round up. Reviewed by R. Hatch; MP 740
Rowse, Arthur E.
The "failing" newspaper probe in Congress: the press dummies up; S 816
Rowthorne, Bob; British new leftist in debate with old leftists 721 ff.
Rubber industry; effects of defoliation in Vietnam 484
Rumsfeld, Representative Donald; bill to reform Congress 390, 391

PAGE
Rundquist, George E.; tribute to late civil libertarian; E 782
Ruppenthal, Karl M.
  Jet-age diversions: world law and airplane hijackers; S 144
Rusk, Dean; as secretary of State, made decisions without consultation; E 355
  Disingenuous denial of spying function for ship Pueblo; forced to acquiesce in official confession; E 2
Russell, Bertrand, Earl; on need for control in school situation 72
Ryan, Representative William Fitts; on space program and poor 814-815

S

Sabbath is gone. D. Hofstein; P 154
Safety; neglect of by business. R. Nader; S 166
Salesman. Reviewed by H. Clurman; MP 318
Saloma, John; on independent left position of Ripon society in Republican party 203
Salud clinic, California. See California
Samperi, Salvatore. Film Grazie Zia reviewed by R. Hatch; MP 126
Sampson, Ronald V. Dec. 16 article, The bramble of power, oversimplified. E. L. Mally; C 2
  Deficiency of motivation in Dec. 16 article. A. Johnson; C 34
  Power over knowledge: what is a university?; S 560
  Praise for Dec. 16 article. E. Sawyer; C 2
Sanchez, George I.
  Nixon and positivism; law and order theme's implications for common man; C 2
San Francisco; exit of new "beats" from Haight-Ashbury to quieter North Beach; E 357
  Formerly successful community relations division of police department. A. A. Rosenfeld; S 503
  Paradox of deteriorating police-minority community relations; E 482
San Francisco state college. See Education
Santa Barbara, California; oil from leaking offshore wells. E. Cowan; S 304
Sawyer, Elizabeth
  Praise for R. V. Sampson article of Dec. 16, The bramble of power; C 2
Sax, Brian M.
  Restrictions on use of injunction against repression by students; C 810; see also 718
Scenarios; prophetic simulation of disasters by war-games theorists, militant, students, et al. in U.S. society. Y. Blumenfeld; S 788
Schardt, Arlie
  Rebuttal to C. Pou, editor of Atlanta Constitution, on 1966 Georgia election; C 130
Scheuer, Representative James H.; proposal for independent agency to guide Congress on merits of Pentagon devices; E 421
Schiller, Karl; brilliant Socialist West German economics minister 424-425
Schisgal, Murray. Play Jimmy Shine reviewed by H. Clurman; D 61
Schlesinger, Arthur M., Jr.; cold-war remarks at historians' meeting 78
Schlesinger, John. Film Midnight cowboy reviewed by R. Hatch; MP 774
Schoener, Allon. Show Harlem on my mind, at Metropolitan museum, reviewed by L. Alloway; A 156
Schools. See Education
Schroeder, Gerhard; Christian Democrat defeated for West German presidency 423
Schroth, Raymond A., S.J.; editorial on Fortas inspired renewal of Nation subscription; C 746; see also E, 650
Schultz, John; head of team investigating Federal trade commission 69
Schuman, Charles; spokesmen for growers in grape strike and boycott 591 ff.
Science; and military research; appointment of L. A. DuBridge as Nixon adviser; E 5
  Business's application of increases power through diversification 458 ff.
  Mask for power 565
  Misuse on war projects by universities; "research stoppage" planned by professors; E 228; see also E, 355, 454, and 586
Scott, Senator Hugh; election as Republican whip seen as shift in power, not shake-up; E 67
Screaming meemies, the. H. Humphries; P 574
Sculpture. For reviews, see Kozloff, M.
Sea gull, the (S. Lumet version). Reviewed by H. Clurman; MP 220
Sea horses. F. J. Arnstein; P 345
Seafarers international union. See Labor—Union
Seale, Bobby; Negro co-defendant in Chicago "conspiracy" trial 754
Selden, Neil. See Imbrie, M.
Selecky, John; New Jersey assemblyman's alleged relationship with organized crime 108-9
PAGE
Selective service system (draft). See United States—Defense, national Self-portrait at thirty. P. Dow; P 62
Sentinel missile. See Armament—Missiles
1776. Reviewed by H. Clurman; D 443
Shahn, Ben; tribute to late artist. J. Levine; E 390
Shakespeare, William. Play Hamlet (N. Williamson production) reviewed by H. Clurman; D 643
Shale oil. See Oil
Shame, the. Reviewed by R. Hatch; MP 61
Shapiro, Harvey
  A message from Rabbi Nachman; P 375
Shaw, Clay; verdict of not guilty of conspiracy to assassinate President Kennedy inevitable; New Orleans prosecutor J. Garrison irresponsible; E 324; see also C, 450, with editorial reply
Shaw, George Bernard. Film version of play Great Catherine reviewed by H. Clurman; MP 220
Sheehy, Michael
  Irish literary censorship; S 833
Shefetz, Melvin C.
  England's new left: young and angry talent; S 720
Sherrill, Robert C.
  Insurgents in caucus: club business on the Hill; E. M. Kennedy's election as Senate Democratic whip and failure to unseat House speaker J. W. McCormack; S 102
  Looking back at Johnson: the wasted years; S 42
  The West Virginia miracle: the "black lung" rebellion of coal miners forced passage of payments bill for ailment; S 529; see also C, 714, with Sherrill reply
Shields, Art; venerable reporter on Daily World 632-633
Shine, Ted. Play Contribution reviewed by H. Clurman; D 548
Shipping industry; alien seamen's "contributions" to Seafarers union used in U.S. political campaigns; E 68
  Cause and effect of longshoremen's strike over containerization; E 4
  Oil-pollution problem from tanker leakage. E. Cowan; S 304
Sierra club; fratricide in conservationist group. R. A. Jones; S 567; see also C, 650
Silver, Adele Z.
  Tough going for Negro mayor C. Stokes of Cleveland in re-election campaign; E 524
Simângo, Uria; acting head of FRELIMO 598
Simon, Neil. Musical Promises, promises reviewed by H. Clurman; D 125
Simpson, Smith
  State department as Nixon's seventh crisis; diplomats in disarray; S 138; see also C, 138
Singer, William S.; defeated machine candidate in Chicago aldermanic race; E 389
Singleton, Donald; Daily News series on New York City housing crisis; E 557
Sirhan, Sirhan B.; death penalty for assassin of R. F. Kennedy deprecated; E 589
Sjöman, Vilgot. Film I am curious (yellow) reviewed by R. Hatch; MP 381; see also C, 554
Slawson, W. David
  Tax reform: how to patch the loopholes; S 760
Slums. See Cities, U.S.
Small, William A., Jr.; Tucson newspaper involved in antitrust suit 817
Small as a fist. R. T. Goodman; P 30
Smith, David. Sculpture exhibition at Guggenheim museum reviewed by L. Alloway; A 518
Smith, Desmond
  The Daily World: Communism's family newspaper in U.S.; S 631
Smith, Ralph Lee
  The problem of the police problem; S 486
Smythe, Dallas
  "Buy something": five myths of consumership; pervasive influence of mass media; S 82; see also C, 194
Snow, C. P. Dec. 9 article, Liberal Communism, encouraging. E. L. Mally; C 2
Sobell, Morton; belated release of Rosenberg spy-case figure; E 101
Socialism; contributions of N. Thomas; E 5
Someone's comin' hungry at my pocket. Reviewed by H. Clurman; D 478
Song of the worst thing, the. W. Biermann; P 440
South, U.S.; middle-class laymen's domination of Protestant churches. H. Golden; S 602
South Africa, Republic of; apartheid empire across southern Africa. I. Robertson; S 596
  Backing of Cabora Bassa hydroelectric complex in Mozambique 598
  Educational apartheid paralleled by black-studies fanatics in U.S. 755-756
PAGE
South Carolina; Negro dissenters at Voorhees college arrested 588, 655-656
South-West Africa; part of South Africa's apartheid empire 596 ff.
Space
  After landing on moon, blow it up. T. Wah; C 66
  Discrimination against Negroes. J. Robertson; S 814
  Diversion from program urged by Senator E. M. Kennedy 684, 814
  German mass media allege that U.S. spends vast sums on program. H. Pepper; C 34
  Moon flights can wait; E 35; see also C, 194
Spain
  Role of U.S. general, D. A. Burchinal, in negotiations for renewal of bases; E 323
  Telegram protesting arrest of intellectuals. H. Arendt et al.; C 258
  Trouble ahead for Franco; E 133
  U.S. base agreement dangerous at any price; E 813
  Widespread unrest as reason for abandonment of U.S. bases; E 261
Sparkman, Senator John J.; "honoraria" for speeches before industrial groups 684
Sprague, Charles A.; tribute to late distinguished Oregonian; E 782
Spring, 1969. E. Merriam; P 514
Spying. See Pueblo (ship)
SST. See Aviation
Stamler, Dr. Jeremiah; 1965 suit against subpoenaing House un-American activities committee 626, 627
Stamler, Nelson F.; New Jersey prosecutor fired in 1951 for exposing Mafia gambling operations 106
Stark, John P.
  Letter carrier fights back against junk mail; S 13; see also C, 66
States, U.S.; residency requirements for welfare outlawed; E 555
  Rising taxes 726
Steel industry; pollution of Lake Superior. Hill; S 795
Steinbeck, John; evaluation of late writer's work; E 37
Stenvig, Charles. See Minneapolis
Stevens, Richard L.
  Thesis of C. Cohen's Democracy and the curriculum not valid; C 586; see also 334
Stoddard, Charles H.; report on pollution of Lake Superior 795 ff.
Stokes, Mayor Carl B. See Cleveland, Ohio
Stokes, Louis A.; Negro freshman in House 6, 7
Stolen kisses. Reviewed by R. Hatch; MP 126
Stone, Clement; Chicago philanthropist and Nixon campaign angel may inculcate "positive mental attitude" in HEW department. L. Wille; S 338
Stone, William B.
  M. Czikszentmihaly exaggerated elaboration of chess-playing equipment; C 290; see also 210
Stop, you're killing me. Reviewed by H. Clurman; D 477
Stoutenberg, Adrien
  From the diggings; P 802
Strauss, Admiral Lewis L.; technologically based 1967 peace plan for Middle East ignored by State department; E 163
Strauss, Richard. Performances and recordings of works reviewed by D. Hamilton; M 413
Students. See Education
Subin, Harry
  Preventive detention for potential criminals: bail for the rich, jail for the poor; S 363
Submarines; accidental sinking of nuclear Guitarro; obsolescence of Polaris type; E 717
Swanston, David
  Education for relevance: first year at Federal city college, Washington, D.C.; S 594
Swaziland; part of South Africa's apartheid empire 596 ff.
Swift, Joan
  December; P 382
Syracuse, New York; showdown of city administration and community action agency 235

T

Tagliabue, John
  The real thing; P 830
  Three poems; P 216
Taking off the face. P. Zweig; P 577
Tango. Reviewed by H. Clurman; D 157
Tanner, Ray; XYZ chromosome count as defense in criminal assault case 36
Tanzer, Michael
  Depression warning: out on the credit limb in U.S. economy; S 686; see also C, 746
Tariq Ali; Pakistani new leftist resident in England; debate with British old leftists 721 ff.

PAGE

Taxes. See United States—Economics
Taylor, Ronald B.
  Labor in the vineyard: California grape boycott and the national labor relations act; S 591
  Salud, socially oriented Tulare Co., Cal., clinic operated by Dr. D. Brooks and wife Wendy, as medical storm center; S 7
Teer (Arrow). Reviewed by J. V. Hatch; D 805
Telephone industry; California public utilities commission's approval of rate increases to Pacific telephone and General telephone; E 36
Telephones. See American telephone and telegraph company
Television
  Cigarette advertising discontinued by Westinghouse broadcasting and Canadian broadcasting corp.; pressure on and by other networks; E 685
  Coverage of Nixon European trip; E 322
  FCC policy by whimsy shown in Boston and Salt Lake City license decisions; E 197
  German program dramatized reunification problems. L. R. Colitt; S 283
  Public television: the producers organize. C. Horman; S 634
  Role in myths of consumership. D. Smythe; S 82
Teorema. Reviewed by R. Hatch; MP 582
Terzani, Tiziano
  Italy erupts; storming the institutions; S 751
TFX; costly fighter plane 658 ff.
Thailand; U.S. cash register in; E 165
Thant, Secretary-general U. See United Nations
Theatre; left theatre in India. J. V. Hatch; D 804
  Where are the playwrights? C. Hughes; D 90; see also C, 162
  For reviews of plays, see Clurman, H.; Hatch, R.; Hatch, J. V.
Thieu, President Nguyen Van; Nixon's face-saving meeting with South Vietnamese chief; E 684
Things you do not say, the. A. Marcus; P 278
Third world; how U.S. looks to. E. Ahmad; S 265; see also C, 290 and 322
Third world, the. L. Ferlinghetti; P 92
Thomas, Norman; appraisal of late Socialist leader; E 5
Thompson, Edward; influence of book The making of the British working class 297-298
Thompson, Meldrim; candidate of Manchester Union Leader defeated in 1968 New Hampshire gubernatorial race 398
Three poems. J. Tagliabue; P 216
Thurmond, Senator J. Strom; Nixon's debt to may thwart school integration 80
Thyng, Brigadier General Harrison (ret.); candidate of Manchester Union Leader defeated in 1966 New Hampshire Senate race 398
To a Gentile poet. M. Leib; P 155
To be young, gifted and black. Reviewed by H. Clurman; D 548
Toch, Hans
  Cops and blacks: warring minorities; S 491
Torrey Canyon (ship); wreck of tanker in 1967 caused record beach pollution 304 ff.
Touster, Saul
  Two winter pieces; P 216
Trade; adverse effects of Vietnam war on U.S. 264
  Discouraging British figures 720
  South African gains 596-597
Treires, James J.
  Cohen and Widmer articles on campus unrest contrasted; C 682; see also 334 and 537
Tribune; organ of British old left; editors' debate with new-left counterparts on Black Dwarf. M. C. Shefetz; S 720
Trubitt, Hillard J.
  Going by the book; adherence to tradition by police and other city employees; S 507
Trudeau, Prime minister Pierre Elliott. See Canada
Truffaut, François. Film Stolen kisses reviewed by R. Hatch; MP 126
Trusts; tax proposals on 761-762
Tuckerman, Anne
  Albanian demonology; Stalinist regime's conspiratorial view of world; S 566

PAGE

  Fire control at the U.N. in Middle East crises; S 70
  U.N.: defusing the powder keg in Middle East; S 198; see also C, 322
Tucson, Arizona; Justice department antitrust suit against newspapers 817 ff.
Tunney, Representative John V.; likely Democratic senatorial candidate in California in 1970 112-113
Tuotti, Joseph Dylan. Play Big time Buck White reviewed by H. Clurman; D 60
Twentieth century; ends Dec. 31, 2000. H. Cushman; C 194; see also E, 35
Two winter pieces. S. Touster; P 216

U

Udall, Representative Morris K.; unsuccessful bid for House speakership 103-4, 391
Udall, Secretary of the interior Stewart L.; abortive last-stand attempt to set aside vast acreage as national monuments; E 164
Ulbricht, Walter; East German boss 270-271
Unidentified flying objects (UFOs); Condon-U. of Colorado report on; E 100
Union Leader; New Hampshire's journal of abuse. W. D. Gardner; S 397; see also C, 482
Union of Soviet Socialist Republics
  And the United States
    As Vanya and Sam in fable based on prisoner's dilemma in war games. J. Goldberg; C 778
    Comparative justification for missile defenses. R. Moody; C 682
    Drift toward doomsday, the: blind strategy of missile defense. M. J. Rosenberg; S 168; see also C, 522
    Embarrassment for U.S. in 1962 missile crisis from arbitrary and autonomous decisions 356
    Friendly exchange of rare early films; E 421
    Missile rivalry 656
    Moon race can wait; E 35
    New West Berlin flare-up, with denial of travel permits to West German electors; complication of Nixon visit; E 228
  Czech invasion justified by E. J. Kahn scenario 790
  Czech invasion split World federation of trade unions (WFTU); E 291
  Harmony with Cuba 827
  Pressure for Middle East settlement 70, 198
  Relations with East Germany 269
  Sordid role in Nigeria civil war; E 357
  Ussuri river not issue in face-off with China in Manchuria. C. P. Fitzgerald; S 465
Union oil company; leaking wells deface shoreline of Santa Barbara, Calif. E. Cowan; S 304
United church of Christ; New York state conference recommendations on draft reform. G. R. Hodges; C 34
United Nations
  Breakdown of four-power talks on Middle East; readiness to denounce Israel 259
  Fire control of Middle East crises. A. Tuckerman; S 70
  Inter-governmental maritime consultative organization (IMCO) rulings on pollution of seas by tankers 306-307
  Peacekeeping efforts in Middle East. A. Tuckerman; S 198; see also C, 322
  Plain talk on members' irresponsibility by outgoing President E. Arenales of general assembly; E 4
  Should implement 1967 Security council resolution as basis for Arab-Israeli settlement; E 34
  U.S. dominance of forces in Korea; one-sided reports of U.N. commission on the unification and rehabilitation of Korea (UNCURK) 622 ff.
United States
  Agency for international development (AID)
    Brazilian activities 664
    Funding of African American labor center 48
    Ties with AIFLD in Latin America 46 ff.
  Agriculture department
    Opposition to limiting farm subsidies 749
    Stingy administration of stamp and other food programs; Secretary Hardin cited by California rural legal assistance (CRLA); E 452

PAGE

  Atomic energy commission (AEC)
    Dangers of underground nuclear explosions; E 556
    Unconcern over Rocky Flats, Colo., plutonium fire; E 781
    Underground Nevada tests challenged by H. Hughes; E 453
  Budget bureau
    Inadequate review of defense expenditures 657
    Small staff keeps half an eye on $20-billion defense procurement. R. W. Dietsch; S 331
  Central intelligence agency (CIA)
    Alleged funding of Peace with freedom labor-cultural group in Africa 48-49; see also C, 162
    Role in Pueblo deployment; E 196
  Commerce department
    Supervision of retail packaging 732
  Congress
    Black freshmen in House. C. Rabb; S 6
    Calls for investigation of conditions in U.S. military stockades 433
    Chance to curb national militarization; E 652
    Exposure of conservative Democratic Congressmen's Republican voting record by liberal Democratic study group; E 451
    Growing opposition in Senate to Sentinel ABM 196
    Guns vs. butter as key issue; E 354; see also C, 541
    Hearings on defense costs 656 ff.
    Hearings on packaging 730 ff.
    House subcommittee headed by O. G. Pike investigating Pueblo affair 326
    Inouye and other bills to outlaw detention centers; E 716
    Insurgents in caucus: club business on the Hill; E. M. Kennedy's election as Senate majority whip and failure to unseat House speaker J. W. McCormack. By R. G. Sherrill; S 102
    Investigations of defense procurement 328 ff., 331
    Majority leader M. Mansfield on Senate's responsibility for continuing Vietnam war. E. Gruening; E 748
    Masque of moderation by Committee on internal security, successor to House un-American activities committee; E 260
    Members' dubious lecture "honoraria"; E 683
    Need for list of members voting against key military appropriations; 21 in House cited; E 484; see also C, 618
    Opponents of nuclear Armageddon 173, 174
    Press silent on "failing" newspaper probe. A. E. Rowse; S 816
    Resurgence of House un-American activities committee as Committee on internal security 625 ff.
    Shift in power, not shake-up, in Senate's election of E. M. Kennedy as Democratic whip and H. Scott as Republican whip; E 67
    Small-town Congress: obsolescence on Capitol Hill. C. Rabb; S 390
    Tax-reform hearings. W. D. Slawson; S 760
    Wiretapping increased through title III of 1968 omnibus crime control and safe streets act. S. Fly; S 697
  Constitution
    And DDT; attempt to ban pesticide. H. Henkin; S 308
  Culture
    Neglected; department of cultural affairs urged; E 326
  Defense, national
    Admirals' recommendation of court-martial for Pueblo commander Bucher overruled by Navy secretary J. H. Chaffee; E 620
    Arms chill in air as result of Vietnam; E 195
    Army court's severe sentences of San Francisco Presidio "mutineers"; E 261; see also 432
    Army's indefensible proposal to ship surplus poison gas by rail, then dump it in Atlantic; E 653, 717, and 781

PAGE

At odds with State department on Spanish-bases commitment; E 323
Contractors' mass employment of retired military officers as executives; E 419
Decisions made by pressure rather than logic; E 355
Devices too complex for Congressmen to judge; J. H. Scheuer's proposal for evaluation agency; E 421
Dilemma of Deputy Secretary D. Packard's financial holdings; E 66
Disaffection among services on Vietnam war 264
Diversification of knowledge for own ends 458 ff.; see also C, 650
Draft discriminatory and inequitable; should be abolished; E 164
Draft-reform recommendations of New York state conference of United church of Christ. G. R. Hodges; C 34
Drift toward doomsday, the; blind strategy of missile defense. M. J. Rosenberg; S 168; see also C, 522
Excess profits on air-frame contracts revealed by U.S. tax court. S. Watzman; S 113
Farce of civil-defense test announcements on radio; E 621
Growing opposition to ABM missile and similar programs; E 586
"Little groups of neighbors"; draft boards in action. L. B. Jackson; S fl74
Low incidence of combat fatigue among troops in Vietnam; E 621
National guard used against U.S. protesters in "little wars," as at Berkeley, Calif.; E 716; 787
Naval bases in Japan 142-143
Navy's ineptitude in Peublo affair; E 196; see also C, 322
Nixon "blueprint" on. E. Gruening; E 781
Old draft law extended under Johnson 44
Pentagon mail interchangeable with that of White House. H. Mears; C 778
Pentagon procurement: billion-dollar grab bag. R. F. Kaufman; S 328
Piety in army guidance manuals to be eliminated following American civil liberties union suit; E 325
Proposed amendment to draft act would make Vietnam service voluntary. E. Gruening; E 165
Pueblo hearings reveal divided command and Navy's ineptitude. J. Robertson, S 326
Sacred missions involving contamination as continuing sources of embarrassment; E 717
Scientists' and engineers' rebellion against misuses of talents on military research; E 228, 355, and 454
Secretary Laird's missile pause; E 227
"Selling" the ABM through publicity campaign; E 259
Seminars of military persuasion; General Westmoreland as participant; E 389
Senator Proxmire's opening shot in guns-vs.-butter battle — key national issue; E 354; see also C, 541
Small Budget bureau staff keeps half an eye on $20-billion Pentagon procurement. R. W. Dietsch; S 331
Stalling tactics on graduate-school draft deferments; E 197
Stockade justice: the army's kangaroo courts. K. H. Purnell; S 432
Swollen forces; Congress should curb national militarization; E 652
Token cuts in Nixon budget proposals 555
Usury of war, the. Phoenix of obsolescence and rising costs of missile systems, supersonic planes, etc. R. F. Kaufmann; S 656
Usury of war, the. Vietnam: the 200-year mortgage. J. L. Clayton; S 661
Which memo?: the odor of fraud in A. Fargas draft-induction case. C. Dreifus; S 176; see also C, 258
Economics
  Balance-of-payment and currency problems; E 651
  Churches' real estate should be taxed; E 619
  Depression warning: out on the credit limb. M. Tanzer; S 686; see also C, 746
  Disastrous Johnson policies 43
  Potential tax windfall from antitrust penalties. M. Mintz; S 467
  Tax reform: how to patch the loopholes. W. D. Slawson; S 760
  Tax-reform issue dodged by AFL-CIO; E 718
  Trade-off in Nixon tax proposals; no fundamental structural reform; E 554
  Usury of war. Vietnam: the 200-year mortgage. J. L. Clayton; S 661
  Vietnam war and 264
  Widespread taxpayer revolt 724 ff.

PAGE

Equal employment opportunity commission
  Flood of sex-discrimination complaints 242
Executive branch
  Under Johnson 43 ff.
  White House mail interchangeable with Penagon's. H. Mears; C 778
Federal communications commission (FCC)
  Complaisance toward AT&T 820 ff.
  Policy by whimsy shown in Boston and Salt Lake City TV license rulings; E 197
Federal trade commission (FTC)
  Found rigging in gasoline and grocery promotion "games" 370 ff.
  Found wanting by investigative team organized by R. Nader; E 69
Foreign policy
  Crisis in State department. S. Simpson; S 138; see also C, 226
  Decisions made by pressure rather than logic; E 355
  How we look to the third world. E. Ahmad; S 265; see also C, 290 322
  In Latin America: marriage of convenience of Labor and State departments. H. W. Berger; S 46
  Lessons for Democratic party in recent past 201
  Linked with plans of military 652
  Looking back at Johnson: the wasted years. R. G. Sherrill; S 42
  Nixon "blueprint" for continued war abroad. E. Gruening; E 781
  Possible effect of Chinese intransigence toward Soviet Union 465-466
  Pro-dictatorship in Latin America. D. Bonafede; S 663
  Public-relations diplomacy in Nixon's dispatch of N. A. Rockefeller to Latin America; E 746
Foreign relations
  With Brazil; backing of generals. D. Bonafede; S 663
  With Haiti 394 ff.
  With Japan; unpopularity may bring civil war. A. Axelbank; S 141; see also C, 354
  With South Korea 622 ff.
  With Spain: base agreement dangerous at any price; E 813
  With Spain; wide unrest as reason for abandonment of military bases; E 261
  With Thailand based on vast expenditures; E 165
Health, education and welfare department
  Budget cut for books and libraries; E 750
  Contributions of former director of education H. Howe. By H. Golden; S 131
  Laggard enforcement of school integration 80, 81
  Possible exposure to "positive mental attitude" of C. Stone, Nixon campaign angel. L. Wille; S 338
  Remiss on occupational health and safety 167
Interior department
  Bureau of mines' lack of zeal on coal miners' working conditions 530, 531
  Retreat on order to Reserve mining on pollution of Lake Superior. G. Hill; S 795
  Secretary S. L. Udall's last-minute attempt to set aside vast acreage as national monuments frustrated by Senator W. L. Aspinall; E 164
Justice department
  Antitrust suit against Tucson newspapers 817 ff.
  Laggard enforcement of school integration 80, 81
  Memory of Dr. M. L. King, Jr., slandered by FBI wiretaps; E 780
  Secretary J. Mitchell's dismaying choice of J. Leonard to head civil rights division; E 162
  Wiretapping restrictions imposed by Supreme court rulings 699
Labor department
  Courting of Alliance for labor action (ALA) 759
  Marriage of convenience with State department on Latin-American policies. H. W. Berger; S 46
National aeronautics and space administration (NASA)
  Moon flights can wait; E 35
National security agency (NSA)
  Outflanked regular naval officers in Pueblo spy-ship operation 326 ff.
Office of economic opportunity (OEO)
  Butt of controversy in politics of anti-poverty. R. H. Davidson; S 233
  Embattled legal services program in Mississippi 791-792, 794
Post office department
  Letter carrier's fight against junk mail. J. P. Stark; S 13; see also C, 66 Presidency
  Eisenhower's; E 418

PAGE

Renegotiation board
  Precarious existence despite success in obtaining refunds from excess profits on war contracts. S. Watzman; S 113
Rural electrification agency (REA)
  $25-million loan to Lower Colorado River authority 45
Society
  National failure of social conscience, as in A. Fortas episode; E 650; see also C, 746
  Overclass/underclass: knowledge is power. J. McDermott; S 458; see also C, 650
  Prognosis of rightist crackdown following Vietnam war: the wheel of panic. T. J. Lowi; S 624
  Scenario society, the. Y. Blumenfeld; S 788
  Violence as natural, according to H. R. Brown and special national commission; indifference to Vietnam atrocities; E 779
  Why dissent turns violent. K. Widmer; S 425
State department
  As Nixon's seventh crisis; diplomats in disarray. S. Simpson; S 138; see also C, 226
  Brazilian blunders. D. Bonafede; S 663
  D. Rusk's autonomous decisions; E 355
  Myopia on Strauss-Eisenhower peace-through-irrigation plan for Middle East; E 163
  Split with Defense department on commitments to Spain; E 323
Supreme court
  Attacked by safe streets and crime bill of 1968 495
  Chief justices Warren and Burger compared; E 682
  Destroyed legal arguments for "free choice" in school desegregation 80-81
  Liberal rulings and rightist reaction 625 ff.
  May rule on fate of 500 remaining condemned prisoners. E. Gertz; E 102
  On right of assembly 753
  Outlawing of state residency requirements for welfare; E 555
  Police resentment over rulings on rights of accused 491, 500
  Resignation of justice A. Fortas under pressure; E 650; see also C, 746
  Rightist campaign to force resignation of justice W. O. Douglas; E 716
  Rulings on eavesdropping cases 699
Treasury department
  Income-tax proposals 761 ff.
  Internal revenue service allowance of tax deduction for antitrust penalties 467-468
Unruh, Jesse
  Watershed of politics: a Democrat speaks to the question; S 199
  California assembly Democratic leader's setbacks 110, 112
Up tight. Reviewed by R. Hatch; MP 62
Uphaus, Dr. Willard; veteran pacifist-hounded by Manchester, N.H., Union Leader. L. Boyer; C 482
US. See Black panther party
Ussuri river, Manchuria; not issue in Chinese-Soviet face-off. F. P. Fitzgerald; S 465
Utah; sheep killed by army poison gas 717

V

Van der Ryn; U. of California professor on "people's park" crisis at Berkeley 785-786
Van Jossen, Sgt. Joseph A.
  E. Witten article of Dec. 16, Rhetoric of ambivalence, misleading on new left's need to merge; C 66
Venezuela; M. L. King, Jr., honored on stamps. E. Rockwell; C 682; see also E, 453
Vera foundation; brought about bail reform act 364
Very latest news, the. M. L. Rosenthal; P 550
Victor, Florence
  Public officials and assassination, based on Dec. 2, editorial, Bulletproof illusions; C, with editors' reply, 98
Vietnam
  Battle for the mind of President-elect Nixon on war; E 98
  Conduct of war by U.S. questioned by Senator E. M. Kennedy; E 684
  Disproportionate number of Negroes and poor in U.S. forces 175 ff.
  Effects of defoliation observed by U.S. zoology professors E. W. Pfeiffer and G. H. Orians; E 484
  Eisenhower policies on; E 418, 420
  Elements of settling war, Saigon notwithstanding. R. A. Falk; S 689
  End of war may bring rightist crackdown in U.S. By T. J. Lowi; S 624
  Failures of U.S. State department 138
  Lessons for Democratic party 200, 201

Index

PAGE
Majority leader M. Mansfield on U.S. Senate's responsibility for continued war. E. Gruening; E 748
New approach to ending war. E. Gruening; S 570
Nixon inaugural address moderate on war; E 130
Nixon meeting with President N. V. Thieu of South Vietnam; E 684
Nixon must produce proposals for solution of war 323
Nixon-Thieu meeting at Midway I.; E 778
Nixon's war in. T. Coffin; S 262
Opposition to war from new Alliance for labor action (ALA) 758
Press coverage in U.S. inadequate for public to form judgments 459-460
R. Findley and S. Chisholm speeches on war in U.S. House; E 451
Reasons for low incidence of combat fatigue among U.S. soldiers; E 621
U.S. policies arrived at without consultation 356
U.S. public unconcerned over ruin of small country; E 779
Usury of war: 200-year mortgage. J. L. Clayton; S 661
W. A. Harriman succeeded by H. C. Lodge as chief peace negotiator for U.S.; E 68
War brings arms chill in U.S.; E 195
War exploded myth of revolutionary U.S. By E. Ahmad; S 265
War profits of U.S. corporations: the tax-court peephole. S. Watzman; S 113
War worse than ever; talks with North's delegates at Paris peace talks. J. Mirsky; E 556
"Who is the enemy?": jail notes of a young Vietnamese. Nguyen Van Minh, with introduction by D. Marr; S 359
Viguerie, Richard A.; rightist public-relations man's distribution of background material on Chief justice W. E. Burger; E 749
Vinson, Ken
Mississippi: signs of life. The lawyers of Mississippi U. law school; S 791
Violence; report of national commission on confirms H. R. Brown diagnosis; public equanimity over ravaging of Vietnam; E 779
Vorster, Prime minister Balthazar J. See South Africa, Republic of

W

Wah, Thein
After landing on moon, blow it up; C 66
Wald, Dr. George; speech against supermilitarism 586
Wall Street Journal; scenarios on wounded R. F. Kennedy 790
Wallace, George C.; appeal of racist politician explained 460, 667
War, usury of. Special section, May 26
War games. See Scenarios
Warburg, James P.; tribute to late foreign-policy critic; E 782
Ward, Baxter; TV newscaster's challenge to S. Yorty in Los Angeles mayoralty race 403-404
Warning, the — a theme for Linda. Reviewed by H. Clurman; D 612
Warren, Chief justice Earl; compared with successor, W. E. Burger; E 682
Warren report; not on trial in C. Shaw conspiracy case; E .... 324; seee also C, 450, with editorial reply
Washington, D.C.; first year at first public college, Federal city college. D. Swanston; S 594
Watch on MacDougal. By A. Grumbach; P 742
Water pollution. See Pollution
Watkins, Clifford; Stockton, Calif., Negro wounded and brother Ted killed by liquor-store clerk; acquitted of robbery; E 483
Watson, John B.; quintessential behaviorist 563
Watzman, Sanford
War profits: the tax-court peephole; S 113
Waugh, Evelyn. Film version of novel Decline and fall reviewed by R. Hatch; D 187
Weinstein, Henry E.
Conversation with Negro militant E. Cleaver; S 74
Welfare. See Poverty
Welles, Chris. Dec. 23 article, The dormant bomb, mistaken in making Nixon more favorable to oil industry than Johnson. By H. Fallis; C 162
Werth, Alexander
Kingsley Martin: a memoir; S 294
Nation's tribute and debt to; E 387
Tribute to late historian-journalist. C. Bourdet; S 358
West Virginia; strike of coal miners brought miracle of compensation payments for black lung. R. G. Sherrill; S .... 529; see also C, 714, with Sherrill reply
Western electric company. See American telephone and telegraph company
PAGE
Westin, Alan; on wiretapping loopholes in omnibus crime control and safe streets act of 1968 .... 697, 699
Westmoreland, General William C.; participant in Defense seminars of persuasion; E 389
White, Harry A.
Praise for editorial on A. Fortas and "American disease"; C .... 746; see also E, 650
Whitehead, Ralph, Jr.
The Chicago indictments for conspiracy: Daley vs. the guerrilla theatre; S 422
Widick, B. J.
Alliance for labor action (ALA): new voice of labor; S 758
Meany and Reuther: labor's main bout; S 601
Widmer, Kingsley
California: why the colleges blew up; S 237
Rebellion as education; S 537
Why dissent turns violent; S 425
Wildstrom, Stephen H.
Mugged by the sheriffs: an anecdote of illegal beating without redress; S 496
Wilhelm, Sidney M.
Normal police conduct in Berkeley repression; C .... 810; see also E, 747
Wilkie, Curtis
Muzzle on campus speakers at state universities in Mississippi; E 132
Wille, Lois
Clement Stone feels great; Chicago philanthropist and Nixon campaign angel may inculcate "positive mental attitude" in HEW department; S 338
William I, the conqueror; land census, Domesday book, being emulated in Soviet Union and should be in U.S. By J. T. Younger; S 275
Williams, Tennessee. Play In the bar of a Tokyo hotel reviewed by H. Clurman; D 709
Williamson, Nicol. Production of Hamlet reviewed by H. Clurman; D 643
Willis, Will; severe sentence of Florida newspaperman for marijuana possession; E .... 293; see also C, 509
Wilson, Prime minister Harold. See Great Britain
Wilson, Jerome
New York City sweepstakes: Mayor Lindsay vs. the field; S 332
Winberry, John J.; New Jersey prosecutor of 1940s fired upon uncovering Mafia gambling syndicate 106, 107
Winter, Carl; co-editor of Daily World 633
Wiretapping; "dirty business," as in FBI surveillance of Dr. M. L. King, Jr.; E 780
Increase authorized by title III of omnibus crime control and safe streets act of 1968. S. Fly; S 697
Wisconsin; movement to ban pesticide DDT. H. Henkin; S 308
Witten, Edward. Dec. 16 article, Rhetoric of ambivalence, misleading on new left's need to merge. Sgt. J .A. Van Jossen; C 66
Wolf, Lazer
A murder; P 154
Women, national organization for (NOW); feminist group. J. Freeman; S .... 241; see also C, 354
Women's liberation front; feminist group. J. Freeman; S 241
World without war council of the United States; internes sought. M. Green; C 650
Worth county. See Georgia
Writers and writing; I. Babel on (excerpt from Years of hope, by K. Paustovsky) 406
Wurster, Charles; biologist's testimony against DDT 308, 310

Y

Yannacone, Victor, Jr.; attorney for conservation group seeking to ban DDT in Wisconsin .... 308 ff.
Yarborough, Senator Ralph; deserves praise for courageous stands. Mrs. L. Dresh; C 714
Ybarra, Andres
Quinto Sol members didn't occupy office of Berkeley president; C .... 386; see also 272
Year Boston won the pennant, the. Reviewed by H. Clurman; D 741
Yorty, Mayor Sam; campaign for re-election in Los Angeles. P. Kerby; S 403
Defeated in primary by Negro councilman T. Bradley; E 485
Racism as factor in victory. P. Kerby; E 749
Won re-election 811
Yost, Charles; Atlantic monthly article on myths in Middle east; E 34
Young, Whitney, Jr.; talk to Alliance for labor action on political tendencies among Negroes 759-760
Younger, Judith T.
A tip from William the conqueror; land census for U.S. as well as for Soviet Union; S 275
Youth; new ethic toward military 264
PAGE

Z

Zambia; active opposition to South Africa's apartheid empire .... 596 ff.
Initial opposition to Cabora Bassa hydroelectric project in Mozambique 598
Zionism. See Israel
Zweig, Paul
Don't walk; P 577
On willpower; P 577
The prayer wheel; P 577
Taking off the face; P 577

BOOK REVIEWS

Books are indexed under author and title and in some cases under subject.

The following explanatory letters are used in the index:

B Book review
R Reviewer
C Correspondence

A

Abolitionism. Means and ends in American abolitionism: Garrison and his critics on strategy and tactics, 1834-1850. A. S. Kraditor; B 214
Active society, the: a theory of societal and political processes. A. Etzioni; B 675
Adcock, Cynthia L.; R 54
Affirmative school integration: efforts to overcome de facto segregation in the urban schools. Edited by R. Hill and M. Feeley; B 669
Age of discontinuity, the. P. F. Drucker; B 576
Agents of change: a close look at the Peace Corps. D. Hapgood and M. Bennett; B 86
Agony of the American left. C. Lasch; B 797
America the beautiful: a modern guide to sex, security, and the soft buck. Edited by J. Lieber; B 28
American power and the new mandarins: historical and political essays. N. Chomsky; B 373
American serfs, the (in South). P. Good; B 55
Amis, Kingsley
I want it now; B 546
Amis, Kingsley, and Norman Mailer; new conservatism of. Article by M. Green 573
Anatomy of a crisis: the Laotian crisis of 1960-1961. B. B. Fall. Edited with an epilogue by R. M. Smith; B 639
And other stories. J. O'Hara; B 85
Andrews, Lewis M.
Making a million under 30; critique of magazine Careers Today 315
Angus, Ian (Ed.). See Orwell, George
Arendt, Hannah
Men in dark times; B 121
Arthos, John; R 186, 410
Artist as critic, the: critical writings of Oscar Wilde. Edited by R. Ellman; B 799
Ashbery, John, and James Schuyler
A nest of ninnies; B 475
Ashmore, Harry S., and William C. Baggs
Mission to Hanoi; B 374
Asturias, Miguel Angel
Strong wind; B 213
Autobiography of a runaway slave, a. E. Montejo. Edited by M. Barnet; B 121

B

Babel, Isaac; conversation with, excerpted from Years of hope, by K. Paustovsky 406
Baggs, William C. See Ashmore, H. S.
Baker, Carlos
Ernest Hemingway: a life story; B 671
Baland, Timothy; R 547
Baring-Gould, William S.
Nero Wolfe of west thirty-fifth street; B 251
Barnard, Harry; R 89
Barnet, Miguel (ed.)
The autobiography of a runaway slave. By E. Montejo; B 121
Bayley, David H., and Harold Mendelsohn
Minorities and the police: confrontation in America; B 515
Beastly beatitudes of Balthazar B., the. J. P. Donleavy; B 85
Beatles, the. H. Davies; B 28
Beauvoir, Simone de
The woman destroyed: B 252
Bedient, Calvin; R 120
Beginning of the end, the: May 1968 (in France). A. Quatrocchi and T. Nairn; B 53
Behind the shield: the police in urban society. A. Niederhoffer; B 515
Bendiner, Elmer; R 515, 832

Index

PAGE

- Benedikt, Michael
  - The body; B 547
- Bennett, Meridan. See Hapgood, David
- Bernanos, Michael
  - The other side of the mountain; B 124
- Bernstein, Victor H.
  - Praise for T. Pol review of P. Roth's Portnoy's complaint; C .... 372; see also 311
- Berrigan, Daniel
  - Night flight to Hanoi; B 375
- Berry, Wendell
  - The long-legged house; B 707
- Berryman, John
  - His toy, his dream, his rest; B .... 245. See also correction by reviewer M. Goldman; C 290
- Bezanker, Abraham; R 800
- Biermann, Wolf
  - As The poet in the collective (East Germany). Article by D. Kleinbard 438
- Biermann, Wolf
  - Mit Marx- und Engelszungen; B 438
- Bird, Caroline, with Sara Welles Briller
  - Born female; B 772
- Birenbaum, W. M.
  - Overlive: power, poverty, and the university; 669
- Black Jacob. By W. Mahoney; B 475
- Black rage. W. H. Grier, M.D., and P. M. Cobbs, M.D.; B 24
- Blackburn, Paul
  - In . on . or about the premises; B 217
- Blackburn, Sara; R 28, 124,, 252, 280, 475, 642, 708
- Blake, William; and nonviolence. Article by J. Sutherland 542
- Blanchard, William H.; R 609
- Blast of war, the: 1939-1945. H. Macmillan; B 279
- Bloom, Murray Teigh
  - The trouble with lawyers; B 513
- Blumberg, Herbert H. (ed.) See Hare, A. Paul
- Body, the. M. Benedikt; B 547
- Bolling, Richard
  - Power in the House: a history of the leadership of the House of Representatives; B 21
- Book marks (brief reviews) 28, 124, 217, 252, 374, 412, 475, 611, 642, 708
- Born female. C. Bird, with S. W. Briller; B 772
- Bottomore, T. B.; R 344
- Brégeon, Janine
  - A useless day; B 29
- Briller, Sara Welles. See Bird, C.
- Brilliant, Alan
  - Price correction on The cry of Vietnam, by Thich Nhat Hanh; C .... 554; see also 377
- Brown, Frederick
  - An impersonation of angels: a biography of Jean Cocteau; B 88
- Bruno's dream. I. Murdoch; B 124
- Bullet Park. J. Cheever; B 836
- Burchett, Wilfred
  - Vietnam will win!; B 470
- Byrd, Max; R 251, 770

C

- Cain X 3: The postman always rings twice, Mildred Pierce, Double indemnity. J. M. Cain; B 768
- Camilo Torres. G. Guzmán; B 829
- Cammett, John M.; R 733
- Cancer ward, the. A. I. Solzhenitsyn; B ... 20, 344
- Capouya, Emile; R 20, 213, 344, 831
- Careers Today (magazine); critique by L. M. Andrews 315
- Carroll, Paul
  - The poem in its skin; B 411
- Carter, Dan T.
  - Scottsboro: a tragedy of the American South; B 674
- Casanova, Giacomo
  - History of my life. 6 vols. Translated by W. Trask. B 183
- Case that will not die, the: commonwealth vs. Sacco and Vanzetti. By H. B. Ehrmann; B 605
- Castaneda, Carlos
  - The teachings of Don Juan: a Yaqui way of knowledge; B 184
- Castle to castle. L.-F. Céline; B .... 343; see also C, 482
- Castro, Fidel. By H. Matthews; B 609
- Catching Saradove. By B. Harris; B 643
- Céline, Louis-Ferdinand
  - Castle to castle; B .... 343; see also C, 482
- Censorship, Irish literary. Article by M. Sheehy 833
- Charney, George
  - A long journey; B 344
- Cheever, John
  - Bullet Park; B 836

PAGE

- Chevigny, Paul
  - Police power: police abuses in New York City; B 515
- Chomsky, Noam
  - American power and the new mandarins: historical and political essays; B 373
- Churchill revised: a critical assessment. A.J.P. Taylor et al.; B 637
- Chuang Hua
  - Crossings; B 124
- Cities, U.S. Books on schools reviewed 669
- Class conflict, slavery, and the United States Constitution. S. Lynd; B 54
- Clecak, Peter; R 150, 765
- Clurman, Harold; R 88, 580
- Cobbs, Price M., M.D. See Grier, W. H., M.D.
- Cocteau, Jean. Impersonation of angels, an: a biography of Jean Cocteau. By F. Brown; B .... [illegible]
- Cohn-Bendit, Daniel and Gabriel
  - Obsolete Communism: the left-wing alternative; B .... 578. See also correction; C 618
- Coleman, Elliott; R 345
- Collected essays, journalism and letters of George Orwell. Edited by Sonia Orwell and Ian Angus; B 150
- Collected longer poems of Kenneth Rexroth, the; B 378
- Collected stories of Jean Stafford, the; B 471
- Coming of age in Mississippi. A. Moody; B.... 26
- Communism. Obsolete Communism: the left-wing alternative. D. and G. Cohn-Bendit; B ...... 578. See also correction: C 618
- Communist party, U.S. Long journey, a. G. Charney; B 344
- Companions of the holiday. D. Richie; B 475
- Conflict of generations, the: the character and significance of student movements. L. S. Feuer; B 575
- Congress, U.S. Three books on reviewed 21
- Connell, Evan S., Jr.
  - Mr. Bridge; B 836
- Connor, James E. (ed.)
  - Lenin on politics and revolution; B 733
- Conservatism; new type of in writings of N. Mailer and K. Amis. Article by M. Green 573
- Cook, Fred J.; R 605, 771
- Corrington, John William
  - The lonesome traveler and other stories; B 412
- Crime. Limits of the criminal sanction, the. H. L. Packer; B 510
- Crime of punishment, the. K. Menninger, M.D.; B 510
- Crossings. Chuang Hua; B 124
- Cry of Vietnam, the. Thich Nhat Hanh. Drawings by Vo-Dinh; B .... 377. See also price correction; C 554

D

- Danger in Washington: the story of my twenty years in the public schools of the nation's capital. C. F. Hansen; B 669
- Dangerfield, George; R 637
- Daniels, Guy
  - Progress, U.S.A.; B 412
- d'Arazien, Steven; R 470
- Davies, Hunter
  - The Beatles; B 28
- Davis, James W., Jr., and Kenneth M. Dolbeare
  - Little groups of neighbors (draft boards); B 174
- Deak, Istvan
  - Weimar Germany's left-wing intellectuals; B 442
- Derfler, Leslie; R ...... 578; see also correction; C 618
- Dog's life, a. M. Holroyd; B 642
- Dolbeare, Kenneth M. See Davis, James W., Jr.
- Dolci, Danilo
  - The man who plays alone; B 831
- Donleavy, J. P.
  - The beastly beatitudes of Balthazar B.; B 85
- Donner, Frank J.; R 21
- Dorn, Edward
  - Gunslinger: book I; B 611
- Dorner, Alexander
  - The way beyond "art"; B 774
- Draft boards. See Davis, James W., Jr., and K. M. Dolbeare
- Dragging the main: and other poems. D. Ray; B 345
- Dreher, Carl; R 675
- Drucker, Peter F.
  - The age of discontinuity; B 576

E

- Education. Nine books on U.S. schools reviewed .... 669; see also C, 778

PAGE

- Edward Lear: the life of a wanderer. V. Noakes; B 545
- Ehrmann, Herbert B.
  - The case that will not die: commonwealth vs. Sacco and Vanzetti; B 605
- Eliot, George: a biography. G. S. Haight; B 120
- Ellmann, Mary; R 26, 409
  - Thinking about women; B 215
- Ellmann, Richard (ed.)
  - The artist as critic: critical writings of Oscar Wilde; B 799
- Elman, R. M.; R 55
- Encounters with Lenin. By N. Valentinov; B 733
- Ernest Hemingway: a life story. C. Baker; B 671
- Essay on liberation, an. H. Marcuse; B 765
- Etzioni, Amitai
  - The active society: a theory of societal and political processes; B 675
- Everyman's Constitution: historical essays on the fourteenth amendment, the "conspiracy theory," and American constitutionalism. H. J. Graham; B 802

F

- Fall, Bernard B.
  - Anatomy of a crisis: the Laotian crisis of 1960-1961. Edited with an epilogue by R. M. Smith; B 639
- Family Carnovsky, the. I. J. Singer; B 800
- Fang, Irving
  - Television news; B 472
- Feeley, Malcolm (ed.) See Hill, R.
- Felix factor, the. R. Stiller; B 413
- Feuer, Lewis S.
  - The conflict of generations: the character and significance of student movements; B 575
- Fidel Castro. By H. Matthews; B 609
- Fleming, D. F.
  - The origins and legacies of World War I, and five other titles on U.S. foreign policy; B 153
- Forman, James
  - Sammy Younge, Jr.: the story of the first black student to die in today's liberation movement; B 58
- France. Beginning of the end, the: May 1968. A. Quatrocchi and T. Nairn; B 53
  - Red flag/black flag: French revolution 1968. P. Seale and M. McConville; B.... 53
- Futurism, Russian, by V. Markov; B 182

G

- Galeano, Eduardo
  - Guatemala: occupied country; B 829
- Gallo, Norman J.; R 249
- Gargan, Edward T.; R 437
- Garrison, William Lloyd. Means and ends in American abolitionism: Garrison and his critics on strategy and tactics, 1834-1850. A. S. Kraditor; B 214
- Gate of darkness, the: studies on the leftist literary movement in China. Tsi-an Hsia; B 249
- Gay, Peter
  - Weimar culture: the outsider as insider; B 437
- George Eliot: a biography. G. S. Haight; B.... 120
- Gerassi, John
  - North Vietnam: a documentary; B 374
- Ginsberg, Allen
  - Planet news: 1961-1967; B 311
  - T.V. baby poems; B 217
- Girl in Melanie Klein, the. R. Harwood; B.... 708
- Girls, the: a tetralogy of novels. H. de Montherlant; B 410
- Glass house, the: the life of Theodore Roethke. By A. Seager; B 27
- Glasser, William
  - Schools without failure; B 669
- Godfather, the. M. Puzo; B 771
- Going places. L. Michaels; B 708
- Goldman, Eric
  - The tragedy of Lyndon Johnson; B 407
- Goldman, Michael; R .... 245; see also letter of correction; C 290
- Goldstein, L. Alan; R 640
- Goldstein, Laurence; R 250, 472
- Good, Paul
  - The American serfs (in South); B 55
- Graham, H. J.
  - Everyman's Constitution: historical essays on the fourteenth amendment, the "conspiracy theory," and American constitutionalism; B 802
- Greed. D. Wakowski; B 611
- Green, Martin
  - Article Mailer and Amis: the new conservatism 573, 735
- Green house, the. M. Vargas Llosa; B 280
- Grier, William H., M.D., and Price M. Cobbs, M.D.
  - Black rage; B 24

Index

PAGE

Gruening, Ernest; R 407
Guatemala: occupied country. E. Galeano; B 829
Guitry, Sacha: the last boulevardier. J. Harding; B 88
Gunslinger: book I. By E. Dorn; B 611
Guzmán, Germán
  Camilo Torres; B 829

H

Haavikko, Paavo
  Paavo Haavikko: selected poems. Translated by A. Hollo; B 217
Hájek, Igor
  Morning coffee with Alan Sillitoe; interview with British playwright on writers 122
Halper, Nathan (translator)
  A treasury of Yiddish poetry (excerpts).... 154
Hanh, Thich Nhat
  The cry of Vietnam. Drawings by Vo-Dinh; B .... 377. See also price correction; C .... 554.
Hanoi. Books by visitors to reviewed briefly.. 374
Hanoi. By M. McCarthy; B 376
Hansen, Carl F.
  Danger in Washington: the story of my twenty years in the public schools of the nation's capital; B 669
Hapgood, David, and Meriden Bennett
  Agents of change: a close look at the Peace Corps; B 86
Harding, James
  Sacha Guitry: the last boulevardier; B 88
Hare, A. Paul, and Herbert H. Blumberg (eds.)
  Nonviolent direct action: American cases: social-psychological analyses; B 314
Harlem on my mind. Edited by A. Schoener; B 156
Harris, Bertha
  Catching Saradove; B 643
Harwood, Ronald
  The girl in Melanie Klein; B 708
Hawley, Amos H. See Zimmer, B. G.
Heads. E. Stewart; B 252
Hemingway, Ernest: a life story. C. Baker; B 669
Heresy of self-love, the. P. Zweig; B 409
Hill, Roscoe, and Malcolm Feeley (eds.)
  Affirmative school integration: efforts to overcome de facto segregation in urban schools; B 669
Hindus, Milton
  Praise for F. Morton's review of L.-F. Céline's Castle to castle; C .... 482; see also 343
His toy, his dream, his rest. J. Berryman; B .... 245. See also letter of correction by reviewer M. Goldman; C 290
History of my life. 6 vols. G. Casanova. Translated by W. Trask; B 193
Hollo, Anselm (translator)
  Paavo Haavikko: selected poems; B 217
Holroyd, Michael
  A dog''s life; B 642
Honig, Edwin
  Spring journal; B 640
Horman, Charles; R 314
Horowitz, Irving Louis, et al. (eds.)
  Latin American radicalism: a report on left and nationalist movements; B 277
Hsia, Tsi-an
  The gate of darkness: studies on the leftist literary movement in China; B 249
Human guinea pigs: experimentation on man. M. H. Pappworth, M.D.; B 117
Husband, the. S. Stein; B 252

I

I want it now. K. Amis; B 546
Ignatow, David; R 411
Impersonation of angels, an: a biography of Jean Cocteau. By F. Brown; B 88
In . on . or about the premises. P. Blackburn; S 217
Inland island, the (excerpt). J. W. Johnson.. 246
Insurgent Mexico. J. Reed; B 832
Intellectual origins of American radicalism. S. Lynd; B 54
Irish literary censorship. Article by M. Sheehy 833

J

Jacklove affair, the. P. Menegas; B 412
Jackson, L. Brewster; R 174
JFK and LBJ: the influence of personality upon politics (in Congress). T. Wicker; B 21
Johnson, Josephine W.; R 707
  The inland island (excerpt on March)........ 246
Johnson, Lyndon, the tragedy of. E. Goldman; B 407
Johnson, President Lyndon B. JFK and LBJ: the influence of personality upon politics (in Congress). T. Wicker; B 21

PAGE

K

Kaplow, Jeffrey J.; R 53
Karlinsky, Simon; R 182, 469
Kazantzakis, Helen N.
  Nikos Kazantzakis: a biography based on his letters; B 186
Kennedy, President John F. JFK and LBJ: the influence of personality upon politics. T. Wickers; B 21
Kenney, Edwin J., Jr.; R 471
Kindness of strangers, the. S. Viertel; B 580
Kitchen poems. J. H. Prynne; B 217
Kleinbard, David
  The poet in the collective; article on W. Biermann in East Germany 438
Kluger, Richard
  National anthem; B 709
Kraditor, Aileen S. (ed.)
  Up from the pedestal; B 772
Kraft, Ivor; R .... 669; see also C, 778

L

Laos. Anatomy of a crisis: the Laotian crisis of 1960-1961. B. B. Fall. Edited with an epilogue by R. M. Smith; B 639
Lasch, Christopher
  The agony of the American left; B 797
Latin American radicalism: a report on left and nationalist movements. Edited by I. L. Horowitz et al. 277
Lawyers, the trouble with. M. T. Bloom; B.... 513
Lear, Edward: the life of a wanderer. V. Noakes; B 545
Leavis, F. R. and Q. D.
  Lectures in America; B 735
Lectures in America. F. R. and Q. D. Leavis; B 735
Legends of our time. E. Wiesel; B 250
Lenin, encounters with. M. Lewin; B 733
Lenin on politics and revolution. Edited and introduced by J. E. Connor; B 733
Leningrad. The 900 days: the siege of Leningrad. H. E. Salisbury; B 341
Lenin's last struggle. M. Lewin; B 733
Lewin, Moshe
  Lenin's last struggle; B 733
Lieber, Joel (ed.)
  America the beautiful: a modern guide to sex, security and the soft buck; B 28
Light, James F.; R 671
Limits of the criminal sanction, the. H. L. Packer; B 510
Little groups of neighbors. J. W. Davis, Jr., and K. M. Dolbeare; B 174
Lockwood, Lee; R 374
London labour and the London poor (reprint). H. Mayhew; B 313
Lonesome traveler, the, and other stories. J. W. Corrington; B 412
Long journey, a. G. Charney; B 344
Long-legged house, the. W. Berry; B 707
Love object, the. E. O'Brien; B 252
Lynd, Staughton
  Class conflict, slavery, and the United States Constitution; B 54
  Intellectual origins of American radicalism; B 54

M

Mac Low, Jackson
  22 light poems; B 611
Macmillan, Harold
  The blast of war: 1939-1945; B 279
MacNeil, Robert
  The people machines; B 472
Magarshack, David
  Pushkin: a biography; B 469
Magdol, Edward; R 214
Mahoney, William
  Black Jacob; B 475
Maigret in Vichy. G. Simenon; B 770
Mailer, Norman, and Kingsley Amis; new conservatism of. Article by M. Green 573
Making a million under 30; critique of magazine Careers Today. Article by L. M. Andrews 315
Man who plays alone, the. D. Dolci; B 831
Mandiargues, André Pieyre de
  The margin; B 642
Manegas, Peter
  The Jacklove affair; B 412
March. On March: time to take stock; excerpt from The inland island. J. W. Johnson; B.. 246
Marcuse, Herbert
  An essay on liberation; B 765
Margin, the. A. Pieyre de Mandiargues; B.... 642
Markov, Vladimir
  Russian futurism; B 182
Matthews, Herbert
  Fidel Castro; B 609
Mayer, Martin
  The teachers strike: New York, 1968; B.. 669
Mayhew, Henry
  London labour and the London poor (reprint); B 313

PAGE

McCarthy, Mary
  Hanoi; B 376
McConville, Maureen. See Seale, Patrick
McDermott, John; R 797
McGuane, Thomas
  The sporting club; B 475
Means and ends in American abolitionism: Garrison and his critics on strategy and tactics, 1834-1850. A. S. Kraditor; B 214
Medicine. Human guinea pigs: experimentation on man. M. H. Pappworth, M.D.; B.... 117
Meisler, Stanley; R 86
Men in dark times. H. Arendt; B 121
Mendelsohn, Harold. See Bayley, D. H.
Menninger, Karl, M.D.
  The crime of punishment; B 510
Metropolitan area schools: resistance to district reorganization. B. G. Zimmer and A. H. Hawley; B 669
Mexico, insurgent. J. Reed; B 832
Michaels, Leonard
  Going places; B 708
Military philosophers, the. A. Powell; B 546
Miller, Arthur S.; R 576
Mills, Ralph J., Jr. (ed.)
  Selected letters of Theodore Roethke; B.... 27
Minorities and the police: confrontation in America. D. H. Bayley and H. Mendelsohn; B 515
Miscreant, the. L. O'Sullivan; B 412
Mission to Hanoi. H. S. Ashmore and W. C. Baggs; B 374
Mr. Bridge. By E. S. Connell, Jr.; B 836
Mit Marx- und Engelszungen. W. Biermann; B 438
Moody, Anne
  Coming of age in Mississippi; B 26
Moment in Camelot, a. M. Rennart; B 28
Montejo, Esteban
  The autobiography of a runaway slave. Edited by M. Barnet; B 121
Montherlant, Henry de
  The girls: a tetralogy of novels; B 410
Morris, Robert K.; R 546, 737
Morton, Frederick; R .... 343. See also C, 482
  The snow gods 280, 343
Most difficult area, the. K. White; B 217
Murdoch, Iris
  Bruno's dream; B 124
Myers, Oliver T.; R 121

N

Nairn, Tom. See Quatrocchi, Angelo
National anthem. R. Kluger; B 709
Nero Wolfe of west thirty-fifth street. W. S. Baring-Gould; B 251
Nest of ninnies, a. J. Ashbery and J. Schuyler; B 475
New York City. Books on schools reviewed.... 669
Newby, P. H.
  Something to answer for; B 546
Niederhoffer, Arthur
  Behind the shield: the police in urban society; B 515
Night flight to Hanoi. D. Berrigan; B 375
Nikos Kazantzakis: a biography based on his letters. H. N. Kazantzakis; B 186
900 days, the: the siege of Leningrad. H. E. Salisbury; B 341
Noakes, Vivien
  Edward Lear: the life of a wanderer; B 545
Nog. By R. Wurlitzer; B 252
Nonviolence, William Blake and. Article by J. Sutherland 542
Nonviolent direct action: American cases: social-psychological analyses. Edited by A. P. Hare and H. H. Blumberg; B 314
North Vietnam: a documentary. J. Gerassi; B 374

O

O'Brien, Edna
  The love object; B 252
Obsolete Communism: the left-wing alternative. D. and G. Cohn-Bendit; B .... 578. See also correction; C 618
O'Connell, Shaun; B 85
O'Hara, John
  And other stories; B 85
110 Livingston Street; politics and bureaucracy in the New York City schools. D. Rogers; B 669
Origins and legacies of World War I, the. D. F. Fleming; B 153
Orwell, George. The collected essays, journalism and letters of George Orwell. Edited by Sonia Orwell and Ian Angus; B 150
  Compared with N. Mailer and K. Amis 574
Orwell, Sonia (ed.). See Orwell, George
Osborn, Catherine B., and Margaret Waterman
  Papa Gorski; B 412

Index

PAGE

O'Sullivan, Lawrence
  The miscreant; B 412
Other side of the mountain, the. M. Bernanos; B 124
Overlive: power, poverty, and the university. W. M. Birenbaum; B 669
Owens, Rochelle
  Salt & core; B 611

P

Paavo Haaviko: selected poems. Translated by A. Hollo; B 217
Packer, Herbert L.
  The limits of the criminal sanction; B 510
Papa Gorski. By C. B. Osborn and M. Waterman; B 412
Pappworth, M. H., M.D.
  Human guinea pigs: experimentation on man; B 117
Parks, Norman L.; R 153
Party leaders in the House of Representatives. R. B. Ripley; B 21
Paul, Sherman; R 27
Paustovsky, Konstantin
  Years of hope (excerpt; conversation with I. Babel); B 406
Peace Corps. Agents of change: a close look at the Peace Corps. D. Hapgood and M. Bennett; B 86
People machine, the. R. MacNeil; B 472
Pieyre de Mandiargues, André
  The margin; B 642
Planet news: 1961-1967. A. Ginsberg; B 311
Poem in its skin, the. P. Carroll; B 411
Poems 1964-1967. J. Rothenberg; B 611
Poetry. Five books of reviewed 611
  Special series of British and American poets by publishers Cape Goliard and Grossman; B 217
  Treasury of Yiddish poetry (excerpts). N. Halper (translator); B 154
Pol, Therese; R 311. See also C, 372
Police. Four books on reviewed 515
Police power: police abuses in New York City. P. Chevigny; B 515
Portnoy's complaint. P. Roth; B 311. See also C, 372
Powell, Anthony
  The military philosophers; B 546
Power in the House: a history of the leadership of the House of Representatives. R. Bolling; B 21
Professor Wilmess must die. P. Rader; B 709
Progress, U.S.A. By G. Daniels; B 412
Providence Island. C. Willingham; B 412
Prynne, J. H.
  Kitchen poems; B 217
Purdy, James
  63: dream palace; novella on phonograph records 737
Pushkin: a biography. D. Magarshack; B 469
Pushkin: death of a poet. W. N. Vickery; B 469
Puzo, Mario
  The godfather; B 771

Q

Quatrocchi, Angelo, and Tom Nairn
  The beginning of the end: May 1968 (in France); B 53

R

Rader, Paul
  Professor Wilmess must die; B 709
Ray, David
  Dragging the main: and other poems; B 345
Raymond, John
  Simenon in court; B 770
Red flag/black flag: French revolution 1968. P. Seals and M. McConville; B 53
Reed, John
  Insurgent Mexico; B 832
Rees, Barbara
  Try another country: three short novels; B 471
Reeves, Nancy; R 772
Remnants of power, the: the tragic last years of Adlai Stevenson. By R. J. Walton; B 89
Rennart, Maggie
  A moment in Camelot; B 28
Rexroth, Kenneth
  The collected longer poems of Kenneth Rexroth; B 378
Rich schools, poor schools: the promise of equal educational opportunity. A. E. Wise; B 669
Richie, Donald
  Companions of the holiday; B 475
Ripley, R. B.
  Party leaders in the House of Representatives; B 21
Roazen, Paul; R 121

PAGE

Roethke, Theodore
  Selected letters of Theodore Roethke Edited by R. J. Mills, Jr.; B 27
Roethke, Theodore. The glass house: the life of Theodore Roethke. By A. Seager; B 27
Rogers, David
  110 Livingston street: politics and bureaucracy in the New York City schools; B 669
Roszak, Theodore; R 184, 545
Roth, Philip
  Portnoy's compliant; B 311. See also C, 372
Rothenberg, Jerome
  Poems 1964-1967; B 611
Rowley, Peter; R 412, 736
Russian futurism, by V. Markov; B 182

S

Sacco, Nicola, and Bartolomeo Vanzetti. Case that will not die, the: commonwealth vs. Sacco and Vanzetti. By H. B. Ehrmann; B 605
Sacha Guitry: the last boulevardier. J. Harding; B 88
Salisbury, Harrison E.
  The 900 days: the siege of Leningrad; B 341
Salt & core. R. Owens; B 611
Sammy Younge, Jr.: the story of the first black student to die in today's liberation movement. J. Forman; B 58
Sanctity: or There's no such thing as a naked sailor. J. Selby; B 475
Schoener, Allon (ed.)
  Harlem on my mind; B 156
Schoolhouse in the city, the. Edited by A. Toffler; B 669
Schools. See Education
Schools without failure. W. Glasser; B 669
Schuyler, James. See Ashbery, J.
Scott, John Anthony; R 802
Scottsboro: a tragedy of the American South. D. T. Carter: B 674
Seager, Allan
  The glass house: the life of Theodore Roethke; B 27
Seale, Patrick, and Maureen McConville
  Red flag/black flags: French revolution 1968; B 53
Selby, John
  Sanctity: or There's no such thing as a naked sailor; B 475
Selected letters of Theodore Roethke. Edited by R. J. Mills, Jr.; B 27
Shapiro, Charles; R 58, 836
Sillitoe, Alan. Playwright interviewed on English writers. Article by I. Hájek 122
Silver, George A., M.D.; R 117
Simenon, Georges
  Maigret in Vichy; B 770
  The prison; B 770
Simenon in court. J. Raymond; B 770
Simon, Joan; R 377; see also C, 554
Singer, I. J.
  The family Carnovsky; B 800
63: dream palace. J. Purdy; novella on phonograph records 737
Sklar, Robert; R 373, 704
Slaughterhouse-five, or The children's crusade. K. Vonnegut, Jr.; B 736
Sleep of reason, the. C. P. Snow; B 546
Smith, Robert F.; R 277, 829
Smith, Robert M. (ed.)
  Anatomy of a crisis: the Laotian crisis of 1960-1961. B. B. Fall; B 639
Snow, C. P.
  The sleep of reason; B 546
Snow gods. F. Morton; B 280
Solzhenitsyn, Aleksandr I.
  The cancer ward; B 20, 344
Something to answer for. P. H. Newby; B 546
Sontag, Susan
  Styles of radical will; B 704
  Trip to Hanoi; B 376
Spinner, Thomas J., Jr.; R 279
Sporting club, the. T. McGuane; B 475
Spring journal. E. Honig; B 640
Stade, George; R 215
Stafford, Jean
  The collected stories of Jean Stafford; B 471
Stein, Charles; R 217, 611
Stein, Sol
  The husband; B 252
Stern, Daniel; R 280
Stern, James
  The stories of James Stern; B 643
Stevens, Shane; R 674
Stevenson, Adlai E. Remnants of power, the: the last tragic years of Adlai Stevenson. By R. J. Walton; B 89
Stewart, Edward
  Heads: B 252
Stiller, Richard
  The felix factor; B 413
Stock, Robert; R 378
Stone, Christopher D.; R 510
Stories of James Stern, the; B 643

PAGE

Strong, Jonathan
  Tike and five stories; B 642
Strong wind. M. A. Asturias; B 213
Student movements. See Feuer, L. S.
Sullivan, Kevin; R 799
Styles of radical will. S. Sontag; B 704
Sutherland, John. Article William Blake and nonviolence 542

T

Taylor, A. J. P., et al.
  Churchill revised: a critical assessment; B 637
Teachers strike, the: New York, 1968. M. Mayer; B 669
Teachings of Don Juan, the: a Yaqui way of knowledge. C. Castaneda; B 184
Television. People machine, the (news programs). R. MacNeil; B 472
Television news. I. Fang; B 472
Thinking about women. M. Ellmann; B 215
Tike and five stories. J. Strong; B 642
To find a man. S. J. Wilson; B 124
Toffler, Alvin (ed.)
  The schoolhouse in the city; B 669
Torres, Camilo. By G. Guzmán; B 829
Tragedy of Lyndon Johnson, the. E. Goldman; B 407
Trask, Willard R. (translator)
  History of my life, by G. Casanova. 6 vols.; B 183
Treasury of Yiddish poetry, a (excerpts). N. Halper (translator) 154
Trip to Hanoi. By S. Sontag; B 376
Trouble with lawyers, the. M. T. Bloom; B 513
Try another country: three short novels. B. Rees; B 471
Tsi-an Hsia
  The gate of darkness: studies in the leftist literary movement in China; B 249
T.V. baby poems. A. Ginsberg; B 217
22 light poems. Jackson Mac Low; B 611
Two, three, many more. N. von Hoffman; B 709

U

United States foreign policy. Six titles on by D. F. Fleming; B 153
Up from the pedestal. Edited by A. S. Kraditor; B 772
Useless day, a. J. Brégeon; B 29

V

Valentine, Charles A.; R 24
Valentinov, Nikolay
  Encounters with Lenin; B 733
Vanzetti, Bartolomeo. See Sacco, N.
Vargas Llosa, Mario
  The green house; B 280
Varieties of police behavior: the management of law and order in eight communities. J. Q. Wilson; B 515
Vickery, Walter N.
  Pushkin: death of a poet; B 469
Vietnam, the cry of. Thich Nhat Hanh. Drawings by Vo-Dinh; B 377
Viertel, Salka
  The kindness of strangers; B 580
Vietnam, North. Books on reviewed in brief 374
Vietnam will win! W. Burchett; B 470
Vo-Dinh. See Hanh, Thich Nhat von Hoffman, Nicholas
  Two, three, many more; B 709
Vonnegut, Kurt, Jr.
  Slaughterhouse-five, or The children's crusade; B 736

W

Wakowski, Diane
  Greed; B 611
Walton, Richard J.; R 639
  The remnants of power: the last tragic years of Adlai Stevenson; B 89
Warnecke, Steven; R 442
Waterman, Margaret. See Osborn, C. B.
Way beyond "art," the. A. Dorner; B 774
Weimar culture: the outsider as insider. P. Gay; B 437
Weimar Germany's left-wing intellectuals. I. Deak; B 442
Weltbühne, Die (periodical). Weimar Germany's left-wing intellectuals. I. Deak; B 442
Werth, Alexander; R 341
White, Kenneth
  The most difficult area; B 217
Wicker, Tom
  JFK and LBJ: the influence of personality upon politics (in Congress); B 21
Widmer, Kingsley; R 575
Wiesel, Elie
  Legends of our time; B 250

PAGE

Wilde, Oscar. Artist as critic, the: critical writings of Oscar Wilde. Edited by R. Ellmann; B ... 799
Willingham, Calder
  Providence Island; B ... 412
Wilson, James Q.
  Varieties of police behavior: the management of law and order in eight communities; B ... 515
Wilson, S. J.
  To find a man; B ... 124
Wise, Arthur E.
  Rich schools, poor schools: the promise of equal educational opportunity; B ... 669
Woman destroyed, the. S. de Beauvoir; B ... 252
Women. Thinking about women. M. Ellmann; B ... 215
Women's liberation; two books on reviewed ... 772
World War I, the origins and legacies of. D. F. Fleming; B ... 153
Wright, James D.
  Cause of teacher mediocrity cited in I. Kraft article Second-class schools in a first-class power; C ... 778; see also 669
Wurlitzer, Rudolph
  Nog; B ... 252

Y

Yaqui Indians. Teachings of Don Juan, the: a Yaqui way of knowledge. C. Castaneda; B ... 184
Years of hope (excerpt; conversation with I. Babel). By K. Paustovsky; B ... 406
Younge, Sammy, Jr.: the story of the first black student to die in today's liberation movement. J. Forman; B ... 58

Z

Zimmer, Basil G., and Amos H. Hawley
  Metropolitan area schools: resistance to district reorganization; B ... 669
Zweig, Paul; R ... 183, 311
  The heresy of self-love; B ... 409

THE NATION COMPANY 312 333 SIXTH AVENUE, NEW YORK, 10014

BURLINGAME
JAN 7 1969
LIBRARY

CALIFORNIA CLINIC RONALD B. TAYLOR

THE NATION

JANUARY 6, 1969 35 cents

S-69R PL-5337
BURLINGAME PUBLIC
LIBRARY
BURLINGAME CA 94010

GREEK JUNTA ON TRIAL

JAMES BECKET

Clay, Chisholm & Stokes

THE BLACK FRESHMEN CHARLES RABB

A Letter Carrier Fights Back JOHN P. STARK

Solzhenitsyn's 'The Cancer Ward'

EMILE CAPOUYA

LETTERS

Nixon and positivism

Austin, Tex.

DEAR SIRS: The "law and order" theme of the forthcoming Nixon administration makes me apprehensive. That was the theme of Augustus Comte, the 19th-century Positivist: "Order and Progress." Exported from its French birthplace, it came to the New World to foster a complete sellout of the common man, notably in Mexico and Brazil. . . .

In the name of "progress" Mexico sold her natural resources (mining, smelting, ranching) to United States interests, her port facilities to the British, and lesser concessions (like telephone systems) to other United States and European corporations. And, thus, it sold the common man of Mexico into abject poverty, ignorance and absolute submissiveness. It took a protracted and bloody revolution to establish governments that would restore her natural resources and dignity to her people.

Law and order, indeed! Will the Nixon administration pare the budget allocations to the munitions makers, to the corporate farms, to the industrialists in general? I'll give odds. The programs in behalf of us peasants will be pared to the core. Would that I could in conscience take a short Rip Van Winkle nap. I am afraid of politics that stress "law and order."

George I. Sanchez
Professor of Latin American Education University of Texas

power in the cradle

New York City

DEAR SIRS: I am much encouraged, reading the two successive essays—by C. P. Snow and Ronald V. Sampson—dealing with the problem of power in your issues of December 9 and 16. . . . I would like to suggest, however, that the study of power and its control is divided into two areas, one governmental, the other psychological. . . . The role of psychology is potentially more important. And here I wish to modify Mr. Sampson's optimistic conclusion about the simplicity of prescription. ("To diagnose a disease . . . is not difficult. To prescribe the remedy is also not difficult.") I have read Mr. Sampson's The Psychology of Power, as well as other works dealing wholly or in part with the same problem. Do we really know enough, as yet, about those factors of child rearing which make for the desire for power? Do we not need a program among psychologists, psychoanalysts and anthropologists (there have been studies of primitive peoples who show no evident desire for power—can we not learn from them?) in order to get at the perhaps multifold roots of our problem? . . . E. Louise Mally

American way

Brooklyn, N. Y.

DEAR SIRS: Ronald Sampson's "Bramble of Power" [The Nation, Dec. 16] is one of the finest and most forthright articles I have ever read. . . . It is even more telling when read and digested in the context of three recent paperbacks: Justice Fortas' glib repudiation of any "civil disobedience" which is not subservient to the power structure: Howard Zinn's attempted rebuttal (Disobedience and Democracy), which is uneven but inspiringly provocative; and Erich Fromm's The Revolution of Hope. The last goes deeply into the many grave problems of the individual vs. the technological society. . . .

Sampson's ideas should be required reading for every person who knows, however vaguely, that the American Way of Life is really the American road to symbolic and actual death. Elizabeth Sawyer

EDITORIALS

Disingenuous Denial

The crew of the Pueblo has been released under extremely odd circumstances. The United States has signed a confession dictated by North Korea and has simultaneously, with the acquiescence of the North Koreans, released a statement denying the confession.

Dean Rusk avers that nothing in his nineteen years of public service equips him to explain the willingness of our opponents in this affair to accept a document that has been repudiated in advance. He seems to imply that the Oriental mind is devious and unfathomable by simple Western logic; State Department officials have also suggested that North Korea may find the confession useful propaganda in Communist countries, where the denial could be suppressed in the controlled news media.

But the reasoning of the North Koreans may not be all that labyrinthine, and they may well expect the paper signed by Major General Woodward to carry weight in circles much wider than the Communist orbit. The fact is that American explanations of what the Pueblo was up to, and where she was cruising when the North Koreans took her in tow, have been contradictory and disingenuous. It is perfectly obvious that she was spying—that, indeed, was her only function—and it is at least probable that she was, or had been, trespassing. The North Koreans may think that the confession will carry more weight than the denial; they may well be right. In which case, they have quite generously allowed the United States to save its face.

Only history will determine which of the documents is the more credible—and Dean Rusk would have done well to make that obvious observation and then shut up. His air of half-amused incredulity does nothing to improve what has been from the first an embarrassing situation.

However, Secretary Rusk and the rest of the Johnson Administration do deserve credit for having poured no oil on the potentially very dangerous Pueblo fire. The captured crew is now safe home, and no other men were at any time committed to the incident. Of course, the Pueblo remains in North Korea, and with a signed confession in their hands the authorities there are not likely to give her up. But spies have always been expendable, and a spy ship can certainly be forsaken without much loss of sleep. We were engaged in mischief with the Pueblo and by patience and luck we came out of the affair with nothing much worse than a knuckle-rapping. If laughter can be heard from Pyongyang, Mr. Rusk may dismiss it as evidence of the inscrutable Oriental sense of humor.

Lesson of the Year

"Due process" is an old term which is being cited today in a new context. Traditionally it has been used as a catch-all term to characterize certain minimal procedural restrictions—the right to a fair hearing, etc.—which must accompany the legitimate exercise of state power. It is now taken to mean, in almost any issue of any paper, that a group or class or region has a right to an effective voice in decisions that will influence its future. Just as the people once said "no taxation without representation," so today they are saying "no decision making without participation." Quite simply, the people want to do for themselves, not to be done for by others.

Illustrations abound. In Texas, a grass-roots revolt, headed by a group of laymen and seminarians, has been launched against the authoritarian role of Archbishop Robert E. Lucey. The Archbishop has long been a prominent advocate of liberal social reforms; he was speaking up for migratory farm workers long before their plight became a popular and well-publicized cause. The basis of the revolt against the leadership of this great and good man is quite simple: it is not so much Archbishop Lucey's authority that is being challenged as his style of leadership. His constituency, priests and laity alike, want a voice in the decisions he has been making. "There was a time," one rebellious priest is quoted (The New York Times, December 15), "when autocratic men could function very well as bishops and when the immigrant church in this country almost needed strong hands. But now the laity is increasingly sophisticated and mature, and a lot of people have their own ideas about what the church needs."

Underlying nearly every "student protest" since the big Berkeley "bust" of December, 1964, has been the deep conviction that decisions were being made in administrative seclusion about matters on which students should be consulted. Four interim reports on the situation at Columbia University all stress "the need to restructure the decision-making processes at the university."

Labor leaders purport to be baffled by what is termed "the rejection syndrome"—the growing tendency of the rank and file to reject contracts that have been negotiated by the officers. This tendency, reports Damon Stetson in The New York Times (December 7), reflects "a spirit of rebellion against the Establishment that seems to have become epidemic." The rank and file obviously want a more direct say in decisions affecting their welfare. A state mediator, quoted in the Times story, puts his finger on a key aspect of the new syndrome: It is not only that the public is generally better educated, more sophisticated, more mature; it is also better informed, and news reaches it far more quickly than it once did. In discussing the insistent and growing demand for a voice in government decision making, Richard R. Wolfe (Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists, December, 1968) comes up with an apt and telling quotation from the Times of London: "[Modern] society . . . centralizes decision making but spreads the desire to make decisions. How can democracy in this predicament satisfy both the need for greater efficiency and the need for wide participation?" It is not so much that organizational leadership is deliberately "authoritarian" as that it does not know how to function democratically in the new social environment.

On December 11, C.B.S. News told the story of how Long Island Railroad commuters had more or less spontaneously rebelled against the unions and the management by simply refusing to pay for their tickets. There can be no doubt that the thousands of commuters who ride this line have more to complain about than any comparable group in the nation; they have been plagued in the coldest

IN THIS ISSUE

January 6, 1969

EDITORIALS

2

ARTICLES

6 Clay, Chisholm & Stokes: The Black Freshmen — Charles Rabb
7 California Clinic: Medical Storm Center — Ronald B. Taylor
11 Greek Junta on Trial — James Becket
13 Junk Mail: A Letter Carrier Fights Back — John P. Stark
14 Some Cartoons of 1968
17 GOP Governors: The Illusion of Power — Melvin H. Bernstein
18 Brazil: The Tanks Roll — Warren Dean

BOOKS & THE ARTS

20 Solzhenitsyn: Optimist and Realist — Emile Capouya
21 You Can't Get There From Here — Frank J. Donner
22 The Pool (poem) — Dave Kelly
24 Incomplete Diagnosis — Charles A. Valentine
24 The Mummies of Guanajuato (poem) — Marvin Bell
26 Out of White Sight — Mary Ellmann
26 Dinah (poem) — A. R. Ammons
27 Making It as a Poet — Sherman Paul
28 Nation Book Marks — Sara Blackburn
29 Films — Harold Clurman
30 Small as a Fist (poem) — Ryah Tumarkin Goodman
31 Crossword Puzzle — Frank W. Lewis

Publisher
JAMES J. STORROW JR.

Associate Publisher
GIFFORD PHILLIPS

Editor
CAREY McWILLIAMS

Associate Editor
PHIL KERBY

Executive Editor
ROBERT HATCH

Literary Editor
HELEN YGLESIAS

Copy Editor, MARION HESS; Poetry Editor, JOHN LOGAN; Theatre, HAROLD CLURMAN; Art, MAX KOZLOFF; Music, BENJAMIN BORETZ; Science, CARL DREHER; Advertising Manager, MARY SIMON.

Washington, ROBERT G. SHERRILL; Paris, ALEXANDER WERTH; London, RAYMOND WILLIAMS; Bonn, C. AMERY; Canberra, C. P. FITZGERALD; United Nations, ANNE TUCKERMAN.

The Nation is published weekly (except for omission of four [illegible] issues) by the Nation Magazine Company and copyright 1968 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014, Tel: CH 2-8400. West Coast office (for editorial correspondence only): 825 South Barrington Avenue, Los Angeles, Calif. [illegible]. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. and at additional mailing office.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Add [illegible] per year postage for Canada; $2 for foreign.

THE NATION

Volume 208
No. 1

and hottest weather alike by every imaginable inconvenience. Now, at last, they assert as a group "the right to be heard."

Business Week (December 14) reports that the Transportation Department has finally decided to hold public hearings on whether there should be public hearings in the future on all federal-aid highway projects—that is, whether the public should have some say about the road-planning process. Up to now, the state highway departments had the last—and in most cases, the only—word on how, where and when a new road is to be built.

Recently, a three-member federal court panel ruled that welfare clients have a right to an impartial hearing before a third party before their cases can be closed. At first blush this seems like "due process" in the older usage, but behind the decision one can sense the pressure of organized group power.

In most cases the substance of the protest is a demand for democratic decision making. "We're headed for a more democratic church, one that belongs to the people," proclaims one of the leaders of the Texas uprising against Archbishop Lucey's leadership. Said one of the rebellious Long Island commuters: "I just think the people who ride this railroad should have more of an opportunity of letting the world know its basic problems." In almost every instance the specific cause of the particular protest can be traced to the unwillingness or inability of an organization to respond to the demand for wider responsibility. Leadership, thus, is confronted with a revolution not against its premises but against its methods.

"The lesson of the past year," J. K. Galbraith said recently, "is that organization can be opposed. . . . Future Presidents recalling that one was forced from office, future Secretaries of State recalling that one was reduced to getting in and out of hotels like a burglar, future military men watching the revolt against ROTC sweeping the campuses, future industrial firms reflecting on the fate of both their recruiters and recruitment will have a more thoughtful view of the limits of organization."

This lesson is certain to be painfully apt for a long time, because the process by which organizations adjust to the new imperative for wider participation will not occur easily or overnight. What we need, of course, is a new concept of due process that could be applied to the wide range of institutions whose traditional methods of taking decisions are being challenged on such a broad front. In the past, court actions and specific legislative provisions applied the test of "due process," but in a mass society due process has taken on meanings for which appropriate procedures have yet to be devised.

Plain Talk at the UN

If a prize were to be awarded for international diplomatic candor (which is not a bad idea), the first truly worthy recipient since the late Cordell Hull would be Emilio Arenales of Guatemala, last year's President of the UN General Assembly.

Recently recovered from prolonged but obviously successful brain surgery, Señor Arenales closed the twenty-third session of the Assembly with words seldom matched in bluntness since the founding of the organization. Speaking of the "unrealistic and emotional approach" of the delegates, he said: ". . . we who come to the United Nations year after year fall victim to these illusions. . . ." He then proceeded to chastise his fellow delegates for substituting speeches and resolutions for "good faith and greater political will to solve problems directly," and concluded his onslaught with these words: "While member states . . . are not ready to shoulder this obligation and responsibility and to transform thought into action, the United Nations will remain a mythical entity in which only those of us who work here believe."

This kind of talk recalls Lord Tennyson's "The nations do but murmur, snarling at each other's heels." Whatever his source of inspiration, Señor Arenales refreshingly called the shots on the UN's performance. The Parliament of Man seems lately to have engaged itself almost exclusively in gamesmanship, scoring minuscule points and spinning endless webs of words whose effect has been to inhibit, almost to prohibit, effective action on the problems at hand. President Arenales' words of justified exasperation exploded like dynamite upon an ice jam of frozen oratory. It remains to be seen whether their effect will survive the current recess, but to Señor Arenales, a hearty "Viva!" for a good try.

Cause and Effect

The eighty-day cooling-off period under provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act having expired, the longshoremen on the Atlantic and Gulf Coasts have gone on strike, and the usual lamentations have issued from the industry: The strike will cost $1 million a day in losses in the port of New York alone, and at least $5 million a day in ports along the Atlantic Coast. "Economic disaster" threatens the nation, according to the counsel and chief negotiator for the 140 companies in the Shipping Association. All this is public relations, as is the injunctive process which postponed the present strike, invoked no less than seven times in International Longshoremen's Association disputes since Taft-Hartley became law.

Even if it turns out to be brief, this strike is a prime example of how technological advance can make already poor labor-management relations worse, and threaten to upset even those which, as between the Pacific Maritime Association and the International Longshoremen's and Warehousemen's Union, have been conducted on a generally sane and mutually advantageous basis.

The overriding issue in the maritime controversy is "containerization." The traditional way of handling cargo has been to load miscellaneous items into a sling, lower it into place, unload it, and dispose the contents in the space available. In this way an eighteen-man crew could handle about 18 tons of cargo an hour, and another crew could repeat the process at the port of destination at about the same pace. But suppose the shipment consisted, as it often does, of goods manufactured at a single plant and destined for a single buyer overseas. The goods could be loaded at the plant into a van or container, shipped by rail or tractor to the point of embarkation, and there swung by a dockside crane either into the hold or stowed on deck. By this technique the same eighteen-man crew (with probably not all of them working) can handle up to 480 tons an hour.

No wonder 12 per cent of all cargo shipped in and out of New York is already containerized, with 50 to 75 per cent forecast by the mid-1970s. No wonder container ships are being built by the score. Until the supply catches up with the demand, it's a bonanza for the shipping industry, and even over the long term the profit potential is enough to make a banker's eyes glow.

There is only one flaw in this beautiful picture: what is to become of the unneeded longshoremen? In a few years the 23,000-man work force in the port of New York may be reduced to 12,000, and in other ports in somewhat the same proportion. Are they to become astronauts, or computer programmers, or live high on the negative income tax?

Nor is this a problem only for "bad" unions like the ILA, with its waterfront gangsterism, coupled with such intense ideological virtue that the men will walk off the job if a shipment of Polish hams is found in the cargo. The ILWU, of which Harry Bridges is still president (remember when the shipping interests and the Red hunters tried to deport him?), is a first-rate union. Containerized shipping is an accepted labor-management fact on the West Coast. The union gave the employers almost unlimited freedom to institute whatever technological change seemed good to them—provided the employers shared the benefits with the union.

The ILWU has no quarrel with manufacturer-loaded containers, but another problem has arisen. Matson, for instance, is a major tenant of a new $36-million marine terminal, and there are other container freight stations along the West Coast. Matson claims that the ILWU-PMA agreement does not cover freight-station work, where mixed loads are stuffed into containers and brought to dockside. Matson is at present using members of the Teamsters union at one of its freight stations a mile from the waterfront in San Francisco. How far does the ILWU jurisdiction extend?

Obviously containerization cannot and should not be stopped. But aside from the strike in the East it is raising problems for waterfront unions East and West, and these problems will continue to grow.

Wait and See

Lee A. DuBridge, president of California Institute of Technology since 1946, is to be President Nixon's science adviser. DuBridge has long been a member of the select circle of high administrative scientists and engineers who advise on the channeling of federal research money and who largely determine the distribution of the top jobs. In a way, he will henceforth be doing officially some of the things he was doing unofficially.

In his interview with New York Times reporters and editors on December 16, Dr. DuBridge gave little indication of how he plans to use whatever influence may be his to determine the future course of American science and technology. (He was more discreet than David M. Kennedy, the incoming Secretary of the Treasury.) Dr. DuBridge did declare himself in favor of a 10 per cent annual increase in basic research for the next few years—which, if he can make it stick, will help to allay the current fears of the scientific community. He pointed out that scientific research must be free, while applied research must be aimed toward something (usually military applications, he might have added). Secret military work should not be done at a university, which is a teaching institution. Cal Tech has barred secret military work on its campus for the past twenty years. But off the campus it is carried forward, as by the Jet Propulsion Laboratory; and faculty members, including Dr. DuBridge himself, work for the military. That is necessary for the safety of the country, Dr. DuBridge averred, although he evaded a question about the dangers of a military-scientific complex and conceded only that differences of opinion about the Vietnamese War had opened a breach between the Department of Defense and parts of the scientific community.

In sum, Mr. Nixon's choice was a good one, but just how good remains to be seen. Nor should it be forgotten that the scientific adviser exerts only as much influence as the President chooses to give him, and this in turn is based on the President's ability to extract funds from Congress.

Norman Thomas

Norman Thomas possessed so many admirable qualities, and there were so many sound reasons for the high regard in which he was held, that it seems almost a minor form of blasphemy to find him being praised for the wrong reasons. He was not "the father of American socialism"; Debs, Hillquit and De Leon would have a better claim to that title. Thomas' contributions to the theory and practice of American socialism were negligible—the Socialist Party was weaker at his death than when he joined it. Actually there was some truth in Leon Trotsky's biting comment that "Norman Thomas called himself a Socialist as a result of a misunderstanding."

Nor was he a "revolutionary." His social thinking derived from Walter Rauschenbusch and the social gospel, not from Karl Marx and class conflict. It was because his socialism was of the reformist variety that, long before his death, he came to be accepted as a fixture of the Establishment. As he grew older he was, indeed, the Establishment's favorite dissenter, revered and venerated.

Fortunately the peace movement, to which his contributions were of much greater importance than those he made to American socialism, took on a new relevance and urgency in the last years of his life, and he responded to its calls on his time and energies with all his remarkable eloquent fervor. Thomas was trained—and well trained too—for the ministry, and throughout his long and useful life he remained, as Alden Whitman pointed out in The New York Times, "a moral evangel . . . the nation's conscience for social justice and social reform." His name is not mentioned in T. B. Bottomore's Critics of Society: Radical Thought in North America, nor in Christopher Lasch's The New Radicalism in America, 1889-1963, and for a good reason: he was a moralist, not a social critic.

He had great courage, a deep feeling of compassion for the underprivileged, a keen sense of social injustice, and an abiding commitment to civil rights and civil liberties. Throughout his life he was a moralist inveighing tirelessly against social evils and injustices, "the Isaiah of his times."

Varieties of Freedom

Reuters reports from Copenhagen that the Danish Government has started curbing the activities of its internal intelligence services "as part of a campaign to extend Denmark's 'permissive society' from sexual to political matters." The aim is to take all official pressure off the individual's political choices. Police intelligence is prohibited from listing as security suspects persons who join legal protest demonstrations or legal political organizations, including the Communist Party. Names so listed in the past are to be erased, although the police may still investigate applicants for jobs that require security clearance. Journalists and other citizens are to be given freer access to state documents. The dispatch concludes: "Denmark is a country that interprets freedom of the individual literally and is seeking to give its citizens all possible opportunity to take responsibility for their own lives."

This is not the trend in the United States. In curbing militant demonstrators, the police shout abuse for abuse, then wade in with their clubs. The South gives its unwanted Negroes a free choice between starving where they are or going North to get on ghetto relief rolls. Once more HUAC is holding what it calls hearings, while Senator McClellan freely disembowels witnesses before his own committee. The political Left has been abolished organizationally; the Center, having taken its place, is viewed with suspicion if it even glances leftward.

All this in the name of freedom, which is extended to small countries with napalm and TNT. Denmark, being so small itself, does not range abroad to liberate others, but is concerned only with freedom within its own borders. The Danes may account themselves fortunate that, for historical and geographical reasons, they are in no danger of being protected against external or internal enemies by the colossus of the West.

CLAY, CHISHOLM & STOKES

THE BLACK FRESHMEN

CHARLES RABB

Mr. Rabb is a reporter in the Washington bureau of the New York Daily News.

Washington, D.C.

Robert N. C. Nix (D., Pa.) was the only Negro Representative from Philadelphia in the 90th Congress. Early last year, when he began to fear that he might have strong primary or Republican opposition for his seat, Representative Nix put on a burst of activity, throwing bills into the legislative hopper and inviting correspondents from the Philadelphia papers up to his Capitol Hill office for interviews. When the tough competition failed to materialize, Nix's interest in legislation and in seeing his name in the Philadelphia papers also subsided.

Nix, on this score, is probably no worse than the other four men in Philadelphia's Congressional delegation. He contributes virtually nothing to shaping legislation either on the House floor or in committee; but he votes as a big city liberal Democrat should, and serves his constituents as a useful link to City Hall. But Nix represents a district that is plagued by a disproportionate share of the city's problems; if its needs are ever to be acknowledged and tended, it requires more than routine representation.

The inadequacies of Nix are shared in varying degrees by three of the four other black Congressmen who sat in the 90th Congress. The lone exception was Rep. John Conyers, Jr. (D., Mich.) who, following the banishment of Adam Clayton Powell, emerged as the most articulate black spokesman in the House.

When set against this generally uninspiring record, the credentials of the three new Negro Congressmen, promising in their own right, become even more impressive. Whether they will live up to this promise remains to be seen.

All three—Shirley Chisholm of Brooklyn, William Clay of St. Louis, and Louis A. Stokes of Cleveland—have raised eloquent voices of protest. They have roots deep in their communities. Clay, 36, is a real estate broker and an official in the Steamfitters Union, an organization powerful in Missouri politics. He comes to Congress with a reputation as a civil rights activist, although he concedes he has "mellowed" in recent years.

Clay was in the van of the CORE drive in 1963 and 1964 to open up employment for Negroes in St. Louis banks. He served 240 days in the city workhouse for violating a court injunction against picketing the Jefferson Bank and Trust Co., on the fringe of the Black Belt—a term he could have avoided had he adopted a repentant manner; he and another demonstrator were the only two of fourteen arrested who served the full term. Under Clay's prodding, the Steamfitters set up a job-training program that has helped bring Negroes into the almost all-white Local 562. There were three Negroes in the local when the program began in 1964, says an aide to Clay, and now through a policy of hiring 50 per cent blacks there are thirty-three. Nevertheless, the local still remains more than 95 per cent white.

Clay maintains his militancy hasn't cooled off. "If I've changed," he explains, "it's been to become aware that through politics much more can be accomplished than through some other means you could resort to." He sees his job as guardian, along with other Congressional liberals, against any dismantling of the poverty program or other recently enacted welfare measures.

Clay, as well as Stokes and Mrs. Chisholm, advocates increased federal spending to restore the inner city. He favors reforms in welfare and considers a negative income tax and guaranteed income programs as promising approaches. He wants spending increased for education, greater public and private commitment in housing and an expanded program, including incentives to private industry, to train the unemployed for substantial jobs. Like the other black freshmen, Clay criticizes American involvement in Vietnam and favors U.S. concessions to get the Paris talks moving.

There's no doubt that the voters' familiarity with brother Carl Stokes, Mayor of Cleveland, gave Louis Stokes a jump on the field of twenty-one in the Democratic primary. But attorney Stokes, 43, has a distinguished record in his own right. An NAACP official and chairman for five years of its Legal Redress Committee, Stokes argued and lost the stop and frisk case before the Supreme Court. He won the NAACP's Ohio redistricting suit which led to the creation of the 65 per cent Negro Cleveland district that sent him to Congress.

Although he lives in Shaker Heights, outside his central city district, Stokes insists that he has built a strong identity in the black community through years of badgering City Hall for improved treatment of Negroes, his defense of civil rights demonstrators in the early 1960s, his public school desegregation suit, and other rights cases.

In the inevitable comparisons with his better-known brother, observers describe Louis as "more thoughtful," "less abrasive" and "highly articulate." Stokes says he intends to work toward getting Congress to establish "some sense of priorities" for dealing with the problems of the cities. For that reason, among others, he wants the war in Vietnam ended soon.

Mrs. Chisholm, 44, displayed a sharp tongue in her successful campaign to become the first woman of her race to sit in Congress. She says she will "fight for a people that have too long been denied the opportunity to have their problems and hopes dramatically focused. My greatest political asset—which professional politicians fear—is my mouth, out of which come all kinds of things one shouldn't always discuss for reasons of political expedience."

She was born in Brooklyn but speaks in a clipped accent that recalls her early years in the West Indies, where she lived with her maternal grandmother. She returned to Brooklyn to finish her schooling, graduated from Brooklyn College, and received an M.A. in education at Columbia University. Mrs. Chisholm then taught nursery school, and was private school and day care center director and educational consultant for New York City's Bureau of Child Welfare.

Though long active in Democratic politics, she did not run for office until 1964, when she became the first member of her sex and race to be elected to the New York State Assembly. She was respected in Albany, but known as something of a maverick.

When a court-ordered redistricting led to the creation of a Brooklyn district with a black majority last year, Mrs. Chisholm jumped into the race and beat the organization choice in the critical primary race. She then trounced James Farmer, founder of CORE, who ran with Liberal and Republican endorsement in an overwhelmingly Democratic district.

Redistricting helped put Mrs. Chisholm, Clay and Stokes into Congress. And as the urban centers become increasingly black, they will produce a steady increase in the number of Negro Congressmen. Representative Conyers has estimated, perhaps optimistically, that the present nine black districts could rise to as many as twenty-five by 1972. Whatever the figure, it is evident that the pressures in the black community are such that bold and effective spokesmen on the order of Mrs. Chisholm, Clay, and Stokes will be pushed forward. The constituencies will no longer be satisfied with Representatives who do no more than vote correctly.

CALIFORNIA CLINIC

MEDICAL STORM CENTER

RONALD B. TAYLOR

Mr. Taylor is a California newsman and free-lance writer who has covered farm labor and related subjects in the San Joaquin Valley for the last decade.

Visalia

In the summer of 1967 Dr. David Brooks came to Woodville, a remote hamlet tucked off in the cotton fields of California's rich San Joaquin Valley. He purchased an old bar and restaurant building, sawed and banged together some alterations, and opened a private medical clinic called Salud (Spanish for good health).

Before Dr. Brooks's arrival, there had been only one doctor to serve the 18,000 people living in a dozen crossroads communities scattered over the 750-square-mile southwestern corner of Tulare County. There were (are) no hospitals, no dentists, no drugstores and, prior to Salud, no clinical services. The nearest medical help was in Tulare or Porterville; but in Porterville—a city of 18,000—the tax-supported hospital refused to accept MediCal (welfare) patients, except in emergencies. Families seeking such help in this city were sent 30 miles west, to the county-supported hospital for the poor. (Through state and federal funding. MediCal pays doctors and hospitals for services to qualified patients.)

Because the need for a medical clinic was and is so obvious, the opening of Salud should have been a reason for celebration. But that simple reaction was quickly complicated by the half-dozen causes and controversies which the doctor insists upon fighting simultaneously. While his patients literally demonstrated their belief in his medical skill and community-service approach to medicine, his demeanor generated a storm of controversy within the conservative county medical society, and among local growers, agri-businessmen and the right wing.

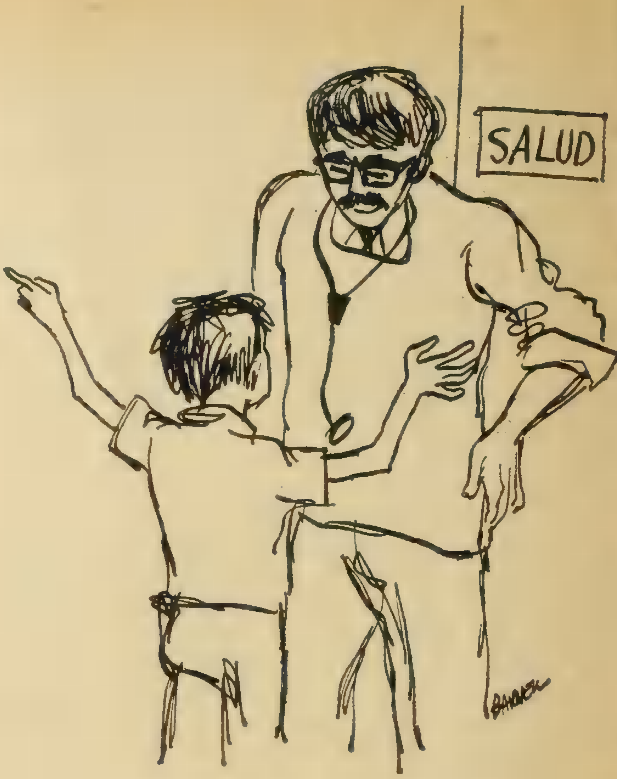
Dr. Brooks and his wife—the former Wendy Goepel—are trying to establish a private medical clinic that involves local people in clinic operation and administration. The doctor is also fighting to get medical privileges in the county's general hospital (the better to help the poor), while forcefully calling for drastic changes in the administrative and medical policies of that same hospital. Further to complicate matters, Dr. Brooks was himself fired from the staff of this hospital.

The doctor is a graduate of the University of Illinois medical school (1962); he interned at the University of Texas, spent two years in the United States Air Force and took a two-year residency at the Fresno County (California) General Hospital. The hospital was only 70 miles north of the Delano grape strikes and Cesar Chavez's efforts to organize farm labor, so Dr. Brooks visited Delano and volunteered his off-duty medical services. At the time Wendy Goepel, a Stanford graduate and former volunteer in the Chavez movement, was trying to find ways to establish rural medical clinics. Earlier that summer (1967) she had been working for the Office of Economic Opportunity, assigned to Lowndes County, Alabama, to help establish rural medical clinics.

While Dr. Brooks wanted to work with Chavez's union, he realized he would not be able in that situation to experiment with the development of a community approach to medicine. He and his future wife discussed the idea of a private clinic with various local and state health people. The doctor gave up his voluntary work with the union, completed his work at Fresno County hospital, and joined the staff of the Tulare County hospital, at a salary of $1,500 a month. Woodville was selected as the clinic site, and he and Miss Goepel began putting their nickels together to create Salud.

At this point, their physical appearance became an important factor. Both are near 30 and have the studied, casual-indifferent look of the white, middle-class college student turned toward the New Left. She had been in and out of OEO jobs in California and Washington and was already controversial; the John Birch Society and other right-wing groups had attacked her for her work in the Delano grape strikes and in the attempt to establish health clinics in Lowndes County, Alabama.

Dr. Brooks wears his hair, neatly combed, at collar length; he has a full mustache and heavy eyebrows. His voice is deep and pleasant, he dresses in jeans, turtle necks and sweaters, and is apt to carry a stethoscope in his hip pocket. (However, he has recently started wearing a tie, to see if that will soften some of the medical society's conservative reaction to his appearance.) Dr. Brooks is also argumentative, in a soft, persuasive way, and feels a strong obligation to speak out when he sees anything he considers wrong.



After two months' service in the Tulare County hospital, Dr. Brooks was fired, the medical director listing three specific medical treatment charges. He appealed, first to the county hospital's executive committee (it is headed by the doctor who fired him), then to the county's governing Board of Supervisors. The appeals were rejected, even though individual supervisors conceded that the problem probably arose from personality conflict. (At least one doctor, who knows the cases and the people, agrees that personalities clashed.)

Had Brooks, the physician, concerned himself only with establishing medical privileges in the county hospital—he wasn't asking to return to his old job; only to gain admittance and treatment for those Salud patients who must use the county hospital—he might have won. But Brooks, the argumentative crusader, insisted upon repeated attacks on hospital policies and practices. The validity of his criticisms is a separate argument, but by seeking admittance in one breath and attacking the hospital in the next, he lost any official sympathy he might have earned.

Dr. Brooks is a member in good standing of the Tulare County Medical Society, and he has privileges in two taxpayer-supported district hospitals within the county. While the basically conservative medical society will make no official comment, other than to say it insists upon high medical standards as minimums for its membership, two of its members, Dr. John Castiglione and Dr. John Williams, consider Dr. Brooks a good physician who knows his own limits and makes good use of specialists.

Dr. Castiglione says: "David is abrasive, both in his dress and the way he has been telling them how to run their [Tulare County] hospital." Dr. Williams, while he disagrees with Dr. Brooks's methods of establishing Salud and fighting the county hospital, says: "Brooks is a bit like Don Quixote, and because of this, he is offensive to the conservative medical community. He is a competent guy, medically; his motives are socially honest, but maladroit."

Two other physicians, both outsiders, who have an interest in the community approach to medicine and who have come to Salud, briefly, to observe, are Dr. Bruce Jessup, former poverty health coordinator for the state bureau of child health, and Dr. David H. Solomon, chief of medicine, Harbor General (Los Angeles County) Hospital and professor of medicine at the University of California (Los Angeles) medical school.

Dr. Jessup, now one of two pediatricians in the OEO-funded East Palo Alto Neighborhood Health Center, commented: "It is a big mistake to think that all of those in need are covered by some form of government aid. I'm impressed with what Dr. Brooks is trying, because the most difficult people to reach are the migrant and the rural poor; they are the least oriented to medicine."

Dr. Solomon sees clinics like Salud as potential training centers for young doctors seeking experience in the disappearing practice of rural, general medicine. He added, "I was awed by the load he has undertaken, and I personally think he's doing an excellent job; he quite obviously is bringing medical care to people who essentially have none."

Dr. Solomon also observed: "Dr. Brooks is totally involved in family welfare. It is usual for a doctor to give medical advice, to sympathize, to encourage, but he insists on doing more. Whether it is possible to be a doctor and a social worker at the same time, I don't know. He doesn't seem to be able to put physical limits on himself."

Salud is unique because it is a shoestring, "go-it-alone" project. California has five neighborhood health clinics that are funded by OEO. Several have other, outside help. For example, the Watts multi-purpose health center is co-sponsored by the University of Southern California medical school. Salud operates as a private business, paying its bills out of revenues collected for medical services. From 30 to 60 per cent of its patients are on MediCal (welfare) or Medicare (old-age assistance), depending upon the time of year and availability of work. The remainder of the case load pay out of their own pockets, according to their ability.

The clinic itself looks from the outside like the old bar. The building is sagging, the waiting room is filled with old, cast-off couches and rugs and hand-me-down bric-a-brac. By design, and economic necessity, it is a bit shabby and comfortable, an enlargement of the front-room environment found in most of Woodville's 200 homes. On a side wall, behind the plank reception desk, are 1,500 active "family" files, each containing a half-dozen or more names and medical case histories.

Dr. Brooks isn't a distant figure in a white gown, but someone the kids can run up to and hug, as he moves from one examining room to another. Commenting on this casual environment, Dr. Solomon said: "I'm delighted to see him experiment, it is a bit of a new idea, and seems to be working. He sacrifices the impressive side of the doctor-patient relationship—and it is needed at times—but his patients feel at home with him, as their numbers prove."

The clinic is a success, in numbers of patients, because it was designed to meet the needs of the community. Woodville has a population of 1,200; it is the bedroom for farm workers who rove a wide area to work. It is also home for retired farm workers who live on state old-age pensions. Some, who worked in cotton gins or stores or business, have social security. The average family income for farm workers is $2,000 to $5,000, and for those at the low end, the work is highly seasonal. Nutrition in the community is poor, housing is usually substandard, though most of the residents work hard to patch and repair and add on. Plumbing may include hot water, but outside pit toilets and water heated on the stove are more generally the case.

The workers—mom and dad and the kids—can't get to the doctor until late afternoon, or evening. So the clinic opens at 11 A.M., and the doctor arrives some time after lunch. He schedules thirty-five to fifty patients, during the afternoon and evening and spends his mornings at one of the two district hospitals. The clinic has no absolute closing time, and Brooks may work past 10 P.M. Official Saturday hours are 3 P.M. to 8 P.M. and Sunday is supposed to be a day of rest, but Dr. Brooks has no doctor to relieve him. (He is looking for another full-time staff physician, but isn't optimistic. The job requires a young man willing to submerge himself into the clinic—as run by Dr. Brooks—and into Woodville's problems.)

Part of Salud's intent is to provide personalized, individual treatment that has doctor-patient continuity. In rural areas, like this, from 40 to 70 per cent of the medically indigent are not qualified for MediCal or Medicare and therefore must go to the county's general hospital in Tulare. It operates a huge outpatient clinic; the waiting room is of auditorium size and, in the winter, is filled with patients who wait hours to see one of the staff doctors. The great numbers treated make impossible a doctor-patient relationship that many feel is vital to good medicine and health education.

The quality of medicine reaching the rural poor who cluster in fly-speck communities like Woodville can be measured by the infant mortality rates. In Tulare County the rate is 26.5 deaths per 1,000 births, thirty-fifth highest out of fifty-eight counties. The highest rates are in those counties even more isolated, more rural than Tulare; the lowest rate is in the urban-industrialized area south of San Francisco, on the peninsula.

Dr. Ed Jackson, head of the California Public Health Department's division of maternal health and child care, has said: "It is difficult to tell how much MediCal has done. Maybe half the mothers are covered. The rest drop through the cracks and are not eligible. But I'm guessing, because no one really knows."

Dr. Jackson added: "Most doctors practice good medicine, and most mothers have good care in our society, so most doctors say 'phooey' when the national infant mortality rate (24.7 per 1,000) is compared, say, to Sweden's (14 per 1,000). These doctors do not see the urban and rural ghetto medical problems. For various reasons—transportation, economics, language, cultural barriers—many of these women receive no medical attention until they appear at the county hospital door, in labor and ready to deliver."

Dr. Brooks is proud of the fact that only one of the babies he has delivered was a case unfamiliar to him. All the other mothers have had prenatal care. He says: "I hope some day we can establish an obstetrics unit right here; there is no reason why uncomplicated deliveries cannot be made here, instead of in a hospital 15 or 20 miles away."

Salud has a staff of fourteen, half of them working part time. Mrs. Brooks, by training a medical social worker, acts as administrator and personnel supervisor; a Woodville woman has been trained and licensed as an X-ray technician, another works in a rudimentary lab; there is a registered public health nurse who is training nurses' aides, a receptionist and bookkeeper. Each position is also a teaching job. For example, a receptionist on the front desk is apt to be a high school girl who comes in after school, on a part-time basis, to learn clinical office procedures. She is also learning that she does not have to work in the field for low wages, marry, raise a large family, and live in a shack in society's back yard.

While Dr. Brooks owns the clinic, he and his wife live on a $200-a-month income, in a three-room cabin behind a service station. The doctor has given the staff a democratic, decision-making process, through weekly staff meetings. Each worker receives $200 a month full time, or $100 a month part time. Recognizing that a young doctor or nurse may have school loans or other debts to pay, the clinic staff has approved outside professional income of up to $1,000 a month, to meet these obligations. However, the standard of living is pegged at $200 a month.

Mrs. Brooks explained: "We all work equal hours, hard, long hours, and there's no reason why one should make more than another." This altruism tends to hide the economic necessity of the low pay. Starting a clinic is expensive, even when the equipment is second hand. The clinic goal, as set forth by Dr. and Mrs. Brooks, is group practice, with ten doctors working out of five clinics scattered through this rural area.

To do this will be tough, they admit. It requires a kind of total commitment that most are unwilling to give. The doctor and his wife feel they must be a part of the low-income Woodville scene, yet they are angered by press reports billing them as crusaders among the poor. (Their practice does include some mid-income patients, but most are low-income families.) It is as though by becoming "poor" themselves, they wipe out the word and everyone is equal. This, plus their expressed belief that treating medical ills includes correcting problems like poor nutrition, poor housing and low wages, sparks controversy within the community.

In Woodville, and the surrounding farming areas, there are some old-fashioned farm families, some professional cotton gin and irrigation engineering and operating personnel. Among this group there are a few who are convinced that Salud is a nest of pot smoking, Communist hippies. One farmer's wife sent me a copy of Robert Welch's American Opinion, containing an article entitled "The Grapes," and devoted to attacking Cesar Chavez, Wendy Goepel and others connected with the Delano grape strike. With the article was a letter asking why one former nurse at the clinic had been in Los Angeles and Detroit just before the riots? The letter's conclusion is probably the key to the local fear: "Is the clinic a front for Chavez?"

The Brookses both worked for Chavez at one time, on a voluntary basis; they both seek social change, and Salud is the instrument with which they hope to effect that change. Sitting around the tiny kitchen table in their cabin, the doctor and his wife envision a Salud that will become the center of a much larger community development project. Their plans are so broad as to become confusing; the individual patient gets lost in the treatment of community ills, and the community gets lost in the treatment of society's ills. The creators of Salud are restless, impatient. As the doctor describes his work and his dreams, I can't help hearing the echo of Dr. Solomon's comment: "Whether it is possible to be a doctor and a social worker, I don't know. He doesn't seem to be able to put any physical limits on himself."

GREEK JUNTA ON TRIAL

JAMES BECKET

Mr. Becket, a Harvard Law School graduate, is studying for a Ph.D. in international law and economics at the University of Geneva.

Strasbourg, France

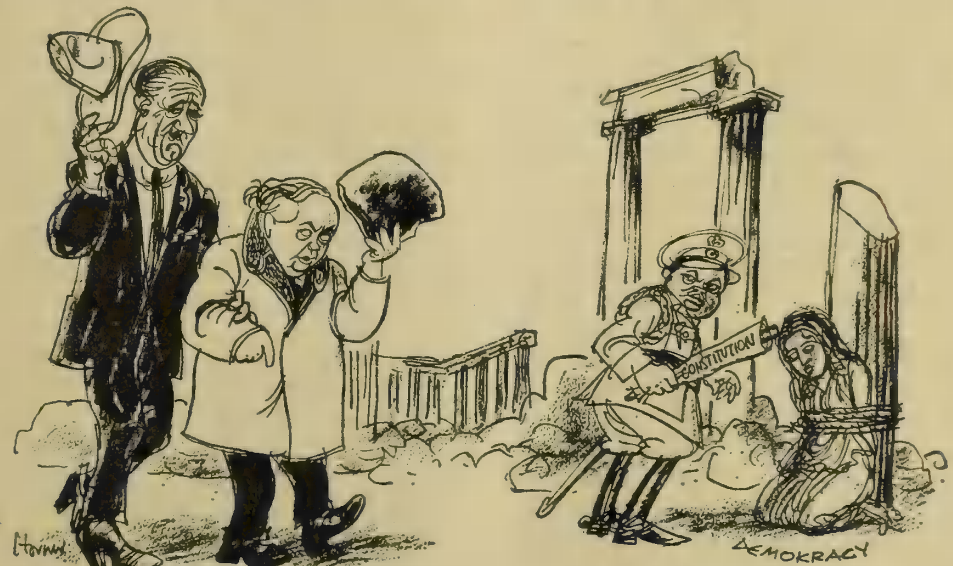
In September of 1967 the governments of Norway, Sweden, Denmark and Holland filed an application with the European Human Rights Commission charging the Greek junta with violating nearly all the basic articles of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms. The case dragged on for more than a year through purely legal and procedural stages, but last month when a subcommission convened in Strasbourg to hear testimony on torture, the human element of human rights burst upon the commission. The French provincial city was the scene of a drama reminiscent of both James Bond and the Keystone Cops. Two witnesses brought by the junta escaped their guards. Rushing about Strasbourg all week were officers of the French Sûreté, armed junta thugs, international lawyers, Greek exiles and hordes of journalists. Not only is the case on its way to becoming a landmark in the history of the international protection of human rights, but it has assumed an immediate political importance.

The European Commission on Human Rights came into existence after World War II. Empowered to hear cases brought by individuals or member states, the basic functions of the commission are to find the facts of a dispute and to attempt a "friendly settlement." It has not been easy for the Scandinavians to press the case. Not only has pressure from many quarters been exerted on them to abandon their efforts, but it has been difficult to find witnesses outside Greece who were willing to testify, especially witnesses who had been tortured. The junta does not permit anyone who has been tortured to leave Greece, and recently they have been forcing torture victims to sign declarations that they were well treated.

The delegation of the Greek regime flew from Athens to Paris on Saturday, November 23. In this delegation of forty-nine which took the train to Strasbourg were not only lawyers and witnesses but members of the Greek security police, the military police (ESA), the Greek CIA (KYP), and pistoleros attached to the Prime Minister's office. Three of the witnesses were soon to find themselves on the front pages of the world press—two because they appeared before the commission and one because she didn't.

On Sunday Constantine Melitis, 33, a grocer from Salonika, and Pandelis Marketakis, 38, a car mechanic from Crete, sat with their guards in the hotel dining room puzzling over the menu. A Greek came up and offered to help. This man belonged to Andreas Papandreou's Panhellenic Liberation Movement (PAK). Through him the two witnesses found the chance they were looking for; they managed to elude their guards and arrive at the Grand Hotel to ask the Norwegian delegation for protection. The story had still not broken on Monday when an emissary of the junta came to the Grand Hotel "on his own" to ask that the "kidnapped" witnesses be handed over for "humanitarian reasons."

The two witnesses turned out to have quite a story to tell. Melitis had been the driver of the car in which a leftist deputy named Tsarouchas was arrested last May between Salonika and Athens. Melitis was savagely beaten, his cheekbone shattered, but at least he arrived alive in Salonika. Tsarouchas died of a "heart attack." Melitis broke under the KYP tortures of falanga (bastinado), mock execution, and worst of all electric torture when electrodes were attached to his genitals. Marketakis, who lost an eye fighting the Communists in 1948, was arrested in Crete after an explosion in a factory. He went through seventy-five days of systematic torture, nearly dying of



Horner, New Statesman (England)

Diplomatic Courtesies Resumed

NOTICE TO SUBSCRIBERS

Because of postal regulations, The Nation's mailing list must be arranged according to Zip Codes. Therefore—with any correspondence about address changes, renewals, etc.—please enclose the address label from your Nation. If you don't have a label, be sure to include your Zip number, and be sure it is correct. Without it, we cannot find your name plate.

internal bleeding. When both men were finally released, the police spread the story that they had betrayed their comrades. Isolated and without work, they were cultivated by the police, who planned to use them as prosecution witnesses whenever needed. Given the ever-present threat to their families, the police believed they could count on them. They were brought to France as "tame" witnesses.

The subcommission began hearing evidence on Monday morning in a highly charged atmosphere. Proceedings before the commission are absolutely secret. (It is doubtful that any sovereign state would sign the Convention if they were public.) However, the witnesses themselves, if unable to tell what happened inside the commission, were able to relate their experiences in Greece. Lieutenant (j.g.) Marotis-Lanas of the Greek Navy's South Aegean Command, formerly in charge of the junta's security office for Piraeus and the Aegean islands (he defected after the King's coup) told of watching Greeks being tortured, told of picking bodies up on the beaches around Athens, and told of a secret interrogation center in Agios Paraskevas, near the American College, where the camp commander proudly showed him his latest torture equipment. (The Greek delegation admitted the existence of this hitherto secret camp, but claimed it was a NATO camp for "interrogating" Eastern Europeans.) The witness also told of a police list of nearly 1,000 names of those in hiding who were to be killed on capture. (Tsarouchas had been on the list.) Most important as to direct junta responsibility was Lieutenant Marotis-Lanas' testimony that in his presence Minister of the Interior Pattakos gave orders to torture and kill specific persons. Miss Kiti Arseni, 30, told of her nightmarish torture a year ago on the notorious "terraza" of the Bouboulinas Street Security Police Station. Arrested for passing along a "freedom poem" of Theodorakis, she suffered falanga as well as being beaten all over her naked body with a plaited steel wire. The climax was when her brother, an army draftee, was brought in and forced to beat her himself. Even those observers who knew about torture in Greece were shocked by the picture that emerged. Rather than the work of an occasional Balkan sadist, it is a highly programmed modern enterprise.

On Wednesday morning the two Greek transfuges left the Grand Hotel under heavy police escort, ran the gauntlet of television and press to enter the modern commission building where armed Greek heavies and Council of Europe police milled about the corridors. The French, aware that the Greeks were armed, were under orders from Paris to avoid any incidents on the premises. After the witnesses had testified, they were whisked back by the Sûreté to their original hotel to retrieve their luggage. In a dramatic confrontation, the head of the Greek delegation, Mr. Koutoupis, told Marketakis: "For what you have done today your children will pay."*

The drama then shifted to the fate of a third Greek witness, Miss Zaira Peta, who never appeared before the commission. (She had been in Bouboulinas at the same time as Miss Arseni.) Sunday she was in tears at dinner and each time she left her room she was flanked by two Greek guards. At least one journalist was roughed up for inquiring about her. Wednesday Miss Peta disappeared. The Greek delegation gave out three different stories as to why she was unable to appear: she was sick, her sister was sick, and business commitments necessitated her immediate return to Athens. Miss Peta is a seamstress.

Meanwhile the case gradually proceeds. More evidence on torture is being heard in mid-December, then the commission plans to hear witnesses in Greece. If a "friendly settlement" is not reached (and it is difficult to imagine how wholesale torture and murder can be subject to this formula), the commission will submit a report to the Council of Ministers, which is made up of the Foreign Ministers of the Council of Europe countries. After a three-month waiting period, they will seek a solution.

For international law and the developing international protection of human rights, this case is an important test. Here the concepts of national sovereignty and human rights clash. Before leaving Greece, Marketakis and Melitis had been told that foreigners were attacking Greece and that they would go to the Greek consulate in Strasbourg to give testimony. True, they had been beaten some themselves, but that was between Greeks and abroad they would be patriots. The exciting aspect of this case from the standpoint of human rights law (as well as from the standpoint of the victims) is that it is a Norwegian's business when a fellow European's human rights are violated. The question remains whether the rather fragile international mechanism can bear the strain of this case, the most important it has ever faced. The Greek investigation will make or break the commission. If it is unable to protect such basic human rights as the right to be free from torture, it will be exposed as an institution able to handle only procedural issues which provide articles in learned legal periodicals. The case is dynamite for its political implications—not only in Greece, where heads are sure to roll as a result of last month's fiasco but also in Europe and the Atlantic Alliance.

Even though this is supposedly a European matter, the proceedings were held under the long shadow of the United States. American diplomats at such institutions as

---

* A Reuters story of December 18 reported that Mr. Marketakis was in London, accompanied by Greek Government officials, en route from Stockholm to Athens. His official "interpreter" said that Marketakis retracted allegations of torture, alleged that he had been kidnapped by "Communists in Strasbourg," and had been forced to say what he did under the threat of "twenty revolvers." The Greek Embassy in Stockholm also announced that he had been held earlier in Norway by "twenty anarchists" (a number apparently favored by junta spokesmen). Before turning him over to his countrymen, the Swedish police questioned Mr. Marketakis, who however, maintained that he was returning home of his own volition.

The Editors

the Council of Europe, the Common Market and NATO have put considerable pressure on the Europeans to ease up on the Colonels. The United States argues that "communications must be kept open" with the Papadopoulos regime. If the allies were to push too hard, dangerous hard-liners might take over. But given the situation in the Mediterranean, stability not democracy has top priority. Observers at the Council of Europe, believing that NATO calls the tune, are pessimistic that the Council of Ministers would act even on a finding of genocide by the commission if it opposed what the United States conceived its NATO interests to be. But pressure is building up on the Colonels and the Americans. After the drama of Strasbourg, the one newspaper in Norway which has been sympathetic to the Colonels, the conservative Morgenblatt, wrote: "NATO must choose—Greece or Norway."

JUNK MAIL

A LETTER CARRIER FIGHTS BACK

JOHN P. STARK

Mr. Stark, until his recent dismissal (now being appealed) under the circumstances detailed below, had been for ten years a letter carrier in Ithaca, N.Y. Before that he worked at various times as a miner, a Fuller Brush man and a taxi driver.

Ithaca

This is being written on Sunday, November 17, 1968. I left my home about eight o'clock this cold and drizzly morning, and strolled the three blocks past the new library and through the park to the post office, where I jotted down a few last notes to wind up my ten-year research project on The U.S. Post Office and Its Problems. (You'll notice right away that I didn't use this for my title.)

Now, after ten short years, how to distill that almost daily research into a few paragraphs that will have meaning to the outsider, the patron who receives the mail that I, a letter carrier, deliver? I can best begin, perhaps, by quoting from the certified letter I received four days ago from the Postmaster:

> On November 9, 1968, you refused to case and deliver 3rd class bulk mail, deemed mailable by the post office department, sorted to your route, mailed by R. H. Donnelley Corp., 2000 York Road, Oak Brook, Ill. 60523. . . . On November 12, 1968, you again refused to case and deliver this mail. . . .

What prompted that refusal I'll never know for sure—perhaps simple exasperation, after a heavy day, at seeing several trays of those half-inch-thick, sample-and-coupon-crammed envelopes neatly stacked under my case by an obliging clerk. To come off the route, tired and wet, and face a bulk mailing for the next day's delivery is always trying. However, after a good night's sleep, it usually looks much less formidable the next morning. But I thought a lot about those Reuben Donnelley samples that night, and when I reported for work the next morning, I had decided what to do. Since they were of letter size, but too bulky to fit into my first-class case, and at the same time too small to be handled from my junk case, I would refuse to work them on the ground that they were unmailable. I've been convinced for a long time that a great deal of the bulk mail admitted at the back door of the Post Office would be refused at the front windows if it were mailed by an individual, even at first- or second-class rates. And these Donnelley samples seemed to offer the perfect opportunity to put my theory to the test. It was also a wonderful feeling to do something I had been wanting to do for years.

After being sent home on the Tuesday morning after Veterans' Day, I decided to consult with the union president on my position; in an hour's talk, he convinced me of the futility of continued refusal to work. I had made my point, and the next move was up to the department. Any further refusal by me could only hurt my family by jeopardizing my postal career. In fact, he pointed out, I had probably already gone too far. The letter previously quoted from bore this out. It begins: "This is advance notice of at least 35 calendar days that it is proposed to remove you from the postal service or to take such other disciplinary action. . . ."

In the four days I have worked since being informed of the charge against me, namely "failure to deliver mail as requested by the supervisor," I have been busy on my own behalf. As Napoleon said, "The best defense is a surprise offense." This article is just that—an offensive thrust by one spear against the favored positions of big business, the sole beneficiary of bulk-rate mail.

For four days, I have counted each piece of mail sorted to my route. The figures are as follows:

	Good Mail	Bulk Mail	*Throw-away
Wednesday	780	580	95
Thursday	1,000	400	100
Friday	1,050	390	95
Saturday	770	545	165
Totals	3,600	1,915	455

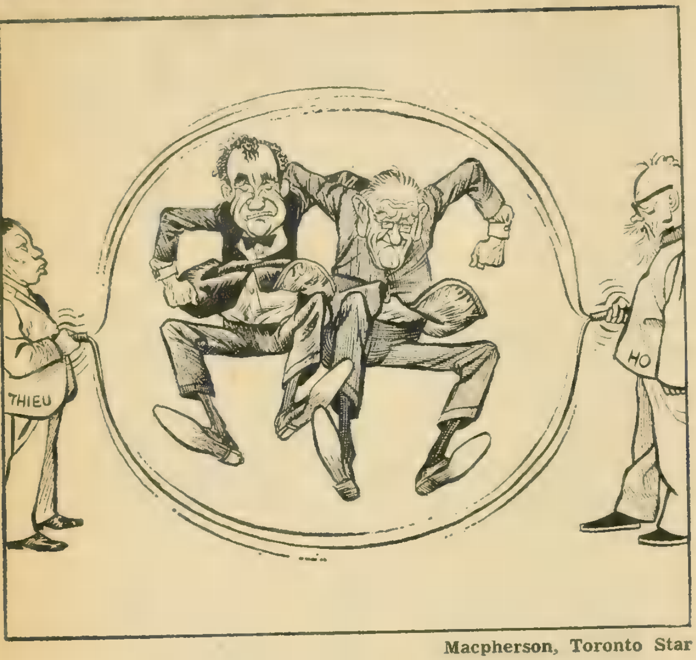
---

* A throwaway is a bulk-rate piece of mail that can be neither forwarded nor returned, and is destroyed at the post office.

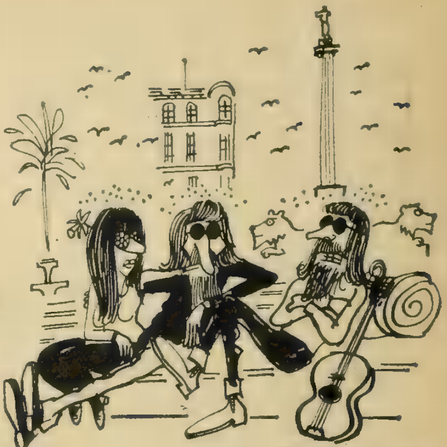
I think the value of these figures is limited only by their sparsity; I offer them as a token attempt at a monumental task—to bring to the American public the truth about the bulk-rate mail fraud. I use the word "fraud" with some bitterness, because I have always considered myself an

(Continued on page 16)

Some Cartoons of 1968

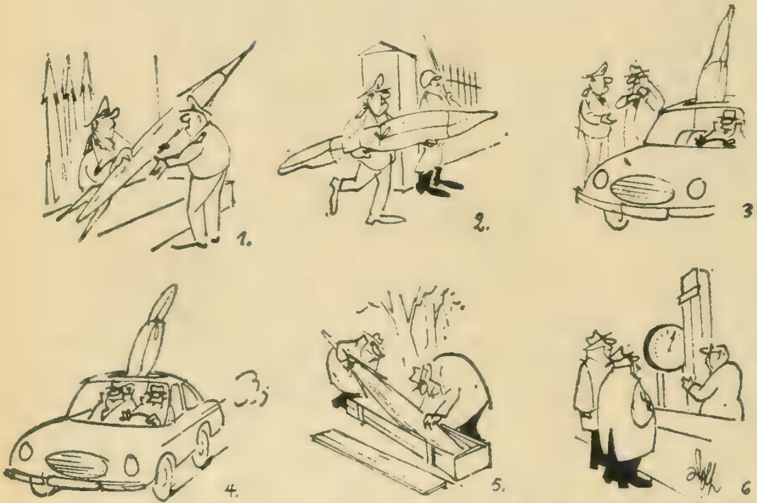


Macpherson, Toronto Star



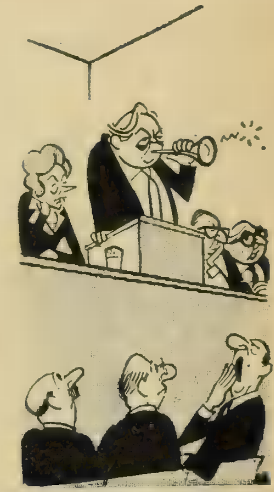
Waite, The Sun (London)

"Let's Teach Franco a Lesson—Let's All Go to Spain This Year"



Wolf, Osnabruck (Germany)

Launching of the First German Rocket to Moscow



Jon, London Daily Mail

Another Stirring Clarion Call

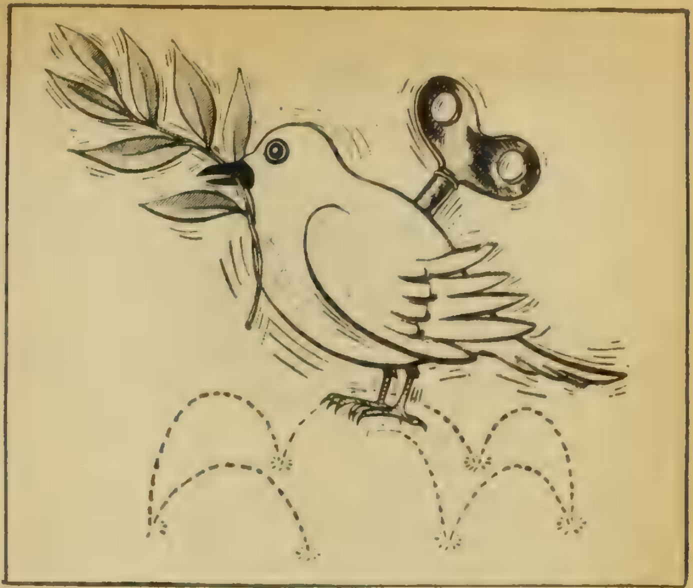
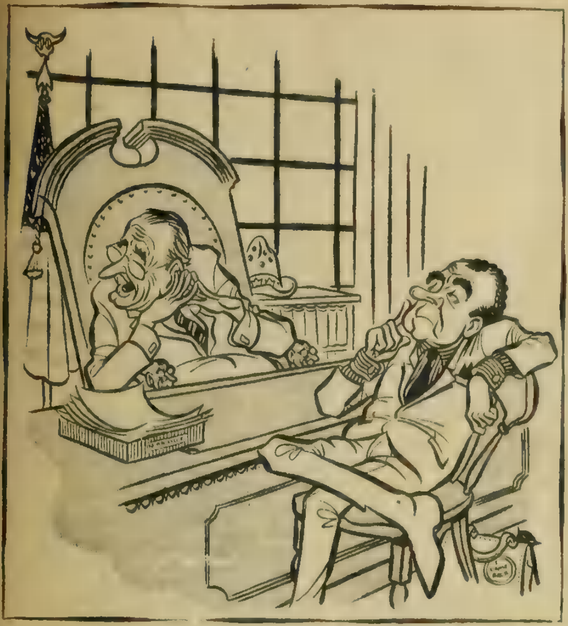
PEACE
JOY
TRUTH
LOVE
OH, OH! HERE COMES TROUBLE -

Brickman, Evening Star (Washington)

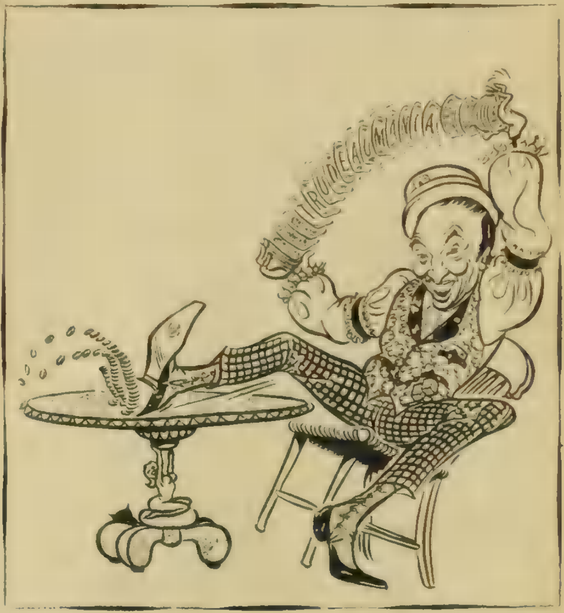


Norris, Vancouver Sun (Canada)



Jones, Toronto Telegram

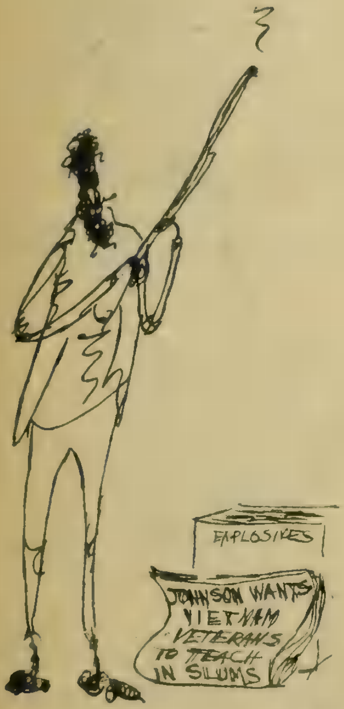
"And Hubie—Go Show Spiro Where the Fallout Shelter Is"



TRUDEAUMANIA

Jones, Toronto Telegram

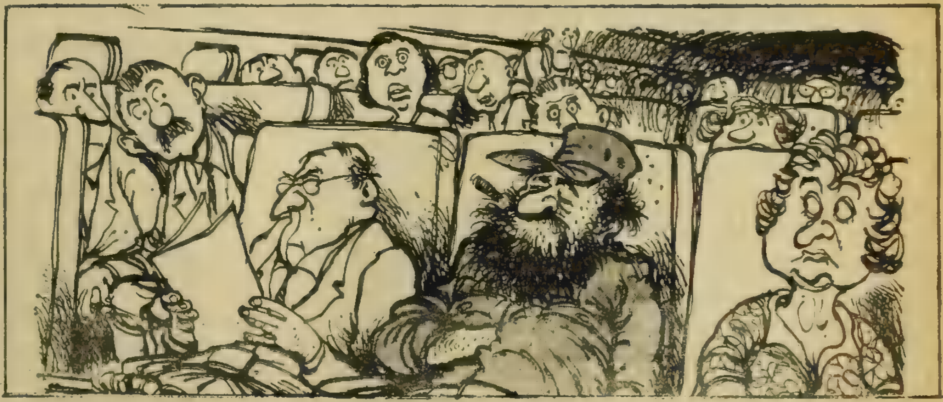
Big Deal in Ottawa



EXPLOSIVES
JOHNSON WANTS VIET NAM VETERANS TO TEACH IN SLUMS

Pat Fink

"He's Been Reading My Mind"



Oliphant, Los Angeles Times

"Welcome Aboard Flight 417, New York to Miami" honest man. And yet, in the intense concentration of these past few days, I see myself as the errand boy for an organization that has betrayed the trust of the American people. In effect, the post office says to every big or little corporation: "We'll give you such a good deal on distributing your advertising matter and your free samples that you cannot afford to pass us up." And then the post office turns to you and me and says: "We're operating under a $500 million deficit—you have got to pay another penny for each Christmas card this year."

Here are the words of the President of the National Association of Letter Carriers, James H. Rademacher, taken from page 7 of the November Postal Record, the monthly NALC journal:

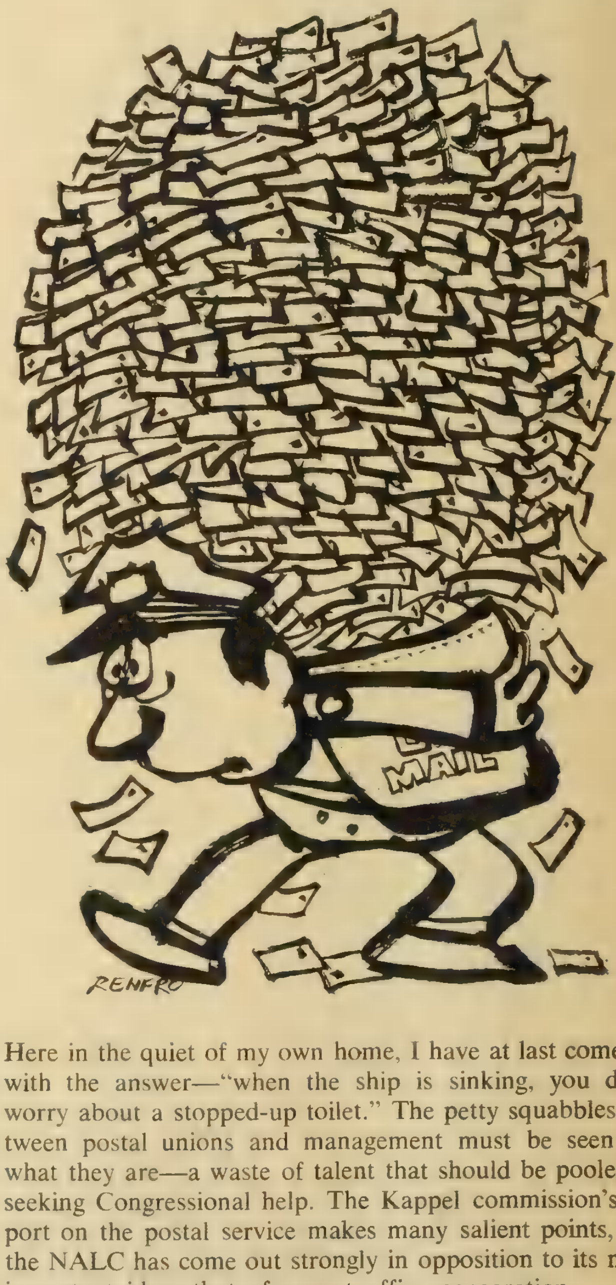
> We revel in the thought that we, as letter carriers, are Ambassadors of Uncle Sam, the flesh and blood embodiment of the Federal Government with whom the public does business every working day of the year. . . . We are the human agents through which the life-blood of the economic community flows, as well as the couriers who make the transmission of information and ideas among our citizens possible.

Been looking in your mailbox lately, Mr. Rademacher? If you lived on my route, every third piece of mail delivered to your house would be a bulk-rate item that you had neither expected nor solicited—a piece of mail that would hardly give me cause to "revel in the thought" of its "transmission," or you reason even to open it before tossing it in the wastebasket.

I know just one thing about Mr. Rademacher's job: If it were my job, I'd forget about the letter carrier's image and start working with management and every new Congressman I could buttonhole toward establishing an equitable rate system for all users of the postal service. Since it requires an act of Congress to change rates, I'd instigate a thorough study of the whole bulk-rate class of mail. While we don't know for sure that first- and second-class mail pay their way, we may be certain that the bulk-rate class of mail costs the most money to handle. (It cost the taxpayers three hours of overtime for me these last four days.) Right now in the post office where I work, there is a shipment of a soap powder sample from Colgate-Palmolive Company, 2700 Seventh Street, Berkeley, Calif., 94700. The R. H. Donnelley Corporation, Mt. Vernon, N.Y. 10550, is the distributor. Each carton contains seventy-four 11-ounce samples. Whether the parcel post men or the foot carriers get the honor of being "the human agents through which the lifeblood of the economic community flows" in this particular case, one thing is sure—it's going to cost someone a lot of overtime to insure the delivery of these free samples from one of the largest corporations in the country.

Piled high on my case, for sorting tomorrow morning, are some 475 Montgomery Ward "Okkies"—a newspaper-size circular addressed to "Occupant, 000 Street, City." This type of bulk-rate mailing always has a deadline. If the sale starts Wednesday, a white mimeographed slip attached to each bound bundle will advise: "Postmaster: Do not home deliver these before Monday, November 18. Please see that they are all delivered not later than Wednesday, November 20." What business or person can send out a batch of first-class letters with such a stipulation?

These past few days, I have been forced to think harder on one subject than ever before in my forty years. To research other articles and introduce masses of statistics seem pointless—I have neither the time nor the inclination to read second-hand accounts of a situation that seems to me incredibly simple and yet almost hopeless of solution. My fellow carriers and clerk friends have all admired my guts and then proceeded to kick me there by inevitably asking, "What do you think one man can do?"



Here in the quiet of my own home, I have at last come up with the answer—"when the ship is sinking, you don't worry about a stopped-up toilet." The petty squabbles between postal unions and management must be seen for what they are—a waste of talent that should be pooled in seeking Congressional help. The Kappel commission's report on the postal service makes many salient points, but the NALC has come out strongly in opposition to its most important idea, that of a post office corporation.

Here is Mr. Rademacher again:

> The NALC is strongly in favor of boldness in action and imagination in thinking among our postal managers, but we are opposed completely to doubtful experimentation which could leave the postal service a shambles.

To illustrate the priority of importance in the moving of mail, let's reduce the whole complicated postal installation in any city to its basic components—men and materials. A post office is a unique kind of factory—the finished product is exactly the same as the raw material; the only change it undergoes is one of sorting. And as a factory it faces a unique problem—a postal installation cannot shut off the inflow of unsorted mail, or even regulate the flow from one day to the next. Given X number of carriers working Y number of hours, with a capacity of Z pieces of mail per carrier, the total output of any post office in any city or town in the country is XYZ. Every day sees this XYZ total output factor strained to its utmost, at least in some post office, somewhere. To talk about automation, scanning machines, standardized sizes, and all the other jargon of the efficiency experts is begging the issue, or worse, not even seeing the simplicity of the problem—which is the amount of mail a given number of men can deliver. Until the postal system can somehow limit the inflow to a more significant type of mail, then to have more than one class of mail is a fraud, in a general sense. With the XYZ factor determining the rate of flow, the ever-building pressure of incoming mail determines that all mail travel together through the sorting processes; bulk mail that is set aside until there is time to handle it without overtime will eventually have to be reinserted into the flow of incoming mail, whether or not there is time or space to handle it. "Whenever practicable," first- and second-class mail are still given priority, but as newer and faster ways of sorting and handling mail are devised, that XYZ total output factor is going to loom ever larger as the bottleneck in the whole system.

Remember, the carrier is the X quantity in this factor. The mail that he delivers, by foot or by truck, is the final finished product of that vast complex known as the post office. The quality of that finished product can be determined only by an aroused public.

GOP GOVERNORS

THE ILLUSION OF POWER

MELVIN H. BERNSTEIN

Mr. Bernstein, who practices law in Los Angeles, is a member of the National Governing Board of the Ripon Society.

Los Angeles

Richard Nixon indicated his regard for the Republican Governors Association by designating Vice President-elect Spiro T. Agnew as the liaison between the state governors and the White House. Agnew, by his own testimony, is to act as a "channel of communications"; even more important from a practical standpoint, he is to be the clearing house through which the governors' patronage must pass.

Nixon named Agnew as his personal representative to the governors at the three-day RGA conference in Palm Springs, Calif., in early December, where closed business sessions took place infrequently in the resort atmosphere. Certainly the schisms of the country were not mirrored in the aquamarine mineral baths of the swank Spa Hotel, where all was unity, bliss and "communications." Only four resolutions were produced by the conference. One of these thanked the host, Gov. Ronald Reagan, for California's hospitality, and another commended outgoing Chairman Chafee of Rhode Island and Vice Chairman Babcock of Montana for their labors. George Romney offered a resolution expressing the Assembly's appreciation of Ray Bliss's "exceptional professional contribution" to the Republican Party, but nevertheless stopped short of recommending that he be retained to make more such contributions.

The group's most substantial resolution recommended that Nixon consider announcing that upon taking office he would stay any last-minute administrative maneuvers which were designed to perpetuate Johnsonian policies. The RGA's new chairman, Ronald Reagan, well briefed at other times, found he could not recall more than two examples of "politically motivated actions with broad fiscal and other implications designed to hamstring and embarrass the Nixon administration" that had supposedly been discussed in the final business session of the conference. Under questioning from reporters he was frank to say that the resolutions had been made to order for the President-elect.

That the conservative Reagan was unanimously elected chairman of the RGA for 1969 was a further blow to any hope that the organization could become a progressive force in Republican politics. Raymond Shafer, a moderate, will succeed Reagan in 1970, and a rotation of offices between conservatives and moderates appears to have been accepted. Certainly Reagan's philosophy is to quash public controversy within party ranks; he rode that horse all the way to Sacramento in 1966.

The California Governor's political slant is in striking contrast to that of the organizers of the RGA. In July of 1963, liberal Mark Hatfield, then Governor of Oregon, announced the birth of a Republican governors' caucus which would meet each year and coordinate programs with the more conservative Republican National Committee and GOP Congressional Campaign committees. Leadership of the governors' new organization rested then in the hands of such state executives as Robert Smylie of Idaho, its first chairman, Love of Colorado, and Scranton of Pennsylvania. Nelson Rockefeller, Romney and Hatfield provided additional muscle for the progressive point of view in the RGA.

There were sixteen Republican governors at the initial caucus in 1963, and the group rose to twenty-five after the 1966 elections. At present thirty-one Republican governors either retain office or were elected in November. With the increase of GOP control of governorships, the moderate-liberal tone of the RGA faded. The governors were unable to unify behind a Presidential candidate in 1964 and could not secure representation on the reactionary GOP platform committee, headed by then conservative Congressman and now Cabinet appointee Melvin Laird. Nor could the governors agree upon a candidate in 1968 or gain much more than bare representation on the Dirksen-dominated platform committee at Miami Beach.

Ed Keiss, Toronto

As the new chairman, Reagan stated the political philosophy of the RGA to be a continuing effort to restore the balance between the national government and the sovereign states operating under a federal compact. This sums up the probable emphasis of both the RGA and the Nixon administration for the next four years. It is hardly a reassuring orientation when one recalls the 20th-century failures of the states to meet the challenges of an urbanized, industrialized society.

Nelson Rockefeller offered his fellow governors their one opportunity for controversy with a proposal to support the federalization of state welfare programs. It was conveniently overlooked—this conference was designed to promote consensus, not conflict. It is doubtful, though, that any resolution would have more than marginal effect on the Nixon administration. The RGA faces cooperation with the first Republican President in its five-year history, during which time the group has proved itself a relatively powerless organization in the Republican Party. The governors are influential in their home states, but as an association they function more as a public relations forum for individual members than as a body of tangible party influence. The association can make no binding decisions, has no constituency, and can nominate no candidates.

Certainly the RGA rates more attention from Richard Nixon's administration than from Lyndon Johnson. But the governors' sway will likely be determined more by how closely their views resemble those of Nixon and of the Congressional wing of the party than by what they as an association can accomplish directly. To be sure, Nixon has appointed three Republican governors—Romney, Volpe, and Hickel—to his Cabinet, but they are not out of the top gubernatorial drawer.

Agnew did not represent himself as an effective channel for any sort of communications during his shoddy national campaign, and with Reagan as its spokesman, the Republican Governors Association will probably lose whatever progressive thrust it has been able to mount in the past. There is little real hope that the RGA will in the foreseeable future provide leadership to reshape GOP thinking and policies, or to broaden the party's narrow base of support. Its programs seem designed to maintain the illusions of unity.

BRAZIL: THE TANKS ROLL

WARREN DEAN

Mr. Dean, professor of history at the University of Texas, is on leave in Brazil.

Sao Paulo

The Brazilian Government has made it official—it's not a democracy, it's a dictatorship. On Friday, December 13, President Costa e Silva closed the Congress, arrested a number of politicians and journalists (including ex-President Kubitschek), instituted overt open press censorship, and suppressed habeas corpus. The government also asserted the power to intervene in state governments, to declare a state of siege, and to begin another round of suspending individual political liberties. The reason, or pretext, for this wave of reaction was the refusal of the Congress to permit one of its members to be indicted.

The deputy in question, Márcio Moureira Alves, had made a speech back in September on the floor of the chamber in which he called for a boycott of the Independence Day parades as a protest against the "butchers of the students"—that is, the army. The military ministers thereupon demanded that Márcio be brought to trial for a crime against national security. At first it seemed that a confrontation could be avoided by some compromise, perhaps a public expiation by the rest of the chamber. But no, the army insisted: it wanted Márcio's head.

The Congress, up to then a thoroughly subservient bunch, saw this latest exigency by the "hard liners" as an unavoidable showdown. To allow a colleague to be tried for a political statement, besides setting a lamentable precedent, would reveal to the electorate how utterly impotent the Congress was. Goaded by the threats of the Minister of Justice and the heavy-handed tactics of the majority leadership, the chamber voted strongly against granting license to try. Within hours the tanks were moving out of the encampments.

The government seems to be resolving in this drastic fashion the problem of its unpopularity. For nearly a year, President Costa e Silva has been trying to cope with a deepening political crisis that is mainly of his own making. Gradually giving way to the demands of the "hard line" in the army, he withdrew from sixty-eight municipalities the right to elect their mayors (the new constitution had already taken that right from the state capitals), declared illegal Carlos Lacerda's attempt to form a "broad front" of opposition elements because the coalition included the exiled Joao Goulart, ordered a raid on the National Student Congress (an illegal, but up to then tolerated group), jailing all 700 of its delegates, and exiled former President Jânio Quadros to a remote border town for having made political statements. In each of these cases the government chose to regard an act of political opposition as a form of attempted subversion. Instead of co-opting the leaders it has simply repressed them, and subsequently it has refused to deal with the sources of discontent upon which these various oppositions nourished.

As the intransigence of the government has revealed itself, the really subversive forces have become more active. Several terrorist groups are at work. So far, they are unapprehended and for the most part unidentified by the police, and they are successful to the extent that they have provoked a counter-terror from the Right. Elements in the Air Force have been caught trying to form a political assassination unit, and weapons seem to have been made available to "anti-Communist" groups from army stocks.

The shutting down of Congress and the arrogation of other super-constitutional powers is an act of stunning finality for a political system that has always managed to keep going by fashioning unsatisfactory compromises out of threadbare personal commitments and free-wheeling private ambitions. The civilian politicians always refrained from putting their colleagues' backs to the wall in order to avoid being put there themselves. But lately the atmosphere has become less cordial. With the political organization and registration of large numbers of the urban masses in the 1950s, the potential for radical, class-oriented appeals became frightening, or tempting, depending on one's inclinations. The generals, representing the interests and attitudes of the urban middle class, found the "Populist" demagogy that arose out of the changed situation repulsive because it was dishonest and disreputable. With the arrival of genuine radical movements sponsored by Miguel Arraes and Francisco Juliao from the state of Pernambuco in the early 1960s, their disdain turned to horror and fear.

The civilian politicians obviously gave the military carte blanche to put a lid on all this social ferment. They proved thoroughly capable of dismantling the labor unions, the peasant leagues, and the personalistic political machines of the cities, restoring to the middle-class parties a tightened control over a devastated political landscape. Significantly, they at the same time purged all the elements within the army that had moderated its ambitions either by representing a certain affinity for the Left or by preferring that officers keep out of politics. In large measure the intermittent repression since then has had the same purpose—to keep mass political movements of any sort from breaking out again. The government's use of the term "subversion" seems usually to have that meaning.

But now the crisis has shifted to a conflict within the governing class itself. The students, the already exiled politicians, and even the terrorists are minor distractions to the army's major drive to root out what it considers the failings of the politicians, the bureaucracy, the courts, and even the church. The officers regard the game of politics with loathing; for them it is sheer disorder and corruption. Their greatest efforts have been directed to reorganizing the political system so that politicians will have little power in it. Direct elections were replaced by indirect elections and appointments, the open party system was replaced by one government party and one tolerated opposition party (the latter in process of liquidation before the Congress was closed), and all political activity was subjected to the superior review of military courts and investigating boards in the name of "national security" or more opaquely "the revolution."

The overall effect of these actions has been profoundly disruptive of the political system, but the generals up to the latest decree continued to tinker, hoping perhaps that with the elimination of a few more individuals or the rewriting of certain of the rules, the system would begin to work to their satisfaction. They have not tried to rewrite the whole game but it is clear, in spite of their democratic rhetoric, that they would be most satisfied with a Salazar-like corporative-Fascist state.

The decree of December 13 will probably isolate the military still more from the society it is trying to remake. The closing of Congress and the other measures, unlike the revolutionary decrees issued in 1964 and 1965, do not have a time limit; they are intended to be in effect, apparently, for a considerable period. Furthermore, the decree, unlike the others, was issued long after passage of the new constitution, which the government itself pushed through Congress and which the government promised to honor. Although many of the civilian politicians scurried to telegraph offices to wire their adherence, it is evident that only the generals are influencing the President now. The middle class itself displays no interest in the affair; it is content as long as inflation is controlled and the specter of communism is kept at bay.

Probably the conflict with the revolutionary Left has not yet been played out. The government, having legitimized violence, is in for more action from those who see violence as the only effective opposition, and surely their ranks will swell. Rather than a leftist revolution, however, other army coups are more likely to follow. President Costa e Silva is riding a whirlwind and it is to be expected that his new counselors will eventually decide he has not got enough stomach for the action.

BOOKS & THE ARTS

Solzhenitsyn: Optimist and Realist

THE CANCER WARD. By Aleksandr I. Solzhenitsyn. Translated by Rebecca Frank. The Dial Press. 616 pp. $8.50.

EMILE CAPOUYA

Mr. Capouya is a writer, and executive editor at Funk & Wagnalls.

This novel by the author of One Day in the Life of Ivan Denisovich and The First Circle labors under a "Publisher's Foreword" that can be numbered among Mr. Solzhenitsyn's tribulations. It begins with a brief account of the arrest, imprisonment and subsequent literary career of Dostoevsky. Then, manner of Plutarch, it presents a biographical sketch of Mr. Solzhenitsyn, together with a review of the recent social and political history of the Soviet Union—provided, I imagine, by the translator or another scholarly person. There follows a précis of the novel itself, presumably for the benefit of readers who are pressed for time. Finally, Dostoevsky is invoked again, and the publisher expresses his confidence that Mr. Solzhenitsyn's book will bowl along down the ringing grooves of time, like those of his great predecessor. The impertinence, in both senses, of such a foreword is particularly scandalous here, since the author is not in a position to defend himself. If publishers must blurble opinions that advance their commercial interests, perhaps they can be persuaded to do so on the dust jacket only, which can be discarded like the wrapping paper it is.

In this instance, the taste of the presentation is brought more insistently into question by a copyright dispute between a British publisher, who is producing an edition of his own, and the Dial Press. The British firm is alleging copyright infringement, and has also criticized Miss Rebecca Frank's translation as being so faulty that it does a disservice to the author. The merits of the case must be presumed to have nothing whatever to do with the arguments on either side appealing to literary values; publishers as litigants are not in a position to assert what literary taste they may have, since their aims are essentially commercial. Miss Frank's translation must seem quite adequate to the readers of the Dial edition. However, those readers should be warned that although Dial has expressed confidence in the permanent value of The Cancer Ward as a work of art, it felt that the book would not be worth $8.50 today unless it were eked out to 616 pages, with the help of disproportionate margins—a luxury that violates good design by distracting one's attention from the text.

From One Day in the Life of Ivan Denisovich, that sober and compressed account of a forced-labor camp, one could scarcely have anticipated the rich complexity of The First Circle. It is true that the structure of the latter novel is episodic, rendered in scenes that are more or less independent of one another, while the action is contained within a period of three days only. Nevertheless, it presents an image of Soviet society—the reverse of the official one, and almost equally far removed from the ignorantly hostile portrait painted by political prejudice in the West—that is imaginatively adequate and fulfilling. Reviewers and the public in this country have responded to the book with enthusiasm. Indeed, it seems to enjoy more esteem among the critics, at least, than that rather more modestly framed story, The Cancer Ward. It is easy to explain that apparent preference.

For one thing, the characters of The First Circle, whether prisoners or officials, are mostly the technicians and bureaucrats who are called intellectuals in the Soviet Union but whom we ourselves would regard simply as members of the middle class. The motives and fortunes of such characters naturally find a ready sympathy in this country among persons who read or write. Then, the novel in which they figure gives a detailed account of the workings of the Soviet system of repression, which is not entirely distinct from the Soviet way of life in general. When every day brings some signal new instance of the struggle for freedom of conscience in the states under Russian hegemony, the relevance and topicality of The First Circle is constantly being vindicated. Finally, it contains bravura scenes that are intensely theatrical, and these too must contribute to the popularity of the story.

More austere in conception, presenting characters that are on the whole less sophisticated, The Cancer Ward appears to me to be more satisfying as a novel, more interesting in terms of literary accomplishment. It is ironical that a work still unpublished, if not officially proscribed, in the country that gave it birth, should support by its grandly humanistic concerns the perennial Soviet strictures upon the degeneracy of Western letters. In comparison with Solzhenitsyn's novel, the light wines and strong liquors of our own literature during the last quarter-century offer nothing in the way of nourishment for the spirit. His plain fare is the product of a preoccupation with the basic terms of social life, and it supports in turn ideals and sentiments of a higher order than are current with us.

The story takes place in the cancer wing of a hospital in a city of one of the Soviet Asiatic republics. This novel, too, proceeds by episodes, and a number of them present sketches of the varieties of Soviet man. The least flattering is that of Rusanov, in civil life a functionary in the record-keeping apparatus of the state; Rusanov's records concern people, and give him the power to dispose of the lives of his fellow citizens. In the name of the proletariat he tyrannizes over proletarians, questioning, imprisoning, exiling, searching out subversion and disaffection, inventing them at need—whether at the behest of the government or on his own account. Once in the cancer ward as a patient, he finds himself among sufferers too afflicted to acknowledge his power, and physicians who on their own ground exercise even greater power, and in a better cause. When his symptoms are arrested and he is released from the hospital, he reverts at once to his old social habits. He has missed the opportunity to find out on what terms he and every other human being holds his life. He may find out at last, for the author suggests that Rusanov is enjoying no more than a remission of his illness.

If Rusanov is a kind of minor Eichmann, whose crimes have official sanction so that he is scarcely exposed to bad conscience, another of the patients of the cancer ward represents a kind of "good conscience" that is much more understandable, even attractive, much more common under every variety of social organization, and ultimately more discouraging to the hope of achieving a humane polity. He is a young geologist, of positive temperament, studious to the point of mortification, possessed by a hypothesis in his specialty that he regards as more important than his cure or his life. As for the social arrangements that govern the Soviet Union, they have never interfered with him in any way. He is the ideal Komsomol, an image of official Soviet man. His disinterested enthusiasm for science and his athlete's dedication will never threaten the powers that be—in the USSR or any other place. He is a lineal descendant of Turgenev's Bazarov, the original nihilist and modern man of science; his brethren in all the advanced industrial nations are now the unacknowledged legislators of mankind.

But the most striking and rewarding portrait is of a former junior officer in the army who has been sentenced to forced labor for political disaffection, and later to perpetual exile. Kostoglotov is one of those extraordinary persons who actually learn from experience—that is, his reflections on his own history are original with him, and not derived from the received opinions that constitute the body of social superstition at any time. He knows that his life of exile is a terrible injustice, that the Soviet state is a tyranny—the more shameful for its claim to incarnate a lofty ideal of political decency. Without for a moment hankering after the other social systems of which we have had examples so far, for he is shrewd enough to guess at the forms that injustice must assume in other states that claim to represent the popular will and the interests of the common man, he longs with an exile's yearning for a community of fair dealing, of love of truth.

Kostoglotov is not a saint, nor a lay figure representing an ideal of primitive Christianity that is appealing in proportion as it is obviously inadequate to deal with the problem of evil. He is a man, with a man's faults, and a man's aspiration to do better than he does. The problem of evil is indeed, under many forms, the deepest concern of Kostoglotov, and the particular preoccupation of his author. By instinct, both Solzhenitsyn and Kostoglotov confront the question positively.

They do not resign themselves to accepting malice or misfortune, but both are rebellious as a matter of conscience, as a matter of honor. Kostoglotov is unresigned even when it comes to the conventions of being ill. He demands to know what drugs are being used upon him, what their effects may be, what is the state of his own "case." He has the strength to surmount the sick man's obsession with his disease to the extent of falling in love. Vera Gangart, the woman who finds herself responding to Kostoglotov despite her habits of puritan abnegation, responds of course to his admiration and desire for her, but also to his unregenerate desire for a truthful basis for life, which she recognizes as the sign of vitality.

Solzhenitsyn is an optimist, a temperament that has always assumed loneliness, suffering and exile to be natural features of this conditional world, but that is not so cast down by that assumption as to think that evil cannot be mitigated by courage and love. Pessimists are persons who have promised themselves paradise on earth, and feel hopelessly dashed by the peripeties of real life. The optimists are the realists: Solzhenitsyn gives a sad resolution to his novel.

In the zoo that Kostoglotov visits on his release from the hospital, the monkey's cage is empty, and a sign tells the public that "a mean person" blinded the animal by throwing tobacco in its eyes. Evil will come. Kostoglotov's disease has been arrested by the injection of hormones, at the price of destroying his virility. He feels that as a political exile and a kind of sexual invalid he will be no proper partner for Vera, and he goes off alone to the remote village where he must spend the remainder of his life. That decision is of a piece with his headstrong character. The reader does not feel assured that Kostoglotov has made the right choice—why should not Vera have been the better for his company? But there is no guarantee that strong natures will choose wisely, only that they will act on their own best inspiration.

You Can't Get There From Here

POWER IN THE HOUSE: A History of the Leadership of the House of Representatives. By Richard Bolling. E. P. Dutton & Co. 291 pp. $6.95.

JFK AND LBJ: The Influence of Personality upon Politics. By Tom Wicker. William Morrow & Co. 297 pp. $5.

PARTY LEADERS IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES. By Randall B. Ripley. The Brookings Institution. 221 pp. $6.75.

FRANK J. DONNER

Mr. Donner is a New York attorney who specializes in constitutional law and civil liberties cases. He is the author of The Un-Americans (Ballantine).

> To any student of government, it is eminently clear that the role of the Congress in determining national policy, defense or otherwise, has deteriorated over the years. More and more the role of Congress has come to be that of a sometimes querulous but essentially kindly uncle who complains while furiously puffing on his pipe but who finally, as everyone expects, gives in and hands over the allowance, grants the permission, or raises his hand in blessing, and then returns to the rocking chair for another year of somnolence broken only by an occasional anxious glance down the avenue and a muttered doubt as to whether he had done the right thing.
>
> House Report 1406, Eighty-seventh Congress, Second Session (1962)

The decline of the role of Congress in the legislative process has become an insistent political reality. While our national assembly has not suffered the precipitous skid of European parliaments to near oblivion, it has been wrenched from its constitutional base as a legislative body by expanding Presidential responsibility for legislative initiative, planning, drafting, the scheduling of priorities, and the mobilization of mass support for programs. The Presidential take-over has resulted from the emergence of a national constituency shaped by changing social forces and the centrality of foreign policy and military defense during the almost continuous hot and cold wars of the past quarter of a century.

A separate and largely independent set of social and political forces has at the same time atrophied the legislative competence of the Congress in dealing with the problems created by urbanization and industrialization. Influenced in part by the value preferences discussed below, the Congress is unwilling to handle the risks, inherent in complex systems management, of commitment to deferred, uncertain or intangible ends.

Congress is in the throes of a serious identity crisis as it lurches from a "rubber-stamp" to an obstructionist role, to use the language of its critics, seeking legislative ground which it can call its own. While it has not resolved the paradox of refusing to legislate as the sole means available to it of asserting its autonomy, neither has it wholly accepted its role as a junior partner of the President. Its present unhappy stance is something like that of a peevish editor who blue-pencils, mutilates or dilutes Presidential legislative contributions through compromising amendments in favor of minority interest groups, inadequate funding and (a specialty of the House) spiteful riders. This ambiguous and largely negative role has itself intensified the deadlock. The need to obtain cooperation of the Congress and at the same time to soothe its status anxieties (already well developed in the House by its feelings of inferiority to the "other body") has created new prob-

THE POOL

There was a place
a pool we all came down for water

with the moon above and shining from it.

Quiet we came silver and black different ones of us from among the trees the hair of the women long and snagged with briars, leaves.

Some dark as the pool
some light as the moon

we, all, naked walking carefully our toes pointed straight and the silence around us was from us

there was a place
a pool we all came down for water.

DAVE KELLY

lems for the vote-hunting leadership.

The problem of the legislative role of Congress (not to speak of its decline even as a theatre of party conflict) is as sticky as the Supreme Court crisis of the thirties. And what makes it even stickier is the fact that it cannot be resolved without first internally reorganizing and democratizing the Congress—especially the House.

Feared in an earlier day as the Trojan horse for an equalitarian rabble, the House stubbornly clings to the status quo: gerontocracy, economic conservatism, social fundamentalism and nativism. With its small-town ways of thinking, insulation from the main currents of American life, perennial campaigning for re-election and selective response to the most backward constituency pressures, the House has become the dead-end kid of American Government. While it is true, as some have noted, that the House is a lot more pluribus than it is unum, the unum that orates, investigates and legislates is the distillation of all our regressive myths and stereotypes. The few modern periods of Congressional legislative initiative have left a dreary harvest of statutory weeds, but in season and out, the House does its best to teach us through its spasms of legislative initiative how nasty the American celebration can be. (HUAC, flag desecration, LSD possession, the Pool bill, conscription, the anti-student rider, draft-card burning, the ouster of Powell, and an anti-riot bill—benighted, vindictive or just plain stupid measures passed by substantial majorities in the 90th Congress.)

Since the organization of their Democratic Study Group a decade ago, the liberals in the House have been losing ground and, far from capturing the leadership role warranted by their potential support, they have become adjuncts of the Establishment and its power system, a co-opted and divided opposition.

Richard Bolling, a ten-term liberal Missouri Democrat and a protégé and lieutenant of Speaker Rayburn (once regarded as his crown prince and possible successor) has written an angry polemic against 77-year-old Speaker McCormack whom he rates lower than Caligula's horse and not to be discussed in the same breath with such illustrious House leaders as Clay, Reed and Longworth. It is the most blunt assault on a House speaker since Uncle Joe Cannon was toppled by George Norris and his insurgent colleagues almost sixty years ago.

Bolling, who served informally as the leadership whip for the Democratic Study Group, is particularly bitter about McCormack's failure to mobilize the resources of his office to deal with the Southern Democrats who cooperate with Northern Republicans to sabotage the President's program. Bolling himself in 1961 had a first-hand encounter with this let's-not-be-beastly-to-the-bourbons style of House leadership. He ran for majority leader against Carl Albert of Oklahoma and lost in a struggle in which the urban machine Democratic regulars (including McCormack privately) lined up with the Southern Democrats. Two years later, he published House Out of Order, a book whose concern with the mechanics of House reform was sparked by the author's conviction that stronger leadership and more resolute tactics were required to fight the coalition.

Power in the House is a rewrite of the earlier volume prepared as a weapon for liberal Democrats in a planned bid to unseat McCormack at the beginning of the 91st Congress. The book is therefore more important as a political act, a manifesto for liberal Democrats, than for the details of its argument or the value of its proposed measures to reverse the entropy of the speakership.

Bolling's case is weakened by the sharpness of his criticisms of the Speaker. He scornfully arraigns McCormack for his provincial style of leadership, his Southern ties ("the Boston-Austin axis"), his fondness for ex-Mayor Curley of Boston (a source of discord with the Kennedys), and opportunism. With an ill-concealed patrician disgust he notes that McCormack's services to his South Boston supporters "provide him with a cushion against parochial, working-class constituents who prefer their cultural ghetto and whose political enthusiasms embrace candidates such as Louise Hicks." But the problem of the House leadership is not a problem created by McCormack's personality or constituents. Bolling's personal strictures obscure the fact that the system which organizes power in the House—the safe district, seniority, weak party loyalty, diffusion of power, oligarchic control by committee chairmen—has institutionalized conciliatory leadership and a policy of accommodation to dissident Southerners.

Bolling himself notes that it was Speaker Rayburn, the father of the cheek-turning tactics of accommodation, who refused to punish the Southern Democrats who had bolted the party to support the Thurmond candidacy in 1948, and "took the position that only the performance of a member in Washington mattered," and that "it was not his business what the member did about politics back home." As Bolling now acknowledges, this style seemed to work much better than it actually did, and when Rayburn (and Johnson in the Senate) ended their leadership tenure, their successors (in the House and Senate) demonstrated the inadequacy of working the legislative cages with crafty animal-taming stunts as a substitute for a structured leadership.

Bolling's specific proposals for strengthening the leadership are commendable but utopian. His key suggestion, to empower the Speaker to nominate members of Ways and Means and Rules and standing committee chairmen, could not conceivably be achieved without a revolution in the Democratic Party. The fact that "you can't get there from here" is itself a potent argument for a new politics.

Bolling assumes that McCormack's successor—his candidate was Majority Leader Albert until the debacle at Chicago—would use these centralized powers to implement a progressive Presidential program. But every solution in this area is dogged by a fresh difficulty: even if the speakership could be rehabilitated as a countervailing source of power to curb the committee chairmen, there is a strong possibility it could still be used in opposition to the President and not in his support.

The selection of the Speaker is itself an important institutional defense of the system. The advancement of members of the House up the rungs of leadership is governed by Rayburn's law that "to get along you must go along." And like just about everything else in the House, the choice of leaders has become bureaucratized into a co-opted succession from Deputy Whip to Speaker, controlled by the incumbent power holders in order to preserve and protect the system.

Bolling's core complaint (and what leads him into such strong, misplaced personal denunciations of the Speaker) comes down to a feeling that pandering to an obstructionist minority is politically immoral. He would applaud Walter Bagehot's tribute—in a different but related context—to effective parliamentary leadership.

> A good horse likes to feel the rider's bit; and a great deliberative assembly likes to feel that it is under worthy guidance. A minister who succumbs to the House—who ostentatiously seeks its pleasure—who does not try to regulate it—who will not boldly point out plain errors to it, seldom thrives. The great leaders of Parliament have varied much, but they have all had a certain firmness. A great assembly is as soon spoiled by over indulgence as a little child.

If the stress on personality is intrusive in Bolling's book, it is puzzling in Mr. Wicker's. The New York Times columnist and Washington Bureau Chief argues that "the influence of personality" was responsible for President Kennedy's "loss of Congress" and for LBJ's loss of his consensus. But this thesis (in the vein of 19th-century "portraits from history") does not unify the book, the whole of which is somewhat less than the promised sum of the two parts into which it is about evenly divided. Wicker does not even try to prove that Kennedy lost Congress as a result of the influence of his personality.

The Kennedy portion of his book deals with three skirmishes in 1961: the duel between the Rules Committee chairman Howard Smith and Speaker Rayburn as an agent of the Kennedy administration over the proposed enlargement of the Rules Committee to supply an administration majority; the fight over the amendment of the Fair Labor Standards Act; and the unsuccessful attempt to enact an education bill. The stumbling progress of these measures in the House was frustrating, but that hardly proves that Kennedy lost the Congress. JFK's initial failures were the result of his tenuous Congressional majority (paralleling his razor-thin electoral margin) and the rudimentary state of his Congressional liaison. And Wicker exaggerates the failures. The administration did win the Rules Committee fight. Wicker insists that victory could have been more decisive, about as valid a point in politics as Louis XIV's complaint that his coachman was "almost late." To be sure, Rayburn—unlike Hugo Smith—did not play the game to the hilt, but that was the way Mr. Sam always played the game.

The 1961 Rules Committee enlargement fight was a symbolic assertion of Presidential legislative responsibility under highly unfavorable circumstances. What is notable about it is that the administration, armed with little more than an activist theory, made a political issue of Presidential legislative leadership and took extraordinary risks. Not that the change itself was so important. Rayburn, after preliminary feints, rejected pressures by Bolling and the Democratic Study Group for a binding party caucus to force the change and for the ouster of Rules committeeman Colmer, a 1960 Presidential election defector. Rayburn never even considered limiting the Rules Committee's powers or jurisdiction. He chose a floor fight on the enlargement issue because the alternative measures might have seriously threatened the system. In addition, Rayburn insisted on minimizing a disruption of the status quo by seeking only a temporary change. The fact that the change proved to be quite ineffective in the 87th Congress made it easy to obtain a substantial majority (235 to 196) in the 88th for making it permanent, a development which Wicker ignores.

Wicker argues, in connection with his other two case histories, that there was a serious gap between Kennedy's pre-election rhetoric and his Congressional resources. So there was. Apart from the fact that Kennedy had no way of anticipating his ultimate Congressional strength, the hortatory collective ("we must" as in "we must get the country moving again") is a staple of Democratic Presidential campaigns, the proclamation of a hoped for "hundred days." More well-founded is Wicker's charge that after promising wine and roses in return for a mandate to remake the country, the new administration promptly proceeded "domestic as a plate" to "retire at half past eight." Not only did the new President fail to offer fresh programs in support of a promised aggressive leadership role, but he fawned on and compromised with the Southerners.

Wicker's account of the influences which led Johnson to escalate the war is perceptive. Here personality plays a more plausible role than in the Kennedy essay: Johnson emerges as the nativist, self-righteous, simplistic, blood-redemption anti-Communist; the doomed gun slinger in a pop-tragic Western, his proud regeneration ambushed by his demons. But here, too, Wicker properly places strong stress on objective considerations: the circumstances of Johnson's accession to power forced him to maintain continuity of policy and reliance upon the Kennedy personnel whose thinking was responsible for initiating the escalation.

Professor Ripley's scholarly essay explores the extent to which party leaders in the House influence legislative behavior. The three-cornered system of dispersal of power, weak leadership and minimal party control has become the permanent modus operandi of the House Democrats, with some variations in terms of stronger ideological unity among the Republicans. The lack of leadership power in the Democratic ranks operates, ironically enough, to stabilize the tenure of the Speaker because he is no threat to the mavericks. Why dethrone a figurehead? The Republicans (as Bolling enviously notes) change their leaders more frequently because the consequences of dissent can be more damaging.

This institutionalized limitation on leadership authority has placed a premium on persuasion, bargaining, psychological whammy, Knute Rockne-ish exhortation, and similar forms of personal

Are You A Slow Reader?

A noted publisher in Chicago reports there is a simple technique of rapid reading which should enable you to increase your reading speed and yet retain much more. Most people do not realize how much they could increase their pleasure, success and income by reading faster and more accurately.

According to this publisher, most people, regardless of their present reading skill, can use this simple technique to improve their reading ability to a remarkable degree. Whether reading stories, books, technical matter, it becomes possible to read sentences at a glance and entire pages in seconds with this method.

To acquaint the readers of this publication with the easy-to-follow rules for developing rapid reading skill, the company has printed full details of its interesting self-training method in a new booklet, "How to Read Faster and Retain More" mailed free to anyone who requests it. No obligation. Send your name, address, and zip code to: Reading, 835 Diversey Parkway, Dept. 533-511, Chicago, Ill. 60614. A postcard will do.

appeal, all "flavored with a large degree of understanding for members who cannot go along on a given bill." The dialectics of this courtship leads the lawmaker to set up shop for himself, play hard to get ("refuse to be taken for granted" is the term of art), trade his vote for return favors, "credits," or future concessions. And as the impatient administration takes over the pursuit of votes from the House leadership, the stakes are raised and the fate of legislation turns on the success of a new kind of high-level "social politics," compounded of buttering-up, barter and blackmail.

Since the keepers of the system must acquiesce in its reform, it is hard to see how meaningful change is possible. The 1946 Legislative Reorganization Act, basically an attempt to restore autonomy to the Congress, merely indentured its power more strongly to the system. The strangling in 1968 by the House Rules Committee of the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1967, with its mushy reforms and the recently announced abandonment of Bolling's dump-McCormack strategy because of the Study Group's cold feet, teach us anew that the more things change in the House the more they remain the same—or get worse. When will we face the fact that traditional politics is incapable of restructuring Congressional power relationships, however desperate the need?

THE MUMMIES OF GUANAJUATO

Some have shoes and hair
though one needs an ear;
and another, a replacement for an unmentionable souvenir.

Death, here, is described in the form of a plea.
A joke: fix that third foot and you'll run better.

Dead-eye is as dead-eye does.
These faces have resolved mood and complaint openly in the underground.

It's a cold "because"
at work in the boneyard.
Death of the soft office,
of the dream without eyes,

the death of my friends,
death of my father,
can you not fix forever
this sinister corpus!

MARVIN BELL

Incomplete Diagnosis

BLACK RAGE. By William H. Grier, M.D., and Price M. Cobbs, M.D. Basic Books. 213 pp. $5.95.

CHARLES A. VALENTINE

Mr. Valentine, who teaches anthropology at Washington University, St. Louis, is on leave to study an urban black community. He is the author of Culture and Poverty (University of Chicago Press).

Men who still hope that American society can be saved from violent disintegration by humane and rational communication are beginning to sound desperate. Even as they act on this hope such men find themselves portraying a national condition which provides little or no support for their own motivating hopefulness.

At the beginning of Black Rage the authors clearly state the premises on which their book is based:

> As the lines [of racial conflict] become more firmly drawn, exchange of information is the first casualty.
>
> If racist hostility is to subside, and if we are to avoid open conflict on a nationwide scale, information is the most desperately needed commodity of our times.
>
> And of the things that need knowing, none is more important than that all blacks are angry.

At the end of the book the authors ask: "What is likely to galvanize the masses into aggression against the whites?" After suggesting that the particular flash point is unpredictable they add: "It seems certain only that on the course the nation now is headed it will happen."

And then:

> If existing oppressions and humiliating disenfranchisements are to be lifted, they will have to be lifted most speedily, or catastrophe will follow.
>
> For there are no more psychological tricks blacks can play upon themselves. . . No more lies. . . No more dreams. . . No more opiates. . . No more patience. No more thought. No more reason. Only a welling tide risen out of all those terrible years of grief, now a tidal wave of fury and rage, and all black, black as night.

In the intervening 200 pages, no reason is given to think that this or any number of similar acts of communication will lead to a speedy end to the humiliation and oppression of racism in America. On the contrary, a major theme of the book is that white supremacy and black inferiority are deeply built into the consciousness (not to mention the unconscious) of all Americans by a combination of mutually reinforcing historical and psychological mechanisms. The authors' analysis effectively destroys their own opening premises.

There is also little or nothing in Black Rage that would lead us to hope for anything from the oppressed masses except the orgy of furious destruction predicted in the final paragraph quoted above. Black people are portrayed as so crippled psychologically by centuries of white terrorism that their "quantum of grief" can only be "released in the form of rage—black rage, apocalyptic and final."

It is two black psychiatrists, writing for a white audience, who have produced these dire portrayals and prognostications. Theirs is a brilliant book which combines highly passionate eloquence with thoroughly intellectual seriousness. Their approach is essentially clinical, though they also make considerable use of historical background and a sociological framework. Case histories of individual black patients provide the bulk of their evidence. Psychoanalysis is the most conspicuous theoretical preference of the authors, but the book often leans heavily on economic and cultural determinism as well. The book is not at all academic, being quite innocent of footnotes, bibliography or other documentation in the conventional scholarly sense.

Drs. Grier and Cobbs explore one aspect after another of the psychological worlds of black people in America. They set forth their thesis that all blacks suffer from more or less suppressed anger and self-hatred, created by the psychosocial effects of slavery and later forms of institutional racism.

Grier and Cobbs's discussion of family patterns gives an idea of their relationship to some prominent themes in recent writing about Negro Americans. They dismiss as "simplistic half-truths" Moynihan's thesis that disorganized families are the core of black people's difficulties in association with emasculation under conditions of urbanization. On the contrary, they argue, Negro family problems exist "because the United States sets its hand against black people and by the strength of wealth, size and number, prevents black families from protecting their members." The authors do not shrink from the policy implications of their position:

> A program for strengthening black families would have to include a change in the fabric of the nation. . . Such a > program would include a change in the working of governments so that black people could command that officials serve them, not humiliate them; that policemen protect them, not prey on them. . . that officialdom generally and courts of law in particular [cease] keeping black families huddled together in a ghetto for the enrichment of real estate interests.

Yet these same authors unhesitatingly accept the more basic premise that there is a distinct entity known as "the Negro family." While they add little to what has already been written, they echo the popular judgment that black families in general are "in deep trouble," "coming apart," and "failing to provide the nurturing that black children need." In fact, they really agree with the fundamental point in the Moynihan analysis, for they state this point in quite familiar terms: "A great many of the problems of black people in America can be traced back to the widespread crumbling of the family structure." So they disagree about causes and cures but not about where the nub of the problem lies.

In the end, a central message of Black Rage seems very like the same old diagnosis: the crux of black people's problems is their own disorganization, pathology, and weakness. All this is caused by past and present white oppression, but the locus of the problem is now in black people, their families, and their psyches. "The white man has crushed all but the life from blacks. . . ." "Black men have been so hurt in their manhood that they are now unsure and uneasy as they teach their sons to be men." As for the black child, "his spirit was crushed before he knew there was need of it."

Unlike many purveyors of similar analyses, Grier and Cobbs do say unequivocally that none of these problems can be solved until whites accede to the basic demand of black people: "Get off our backs! . . . How? By simply doing it—now." In Black Rage this demand does not have the hollow ring of mere lip service to the ideal of ending oppression—again unlike other formulations which link social disadvantage to cultural disorganization or group pathology. Moreover, these two psychiatrists recognize that much that is conventionally labeled abnormal is necessary for black survival in America, e.g., "a healthy cultural paranoia." They are able to ask about a black patient who felt persecuted: "Who can really tell where her delusions end and reality begins in this mad, mad land?"

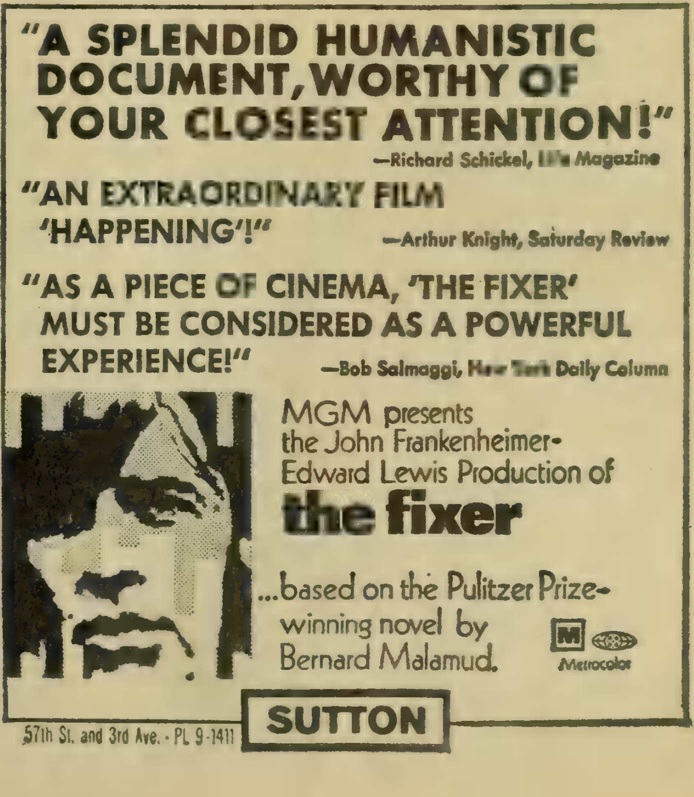
The authors enter a plea for clinicians "who can tell the difference between a sick man and a sick nation." Some of their ideas about mental health and therapy go well beyond the stock psychiatric bromides: "A black man's soul can live only if it is oriented toward a change of the social order. A good therapist helps a man change his inner life so that he can more effectively change his outer world." Thus the conceptions of pathology in Black Rage are by no means confined to the commonplace rationalizations of the status quo that one discovers in many psychiatrically oriented discussions of social problems.

Nevertheless, the prime focus on group pathology strikes this reviewer as the most serious flaw in Grier and Cobbs's work. Several major limitations of the book appear to stem directly from this concentration of attention on the psychic damage suffered by black people in America. The psychic strengths by which black Americans survive, their healthy adaptability, their creativity and capacity for change are not entirely ignored in this book; but these qualities are given only brief and relatively superficial consideration. Little attention is given to the movements for social change created by black people struggling against white oppression.

This is why Black Rage threatens a savage outburst of nation-wide destruction—but suggests no creative accompaniment or outcome from this confrontation. Over and over, particularly toward the end of the volume, Grier and Cobbs describe the predominant feelings of ghetto blacks as "grief and depression." These they interpret as "hatred turned on the self." Then they suggest that "as the sufferer moves toward health, the hatred he had turned on himself is redirected toward his tormenters," with the fury of his attack a measure of the original hurt. Translated into terms of mass behavior this seems to mean that we can expect a cathartic blood bath but no creative revolutionary movement. Ultimately this becomes a demeaning portrayal of debased masses capable of achieving "health" only through irrational aggression. Thus one more derogatory stereotype seems to have been born.

Indeed, these authors appear to attach their only faith in more positive possibilities to individual men of heroic stature. "Malcolm is an authentic hero, indeed the only universal black hero. . . . The essence of Malcolm X was growth, change, and a seeking after truth. . . . [He outgrew] the ideas of revolution and black nationhood . . . by the time of his death." In this same context we are told that the ideology of black militancy is "static" because it is "encased" within those same "ideas of revolution." Thus Grier and Cobbs insist that the white man must "get off our backs," and yet without suggesting how this might be done, they seem to reject anything labeled revolutionary. Presumably this is because they cannot imagine a black revolution as being anything but a frenzied orgy of violence without any goal beyond the expression of Black Rage.

Fortunately for everyone concerned, this prognostication does not ring true to one who lives in a black ghetto and studies the ongoing struggle



"A SPLENDID HUMANISTIC DOCUMENT, WORTHY OF YOUR CLOSEST ATTENTION!"
—Richard Schickel, Life Magazine

"AN EXTRAORDINARY FILM 'HAPPENING'!"
—Arthur Knight, Saturday Review

"AS A PIECE OF CINEMA, 'THE FIXER' MUST BE CONSIDERED AS A POWERFUL EXPERIENCE!"
—Bob Salmaggi, New York Daily Column

MGM presents
the John Frankenheimer-
Edward Lewis Production of the fixer

...based on the Pulitzer Prize-winning novel by Bernard Malamud.

Metrocolor

SUTTON
57th St. and 3rd Ave. - PL 9-1411

there. Here one may see black and brown people, sometimes working with real white allies, making many kinds of efforts to assert and defend their own interests against oppression. Most of these efforts involve opposition to white racism. Some go beyond this and attempt to transcend the racism that poisons American society as a whole. These are certainly creative initiatives. Some of them may well be revolutionary. Black rage indeed exists in the ghettos, but it is neither the only psychological reality nor as yet the predominant mood.

The book is certainly well worth reading to make up one's own mind about it. There is much that is impressive or intriguing or both in Black Rage that cannot be conveyed in a brief review. One might consider, for example, whether a major intention of the book is to threaten and frighten white Americans. Whether or not the authors had any such design in mind, their book might well have this effect. A final question, then, would be: to what purpose? Is there any reason why black people should expect something good from a frightened —or a more frightened—whitey?

All in all, this exercise in "exchange of information" between black and white is a failure. This must be said even though the attempt was surely well intended and obviously carried out by men of insight and imagination. It does not seem likely that it will contribute significantly to whatever national developments might be required to see to it that "racist hostility is to subside" or that "we . . . avoid open conflict on a nationwide scale." It may be that this is hardly the fault of the enterprising and insistent authors, but that America has passed the point where it can be saved by any "exchange of information."

Yet more must be said. The information conveyed by Black Rage is no longer what predominantly white America most needs to learn. Of course, white Americans should know that black people are suffering and are angry. Those whites who are sufficiently ignorant or insensitive or have missed these contemporary realities, however, are not likely to be much influenced by one more treatise, no matter how passionate and intellectual it is. The great untold story of our time is rather the creativity, strength, and determination with which the poor and people of color are struggling to find constructive and humane solutions for their problems, thus making these the nation's problems.

This story is not told in Black Rage. Indeed Black Rage has probably made the task of telling this story effectively to America a little more difficult than it was already.

DINAH

Some are too difficult to win.
I work to remove her doubt.
By the time I've figured me in,
She's already figured me out.

A. R. AMMONS

Out of White Sight

COMING OF AGE IN MISSISSIPPI.
By Anne Moody. The Dial Press. 348 pp. $5.95.

MARY ELLMANN

Mrs. Ellmann is the author of the recently published Thinking About Women (Harcourt, Brace & World).

This is the autobiography of a young woman who was born, on September 15, 1940, at the bottom of the American pile. Her parents, Diddly and Toosweet, were sharecropper Negroes on a plantation in Wilkinson County, in the southwest corner of Mississippi. Anne Moody, then called Essie Mae, was their first child. She had a sister and a brother before Diddly left brown Toosweet for yellow Florence. Then Toosweet, in turn, took up with yellow Raymond, whose family came and took away her next baby as they might have come and claimed Raymond's shoes or Raymond's flashlight. Nonetheless, Toosweet marries Raymond, first by common law and then by law, and they have more babies. At the end of the book, when Anne Moody is 24, a graduate of Tougaloo College in Mississippi, and a full-time CORE organizer, Toosweet's tenth child is 3 months old.

The book is very simply divided into sections: Childhood, High School, College and The Movement. The first section, Childhood, is different from, and better than, all the rest. Something is new here: the door is shut and the black family is inside, out of white sight. This now ancient aspect of America, rural Southern black life, begins to speak. It hits the page like a natural force, crude and undeniable and, against all principles of beauty, beautiful.

At first, the child Essie Mae accepts as the only world a world of heat, snakes, hogs, cow dung, bare feet, outhouses, beans and bread. The poverty of the family imposes an overwhelming physicality, a relentless wheeling of sensations —in their context, shooting dice is cerebral, a release into abstraction. The primary sense of existence is cloacal, as of a people expelled like excrement into their septic "quarters." The filth rises into their primitive language: shit is its first word, ass is its second. But this is an inexplicably fine filth. The mother, Toosweet, cannot get through a sentence without shit, and yet her sentences (like her ridiculous name) become her. One experiences a conversion to this speech —as delicate as pig's feet, rounded, comic, resourceful. There are infinite uses of ass alone—cheap-assed, rich-assed, little raggle-ass house, I'm going to kill your ass! It is the speech of the unregenerate and the uncritically alive, of Toosweet who is nothing but Negro and American—turning out ten-pound brown babies for her high yellow lout Raymond and screaming at her daughter:

> What you know about some African dance? You don't know nothin' about Africa. Ain't never seen an African in your life.

The daughter is intelligent and energetic. The mother's vivacity is translated into the child's ambition, and it is that rigorous compulsion with which the sections, High School and College, deal. This ambition is understandable, even admirable, and entirely familiar— the early assumption of shame, the retaliatory thrusting of the self ahead, the acquisition of credentials, of the vocabulary and the poise by means of which the person may manipulate rather than be manipulated. In America, this is of course a more difficult progress for the native black than for any immigrant. I would not seem to underestimate the cruelties which we incorporate in the name Mississippi, or the bold, embittered strength with which Anne Moody came through the place. And in the final section of her book, The Movement, her personal ambition changes, as personal ambition rarely does, into generosity. She gives herself, enslaves herself, to the drudgery and danger and admitted bleakness of the civil rights cause.

Why then, does all this effort rouse only a stale approbation? Because here, though it must be better to learn and change and rebel against injustice, it sounds worse. This is a prose propelled only by time, by one year's following another, except in Childhood where feeling leaps on top of time and generates a book—in the first part of a nonbook. In this sense, the composition is involuntary: words well up in some deep regressive alliance with the past, and quite fail the present. A transition from the vivid to the trite occurs, which is perhaps like everyone's transition from child to adult, or from innocence to common knowledge. Here it seems also a transition from black to white. What words, after all, do education in a white culture and commitment to a social cause, put into the mouth? Only literary clichés and militant jargon. Observation becomes facile and depthless. The child's baptism was a baptism—the overdressed ladies on the bank, the blasphemous mooing of cows, wet muck in the hair and eyes and ears. "This shit means I've been washed clean of all my sins!" But the adult loss of faith is banal—genuine in life, one supposes, but now almost embarrassing. In the language of The Movement, real regret ("Now look what Wilbert done done to her") becomes mechanical:

> killings, beatings and abuses > killings, beatings, and intimidations > whites killing, beating, and misusing Negroes

If the offense had not become rote, the least of them would not be, repeatedly, the last. A black boy on the street, explaining why Emmet Till dared to whistle at a white woman, immortalizes the freedom of the North:

> That boy was from Chicago, shit, everybody fuck everybody up there.

Anne Moody, CORE organizer, attempts to describe the spirit of support:

> Their interest, courage, and concern gave all of us that extra lift we needed.

But it is impossible to keep these interested, courageous and concerned people straight. Doris and Dave and George and Joan, black and white, run into one another and the gray Movement. The accidental revelation is one of the impersonality, the perhaps necessary frigidity of political and social convictions. The Movement breeds an alienation from the people for whom it moves, an exasperation with their humility, their fear, their swarming shameless need—in fact, with their Toosweet-ness. Anne Moody's championship of the blacks is brave and right, but in its course the blacks themselves slip out of her embrace.

Making It as a Poet

THE GLASS HOUSE: The Life of Theodore Roethke. By Allan Seager. McGraw-Hill Book Co. 301 pp. $7.95.

SELECTED LETTERS OF THEODORE ROETHKE. Edited with an introduction by Ralph J. Mills, Jr. University of Washington Press. 295 pp. $6.95.

SHERMAN PAUL

Mr. Paul teaches English at the University of Iowa. His latest book is The Music of Survival: A Biography of a Poem by William Carlos Williams (University of Illinois Press).

"A 'pot' in Americanese," Theodore Roethke explained to an English woman, "is a low, clownish, objectionable fellow; he is a worm, a louse, a 'gloob.'" By his own frequent admission, Roethke was a "pot"—a roaring, ineradicably provincial boy from Saginaw, Mich.; an innocent abroad; an embarrassing correspondent filling letters with "self-pity and various howls" and "I-love-me items."

An earlier reviewer found his letters dull, but they are not so much dull as potty; and if, as letters, they are seldom comparable to those of Hart Crane, another provincial, still they are valuable and interesting as one of the genuine sources of information and insight about a remarkable and in some ways representative contemporary poet. Inevitably, the letters record an education, in Roethke's case a maturation—obliquely, however, at a distinct remove from the mind that made the poems. The letters, even those exhibiting Roethke's manic or depressed states, are not themselves tortured, as the poems are. From them one can only guess the struggle by which the worm (to appropriate an applicable phrase of Emerson's) mounted through the spires of form.

Another or fuller selection of letters would not, I suspect, appreciably alter this. Mr. Mills limited his selections to those letters illustrating Roethke's career as a poet and teacher; the letters begin at age 23, and there are none to Roethke's mother, sister or wife.

But Mr. Seager, a fellow writer and friend of Roethke, who had access to the poet's papers, does not do much more in his biography than a reader of Roethke's poems might do with the available letters. I have been told that the biography was completed at the time of Mr. Seager's death, but it is more agreeable to think that such a competent writer had sketched in only the scenario of the life. The "glass house," his father's greenhouse, Roethke says, is "my symbol for the whole of life." But Seager's book, either for reasons of tact or inadequacy of imagination, gives only a small part of it. This is regrettable because as a biographer Seager's opportunity for presenting Roethke was greater than Mills's.

In a biography of a poet, the most serious flaw is a lack of connection between the poet's life and art—a connection which might have been made if the biographer had been saturated in Roethke's poems. Another flaw is underfurnishing, for biography intersects history and should reconstitute the times in order to re-create the life. Roethke's life seems thin not only because the resources of his background were thin—his cultural, social and political intelligence was underdeveloped—but because Seager does not give us the milieu

"UNIMPEACHABLY THE BEST PICTURE I'VE SEEN IN YEARS!" —Rex Reed, (Women's Wear Daily)

Palomar Pictures International presents an Associates and Aldrich Production.

"The Killing of Sister George"

FROM CINERAMA RELEASING CORPORATION

Metrocolor® Ⓧ PERSONS UNDER 18 NOT ADMITTED

ON THE WEST SIDE
ORLEANS
in the new Broadway Triplex Theatres
47th St. bet. Broadway & 8th Ave., 757-3503

ON THE EAST SIDE
BEEKMAN
65th St. at 2nd Ave • RE 7-2622

GARAGE

The roof's so full of holes
Constellations creep down the walls
Across the floor where Henry Ford's
Black blood and the stifled groans
Of dinosaurs seep back into the earth.
Silence hangs from a rusty nail,
Peeps from the vacant eye
Of the swallow's nest in the rafters,
From the mute webs of spiders
And the beetle's husk.

Listening to the dumb mouths of jars
I hear of wheels spun off
To the junkyard, spokes sprung out
Like zodiacs, houses of fortune full
Of mice, a legacy bequeathed the moon,
Ruled by the nettle, fleabane, thistle,
Conjunctions of torn upholstery
And weeping headlights,
Gauge on empty, clock on twelve,
Throttle stuck wide open.

HENRY CARLILE

that actually stimulated and nurtured him. Roethke's poetic career is not related to the movement of poetry and criticism through which it passed, nor does Seager do much more than name those poets and critics, like Rolfe Humphries, Stanley Kunitz, Louise Bogan, Kenneth Burke, William Carlos Williams, Dylan Thomas and René Char, upon whom, in various ways, he so heavily depended. The critical reception of Roethke's books interests him more than the forces within and without that enabled Roethke, time after time, to go beyond his past performances. Certainly, a variety of forces and not only his breakdowns are responsible for his poetic progress. One discovers this (in both the letters and the biography) in the radical departure of The Lost Son and Other Poems from his first book of poems. Here was a sudden growth to which many things contributed, among them the liberating and confirming atmosphere of Bennington College, where Roethke taught from 1943 to 1946, the friendship of Kenneth Burke, his most responsive and probing critic and one of his "papas," and the encouragement and criticism of William Carlos Williams, his papa among the poets.

Seager might have dug up the review of the poet's performance at the Circle in the Square Theatre (Roethke was a great performer) or included Roethke's remark on his mother's death: "It ain't fashionable, but I miss her." There might have been more discussion of Roethke's interest in children's books and his intense conflict with what, in an early uncollected poem, he called the "corruptive machine of lust," or of his struggle to rise out of the writhing forms of his secret life. This is an obsessive theme closely related to another equally obsessive theme, that (to use a phrase he noted in a poem by John Malcolm Brinnin) of "god-father."

An intimate knowledge of all of Roethke's poetry is needed in order to appreciate the achieved reconciliation of these themes in "The Rose" of "North American Sequence," or to appreciate their reconciliation in his life. The letters (the most important source of Seager's biography) reveal the loosening, yielding, loving, and accepting of the last years, as well as Roethke's new concern with "final terms" and his determination to "learn to whistle in any dark." Assuredly, this is the golden thread of Roethke's life.

What is prominent in the biography and in this selection of letters is his "making it," the account of the success and reputation poetry finally brought a poet who was always eager for approval, adulation and reward. This might be called the grubby underside of poetry and, in Roethke's case, it is part of the life of a poet who earned his livelihood in the university. Roethke was a great teacher of poetry ("As a teacher," he says, "I have taught what I learned as a writer"), but he was also something of an academic careerist always in search of a better position, more prestige and higher pay. His insecurity is understandable: he began his career in the depression years of the thirties when the tenure of poets was doubly uncertain. He had been let go at Michigan State College for no other reason than the inconvenience (and genteel fear) of mental breakdown and, much later, at the University of Washington, he had to be defended against a state legislator who considered him "some kind of nut." Seager includes the university's cold letter of dismissal, and the defense of the role of the poet in the university written by Robert Heilman, whose unusual understanding and courage he praises. Seager most closely identifies with Roethke, the writer in the university who, like himself, suffered and weathered academic life, and seems to enjoy scoring the university, or rather, in Roethke's words, "the administrative bastards." At 28, Roethke knew that "place does have a lot to do with productivity"—and he moved around in search of it. And he knew—poets take warning!—that "lyric ardor/Chills in the cool of the academy shadow."

Nation Book Marks

SARA BLACKBURN

THE BEATLES. By Hunter Davies. McGraw-Hill Book Co. 357 pp. $6.95.

It's fitting that this book should appear at a time when it is becoming increasingly fashionable to put down the Beatles for their own apparent put-down (in Revolution and elsewhere) of political commitment. John Lennon seemed to have anticipated the trend when he told Mr. Davies: "People think the Beatles know what's going on. We don't. We're just doing it. People want to know what the inner meaning of Mr. Kite was. There wasn't any. I just did it. I shoved a lot of words together then shoved some noise on. I just did it. I didn't dig that song when I wrote it. I didn't believe in it when I was doing it. But nobody will believe it. They don't want to. They want it to be important."

The most interesting sections of Mr. Davies' affectionate but not uncritical "authorized" biography are the early ones, about who John, Paul, George, Ringo and their families were before the Beatles existed. Whether he intended it or not (he probably did, for he is very skillful), the author's wonderfully acute picture of their post-Beatlemania lives makes it clear that it's more sad than beautiful to become rich, famous and worshiped before you are 30.

AMERICA THE BEAUTIFUL: A Modern Guide to Sex, Security and the Soft Buck. Edited by Joel Lieber. David White Co. 207 pp. $5.95.

This collection of pieces about the various deplorable ways in which America buys security these days—from Barbie dolls to honeymoon packages and cemetery plots—has an odd cumulative effect: it shows the extent to which anger has been diluted into professional irony, and that witty articles about such horrors have become almost an appendage to the horror itself. (What is Leo Litwak's touching pro-Esalen piece doing in a book which means to attack "exploiting insecurity"?) Tom Wolfe on Las Vegas and Calvin Trillin's dead-pan charting of some days in the life of a Dow campus recruiter are particularly good but, with the exception of Richard M. Elman's piece on Southern California, I miss what I can't remember so consciously missing before: a sense of outrage.

A MOMENT IN CAMELOT. By Maggie Rennart. Bernard Geis Associ- ates. 713 pp. $8.95.

Miss Rennart's very long novel is a commendably high-level soap opera about social and political life in Washington during the Kennedy years, heavy with the aura of inside information. President Girard and his beautiful wife, Andrea, are troubled by serious domestic problems, but they are very graceful about solving them. Their story alternates with that of another, more typical, Washington couple—a computerlike State Department type and his wife, a sexy art critic—whose marital problems are more flamboyant. There are a lot of parties, Senators both lecherous and wise, and witty newspaper reporters. The political sections—a small Cuban crisis and a long Southern civil rights section starring the maid of the art critic—is pretty noble and awful stuff, but this could be a good gift for someone who has been disabled by a nonpainful illness.

A USELESS DAY. By Janine Brégeon. Translated from the French by Bernard Frechtman. Grove Press. 90 pp. $3.50.

A 25-year-old French housewife and mother decides one morning that it's not worth getting up and, in the monologue that follows, almost convinces us that she's right: the pointlessness and sheer predictability of her life have marooned her somewhere between rage and despair and, although she finally becomes a bit hopeful about expanding her relationships with her husband and children, at the end of the book one is tempted to urge her back into bed again. Despite its unfortunate resemblance to fictionalized Betty Friedan, Mlle. Brégeon's portrait of a certain kind of middle-class emptiness—and its consequent threat to sanity—is powerful and sympathetic.

FILMS

HAROLD CLURMAN

Two well-known English plays, Harold Pinter's The Birthday Party and Frank Marcus' The Killing of Sister George, have been turned into films. The first has been transposed by its original author, the second by Lukas Heller. Both have been directed by Americans: the Pinter by William Friedkin, the Marcus-Heller by Richard Aldrich.

The original material in both cases would appear to be uncinematic. Still the first retains its basic fascination and is altogether superior to the second, though the latter will almost certainly prove more successful at the box office.

The Birthday Party, archetypically commonplace in its details, is in effect a fantasia of fear and persecution. Not only is Stanley, its central figure, a failed pianist gone to seed, hiding from the world and haunted by fear; but so are his persecutors. Even the dull "landscape" outside the tatty little seaside boarding house where Stanley has sequestered himself has the look of a town stricken by some nameless ailment. The buildings are haggard, the sea seems dead, the streets are inert, the beach chairs ghostly. They are all dyed with the hue of mortality.

Both in their 60s, Peter and his wife, who own the lodgings, are drab and depressed; the man, a lowly worker, is honestly, forbearingly, resignedly squelched; the woman, chirpingly and childishly so. She is too dimwitted to fear anything except perhaps the grim reaper himself: she lives in a cozy vacuum of inanity in which only remnants of kindly and uncomprehending womanhood still reside.

Stanley is in terror of those who ruined his career, "carved him up," and ultimately of being taken away by them, removed. When two strangers, Goldberg and McCann, come on the scene, Nemesis (or "Society") enters. Of the two, McCann, the muscle man, is a moron, in shivering awe of his superior, Goldberg. Goldberg is all glib good humor, schmaltzy sentiment, fierce will, gifted with an armory of clichés. He too is mad: his affable sang-froid, his fake ease collapse now and then into insane rage at a reminder by his inferior of antecedents for whom he harbors a muddled nostalgia. He is also idiotically hypochondriac.

The two men's toying and teasing and their bewildering demands on Stanley to justify his existence—addressed in a battery of questions composed of everything from stupid quiz posers to metaphysical and scientific conundrums—reduce Stanley to speechless impotence. The inquisitors haul him off a helpless victim. Where he is taken—to a sanitarium, a madhouse, a gang boss or a prison—does not matter: it signifies his doom. No one is strong enough to protest; most are too dumb to understand.

Pinter's ear is so keen, his method so economic and so shrewdly stylized, balancing humdrum realistic notations with suggestions of unfathomable violence, that his play succeeds in being both funny and horrific. He is aided in this by Friedkin's direction. It is comprised of excellent camera work, the subtle use of color and environmental authenticity, the elimination of all sound except for the dialogue, and above all by the acting.

The cast is truly remarkable. Sydney Tafler's trim and powerful physique acts: it stands for "solid respectability." His unctuous bonhomie, his treacherously winning smoothness which spills out in a delightful Anglo-Yiddish accent (without caricature), his latent savagery constitute an unforgettable portrait. Very nearly on the same level, though in a less complex part, is Patrick Magee as McCann.

Anguished by his own brainlessness, murderously protective of his private insanities and something of a sleepwalker in his own and his victim's nightmares, he too creates a memorable impression. Robert Shaw's Stanley, though rather too robust to appear utterly consumed by despair and somewhat more acid than the character as written, conveys the feeling of a tormented person who might once have become a whole man. Dandy Nichols' housekeeper is almost too absolute in her low-grade innocence and mental deficiency. She achieves tenderness not through sentiment but through her total unawareness of practically everything except the presence of

KNOW CANADA BETTER!

See world affairs from a different perspective!

Read CANADIAN DIMENSION

Independent, lively, and original.
Canada's leading forum for radical thought.

[illegible] for eight large issues

Write to:

CANADIAN DIMENSION
P.O. Box 1413
Winnipeg 1, Manitoba, Canada

The Best Way
To Get
THE NATION

THE NATION 1-6-69
[illegible] Ave., New York [illegible]

☐ One Year, $10

☐ Two Years, $18

☐ [illegible] Months, $6

☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed

(Add $1 per year postage for Canada; [illegible] foreign)

Name ....

Address ....

City ....

State .... Zip No. ....

EDUCATIONAL

GRADUATE STUDIES IN HISTORY
SIR GEORGE WILLIAMS UNIVERSITY
MONTREAL, QUEBEC, CANADA

"The liveliest most subversive university on the continent." Time (Canada), November 8, 1968.

The Sir George Williams department of history offers programs leading to the M.A. and Ph.D. degrees. Student programs are keyed to individual needs with a minimum of bureaucratic specifications Thus, both thesis and course work options are available for the M.A. degree, and the Ph.D. is largely a tutorial program.

Probable graduate seminars for 1969-70, include: Roots of European Imperialism, Comparative European Revolutions, Metropolitanism in Nineteenth Century Canada, Traditionalism and Nationalism in South Asia, The Chinese Revolution, The African in the Americas, Social and Intellectual History of the U.S. in the Nineteenth Century and African Resistance to Colonialism.

Several assistantships at $2,400 will be awarded. Inquiries are invited: Graduate Advisor, Department of History, Sir George Williams University, Montreal 25, Quebec.

QUAKER STUDY CENTER—Suburban Philadelphia. Special program for study in social change, non-violence and radical living. Also year's seminar on man's search for meaning, confirmation and dialogue. Write: L. W. Lewis, Pendle Hill, Wallingford, Pa. 19086.

RECORDS

FREE 40 PAGE CATALOG offers hundreds of recordings of rare Renaissance, Baroque and Classical music. Some records priced as low as $1.00 each! All late recordings in stereo only. MHS RECORDS, Box 932 NA, New York, N. Y. 10023.

WORKERS WANTED

PHYSICIAN, PHARMACIST, Spanish-speaking [illegible] wanted: 1 year old rural California medical clinic with 6,000 patients, mostly Mexican-American, Okie and Filipino farm laborers, needs professionals with energy and interest in community medicine. Should be interested in helping train community people—in medical-legal test cases, in group therapy and education programs, in helping build community medicine residency with university hospital. No government fund involved. Two year commitment asked. Should be eligible for COs after 2/1/69. Low wages. Write or visit: David Brooks, M.D., Salud, Woodville, Calif. 93257.

Advertising Rates

Classified: 74c a line (6 words) 3 line min.
Classified Display: $7.42 per inch (min.)
THE NATION, 333 Sixth Ave., N.Y. 10014
[illegible]

Stanley, the scratchy cub in her care.

This then is as fine a film version of the play as I can imagine. Yet I felt something lacking, despite the fact that it is better acted and directed than were either of the two stage productions I had seen. At first, I thought my slight demur had something to do with cuts Pinter had made in the text (for example, Stanley's peculiar proposal of "elopement" with Lulu the neighborhood cutie, as well as the indication that in the blindman's-buff scene at the party Stanley had begun to strangle her) but on afterthought I have come to suspect that there is something in the play's essential nature which makes it truer to itself on the stage than it can be in even so excellent a film.

On the screen The Birthday Party becomes a suspense and horror story—albeit a very special one—with such cinematic tricks as the sudden switch to sputtering black-and-white flashes—wiping out all color; on the stage The Birthday Party, less obviously ominous, is an inescapably living experience, life itself!

And this for a paradoxical reason: film by its very quiddity is always more specific, more "realistic" than the stage: the camera reveals everything. By its very unmistakable "thereness" the film dispels some of The Birthday Party's allusiveness and "make-believe." On screen we behold mystery concretely; on stage it exists covertly, phantomlike, in the manner of a memory which tinctures a whole episode or period of our lives with its own supra-sensible aura. That is why I sometimes wish that film makers would cease adapting plays and novels and conceive their work directly.

The Killing of Sister George may attract many people by its boldness. What was once a skillful comedy skating between mockery of television sweetness and bitchy humor in regard to female homosexuality has been converted in the film into "the shocking drama of a love triangle involving three women"—in other words, an explicit exploitation of its Lesbian aspect.

The word itself was never pronounced in the play; in the film the young girl says to her jealous mate: "Not every woman in the world is a Lesbian," to which the reply is, "I am aware of that unfortunate fact." Common obscenities are delivered full blast, and there is a lengthy and minute sequence of an all-female seduction. For some this may betoken "liberation" and may thus be presumed to mark progress.

The Killing of Sister George is nevertheless a bad picture. The fun poked at television is dissipated in extended banality and the love affair is basically uninteresting because we don't give a hoot for any of the ladies engaged in it: their "psychology" neatly limned in the play becomes falsely pathetic, a mere pretense of sympathy through its frankness. The play's superficiality was one of its assets. The spurious seriousness of the picture spoils the comedy, while its brave assault on convention is little but hollow show.

SMALL AS A FIST

My dead problems
Already have their epitaphs:
Giant agonies—now pygmy dust.

My living problems
Small as a fist
Beat me
Beat me to death.

RYAH TUMARKIN GOODMAN

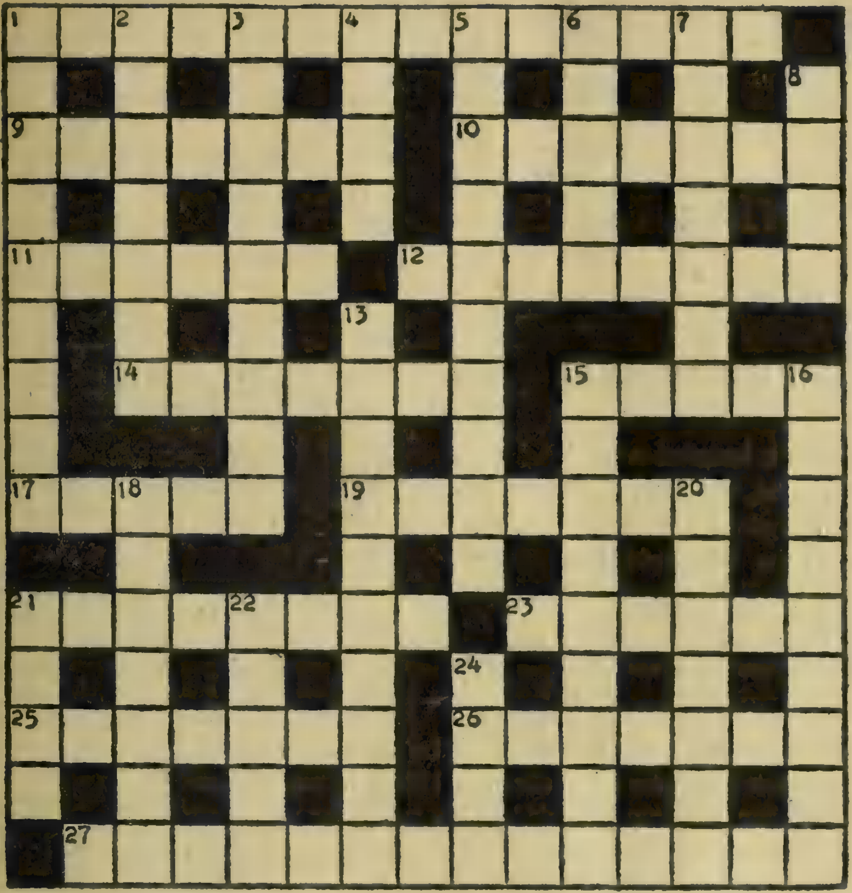
Take for example the ending. "George," the discarded television actress who for years has played the role of a sort of mother figure in a suburban English community, is offered a job as the "voice-over" for a cow in an animated film. She is insulted and at first scorns the very idea. But like the inveterate ham she is—she has to act—the lady begins to rehearse a dolorous "moo!" In the play—which has only one setting and only four characters—she sits alone in her room shortly after she has been abandoned by her girl friend (gone off with the T.V. program supervisor, a discreet Lesbian of resolutely correct bearing), and with tears in her eyes bellows the bovine cry. In the film she returns to the empty studio stage, proceeds to wreck it and by the time she gets to the "moo" we have nearly forgotten its motivation. Both humor and pathos have been vitiated.

Beryl Reid, an admirably resourceful comedienne of considerable dramatic power, plays her part exactly as she did in the play. This means that she is too vehement in relation to the camera close-ups; she seems to be overacting to the detriment of both comedy and drama. Susannah York as "George's" girl friend—the best drawn character in the play—makes a valiant stab at her part but is congenitally unable to convey mental incapacity or moral depravity. Carol Browne is at her best in the sexual encounter with the younger woman but she has been so directed as to deprive the role of the least hint of comedy—which was originally its chief attribute. For some reason, every face in the film looks as if it had been polished with glycerine. The music in the somber moments is not only trite but absurd.

The groundlings of every stripe will enjoy the sight of the real Gateways Club of London—a Lesbian dive in full swing.

Crossword Puzzle No. 1279

FRANK W. LEWIS



ACROSS

1 Forbid fraternization with those of a well-known profession? (3,11)
9 and 12 One who receives in the spirit of the novel. (7,2,3,3)
10 The walrus said we need a loaf of bread so! (7)
11 and 23 Certainly not a hip composition for four, for example. (6,6)
12 See 9 across
14 An impediment to speech, perhaps. (7)
15 Our revels now are in the Tempest. (5)
17 and 21 down Implying the future with one who is in debt, but isn't in deep so much. (9)
19 Rather close to quick, but non-living. (7)
21 Pass for what sounds like an obvious pain. (8)
23 See 11 across
25 It's lace, but the sort that stretches. (7)
26 Proceed to show how one is called back and ravaged. (7)
27 Sometimes criticized as [illegible] modern fault of letters? (14)

DOWN

1 Spots? They might be in back of the 9. (9)
2 With a photo finish, one might do it to soak the head, and get a pained expression afterwards. (7)
3 Turn the ship clear round! (9)
4 Monster of mixed blood? (4)
5 In a nice way, a certain amount of speed to burn (10)
6 Only half how Samson smote! (5)
7 Put forward. (7)
8 Force feed, by the sound of it, in [illegible] vulgar sense. (4)
13 What one does at the complaint counter might be part of the game. (5,5)
15 Urge as a charge for a second! (9)
16 They leave their side of the tree bursting out in dress design. (9)
18 A short way to violence, if one is mean! (7)
20 It sounds as though it should be somewhat wider than an L-bracket, as [illegible] good way to hold something. (7)
21 See 17 across
22 Object to the family, if representative. (5)
24 Military overhead of France? (4)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1278

ACROSS: 1 Fly-by-night; 6 Etch; 10 Enlaced; 12 Costumes; 13 Alike; 15 Asset; 17 Imbroglio; 19 Displayed; 21 Sting; 23 Relic; 24 Thespian; 27 Absolve; 28 Italian; 29 Hoax; 30 Binghamton. DOWN: 1 and 11 Free as a bird; 2 Yellows; 3 Yacht; 4 Indemnity; 5 Heats; 7 Trivial; 8 Hodgepodge; 9 Catalogs; 14 Balderdash; 16 Toll call; 18 Badgering; 20 Silesia; 22 Imagist; 24 Trevi; 25 Plaza; 26 Anon.

PUBLICATIONS

WORLD DEMOCRACY: By Bin Dir Woor. Self-Designated Symbolical World President. Unique. Entrancing. $2. Greenwich Book Publishers, 282 7th Avenue, New York City. Bin Dir Woor calls on all kings, queens, and dictators to consider abdication in such a way [illegible] to promote Democracy.

BOOKS LOCATED on any subject. Extensive Search Service. Satisfaction guaranteed. Hoffman Research Service, 124-N Whitmere Road, Irwin, Pa. 15642.

PAPERBACK PICK-NIC! You're invited! Free lists used bargains. Hard backs too. Harco, [illegible] 52-NA, Carmel, Indiana 46032.

OVER 2,000,000 Back Date Magazines! Reasonable prices. Fast service. Send needs. MIDTOWN, Box 917-N, Maywood, N.J. 07607.

'THE PRESS AND THE BAY OF PIGS'

A detailed study by

Victor Bernstein and Jesse Gordon

The role played by The Nation in breaking the Bay of Pigs story to the American public, reprinted from the Fall issue of Columbia University Forum.

Single copies—15c; 25 copies at 10c each
Orders over 25 at 7c per copy

THE NATION

333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014

PERSONALS

HIGHLY educated, interesting, do-gooder wants to meet female. Write Mr. L., 522 Van Duzer, Staten Island, New York 10301

BIRTHCHART/HOROSCOPE computed and drafted for reference and display 9½ x 11. Send $5.00, date, time and place of birth. INPROMA, Box 224, Lake View, N. Y. 14085.

MAN CANNOT LIVE BY BREAD ALONE. He also needs love. Support free birth control everywhere. Box 4069, Grand Central Sta., New York City 10017.

MEET YOUR IDEAL MATE. Computerized Dating Service (All Ages). "Let TEAM Make You [illegible] Team". For FREE questionnaire write: TEAM Project, 245 E. 30th St., New York, N.Y. 10016

PARTICIPATE in [illegible] intriguing nationwide dating project for alert, literate, Jewish singles. For FREE literature write, giving age, to: OPERATION MAZEL TOV, 550 Fifth Avenue, N.Y.C. 10036.

MANUSCRIPT IN TROUBLE? Skilled editor, published writer, aids authors in revising manuscripts. (In French and English.) Box #619, c/o The Nation.

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, ALgonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

BUY YOUR BOOKS through The Nation

Printed by Milford Publishing Inc., Milford, Conn.

‘History will absolve me.’

With these words, a young lawyer closed his self-defense.

The scene: a secret trial in a hospital-turned-courtroom in Santiago de Cuba, October, 1953. The charge: insurrection against the state—the July 26th attack on the Moncada Barracks. The young lawyer: Dr. Fidel Castro, son of a prosperous sugar planter, Congressional candidate in the 1952 elections and leader of the Moncada attack.

What was the thinking of the man who commanded the July 26th attack, initiating the movement which led Cuba to freedom in 1959? In his passionate five-hour speech, defending not only himself but his comrades who were captured, tortured and murdered by the regime, Fidel Castro denounced the tyranny and unconstitutionality of the Batista dictatorship, the complicity of the oligarchy, and the cowardliness of the courts. He outlined a program of social reform which was later implemented and developed by the revolutionary government. And he presented a legal case for the rights of a people to take arms against an illegitimate government.

We will send you an annotated copy of this important historical document if you enter a new one-year subscription to The NATION. Join us now.

THE NATION 333 Sixth Avenue New York, N.Y. 10014

☐ I'll join you for 1 year (48 issues). I enclose $10 and understand you'll send me free History Will Absolve Me by Fidel Castro.

☐ I'll try you for 6 months (24 issues). Enclosed is $6.

(Add $1 per year postage for Canada and Mexico; $2 other foreign)

Name ....

Street ....

City .... State .... Zip ....

N1-6

The good fight is now in THE NATION —Why not join now?

THE
NATION

JANUARY 13, 1969 35 cents

5-69R PL-5337
BURLINGAME PUBLIC
LIBRARY
BURLINGAME CA 94010

BURLINGAME
JAN 11 1969
LIBRARY

The Wasted Years
LOOKING BACK AT JOHNSON
ROBERT G. SHERRILL

San Francisco State
Urban Campus Prototype
MERVIN B. FREEDMAN

LABOR & STATE: MARRIAGE of CONVENIENCE
Latin America HENRY W. BERGER Africa STANLEY MEISLER

Life and Death in Dixie
Biafra, U.S.A. R. M. ELMAN
Model-City Murder CHARLES SHAPIRO

Paris: The Unexpected Revolution JEFFRY J. KAPLOW

LETTERS

the flexible ape

Boston, Mass.
DEAR SIRS: Ronald Sampson ["The Bramble of Power," The Nation, Dec. 16, 1968] appears to me to be another 19-century Englishman, focused on the rear-view mirror. He talks at length of man's lust for power, but never defines the term. I am not asking for didactic definitions à la Webster but dynamic ones which show how the substance of the idea works. . . .

Neither fear nor appetite need be the only recognizable motivators for man. Give him a complex organism that responds to him and he will turn on with delight; let it try to lead him against his will or moral sense and. . . he will thereupon defeat the system, since he is a far greater master of flexibility than any system I can imagine.

Avery Johnson

draft reform

Watertown, N. Y.
DEAR SIRS: At its recent annual meeting, the New York State Conference of the United Church of Christ, while recognizing that the best way to deal with the draft is to abolish it, yet recognizing that it does exist, made the following recommendations for reform:

Lower the maximum age for draft board members from the present 75 years to 65; include selective conscientious objection as a valid position; drop induction as punishment for conduct which Selective Service frowns on; bar all military personnel from the staffs of Selective Service; limit draft board members' term of office to four years instead of the present twenty-five; make local and appeal boards and staffs personnel representative of the racial make-up of the area served; allow draftees one lawyer and up to five witnesses in local and appeal board hearings; select entirely by lottery with educational and occupational deferments dropped; drop exemption for clergy and ministerial students; exempt all men over 25, and eliminate the card-carrying requirement.

Graham R. Hodges, Chairman
Social Action Committee

Muenchausen

Munich, West Germany
DEAR SIRS: As a man who has lived in America and who likes the American people, having found in them a great deal of intelligence and practical sense, I am disgusted by the propaganda directed against America and the Americans in German newspapers, periodicals, TV and radio.

All these mass media are now spreading about you Americans the gross and implausible lie, supported by obviously phony photographs, that your government spends money, and even a great deal of it, on a so-called space program. The latest news in our mass media amounts to no less than the allegation that your government has sent three American citizens in a rocket around the moon.

Most people seem to believe this nonsense, since they don't know the American people as I do. They are inclined to believe that the Americans are imbeciles who spend billions of dollars which are needed for decent housing, schools and hospitals, on a perfectly useless craze.

If I were an American citizen, I would respectfully, but very firmly, ask my great, wise and beloved President to take most severe steps against the spreading of such damaging rumors. It is necessary to inform your President of this space propaganda in German mass media, because American mass media certainly cannot have spread such rumors.

Hans Popper

EDITORIALS

Myths in the Middle East

The Israeli reprisal action at the Beirut airport was indefensible and should be condemned. So too were the earlier hijacking of an Israeli airliner and the shooting up of an El Al jetliner in the Athens airport, and the Arab states should not be permitted to escape responsibility for guerrilla activities which they in fact encourage. Of course the Israeli reprisal constitutes "overreaction"; but as the Israelis see it, their counteractions must be massive to be effective. Self-righteous condemnation of violence and counterviolence in the Middle East will have little effect; what is needed is a serious effort by the UN to carry into effect the resolution adopted by the Security Council on November 22, 1967, which won the approval of both the United States and the Soviet Union. The resolution provides today, as it did when it was adopted, the basis for a settlement between Israel and the Arab states.

The question is, why has the UN been unable to secure acceptance of the resolution by the belligerent states? Part of the answer may be found in an article in the January issue of The Atlantic by Charles Yost, which was written before he was named our new Ambassador to the UN. As Mr. Yost sees it, both sides are the victims of myths which prevent them from understanding where their real interests lie. The basic Israeli myth is that "strategic" boundaries and military strength can provide, to a nation of less than 3 million people confronted by twenty times that many adversaries, more permanent security than could an agreed settlement and international guarantees. A related myth is that massive retaliation by Israel will stop Arab raids. The basic Arab myth is simply that Israel is illegitimate and must be destroyed. (Other, less hypnotic, myths are mentioned in the article.)

As long as these illusions continue to exercise their despotic sway, it will be extremely difficult to get the parties to see that their real differences could be settled, with a little ingenuity, within the framework of the Security Council resolution. When an Israeli moderate talks sense, he is promptly undercut by a hyper-militant, and the Arabs point to the fate of the moderate as proof positive that they can never live at peace with Israel. And vice versa. It will not, therefore, be easy to subordinate myth to reality; the fantasies have been propagated too long and with such thoroughness that for either side to abandon those it cherishes would require, first of all, an extraordinarily courageous and far-sighted statesmanship on the part of its leaders.

As Mr. Yost notes: "Both sides are rightly circumscribed by the political consequences of the myths so long drummed into their peoples. They may not be able to recapture the necessary freedom of movement, no matter how much both common sense and national interest may counsel them to do so." He therefore believes that the initiative must come from the outside and that the natural place to look for it is at the UN. Mr. Yost demonstrates that there is no inherent clash of vital interests between Russia and the United States in the Middle East; the belief that one exists merely demonstrates that the two great powers, like the belligerents, are more swayed by myths than realities.

A final myth noted by Mr. Yost is that time works for peace in the Middle East; it does not. (See "Once More, With Blood" by Anne Tuckerman, The Nation, April 8.) The Security Council resolution has been permitted to languish much too long. If it is not implemented now, it will doubtless signal another round of mounting violence which, if it comes, will merely set the stage for more of the same. At such a juncture, it is some satisfaction to know that the country will be represented at the UN by a spokesman of Mr. Yost's experience, good judgment and clear understanding.

The Moon Will Wait

From a technological viewpoint, and in a sense from a human viewpoint, the Apollo 8 flight was a triumph on a scale without precedent. Only an engineer with some background in astronautics could fully appreciate the precision with which it was done and the risks that were faced and circumvented. Perhaps the tensest moments of all were at the very end, when the capsule had to re-enter through that 2-degree arc, with a quick fiery death awaiting the men if the angle was a little too steep, and a slow death by asphyxiation if it was a little too shallow.

Yes, a triumph, but not a time for euphoria. The moon landing for which NASA is now preparing (and in even greater haste because Apollo 8 was so successful) is far more hazardous. Why all the rush? It is not clear whether we are racing the Soviets or only ourselves. If the Russians still intend to compete—and if Apollo 11, scheduled for next summer, should end with the American contenders stranded on the moon—we might lose not only the crew but the race.

The project entails risks in any event, but these might be reduced if only we could relinquish our insistence on getting the men onto the great slag heap and back to earth before the end of the decade, the date which has assumed such mystic, fetishistic importance in NASA's thinking. As Apollo 11 (or possibly even Apollo 10) is now planned, everything will depend on the precise functioning of the lunar module in which the two men will ride from the mother ship to the moon and back. It must detach flawlessly, land at the prescribed spot, take off again, and couple with the main vehicle. The module will have no backup. Nor will there be more than a partial rehearsal—maneuvers in earth orbit, as planned for Apollo 9, are not the same thing.

Would it not be possible to guide an unmanned lunar module to the desired location on the moon and let it serve as a backup in case the module in which the two astronauts descend should be disabled in landing, or the engine should fail to fire for ascent? Remote control guidance is now so accurate that the back-up, unmanned module could be brought to a landing alongside the main vehicle. Still other precautionary measures might be considered—if it all didn't have to be done before January 1, 1970.

Robert Hotz, editor in chief of Aviation Week and

IN THIS ISSUE

January 13, 1969

EDITORIALS

34

ARTICLES

38 San Francisco State:
Urban Campus Prototype
Mervin B. Freedman

42 The Wasted Years:
Looking Back at Johnson
Robert G. Sherrill

Labor & State: Marriage of Convenience

46 What's Good for Latin America Henry W. Berger
48 New Mission to Africa Stanley Meisler

49 Rules with Reasons:
The Bases of Moral Education
Richard Peters

BOOKS & THE ARTS

53 The Unexpected Revolution Jeffry J. Kaplow
54 Astride the Historical Schism Cynthia L. Adcock
55 Biafra in Dixie R. M. Elman
58 Model-City Murder Charles Shapiro
58 Man with Broom (poem) George Bowering
60 Theatre Harold Clurman
61 Films Robert Hatch
62 Self-Portrait at Thirty (poem) Philip Dow
63 Crossword Puzzle Frank W. Lewis

Publisher
[redacted] J. STORROW JR.

Associate Publisher
[redacted]

Editor
CAREY McWILLIAMS

Associate Editor
PHIL [redacted]

Executive Editor
ROBERT HATCH

Literary Editor
[redacted]

Copy Editor, MARION HESS; Poetry Editor, JOHN LOGAN; Theatre, HAROLD CLURMAN; Art, MAX KOZLOFF; Music, BENJAMIN BORETZ; Science, CARL DREHER; Advertising Manager, MARY SIMON.

Editorial Associate, ERNEST GRUENING.

Washington, ROBERT G. SHERRILL; Paris, ALEXANDER WERTH; London, RAYMOND WILLIAMS; Bonn, C. AMERY; Canberra, C. P. FITZGERALD; United Nations, [redacted] TUCKERMAN.

The Nation is published weekly (except for omission of four [redacted] issues) by the Nation Magazine Company and copyright [redacted] in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014, Tel: CH 2-8400. West Coast office (for editorial correspondence only): 825 South Barrington Avenue, Los Angeles, Calif. 90049. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. and at additional mailing office.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Add [redacted] per year postage for Canada; [redacted] for foreign.

Information to Libraries: The [redacted] Indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Book Review Index [redacted] the Public Affairs Information Service.

NATION Volume 208
No. 2

Space Technology, rejoiced before the Apollo 8 flight that "with a Soyuz and an Apollo carrying the Hammer and Sickle and the Stars and Stripes, respectively, around the moon at about the same time, it would require a phlegmatic world indeed not to get excited at these extraterrestrial Olympics." That is one way of looking at it—the red-blooded sporting instinct, coupled with billions in business for the aerospace industry. But this juvenile, brutal approach is not the one that should dominate NASA's thinking at this critical juncture.

No Bid for Shale

The Interior Department's latest effort to get somebody interested in developing the government's oil shale land seems to have gone for naught. When bids were opened on December 20 for private leasing of three tracts containing $80 million worth of oil (see The Nation, December 23), Interior officials discovered that not a single oil company had bothered to submit a bid. The only bids at all, in fact, were $499,000 for two of the tracts by a small company called The Oil Shale Corp. and $625 for one tract from a man in Eugene, Ore. An Interior official termed the bids "absurd" and "ridiculous," and on December 26 the department rejected them.

Over the years, the oil industry has steadfastly resisted development of the shale lands because it feared oil from shale might compete with and undercut the price of their well oil. Yet some observers had guessed that the industry, confronted with growing criticism of their obduracy, might join the bidding—especially since the terms devised by Stewart Udall would have allowed lessees to sit on the land for seven years without paying a cent to Washington. However, the oil companies apparently were so confident of their control over the situation that they decided it was unnecessary to show even the most meager pretense of interest. One factor supporting this attitude might be Nixon's appointment of Alaska Gov. Walter J. Hickel as Secretary of the Interior. A man who made a fortune as a real estate developer and builder, and whose state's prime source of revenue is leasing oil lands, Governor Hickel is not expected to disturb the dormant status quo of the oil shale.

California Sleigh Ride

Despite a formerly merited reputation for zealous protection of the consumer (see "Nixon vs. the Consumer," The Nation, December 2), the California Public Utilities Commission last fall allowed Pacific Telephone rate increases of $50 million, supplementing the $36 million previously sanctioned by the Federal Communications Commission. Pacific earns about 12 per cent on its common stock and will now have a rate of return higher than what it enjoyed before the state commission reduced phone rates four years ago.

Pacific says that isn't good enough; it will go back for more to the state commission, where General Telephone has a $50 million rate increase pending and Southern California Edison is asking for $60 million. Some of the gas utilities have already filed their rate-increase requests. TVA-sized Pacific Gas and Electric is waiting in the wings, even though its earnings, and those of other California utilities, are up over previous good years.

The governor appoints the five utility commissioners in California. Pat Brown named some good ones, and the decline of California's commission dates from his departure from Sacramento two years ago. Within a month of taking office, Gov. Ronald Reagan replaced two of the three commissioners who had voted to cut Pacific Telephone rates in 1964. Almost immediately, Pacific filed for an increase. Last month, Reagan got rid of the biggest burr in his blanket, Commissioner Bill Bennett, whose term expired.

So now the commission is broken for riding and the utilities are in the saddle. They, in turn, will assure the public—through customer-financed canned editorial services, speakers' bureaus, ads and retainers—that they are the biggest taxpayers around (they collect more for taxes than they turn over to government); that interest on their long-term debt is terribly high (it is increasing by only 2.5 per cent annually and the interest averages 4 per cent, which any homeowner would envy); that gas and electricity (as in Pacific Gas and Electric and San Diego Gas and Electric) are fiercely competitive components of the free enterprise way of life; and that the smart set uses the Princess and the phone extensions (which return to the phone companies ten times what they cost).

Adding the Cubit

Harry Nelson, a medical journalist, wrote a story for the December 15 Los Angeles Times that may make legal history. The subject was Ray Tanner, a 33-year-old, 6 ft., 3 in. felon convicted of criminal assault. Tanner's lawyer entered a plea of not guilty by reason of insanity, based on Tanner's abnormal chromosome count. Tanner is an XYY. Of a human being's forty-six chromosomes, two are sex-determinative. For brevity, these are designated X and Y, in desoxyribonucleic acid (DNA) terminology. A normal female is equipped with two Xs, a normal male with one X and one Y. According to a hypothesis for which apparently there is some inconclusive substantiating evidence, the possession by a man of an extra Y puts him into a category which, in prison populations (where most of the investigating has been done), is characterized by extra height and pathologically impulsive behavior.

Without going into details, Nelson says that in one case, in Australia, the defendant in a murder case was freed because he was proved to be an XYY; in France the same defense did not avail. The legal status of the XYY syndrome in the United States is still to be decided. Insanity is a legal concept, and lawyers and judges of traditional temper will probably be inclined to hold that, even though a man is an XYY and even if this subjects him to unusual stresses by reason of innate aggressiveness, he still may be able to distinguish right from wrong and so remain responsible for his actions. Or, as Dr. Erik H. Marcus, an assistant clinical professor of psychiatry at UCLA, puts it: "The concept of right and wrong is a moral consideration and moral considerations are not in our genes." Moreover, the connection between human behavior and cell genetics is in an early research stage, and decades may be required to establish firm correlations—if indeed these are found to exist.

A more activist viewpoint came out of Dallas, where the annual jamboree of the American Association for the Advancement of Science, always scheduled between Christmas and New Year's, dealt in an early session with the potentialities of genetic manipulation. Dr. Robert L. Sinsheimer, a biophysicist at the California Institute of Technology and moderator of a panel on the subject, declared the symposium was a "cosmic event"; "We can be the agent of transition to a wholly new path of evolution. . . ." To which Dr. David Daube, a professor of law at Oxford and a specialist in forensic medicine, replied: "The safest course would be to lock all of you up."

But even as he recoiled from the horrors of scientific intervention in what over the aeons has been a province of blind nature, Professor Daube assured the geneticists that he knew it would be both wrong and futile to set limits to their research. He may have remembered that not so long ago, surgery and obstetrics were denounced by the theologians as the work of the devil. While genetic manipulation does pose formidable ethical and social problems, those who set their faces flintily against it are not, as Dr. Sinsheimer pointed out, "among the losers in that chromosomal lottery that so firmly channels our destinies." He spoke not only on behalf of the 250,000 children born each year in the United States with defects that might be remedied by genetic intervention, but also for the 50 million Americans who are classified as "normal" but who must compete in the computer age with an IQ of less than 90. And perhaps also for the XYY population, if the theory concerning them should be confirmed.

Charity and Junk

In Detroit Scope Magazine (December 21), under the caption "How Prosperity Is Killing the Charity Business," Ellen Karasik describes a situation which is unfortunately not local. For many years the industrial divisions of such organizations as the Salvation Army, Goodwill Industries, Volunteers of America, and the St. Vincent De Paul Society have operated collection services which pick up discarded furniture, appliances, clothing, etc., from the more or less prosperous classes and resell them for the benefit of the poor. In many of these organizations homeless and handicapped persons are employed to repair articles that can be profitably restored to operating condition. These divisions are expected to make a profit, however marginal, and receive no funds from the United Community Service, although other divisions of the same charity may receive such help.

In the past the industrial divisions have been in the black often enough to keep going. Now, in Detroit—in a period of prosperity, and with increased calls for pick-up (8,000 a week)—the four organizations listed ran a combined 1968 deficit of more than $250,000.

There are several reasons for this depression in the midst of prosperity, causing additional suffering among those who have already suffered enough. One is that with employment at a high level, agencies unable to pay much more than the minimum wage cannot compete for drivers and other help. Thus Goodwill, with thirty-eight trucks in Detroit, seldom has more than fifteen on the road and pick-ups are delayed for two or three weeks. Goodwill also must decline to pick up major appliances—refrigerators, automatic washers, driers, etc.—because many of its employees have only one arm and cannot handle heavy items. A related difficulty is getting and keeping skilled people for repair of automated machinery, much of which, after diagnosis (itself costly), turns out to be beyond rehabilitation. Formerly, when there was a market for scrap, Goodwill could sell these materials and at least break even, but with scrap selling at $4 a ton the cost of taking broken appliances to the junkyard is greater than the proceeds.

"Aside from not having the drivers," reports Dr. John Hoskins, executive director of Goodwill, "we're picking up trash. . . . The cost for picking up the salvage is two or three times greater than what the salvage brings. . . ." This despite the fact that Goodwill uses zonal pick-up, a highly efficient computerized system which cost J. L. Hudson Co. $80,000 to engineer for itself and which it donated to Goodwill. The system was put in national operation with the help of a federal grant of $850,000. Nevertheless, Goodwill is said to be losing money, and its national board is casting about for ways to stay in business.

Of course much money would be saved if people brought their contributions to central collection depots. Both the Salvation Army and Goodwill have experimented with collection boxes at shopping centers. In the Detroit metropolitan area Goodwill has 195 such boxes. The trouble is that so many people use them as a free trash-disposal system. This is true elsewhere. In the New York metropolitan area, a box was placed in a supermarket, but so many shoppers used it for trash disposal that Goodwill finally had to abandon it.

Reunion

The Nation takes great pleasure in announcing the return of Ernest Gruening to its editorial staff. In the past managing editor and editor of the magazine, former Senator Gruening rejoins the staff with this issue as Editorial Associate. Alaska has lost a fine spokesman in Washington, and the Senate is deprived of one of its most useful and distinguished members; but The Nation has regained an old and valued colleague.

John Steinbeck

Henry George and Bret Harte were first-generation Californians, although both were born elsewhere; Frank Norris and John Steinbeck were second-generation Californians (although Norris was born in the East). The identification with California is not fortuitous; all four were profoundly influenced by their exposure—and response—to certain qualities in the state's social environment. When their inspiration was drawn directly from this environment, they were fine artists (George's Progress and Poverty is, in some respects, a work of art). But once they left California or tried to write about other scenes, they were disappointing. Norris' Blix and A Man's Woman, written while he was living in the East, hardly compare with McTeague or The Octopus. George and Harte never wrote about anything as well as they wrote about California. Norris, as many other California writers have done, misread his own experience. "Dying Fires"—a bad story—is about a California writer of talent who went East and was corrupted by the wicked Bohemian ways of New York.

John Steinbeck was a sensitive and accurate observer of two worlds: that of Salinas, "the salad bowl of America," and of Monterey, close by in terms of space but still quite another world, at least in the days of the fish canneries. His best work—Tortilla Flat, Of Mice and Men, In Dubious Battle, The Red Pony, Cannery Row and The Grapes of Wrath—stems from his intimate knowledge of these two quite diverse worlds. Little of what he wrote after The Grapes of Wrath, beginning with The Moon Is Down, measures up to his early work. East of Eden and The Wayward Bus are about California, but seen from a distance.

Steinbeck also seemed to have lost his political sense once he left California. At the outset of his career, he was actively interested in some of the social issues with which his fiction dealt. His San Francisco News series on migratory farm labor was reprinted as a pamphlet—"Their Blood Is Strong"—and used most effectively by the Simon J. Lubin Society. Later he lent his name to the Steinbeck Committee to Aid Agricultural Workers. But these interests lapsed when he moved East.

In his later years he managed to sound at times like a one-man "Voice of America," extolling American pieties and taking a hawkish position on the war in Vietnam. The difference between these two Steinbecks was that the first wrote about experiences and scenes he knew at first hand, the other did not quite know what he wanted to write about or what he wanted to say.

Appropriately enough, Steinbeck was buried in Salinas.

SAN FRANCISCO STATE

URBAN CAMPUS PROTOTYPE

MERVIN B. FREEDMAN

Mr. Freedman is the author of The College Experience, portions of which appeared in The Nation.

San Francisco

I teach at San Francisco State College. Along with several dozen faculty members and students, I stand at a fifth-floor window and watch a noontime rally of strikers and their supporters. After an hour or so of speeches, the crowd displays a certain agitation. Police begin to appear on the scene. They march and countermarch in squads and platoons. Eventually skirmishing and some open fighting develop. Several dozen strikers and bystanders are clubbed and hauled off in paddy wagons. Some policemen are injured, mostly by rocks and other missiles. The warfare lasts for about an hour. An uneasy calm then settles on the campus, and at noon the next day almost the same scene is repeated, like a regularly scheduled public spectacle. [See "San Francisco State: How to Wreck a Campus" by David Swanston, The Nation, January 8, 1968.]

As I watch these terrifying events, various images come to mind—the Hapsburgs or Romanovs looking down from the palace windows through the snows of Vienna and St. Petersburg at the cavalry clashing with students and workers. From time to time the military quality of the scene below suggests that I have assumed the vantage point of some 19th-century general, Napoleon at Austerlitz, perhaps, surveying a battle from a hill through a spyglass. Since I was raised in Ocean Hill in Brooklyn and served in World War II for three and one-half years as an enlisted man, before I was commissioned a second lieutenant, identifications with emperors and generals are not particularly congenial. The most apposite image to come to mind is Oswald Spengler's—the Roman soldier grimly going about his business (in my case teaching my classes off-campus), while his world crumbles. But I am not a very good Roman soldier, either. I have too many doubts. So I go about in a whirl, torn by contradictory impulses.

Only the theatre of the absurd can do justice to some of the scenes at ground level. I stand in a crowd of strikers who are about to hold a rally. The crowd is San Francisco—pretty blondes dressed like Sacagawea, chic black girls with natural hair, assorted Oriental and brown-skinned young people conservatively dressed, and dignified black adults, goateed black young men, bearded and long-haired white young men, clergymen with clerical collars, gray-haired white adults. I recognize some people—students, faculty members, prominent San Francisco politicians. Who are the others—strikers, supporters, onlookers, townspeople, police spies? Who knows? Suddenly a voice booms out from loud-speakers: "This is Acting President Hayakawa." He is standing on the roof of the Administration Building 100 yards away. A great chorus of boos goes up from the crowd. President Hayakawa proceeds to pontificate over the loud-speakers in donnish tones. (The remoteness of leader from public somehow reminds me of Mussolini haranguing his vassals from the balcony of the Palazzo Venezia.) Meanwhile the crowd at the strike rally takes up a chant, "Fuck Hayakawa" (although most of the older adults do not join in). The President terminates his remarks by wishing his audience a Merry Christmas. The crowd responds to this seasonal civility with hoots of derision and paroxysms of laughter. My companion throughout this scene, a young assistant professor, Yale A.B. and Stanford Ph.D., has been rendered almost catatonic. Finally he blurts out, "This is too much."

The situation of San Francisco State College baffles description and analysis. The Black Students Union and the Third World Liberation Front (composed of other minorities; for example, Orientals and Mexican-Americans) have called for a strike. Their demands, centered on more support and autonomy for black and other nonwhite students, faculty and programs, range from stipulations that most students, administrators and faculty consider reasonable to those that seem extreme and very difficult to meet—the demand, for example, that the college admit all nonwhite students who apply for the fall semester of 1969-70. Spokesmen for the Black Students Union and the Third World Liberation Front state that they will not compromise their demands. Certain activities disruptive of academic procedures have been carried out. Classrooms have been invaded, bomb threats have been phoned in, small explosive devices have been set off, fires have been started, etc. Serious injuries have been few and damage relatively slight, but it is certain that the climate is troubled and alarmed. Many classes now meet off-campus in dormitories, homes, churches and the like. A union of faculty members, an affiliate of the American Federation of Teachers, is attempting to obtain wider union support for a faculty strike. The split between faculty members and the board of trustees of the state colleges has been growing for a long time; now one of the faculty demands is that the trustees, who have been as adamant as the striking students in their refusal to negotiate, enter into discussion with strikers, both faculty and student.

At dinner parties I am harassed by the question, "What is the solution?" By now I have a reply ready. There is, I say, no solution in the present focus. The problem of San Franscisco State College is the problem of all urban campuses, and it is the basic problem of American urban society generally. Can whites, blacks, browns, reds, yellows, adults, youth, hippies, straights, revolutionaries, conservatives live together in sufficient harmony to maintain some orderly processes of society? The answer is not yet final, but the data at hand are not encouraging. Some years back I used to make predictions about complex social events, but I lack such confidence now. I offer the reader three alternatives:

(1) The disorders on campuses are but transitory phenomena which will end soon.

(2) During the next decade the San Francisco State situation will become the norm for urban college campuses and for cities generally. Disorder, explosions, fires, guerrilla warfare, strikes will be common events. At the end of this time a more just, humane and peaceable society will emerge.

(3) Out of recurrent tension and disorder will issue a Fascist state. College campuses and society generally will increasingly resemble South Africa.

San Francisco State is unique in some respects. It has suffered in recent years from an absence of leadership because of rapid turnover of presidents. The California state college bureaucracy is rigid and cumbersome. Militants in San Francisco are very militant, and conservatives in California, followers of Ronald Reagan or Max Rafferty, are very primitive. But the problems of San Francisco State are basically the problems of any urban campus, and the future of American higher education is increasingly the large, urban, commuter campus. No simple procedures are available for avoiding repetitions of the calamities at San Francisco State all over the country. The close interplay now seen in every big city between society at large and the urban campus is evident in the San Francisco State scene. The governor of California, the mayor of San Francisco, various state assemblymen and senators, clergymen, leaders of the black, Oriental and Mexican-American communities, and the San Francisco Labor Council have all entered the fight. Von Clausewitz's dictum may be applied to the student strike—it is simply a more militant form of political action.

The urban campus reflects the conflicts of urban society—nonwhite or non-Anglo militancy, alienated middle-class youth, repressive public opinion and public officials, heavy-handed police procedures, drugs, and the like. And as with society at large the system of academic government is not adequate to the task. Jeffersonian-style democracy and checks and balances cannot cope with the pace and the complexity of mass technological society. The traditional campus community also belongs to another age, the 19th century. In static times a system can carry an inadequate leader. When traditional procedures break down, the qualities of the leader assume crucial importance. The United States could accommodate Calvin Coolidge in the 1920s; Columbia University could do likewise with Nicholas Murray Butler. Such indulgences are no longer possible. The president of an urban college must grasp, make evident, and somehow cope with a bewildering variety of issues, for many or for most of which there are no precedents. He is thus sailing stormy and uncharted waters.

The president of an urban campus must attempt to fashion a viable institution out of a student body that is a very mixed bag. The interests of student groups are diverse and often conflicting—jocks versus radicals, upper-middle-class students with educational goals centered on personal development versus lower-middle-class students who are concerned with rising out of their parents' occupational status, minority groups versus more established groups, and sometimes one minority group against another. The governing of most private universities and colleges, where the student body is relatively homogeneous, is a far easier task.

The traditional concept of a campus community is based on the premise that people know one another and share many experiences and concerns. On a fragmented, urban, commuter campus this is hardly the case. The president frequently finds himself discussing an explosive issue with a group of students whom he has not met before. For all he knows, some of these young people may not be students. Should an ex-student be considered a member of the campus community? How about a resident of the local community who has never been enrolled in the college? Should the president refuse to talk to a young man or woman if it develops that he or she is an "outside agitator"?

Needless to say, public opinion is a force with which college presidents must reckon. In California Ronald Reagan, Max Rafferty, and such figures stalk the land, ever alert for signs of sexual immorality, pornography, drugs and radical or unpatriotic sentiments and behavior on campuses. Public support for their views is considerable. In the California gubernatorial election of 1966, Ronald Reagan campaigned very successfully against radicals and hippies on the Berkeley campus of the University of California. I should estimate that the citizenry of California oppose the strike at San Francisco State by a margin well above three to one. In response to this public opinion the trustees of the state college system and the regents of the university system have infringed upon certain faculty prerogatives—for example, in the Eldridge Cleaver case. In a time of George Wallaces and Max Raffertys it may seem ludicrous to suggest that college presidents must educate public officials and citizens at large on the basic issues of intellectual and academic freedom. But they must nevertheless try.

Students and trustees, legislators and public opinion are by no means the limit of the president's concern. When a campus is in turmoil one hears comparatively little about the faculty. This is a serious oversight, as any president knows. A faculty can immobilize a campus as effectively as any other group. One hundred students can bring in the police and cancel classes. Fifteen faculty members can block almost any program by talking it to death.

For the past nine months, I have been studying faculty attitudes toward student militancy and campus unrest. It may be said that faculty members are like other Americans at this time. They are somewhat demoralized, weary of conflict, and they are shifting perceptibly to the right in the face of radical challenge. Most campuses have a small group of faculty whose views resemble Hearst editorials circa 1938 and another minority which supports student dissidence. The majority of faculty members on an urban campus are liberals. Robert Kennedy and Eugene McCarthy were their candidates. They want a fast compromise solution to Vietnam. They want justice along with law and order. But at the gut level of daily action things are not so easy. Respectable professional men bristle when confronted by obscene language, outlandish dress and bad manners. Black militants may frighten them. Differences in personal style can obscure areas of agreement and avenues of potentially profitable exploration.

Faculty members are lords of small empires and masters of orderly schedules. A teacher meets classes on Monday, Wednesday and Friday, researches and writes on Tuesday and Thursday. Forty-two lectures on the United States, 1865-1914, are to be delivered in the spring semester. The symphony orchestra will give a concert on December 1, 2, 3, and the Drama Department's performance of Heartbreak House takes place on November 10 and 11. Interruptions are resented. One faculty member said to me: "If the college wants to schedule a convocation on Vietnam, let them do it nights or weekends. The convocation took two days out of my teaching. I can't afford to miss two days, considering all the material I have to cover." Roger Heyns, chancellor of the University of California at Berkeley, has made the point that the faculty presumes a college campus to be an institution that almost by definition is to be free of tension. A president must make the faculty see the unreality of such a view in these turbulent times.

The president's domestic complexities are not confined to students, faculty or academic administrators. He must give heed to campus police, secretaries, dormitory residents, business officers and other nonacademic staff. They are an important and neglected element of the community. When three black students meet, a campus police officer suspects that they are up to no good. Secretaries may quake when approached by a black man whose appearance is not respectably middle class. Hippy garb and grooming can be comparable sources of difficulty. These nonacademic contacts can contribute considerably to campus tension.

The financing of higher education for lower-class blacks and other American minority groups is receiving considerable attention at this time. An even more critical issue than finances is the question of what to do with such students once they arrive on campus. College presidents might begin to educate their constituencies concerning some of the implications of black studies. Militant blacks and their allies have thrown light on the hypocritical underpinnings of the "Land of the free and the home of the brave"—the slaughter of Indians, the unjust wars, slavery. They have helped to arrest the march of technology and scientism that a decade ago seemed destined to kill the humanistic spirit. They have greatly contributed to the realization that white, middle-class America does not necessarily walk hand in hand with God. And now they are taking on meritocracy, as exemplified by grades and degrees. They demand that colleges contribute to the development of students rather than that students be tailored to the abstract demands of professions, industry and the like.

Such fundamental issues must be explained and placed within a framework of rational discussion. It may be that the conflicts besetting the urban campus cannot be solved by reason, but the president must live by the faith that rational debate is still useful. These are revolutionary times, and most middle-aged liberals are ten or fifteen years behind the times. They would have made good college presidents in 1955. They are of the alcohol rather than the drug generation.

In order to talk to dissident students today a president must know where "they are at." He must grasp their sense of outrage and their spirit of anarchy, and recognize the grounds on which they justify confrontation and violence. He must appreciate the appeal of anti-thought. He must be able to talk to students in a language that is not dead. The manners, style and language of rebellion are powerfully evocative. The worst of sins among dissident youth is not to feel. And tired old liberal rhetoric can smother feeling like a blanket. See what it did to Hubert Humphrey's standing with radical youth.

None of this is to suggest that presidents abandon faith in democracy and the meliorative possibilities of the college. They must attempt to draw dissident students into that framework. But the tragic view is in order. They may not be successful in so influencing their students, and it may be that reform of the American system of higher education demands confrontation, that meliorative procedures will not work.

At all events the time for playing it cool is past. I suggest that presidents eschew the role of behind-the-scenes diplomat and administrator and return to the 19th-century concept of president as teacher and orator. Heaven knows, their constituencies have much to learn. They might begin by pointing out to rebellious students that while a revolution evokes an extraordinary sense of freedom and possibility, evocation of a mood is not a political end in itself. History indicates that revolutions cannot be expected to conform to plan, but some coherent vision of the post-revolutionary scene is nevertheless necessary. French students took over the Sorbonne and then did not know what to do with it. They thereby lost much support from the French citizenry. Exegesis of the true state of affairs in the governing of colleges and universities is badly needed. Abuse of the trustees is often misplaced. To be sure, trustees can wield power in tyrannical fashion. More often, however, policy is determined by the faculty. The view of Columbia University as a medieval fief ruled by President Kirk and the trustees is myopic. Rather, President Kirk and his trustees maintained a very loose hegemony over a series of duchies and baronies, the various departments, schools and colleges, most of which enjoyed considerable independence. Above all, a president must find suitable ways for students to participate in the operation of the institution. Only then will students assume true responsibility. Given the nature of campus government, which has grown by accretion, this is no easy task.

A president must hold up to his faculty and his non-academic staff the picture of rigidity and intolerance in which all of us share. The times are too perilous to afford these luxuries. This is not to suggest that faculty members should abandon standards, but some openness and humility are in order. The president might remind a faculty member who is disturbed by disruptions of his class that in five years most of his students are not likely to remember his name, much less what they learned in the laboratory of Botany 1A on April 17. Above all, a president must exhort his faculty and staff to function in their professional environment as any mature citizen must live in our turbulent society—that is, tolerating much confusion and ambiguity. The faculty can ill afford short fuses and snap judgments. Some faculty members are quick to label almost all student protest and dissent an SDS plot to revolutionize American society. Such facile judgments needlessly polarize factions.

These days the chances are that the president who abandons the role of playing it cool and stands forth to exert moral force will be punished. The president of a complex urban institution faces an almost impossible task under the best of circumstances, and statistics show that they do not last long in their jobs. Like baseball managers they come and go, but unlike baseball managers their reasons for going are rarely publicized. A president who is fired for publicly standing by principle, whose firing therefore means something, is infinitely to be preferred to the president who goes out with a whimper, because he cannot do the near impossible—that is, hold the urban campus together. Certain elements of the public may enjoy the spectacle of a Socrates receiving his just rewards. A president, however, may inspire and unite his own constituency, his students and his faculty, by a display of moral leadership, a commodity which is usually in short supply and which appears to be critically lacking in the United States at this time. Perhaps some foundation could assume the burden of aiding financially those true teachers among college presidents who lose their jobs by taking unambiguous stands on matters of intellectual and academic principle. Foundations have been known to do less rewarding things with their moneys.

THE WASTED YEARS

LOOKING BACK AT JOHNSON

ROBERT G. SHERRILL

Washington

It's easy to understand why Lyndon Johnson's favorite philosopher is Eric Hoffer, the San Francisco longshoreman; Hoffer shares the President's deep suspicion of change, of Eastern intellectuals, and of people who can't make it on their own. Yet, as is often true of primitives who wander into the company of the mighty, Hoffer gives us—inadvertently, to be sure, for he would never have applied this to his hero LBJ—the best explanation of the Johnson regime: "no matter how noble the objectives of a government, if it blurs decency and kindness, cheapens human life, and breeds ill will and suspicion—it is an evil government."

Lyndon Johnson, if we take his own word for it, had noble objectives. He wanted to save Asia's soul. It may be that he misjudged the danger and perhaps it wasn't his business to dispense salvation, but no one can seriously doubt that among Johnson's reasons for leading this nation deep into that stupid conflict was the desire to "save" a pack of stubborn Orientals from the "sin" of communism. Just so might a west Texas camp-meeting preacher have dragged his drunken brother to the mourner's bench, whether or not the muscular salvation could be made to stick. The evangelistic impulses that have shaped our foreign policies in the last five years should not be overlooked. Johnson has told more than one person—including society writer Betty Beale—that God regularly comes to him with comfort and advice every morning between 3:30 and 4:30 o'clock. At one of those prayer breakfasts that keep Washington pure in heart, Billy Graham likened Johnson to Jesus in that he had "brought a sword unto the world," and Johnson is said to have felt pretty proud of the analogy.

Domestically, Johnson's objectives—that everyone, no matter how lowly and black, should be able to aspire to become as rich and democratic as he—were no less noble, but he had a much harder time keeping his mind on them. Despite the thin splash of nobility that gilds the frame of Johnson's Administration, the picture within does all those things to decency and kindness and human life that Hoffer was talking about; never, at least in this century, has a President so thoroughly bred ill will and suspicion. As to the how and why of its failure, the usual explanation is that Johnson sank so deep into the bog of Vietnam that he accidentally lost many of the domestic rewards he had meant to give to the American people. A better explanation, however, rests more with the man than with events.

Johnson failed because essentially he is a fickle romantic (except in his own business life), a trifler (except in military matters). Much more concerned with defending his pride than with holding a people together, Johnson surrounded himself with and took advice from tired men, toadies and second-raters. On the eve of his election in 1964, Johnson said it was an achievement "that I have spent my whole life getting ready for." And indeed he had spent a lifetime aiming for the White House, but he had not spent fifteen minutes planning what he would do once he got there.

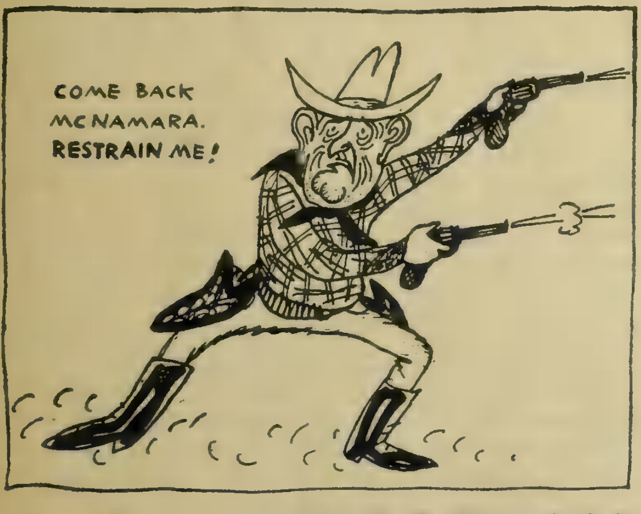
There is considerable evidence that Johnson imagined himself moving into the Presidency as a bigger-than-life Franklin Delano Roosevelt, whose name for nearly thirty years he had dropped as spoor for the Texas voters to follow. A few weeks ago David Wise wrote in The New York Times Magazine: "At the end of the day his face, creased with fatigue, is curiously Rooseveltian, not unlike the large portrait of FDR that hangs on the wall above Mr. Johnson's rocking chair. There is cruel irony in this, for although Johnson admired no man more than FDR, there is no man he more wished to surpass. The Great Society was to have soared far beyond the vision of the New Deal." How far short of that Johnson fell, both in reality and in the minds of the people, is nowhere better measured than in the changing balance of the legislature during the two administrations. In 1934 the Democrats won 332 seats in the House, against 313 in 1932—the year Roosevelt was elected—and in the Senate increased their numbers from fifty to sixty-nine, although it is rare for a party to boost its Congressional power in a non-Presidential year. In 1966, two years after Johnson's overwhelming victory in 1964, the Democrats dropped from 295 seats to 246 seats in the House, and in the Senate from sixty-eight to sixty-four.

How does one account for the contrasting response of the nation to the first halves of the two Presidents' work? By 1934, explains historian Dexter Perkins, the Roosevelt administration had "convinced a great many groups of its good will." A great many important groups were just as convinced that Johnson's early burst of activity was spurious. Even at the height of his Presidential power, he inspired suspicion.

If Johnson ever really understood the record of the Roosevelt administration, on which he expatiated in so many speeches, there was no sign of that understanding in his own Administration. The laws enacted by Roosevelt to control and revive the banks, to control Wall Street, to guide wages and prices up in an orderly fashion, to stabilize the monetary system, to resuscitate entire regions (as with TVA), to balance agriculture between bloat and starvation—these were the formidable reform levers Roosevelt used to shift the nation's entire economic structure toward a more progressive course.

When it came Johnson's turn, he was either afraid to match Roosevelt's experiments in the important structural areas, or had no interest in them. Instead, he mimicked FDR only in the area of handouts—the PWA, WPA, CCC, relief strategy of Roosevelt—which may have been the most immediately meaningful to the voter, the most dramatic to his pocketbook on a short-term basis, but transient and insignificant when compared to other Rooseveltian maneuvers.

When Johnson took office, the banks were not too weak; if anything they were too strong, at least too domineering in federal fiscal matters. But he had no plans for changing the situation and developed none during the next five years. By the middle of Johnson's term, interest rates were the highest in forty years and uncontrolled except by the pessimism their own height created; he leaves office with rates in much the same condition. The dollar, many experts say, is dangerously weak, but Johnson turned away from that problem as Roosevelt never did. The condition of the middle-income and low-income farmer is today more precarious than it has been since the depression years, while the big farmers and the agri-businessmen loot the support programs. Johnson has not made a single move during the past five years to bring fair play back to the farm.



Abu, The Tribune (London)

It is true that under Johnson the Cabinet was expanded to include a Department of Transportation and a Department of Housing and Urban Development, both excellent and needed creations, but to date they signify more a regrouping of file cabinets than a redirection of national policy. The structural policies of the government are just about what they were when Johnson took over, the only difference being that the men who administer them are probably more disorganized and more dispirited than they were in 1963.

Back in 1957 Johnson complained to a friend: "I want to run the Senate. I want to pass the bills that need to be passed. I want my party to do right. But all I ever hear from the liberals is Nigra, Nigra, Nigra." Once in the White House he determined to take care of the liberals' Nigra and all those other irritating underfooters, and take care of them all at once, with quickie programs.

But few of the humanitarian laws put through Congress during the Johnson Administration maintained their substance even to the end of his term. Medicare, yes; some of the education bills, yes. Often, however, there has been an ugly counterweight. The job programs floundered—partly because LBJ was unable to attract men like Ickes and Hopkins, who kept Roosevelt's job programs cranked up—and partly because they were so poorly designed that they are remembered today mainly for the venality and waste that marred the bureaucracy at the top. As for the wider prosperity—the longest unbroken period of prosperity in American history—much of it was traceable to a war economy the other side of which is more than 30,000 of our young men killed and more than 200,000 wounded, not to mention the Vietnamese men, women and children who have perished. Two important civil rights laws were put through Congress, yet more Negroes attend segregated schools today than did when Johnson became President, and the trend toward two nations, cut along the color line, is swifter than at the time of Kennedy's death.

Except in his militant foreign policy, Johnson had a short interest span. Unsupported by strong convictions, his amiable intentions quickly grew limp. Having passed some law with a snazzy title, he seemed not to care much that appropriations did not follow in a quantity to make the new law effective. He was no doubt sincerely angry, as he often sounded, that poverty should exist; but he was rarely angry with Congress for skimping on money for his antipoverty programs. That, he said, was their business.

During the last year and a half of his Administration Johnson was, in fact, siding with the Congressional butchers when liberals in the Senate proposed expanding such programs. One bill, introduced in the Senate in 1968 by Joseph Clark and others, would have authorized the expenditure of $2.8 billion on a two-year emergency job program—a concept far more ambitious than anything put forward by Johnson. The White House sent private word to the committee handling the bill that it should be killed, and in public Johnson was significantly silent. This silence so angered Robert Kennedy that for the first time he announced that he was "actively considering" running for the Presidency. Johnson didn't care; that was in March, and he had already decided to bow out. Having made that decision, he was through with trying to do anything for the country.

A White House aide said not long ago: "The President often speaks of how rapidly a President's power declines. A President must move swiftly to use what power he has in the beginning because that power tends to dissipate—almost like fuel in a rocket. There is a big explosion and things happen, then the thrust is lost and lost very quickly. President Johnson had his 89th Congress and then things started going downhill." The complaint makes little sense because after 1966 Johnson stopped trying to get anything really important through Congress. He bemoans a loss of power when for two years he has made no real test of his power.

In The American Presidency, Clinton Rossiter theorizes that "no man can hold such a concentration of authority without feeling the urge, even though the urge be honest and patriotic, to push it beyond its usual bounds." Many Americans have feared at one time or another during the past five years that Johnson was plotting superpowers for himself, and it wasn't a silly fear, for he did indeed use elaborate trickery to get the extra-Presidential powers that were incorporated into the Tonkin Gulf resolution. But the ambitions that carried him away when he looked toward reshaping Asia were not matched by ambitions to reshape America. Roosevelt risked loss of face—in fact, he lost face—trying openly to purge some of the lawmakers who opposed his domestic reforms, and trying to pack the Supreme Court to ease the way for his emergency programs. That was the kind of effort that Rossiter was talking about—an unexpected intrusion of the Executive into other areas because of an "honest and patriotic" urge to help the country. Johnson was willing to risk his career to wage war, but he was not willing to risk loss of face to reach what he proclaimed as his domestic goals. One can only conclude that he did not care that much about the home front.

He wanted—and usually got from his first Congress—laws that sounded excellent in title. Many of them are still mainly just titles. The program to control water pollution, for example, has not even begun to take shape, though it is now three years old. For Johnson, the proclamation of great battles, the heralding of "studies" and "White House conferences," the headlined statement of his awareness of certain evils—a sort of voodoo exorcism by naming the evil—were sufficient.

In 1964 he said he had launched the Pentagon on a "very comprehensive study" of the draft because he was worried about its inequities, but the study was allowed to die and he happily signed an extension of the old draft—perhaps because he would hazard nothing that might interfere with his war—for which, by September, 1965, he was drafting five times as many men as had been drafted the previous January. Or perhaps it was only because, as so often, he grew impatient with and tired of his reform before it came to much.

On occasion, fidgeting in the confines of Presidential decorum, Johnson would tell Ed Clark how much he envied him his old-fashioned ways of doing business in the Texas legislature. Clark (who became Johnson's ambassador to Australia) used to be the most powerful lobbyist in Texas, serving as the Austin operative for the Houston law firm, Vincon, Elkins, Weems and Searls (to which Texas Gov. John Connally will retire this year as a partner). The Houston firm in many important ways ran the state through Clark; but Clark did not bother to lobby the individual legislators—he climbed the back stairs each morning of the session and laid out that day's calendar with the lieutenant governor, an old friend.

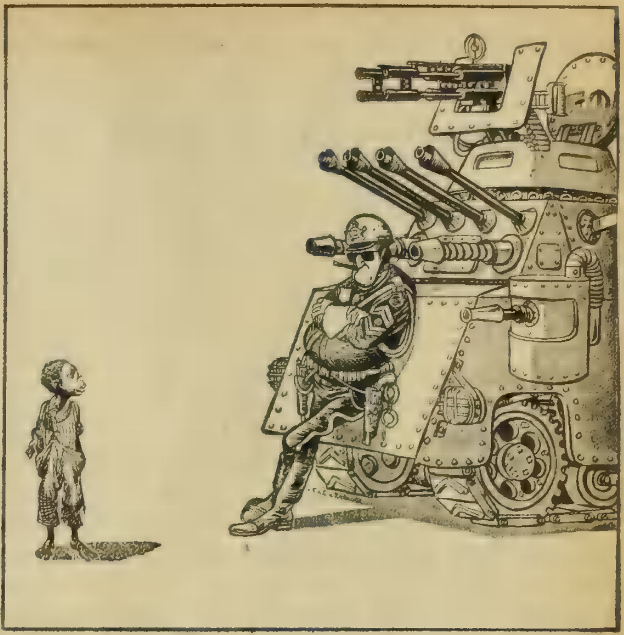
Johnson had had almost the same kind of immediate control over the affairs of the nation when he was Senate Majority Leader, and he grievously missed the cutting and whittling and bending that he used to do in the cloakrooms. But a President must build his wedge into the future with deliberate thoughtfulness, and Johnson preferred to depend on instinct and impulse.

If he had ideas of his own which he deeply believed in pursuing, one could not tell it from his acceptance of a hand-me-down Cabinet. As long as the old Kennedy crowd was willing to stay in line, they could hang around. He had no special notions about foreign affairs, so Dean Rusk was O.K. at State; it was the same with Udall at Interior and Freeman in Agriculture and, for practically the full run, McNamara at Defense. Loyalty, not fresh ideas, was what LBJ desired most of all. In military matters, however, he perked up sharply, taking a keen personal interest in the selection of all five members of the Joint Chiefs. First things came first.

Coldly detached as Senate Majority Leader, Johnson as President allowed himself the luxury of sentiment. All of a sudden he began to drip affection for the downtrodden Negro (he feared and hated the young blacks, whom he did not begin, or apparently want, to understand). In one of the most lyrical speeches ever made on the Negro problem, Johnson laid it out honestly on June 4, 1965, at Howard University:

> For the great majority of Negro Americans—the poor, the unemployed, the uprooted and the dispossessed—there is a much grimmer story. They still, as we meet here tonight, are another nation. Despite the court orders and the law, despite the legislative victories and the speeches, for them the walls are rising and the gulf is widening. . . . Negroes are trapped—as many whites are trapped—in inherited, gateless poverty. They lack training and skills. They are shut in slums, without decent medical care. Private and public poverty combine to cripple their capacities. . . . More than 73 per cent of all Negroes live in urban areas compared with less than 70 per cent of all whites. Most of these Negroes live together—a separated people.

He ticked off a number of rotten areas, and he concluded



Macpherson, Toronto Star

The Great Society

with a promise to "dedicate the expanding efforts of the Johnson Administration" to correcting the racial evils.

But he didn't correct them, or try very hard to do so. He called a White House conference of labor leaders and sociologists and Negro leaders and, when it fell apart, he became angry and impatient with the blacks, and his enthusiasm for the mantle of Lincoln was never again very high. When the President's Commission on Civil Disorders came out in 1968 with a report saying that we were becoming two nations—the very thing Johnson himself had said at Howard—he signified his displeasure by refusing to acknowledge the existence of the report, much less give it any support. His slogan in 1965 was "We Shall Overcome," but by 1966 his slogan seemed to have become "Support Your Local Police."

One would be ungrateful, however, to complain about LBJ's stagnation, for in European affairs, where he took little action, things turned out rather well in at least one important area. Preoccupied with Asia, he has not given Russia much attention—and our relations with Russia are consequently quite good. Johnson may have some instinctive awareness that this is the case, for a few weeks ago Newsweek reported his appraisal of do-nothing Ike as "one of the most knowledgeable men about government ever to hold office in the U.S." In Johnson, too, inaction has sometimes given the appearance of knowledge.

While Johnson has all but abdicated the role of a creative Chief Executive during the past year, he has spent much of that time building his own fortune at home. It may well turn out that the Johnson financial empire in Texas is a more interesting chapter in history than the Johnson failures in Washington. He went into the Presidency with a fortune estimated at $15 million; he will return to Texas with a fortune estimated at $20 million—a healthy increase for a man who, supposedly, put his holdings in trust when he entered the White House.

Actually, Johnson has made little effort to hide what he has been up to. And what he has been up to includes abusing his public powers. He now owns, or indirectly controls, part of every bank in Austin. He also controls banks in Johnson City and in several nearby hamlets, and lately he has bought into at least one Houston bank. Some of the small banks—and all of the large ones—have profited substantially under the Johnson Administration by the use of federal moneys. Not long ago, for example, the Rural Electrification Administration, a federal agency under the Department of Agriculture, lent $25 million to the Lower Colorado River Authority, an outfit in which Johnson feels a very personal interest. The REA normally hands its money out piecemeal, to pay bills as they fall due, but in this case the REA made a singular exception and sent the LCRA the whole $25 million, before the construction project was even begun. REA officials admitted that they had never done this for any outfit except LCRA, but they also admitted they had done it twice before for LCRA—for a total of $55 million.

The LCRA deposited its money in the Johnson banks, a nice bit of federal cash for private banks to lend out and grow upon. It wasn't hard to accomplish; after all, Thomas Ferguson, chairman of LCRA, is a law partner and banking associate of A. W. Moursund of Johnson City, who is perhaps President Johnson's closest business associate.

Lyndon Johnson was 40 years old when he moved into the U.S. Senate and now, leaving the White House and public life, he is 60. He had had a few years in the House of Representatives, but did nothing important there; doubtless he can look forward to another ten years or so of active life, but except for the development of his Texas land-air-waves-banking empire, he is not likely to make any more headlines. He has had a twenty-year opportunity to whack his way into the history books, a rather remarkable twenty-year opportunity, and all the more remarkable for the failure of his achievement compared to what it might have been.

It would be absurd to put him down as a total failure—or as less than a success, if you set him against some of the other at-first promising fellows who came into the Senate with him in 1948: Russell Long of Louisiana, who has yielded so often to the wiles of the lobbyists; Hubert Humphrey, whom Liberals now view as the classic case of what might have been; Estes Kefauver, a great fighter for the people, but dead too soon to carry through his crusades; Clinton P. Anderson, spotty; Robert S. Kerr, self-seeking; Paul Douglas, like Kefauver, really too decent to hope for success in politics.

Looking at the Class of '48, it seems natural that Lyndon Johnson would be the one who finally made it to the White House. Crafty, unscrupulous but something short of corrupt, unburdened by a deep concern for the public welfare but knowing perfectly the script that any politician must memorize to be rated progressive—it was almost inevitable that he would get to the top. And that is probably one reason why so many Americans have disliked him so much—they have realized that in the long run, even without Oswald, Johnson was one of the grosser inevitabilities of the American political machine.

LABOR & STATE: MARRIAGE OF CONVENIENCE

What's Good For Latin America

HENRY W. BERGER

Mr. Berger teaches history at the University of Vermont. His Union Diplomacy: American Labor's Foreign Policy in Latin America is being prepared for publication.

A report issued by the Senate Foreign Relations subcommittee on Latin American Affairs provides up-to-date information on the continuing adventures of the AFL-CIO overseas. Part of a larger review of the Alliance for Progress, the study is a research-staff working paper that examines the assumptions and efforts of American labor diplomacy in Latin America, the most extensive arena of AFL-CIO operations.

The report describes the alliance between the United States Government and the unions in seeking common aims of foreign policy. This involves not only a diplomatic liaison between government and trade union officials but also a formal political and monetary relationship between the government's Agency for International Development (AID) and the AFL-CIO-sponsored American Institute for Free Labor Development (AIFLD), a mutual admiration body composed of leading representatives of the unions and of the American business community. Founded in 1961 as the latest of a series of organizations concerned with labor affairs in Latin America, the AIFLD was in large part a response to Fidel Castro's revolutionary success in Cuba and the possibility that such revolutions might erupt elsewhere in the hemisphere. The AIFLD has been an instrument to combat any such developments through a program of educational, social and political assistance to favored labor elements. The Senate report charges that such aid has often amounted to actual interference in the internal affairs of Latin American unions and governments, that the AIFLD has used the funds and prestige of the United States Government to advance its objectives without government supervision, and that the AFL-CIO, which administers AIFLD, has pursued many of its aims on ideological terms which run counter to dominant social trends in Latin America.

The AIFLD receives the greatest part of its funds ($4,875,000 in 1967) from public funds. Specifically, according to the report, this money has constituted 92 per cent of AIFLD's budget since 1966, most of it channeled through AID. The remainder of the capital comes from the unions and participating business corporations.

The broad stated purposes of AIFLD are to promote democracy and capitalism. This conjunction is important, for it is evidence that American labor organizations, like their business counterparts, see capitalism as vital to an ideal democracy at home and abroad. J. Peter Grace (of W. R. Grace and Co. and chairman of the board of AIFLD) described these aims in an article quoted by the Senate Study:

> Through the AIFLD business, labor and government have come together to work toward a common goal in Latin America, namely supporting the democratic form of government, the capitalistic system and general well-being of the individual. It is an outstanding example of a national consensus effectively at work for the national interest of the United States and for the best interests of the people of Latin America.

This view is shared by AIFLD President, George Meany, the chieftain of the AFL-CIO. Speaking before the Council on Latin America on April 2, 1965, Meany declared that labor "believes in the capitalist system, and we are members of the capitalist society. We are dedicated to the preservation of this system, which rewards the workers, which is one in which management also has such a great stake." And, he added, "the investors of risk capital also must be rewarded." To his Latin American listeners, Meany's words were unmistakable: American capital investment in Latin America is beneficial to both workers and management, and the investors are entitled to a fair return on their investment. The AFL-CIO leader linked this to the effective operation of a democratic society, to which Latin Americans ought to aspire. Trade unions which support this particular version of society in Latin America are preferred over others and have benefited from AFL-CIO assistance.

The AIFLD training of Latin American union officials, at the expense of the American public, is a part of the endeavor. After a period of intensive preparation in the United States, some of these graduates are returned to their countries under an internship program, also financed by the AIFLD, to spread the gospel of American trade unionism and anti-communism to their co-workers. "We feel strongly," wrote one American union official to a Latin American employer in 1962, "that through the education of the workers, it will be possible to halt the wave of communism sweeping through Latin America." As demonstrated in the Senate committee report, these union organizers have also helped to provoke revolutions in their own countries against regimes judged unfriendly by the American labor federation and also by the United States Government.

Brazil is offered as an example where the AFL-CIO encouraged and supported efforts by AIFLD-trained unionists to overthrow the leftist government of Joao Goulart. Ironically, the Goulart regime was replaced by a military dictatorship which suppressed the labor unions—a development which presumably the American labor unions did not welcome.

Nor was this the first time that the AFL-CIO had supported an anti-Left revolution which led to a triumph of the Right. Similar results, for example, occurred in Guatemala where the leftist government of Jacobo Arbenz was overthrown in 1954 with the covert assistance of the United States in the form of money and arms, including planes piloted by U.S. citizens. There is no evidence that the AFL or the CIO (at that time still separate federations) had a hand in those specific operations, but the officers of the two organizations had long opposed Arbenz, applauded his collapse, and sent personnel to reorganize the Guatemalan trade union movement within ten days after the successor to Arbenz, Col. Castillo Armas, assumed the Presidency. Unfortunately, Guatemala has since been victimized by a succession of governments which have been variously incompetent, authoritarian and corrupt. Labor unions have suffered the consequences. Dissent against the present American-supported government has erupted into political violence claiming the lives of an American ambassador and other U.S. diplomatic officers; the regime is now confronted by a guerrilla movement against its rule.

None of this is really news. Indeed, neither is the continuity of official U.S. support for AFL-CIO foreign policy. It too is detailed in the Senate study. The government's decision in 1962 to make an initial $350,000 available to the AIFLD included $100,000 supplied from the President's contingency fund. This is remarkably similar to the $50,000 which Woodrow Wilson's administration provided the AFL in 1918 from the President's special fund to finance the creation of the Pan American Federation of Labor—an instrument designed to a large degree by Samuel Gompers, ostensibly to strengthen ties between the AFL and Latin American labor organizations.

The inter-American labor group of that period was also supposed to serve official U.S. foreign policy. The assistance from the government was offered surreptitiously to avoid an anti-administration reaction from home and abroad. The Senate report of 1968 points out that the present-day AIFLD arrangement "theoretically allows for a minimum of direct involvement in the Latin American situation on the part of State and AID officials, and thereby lessens the chances of State and AID officials becoming embroiled in the politics of Latin America. . . . The design is to insure 'clean' technical assistance for the entire democratic segment of the Latin American labor movement."

In its analysis, the Senate committee staff points out that many critics have attacked the AIFLD as a creature of the State Department. On the other hand, others complain that the AIFLD functions virtually without State Department controls, in spite of the heavy government subsidies. The Senate study appears to support the latter charge, especially since it recommends greater government supervision over the AIFLD. Actually, the question of who is controlling whom is essentially a bureaucratic matter, pressing for those involved, perhaps, but less important than the issue of overall policy upon which AIFLD activities are based. In this context the international ideology of the AFL-CIO, and for that matter of the United States, is really the major issue.

This salient question the Senate report overlooks. For in calling upon the State Department and its related agencies to supersede the functions of the AIFLD, the committee staff ignores the fact that Latin American critics often object to the policy as well as the tactics of American diplomacy. At the very least, the committee staff contradicts itself when it makes such a proposal, for it also notes the Latin American allegation that the State Department manipulates for its own ends the private groups that function in the hemisphere. In his slashing critique of the report, AFL-CIO President George Meany correctly demonstrates this weakness in the study's conclusions. But the more significant flaw which the committee and Meany fail to recognize is that changing the bureaucratic arrangement will not itself alter the policy, which both acknowledge to be the common property of the AFL-CIO and the United States Government. Both groups are committed to the maintenance of dominant American interests in the region (albeit under certain reformist rules and regulations), to the notion that American-style political institutions and capitalism are essential to a good society, and that revolutionary movements which challenge American ideas and interests are unacceptable. Neither is willing or able to see that assuring American investors "a fair return on their investment" may very well prevent the realization of any meaningful good society, democratic or otherwise, in many Latin American countries. Neither acknowledges that reformist measures, even where seriously attempted, may simply not be speedy enough or fundamental enough to produce real changes in the lives of many Latin Americans, and that in an increasing number of cases American interests are considered more secure under the aegis of conservative military regimes.

As for the unions per se, Robert Dockery, author of the first part of the Senate staff report, is perceptive when he notes that, contrary to myth, American labor has not been apolitical or a stranger to ideology. In fact, the unions have rigorously upheld the political ideology of the American private enterprise system, have usually engaged in partisan domestic politics to win economic concessions for their own constituents, supported labor movements allied with their own, and opposed unions and political parties which support ideas and actions with which they do not agree. In the past, labor based its attack against "unfriendly" unions on the ground that politics was inappropriate to trade unionism, when what it really meant was that a particular kind of politics was out of order because it did not agree with American labor's ideological biases. In more recent years that particular argument has not been so evident, but the essential policy has survived.

It is true that the AFL-CIO has had ties with some foreign unions which have included Socialists and supported particular Socialist measures. Without going into the content and fundamental character of the Socialist groups in question, the long history of such relationships shows that those friendships and alliances have existed for the most part only when the particular foreign unions or governments have accommodated themselves to the foreign interests of the United States Government and the American unions, or when the AFL-CIO felt it had no alternative to an even more undesirable situation. When it has believed its interests to be in danger or otherwise resisted, the AFL-CIO has opposed foreign unions and governments. At present this last point is most easily demonstrated by the AFL-CIO's widening split with the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU) and its vigorous opposition to the Latin American Confederation of Christian Trade Unions (CLASC), a nationalist, anti-imperialist, anti-capitalist, anti-Communist organization of Latin American unionists.

Such opposition, it has been suggested, has on a number of occasions resulted in active intervention in the unions and political affairs of other countries. This has been done, it should be added, often out of a quite sincere conviction on the part of various union officials that such action was in the best interests of the country involved, as well as for the security of American unions. Since World War II, in particular, such activities have been carried on with the usual explanation that international communism was about to extinguish freedom and free trade unionism. The assumption is questionable and the Senate subcommittee staff report might have stood on more relevant ground if it had called for a revision of the criteria whereby the American labor unions and the United States Government conduct their international activities.

NEW MISSION TO AFRICA

STANLEY MEISLER

Mr. Meisler, Africa correspondent of the Los Angeles Times, is a frequent contributor to The Nation.

Nairobi, Kenya

When he gets to reviewing American images and interventions abroad, President Nixon might start with the way in which the State Department and other U.S. Government agencies overseas are sometimes upstaged by an old foe of his—American labor. For years, the AFL-CIO has pursued its own foreign policy in Latin America, boasting, among other things, of how it helped to bring down Cheddi Jagan in British Guiana (now Guyana). Now it is turning to Africa. Since the AFL-CIO activity there is fairly new, that might be a good place for President Nixon to choke it off.

In its foreign operations, American labor sometimes acts, or tries to act, as an arm of the U.S. Government. But it can be an uncontrollable arm. In January, 1968, for example, Vice President Humphrey visited Kenya with a large party that included Irving Brown, executive director of the African American Labor Center, the main agency for AFL-CIO's activities on that continent. American Ambassador Glenn W. Ferguson thought it unwise to include Brown because he is disliked by many Kenya leaders, who believe he has shown too much favoritism to Minister for Economic Planning Tom Mboya. Ambassador Ferguson cabled to Washington a request that Brown be dropped from the trip. But the AFL-CIO can sometimes be more powerful than the State Department. Enraged AFL-CIO leaders talked to Humphrey, and the Vice President overruled the Ambassador. Brown came along.

Brown's African American Labor Center was set up in 1965 when George Meany decided that the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions had become too inept to carry out the AFL-CIO's aims in Africa. The Center operates almost entirely on AID funds, about $2.5 million so far. But unlike other organizations that use AID money, the African American Labor Center undergoes little supervision.

The Center signs agreements with African governments for labor projects, AID not being in the picture at all, except to provide the money. In theory, it could veto a labor project and refuse to turn over the funds, but actually AID officials in Africa know little about the Labor Center projects in the countries where they are stationed. If they did protest, they would likely be ignored by their superiors in Washington.

The Center often gives office equipment and cars to African unions or creates vocational training schools; for example, a tailoring school and a printers' school in Kenya. But the Center also tries to fulfill the traditional AFL-CIO role of helping non-Communist unions fight alleged Communist unions. Indeed, the Center spends the largest portion of its AID funds on Nigeria's Trade Union Institute for Social and Economic Development, an arm of the union in Nigeria that is fighting the leftist Nigerian Trade Union Congress. Brown's deputy, Lester Trachtman, explains: "Our aim is to help build the African trade unions and see that they remain independent. The Chinese and Russians see that one of the best ways to infiltrate Africa is to gain control of the labor movement."

Sometimes American labor gets involved in activities that are less overt than those of Brown's Center. And sometimes labor organizations other than the AFL-CIO become entangled in foreign operations. That seemed to be the case early in 1968 with Peace with Freedom, Inc. Unlike the African American Labor Center, Peace with Freedom was not an agency of the AFL-CIO but a kind of free lance. In 1967, it was identified as one of the many private organizations that had received CIA money. Its other major source of funds was reported to be individual American labor unions. One of these, ironically, was the United Auto Workers, which for years has been criticizing George Meany and the AFL-CIO for their CIA entanglements abroad.

Peace with Freedom was directed by Robert Thomas Gabor, a native of Hungary who had become an American citizen. In Africa, Gabor and Peace with Freedom joined with two German labor-supported foundations to set up various cultural organizations that soon sponsored a good deal of the new publishing being done in Kenya, Uganda and Zambia. This insured that Communists were largely kept out of the vital field of communications in the three countries.

Gabor's work aroused suspicion in Kenya, mainly because he seemed too closely associated with Mboya, the Kenya leader who received a good deal of financial support from American labor before independence. Though they had no evidence, some Africans began to suspect that Gabor's cultural projects were a new way for American labor to pass money to Mboya. Last January, Kenya officials refused to let Gabor back into Kenya. He and another American were declared prohibited immigrants, a local newspaper hinting cautiously but pointedly that they might have been involved in CIA operations.

The incident embarrassed the U.S. Embassy in Nairobi. Ambassador Ferguson, who knew that the operations were controlled more by American labor than by the CIA, told a Rotary Club meeting in Nairobi: "It is sometimes wrongly assumed that the United States Embassy in Nairobi is responsible for the activities of all 3,200 Americans in Kenya. We have no control over the activities of every individual."

That, of course, is the nub of the problem to be faced by President Nixon. Does American labor have the right to operate freely abroad, sometimes interfering in the internal politics of a foreign country? Does it have the right to do this without any real control by the U.S. Government? Furthermore, should the U.S. Government foot most of the bill? These questions need to be answered in any U.S. review of labor operations abroad. And American labor ought to ask itself another question. Do all its machinations really help the people it wants to help? The ban on Gabor, for example, embarrassed Tom Mboya almost as much as it did the American Embassy. American labor can now probably help Mboya best by staying away from him and his country.

RULES WITH REASONS

THE BASES OF MORAL EDUCATION

RICHARD PETERS

Mr. Peters is professor of the Philosophy of Education at the University of London Institute of Education.

To the question—why do problems of moral education loom so large nowadays?—an obvious answer is that standards are no longer stable. A moral code cannot be taken for granted as it could, say, fifty years ago. Not that people now tend to fall short more frequently of the standards which they set themselves; rather there is much more dispute about what such standards should be. Older people are often shocked, not because the young have no standards but because they seem to have different ones.

There is something to this thesis, but not, I would suggest, quite as much as is often claimed. Perhaps in more settled and stable times parents were able to pass on a code, the details of which could be adequate for their children. When such conditions no longer obtained, after World War I, it is true that some of the younger generation did revolt on certain matters, proclaiming defiantly that morals were merely a matter of private feeling or of individual decision. But both their subjective stance and the reliance of the older generation on a tradition seem equally inadequate at this time. For, on the one hand, it sounds pretty thin to suggest that telling lies and being cruel are wrong just because of one's private feelings or personal decisions; and on the other hand, established traditions palpably cannot deal adequately with such an issue as sexual morality. The task of this generation is to work out a morality that does justice both to the "Victorian" view and to the progressive protest against it. My present purpose is to mark out such a middle road.

The first task is to identify what we are talking about when we speak of morals. What is a moral matter as distinct from a legal or religious one? The question is not as simple as it sounds, for moral rules cannot be identified simply by their content. Theft, murder and incest, for instance, are against the law; they are also religious sins and defy custom. And they are thought immoral. On the other hand there are some rules like those against lying and the breaking of promises that are generally matters of morality, and matters of law only under very special circumstances. Still other practices, like spitting, are highly indeterminate. Is it immoral to spit in the street? It is against the law in the subway, but in some homes it is quite customary when near a fire. What makes some say that it is an immoral practice and not just a filthy habit? What lies behind the conviction that some rules are matters of morality and others not?

It is surely the suggestion that reasons support such concepts as good, right, wrong and ought which gives them the status of moral rules. Such reasons mark out their importance. A rule is a rule of law if, roughly speaking, it has issued from a determinate source such as a king, a parliament or a judge. It may or may not be backed by what we would deem a sufficient reason, or deal with a matter of moral importance. If, on the other hand, we call something like shaking hands a matter of custom, we suggest that there's no such determinate source. Heaven knows where it came from and there may or may not be some point to it. If we were to speak of it as a moral rule, however, that would imply a reason, however limited.

To say that moral rules are those which have some backing in reasons does not, of course, go far enough; for reasons may be very peculiar. Imagine, for instance, a discussion about corporal punishment in which one person is against it because it gives rise to bruises. "What is wrong with a few bruises?" asks the other. "They turn blue," replies the opponent of such drastic measures, "and our bounden duty is to minimize the amount of blueness in the world. It's such a horrible color." We would think such a man morally mad, even though he gave reasons for his policies. And this would be because his fundamental principle, which made reasons relevant to him, was "Minimize the blueness in the world" instead of our commonly accepted principle of "Minimize suffering."

I've introduced this rather grotesque example merely to indicate the crucial point that fundamental principles are needed to make reasons relevant, and to confer importance on the moral rules which they support. The task of the moral philosopher is to show why a principle such as "Minimize suffering" is defensible, whereas a principle such as "Maximize suffering" or "Minimize blueness" is not. I cannot pursue the crucial task of justifying fundamental principles any further in this article.* I shall have to assume a general agreement that some fundamental principles—such as those of fairness, freedom, respect for persons and the like—are justifiable and that others are not. Such abstract higher order principles lie behind the conviction that matters like theft and the breaking of promises are wrong, and other things like holding a fork in the left hand, rather than in the right, are merely conventions. When, too, we wonder about the morality of such acts as spitting or extramarital sex relations we are looking at them through peepholes provided by such principles. The principles make us take account of some aspects of these practices rather than others.

My example, too, brings out the further point that there are different levels of morality. A small number of fundamental higher order principles are appealed to for justification of other lower order moral rules. Our duty, for instance, to obey the government obviously derives from more abstract principles such as the protection of the general welfare. But these lower-order rules are not all of a piece. Some rules, like those relating to spitting, depend very much on time and place; others, like those concerned with contracts or with noninjury to the person, are not as relative. Indeed it is difficult to conceive of a society of men in which some such rules did not obtain.

This, I think, is where one of the widespread muddles about morality creeps in; people do not distinguish among the different types of rules within a moral system. They will think that because some rules, say about gambling or sex, are relative and depend very much on time, place and circumstances, all moral rules are similarly relative. In parts of Africa, it is said, men are encouraged to have more than one wife; in Europe only one; in the United States only one at a time. Therefore, all morals as to marriage are relative. And fraud, murder, rape and theft are then presumably just as "culture-bound" as spitting in the street!

It should not be thought, either, that any simple appeal to a lack of consensus about moral rules necessarily establishes anything of ultimate significance about their validity. If consensus were the acid test of validity, science would also be in an insecure position; for the scientific view of the world is accepted by only a minority of the human race. If there are good reasons for moral or scientific beliefs, the fact that many cannot grasp them is irrelevant. There are probably many in the Trobriand Islands—or in England—who cannot grasp Newton's laws. Is our estimate of their truth affected by this deficiency?

NOTICE TO SUBSCRIBERS

Because of postal regulations, The Nation's mailing list must be arranged according to Zip Codes. Therefore—with any correspondence about address changes, renewals, etc.—please enclose the address label from your Nation. If you don't have a label, be sure to include your Zip number, and be sure it is correct. Without it, we cannot find your name plate.

Those who attack "absolute" moral principles often develop another type of argument. They say that such principles cannot be absolute because there are circumstances in which they must be bent a bit. What about "white lies"? What about breaking a promise to save someone's life? This is really a very feeble objection, because most people who believe that there are fundamental principles of morality also claim that these principles are subject to an "other things being equal" clause. If there is more than one fundamental principle, it must sometimes be the case that there is a conflict of principle. A person must nevertheless act in such cases, and whatever he does, one of his principles is infringed. A "white lie" is not told out of inclination or for gain or glory. It is told when the truth might cause needless suffering. In such a case other things are not equal. But because there are some cases where a principle must be infringed, nothing follows about the general duties involved. The general duty to tell the truth is not undermined by the fact that on rare occasions other duties are more urgent.

I have spent so much time on the refinements of morality before mentioning anything about moral education because I believe that efforts at moral education on the part of well-meaning parents and teachers are often hamstrung by confusions of the sort that I have indicated. The realization that some moral matters are far from straightforward leads to a generalized agnosticism about morality and to a lack of firmness in handing on rules to children. Children, it is proclaimed, must decide such issues for themselves. As if anyone—let alone a child—ever decided for himself that lying and cruelty are wrong!

Actually a child is well along to maturity before he can assess the rules which structure his life, can work out a code "of his own." This parallels the history of the race; for morality, as a code distinct from religion, custom and law, took a very long time to emerge. A small child lacks the subtlety of discrimination required to distinguish matters of morality from matters of law and custom, let alone to decide "for himself" on his moral principles.

How then can this process get started? Obviously this child must learn to use concepts such as "right," "wrong," and "ought." How can he do so except by being initiated into the code of a community, into a tradition? Much is picked up by imitation and identification—especially in the sphere of attitudes to others. But morality is not a skill like swimming, to be learned purely by imitation; it involves learning a whole family of concepts, which cannot be acquired without a great deal of instruction and explanation. Parents often think that they are teaching children not to steal by scolding or punishing them when they take what belongs to somebody else. They do not ask themselves whether the child has yet the concept of property, of people having rights to things, and of distinctions like that between lending and giving. Without a grasp of this family of concepts, a child cannot properly understand what stealing is. Moral education must always take account of where children are, and that requires considerable imagination. Because of his limited conceptual apparatus, a child's actions look quite different to him and to the adults who are judging him.

---

* See my Ethics and Education (Allen and Unwin, 1966).

But learning to be moral is not just a matter of learning to apply concepts correctly to certain situations; it is also a matter of learning to behave consistently in the required way. Rules must regulate something and what they regulate are human inclinations. Children must develop early the habit of regulating their inclinations. They will usually learn to do this gradually if there is a steady and predictable pressure from their parents; for one of the most valid generalizations about human behavior is that people behave overwhelmingly in accordance with their understanding of what is expected and approved. That is why consistency on the part of parents is so important. If a child is brought up within a firm framework of rules, and is consistently approved of when he conforms to them, he will gradually take the rules into his own mind. In this way a firm basis of habits can be laid down. Without that start, a later development of an autonomous code is most unlikely. For how can children learn to adopt rules of their own and also learn to apply them intelligently to varying situations if they have not learned from the inside what constitutes a moral rule?

Very young children do not properly understand moral concepts. By that I mean that, though they can learn to regulate their inclinations with the consciousness that certain things are right and wrong, their grasp of the grounds for such judgments is very hazy. They regard rules, so Piaget argues, as more or less transcendentally laid down. The notion of the validity of rules, and that they are grounded in principles, takes much longer to dawn. So it is pointless to expect very young children to do what they should because they see the reasons for it. That will come later as their understanding increases and their sympathies and loyalties begin to extend to their contemporaries. In the early stages they have to learn to do what is right without properly understanding why.

Many readers may be shocked by such a suggestion. If so, it is perhaps because their view of learning is modeled too much on "discovery methods" in, say, mathematics whereby children can be induced, through appropriate questioning, to grasp principles, to have "insight," etc. That is one very important way of learning, but it obviously has little application to such things as mechanical skills or historical facts. The beginning of wisdom in understanding human learning is to realize that there are many ways of learning and many different types of things that have to be learned. And one of the palpable facts is that most things in life must be learned before they are properly understood. In any case, understanding is usually a matter of degree. Young children learn that bodies fall to the ground if you drop them; but they cannot possibly understand why. Indeed, how many educated adults can explain gravity? In the learning of skills, such as golf or cooking, great proficiency can be attained by a mixture of practice and imitation, without the slightest understanding of the underlying principles. Morality is not just a body of beliefs; nor is it merely a system of skills. But it is like both in that during the early stages traditions must be accepted on trust from those with more experience and wisdom. Trust is essential, for without that relationship between parent or teacher and child the basic body of rules cannot be imparted with firmness and without fear.

What should form the content of a basic body of rules to provide the substance for a tradition? It would obviously include either fundamental principles themselves, such as the consideration of people's interests; or such rules as those relating to respect for persons, for property and for the keeping of contracts, that fall under the fundamental principles. A few such rules can be insisted on, without constantly correcting children over trivialities. Many conscientious parents seem to me to lack discrimination in this respect. They make as much fuss over table manners and tidiness as they do over lying and stealing. If children are hemmed in by rules, they have trouble developing a sense of what is morally important and what is not. I often doubt that parents are clear about this themselves!

Children vary greatly in the pace of their development, and no hard and fast rules can be laid down as to when the giving of reasons will begin to bite on a child's behavior. But one thing is apparent—reasons will be ineffective until the child's psychological development has reached the point where they awaken some response in him. A good reason for keeping a promise is the inconvenience caused to others if it is broken. But what does that mean to a boy who cares nothing about others? How can he even be moved by respect for persons if he has not gained the sympathy out of which such an attitude arises? How the psychological underpinning for morality emerges is a matter for psychologists, but I suspect that children largely learn to care if they are brought up by those whose own sympathy spreads like a contagion.

If all goes well, as the child begins to develop interests and companions outside the home, his capacity for moral reasoning will also develop—that is, if he is encouraged to discuss different points of view. In our highly differentiated society he will find that he has much need for such a capacity, because on many matters he will find that standards conflict. He may find, too, that social changes make some of his parents' views seem a bit old-fashioned—at least on matters that do not fall under basic moral rules. At that point there is some justification for saying that he must decide for himself where he stands. He will, however, be able to do so only if his early training has given him the necessary equipment. It is most unlikely that he will find that his parents have been mistaken on basic rules such as those relating to injury to the person and to property and to the keeping of contracts. On more relative matters, such as thrift, business ethics or sex relations, he may come to think that they are mistaken. It would be surprising nowadays if an adolescent of any spirit accepted all his parents' standards! But at least he should learn to accept or reject elements in the tradition into which he has been initiated by seeing how they square with fundamental principles. A solid basis of rules has to be passed on in such a way that a sane and sensitive morality can grow out of it. Reason must have an inheritance of traditions to work upon.

The view of morality I have here advanced assigns a crucial role to the authority of parents and teachers. both in laying down a foundation of moral rules and in encouraging children, as they develop, to strike out on their own. So I must end by saying a bit about authority, for I think that on this matter, also, there are many muddles. Our society has staged a successful revolt against the traditional concept of authority which gave unlimited prerogatives to men over women, to parents over children, to employers over employees. But in overthrowing this patriarchal type of authority we have tended to go too far, concluding that there is no place at all for authority—save, of course, in the sphere of law and state action. This all-or-none reaction overlooks the fact that in school and home, as well as in the state, there is a paramount need for authority—provided that it is rationalized and carefully related to the tasks at hand and the individuals concerned.

Authority is what bridges the gap between the generations, for unless authority figures are identified and accepted, knowledge and skill can be handed on only by coercion or bribery. In the old days children were often driven to learning things that were difficult. Progressive teachers in revolt against this approach appealed to the methods of the supermarket, where a premium is placed on appetite. The treatment of children fell in with the tendency of modern industrial societies to gear everything to consumer wants. Progressive therapists tended to forget the extreme plasticity of children's desires and the enormous part played by identification with others. This oversight is relevant both to the formation of wants and to the taking in of rules to control and channel them. Authority enters here as an intermediary between bribery and coercion. It should not be used, of course, to keep children in subservience but to bring about identification with the elements of a society that must be transmitted. A child may become interested in learning something like metal work because he admires his teacher; he may take into himself the code of a beloved parent. But unless he comes to sense what there is of value in the cherished pursuit, unless he comes to feel subjectively the rightness of a course of action, the teacher and parent have failed. Their task is to use their authority so that another generation will eventually grasp what there is of merit for itself in a style of life. They must work hard, in other words, to do themselves out of a job.

As children get older, self-discipline should take the place of imposed discipline. Constraints become internalized and children begin to weigh from within the validity of their promptings. But their tendency to be self-critical, to develop a code of their own, depends on the extent to which they must have kept critical company. The dialogue within reflects the dialogue without; that is why discussion is so important during adolescence. Those in authority over children will, therefore, attempt to get children to do what is sensible by appealing to their common sense instead of ordering them around or appealing to their own status. They will not say, "I'm your father and I'm telling you not to smoke," but will point out the dangers involved. It is a further question, however, whether a child's acceptance of good reasons should be the final criterion for his action. If a parent explains to a child why it is stupid and wrong to put objects on railway lines. and yet sees him doing so, will he stand aside and reflect that the boy is learning to choose? Parents must weigh their own fundamental principles against what is instructive for their children.

Example, of course, is crucial. Parents and others must provide a pattern out of which the child can eventually develop his own style of self-regulation. This is not likely to happen unless exercise of authority is rationalized and sensitively adapted to age, to persons, and to the tasks in hand. For the young will rightly rebel against the irrational expression of a traditional status. In brief, teachers and parents must learn to be in authority without being authoritarian.

BOOKS & THE ARTS

The Unexpected Revolution

RED FLAG/BLACK FLAG: French Revolution 1968. By Patrick Seale and Maureen McConville. G. P. Putnam's Sons. 252 pp. $6.95. Ballantine Books. Paper 95c.

THE BEGINNING OF THE END: May 1968. By Angelo Quatrocchi and Tom Nairn. Panther Books (England).

JEFFRY J. KAPLOW

Mr. Kaplow taught history at Columbia University until last fall when he joined the staff of the University of Ghana. He is the author of Elbeuf During the Revolutionary Period (Johns Hopkins Press) and New Perspectives on the French Revolution (John Wiley).

Lenin, who knew the value of a good slogan, would have appreciated the French revolutionaries of May, 1968, if only for their graffiti. The walls of the Sorbonne, the Odéon Theatre and the occupied factories were thick with them, and they were wonderful. Society is a carnivorous flower. I take my desires for reality, because I believe in the reality of my desires. I understand that one could make a revolution, on condition of staking one's life. But best of all: It is forbidden to forbid.

This was the revolution of liberty and fraternity as well as of equality. Neither a large share of the pie nor even all of the pie in its present state of indigestibility would suffice. There could be no contradiction between the three terms of the proposition. These were the revolutionaries who knew at last that equality, understood in the traditional Socialist sense of an end to private accumulation and exploitation, was meaningful insofar as it prepared the way for the flowering of the human personality, the creation of social, total men in place of the serialized, unidimensional, alienated individuals of advanced capitalist societies.

This was a new kind of revolution, in part because it was unexpected. Revolutions don't happen in developed Western countries, said the Marxologists. Intellectuals don't make revolutions, said the party-line Marxists. But the revolution did happen or, at least, began to happen, and it was the intellectuals who did it. So unless one wishes complacently to deny reality, the time has come to find out why.

Surely no series of events since the Paris Commune has called forth so extensive a pamphlet literature. In France, the number of words devoted to the subject can be counted only with the aid of a computer. And it appears, on the evidence of the two books under review, that the English are now ready to do their bit.

To ask why revolutions happen is not the same as to study the conscious motives of the revolutionaries. Seale and McConville concern themselves chiefly with the latter, while Nairn and Quatrocchi attempt to develop a theoretical framework from which to explain the former. I confess that while I find the journalists' chronicle skillfully done and useful, an excellent source book for the future historian, it is the second book that is truly original and stimulating. Although in some ways the books complement each other, their comparison shows the gulf that exists between a Marxist revolutionary world view (Nairn) and Left-Liberal conceptions (Seale and McConville).

Why did the students turn to the barricades? They shared a common perception of their action as a rebellion against frustration, anxiety and exclusion from power—against, it may be said, the silent acceptance in which they had been forced to live. They found that the fault lay not in the university but in the larger society, and specifically in the Establishment, the power elite, the ruling class, whose interests are best served by the continued existence of a quiet, docile, highly specialized, professionally oriented, politically unconcerned student body that will not, now or in the future, rock the boat. Little boxes, houses in the suburbs and 50,000 or more francs a year, and I'm all right, Jack.

Seale and McConville recognize this motivation when they speak of a revolt against the "inhuman efficiency of modern industrial life," made more acute in the French case by an overcentralized bureaucracy. They might have added the phrase, "under conditions of advanced capitalism," to their statement, further illuminating the use of words like alienation and the consumer society. Alienation does not in this context refer to some vague psychological malaise but rather to a lack of identity between the producer and his work, the individual and the community, each man and his self. Consumer is an excellent adjective for a society where men are expected to derive satisfaction not from their work but from the consumption of phantoms and fantasies, bottles of beer and television sets—but above all, a society in which the possession of things is supposed to replace human relationships.

Perhaps not all the students who manned the barricades were theoretically equipped to understand the connections between their own situation and the general lines of social development. But their consciousness of the situation, so far from being false, was pretty close to the mark.

This was a spontaneous revolution. Sparked by the action of numerous groupuscules, most prominent of which was Cohn-Bendit's Movement of 22 March, it took flame because of the stupidity and obstinacy of the university authorities. The intervention of the police attracted many more students to its ranks. But because this is true, it does not follow that the majority of its supporters were merely reformists who could be bought off with a few crumbs from Edgar Faure's table. Seale and McConville misunderstand the profundity of the movement and the nature of political education that takes place on a political barricade, if they believe this. After all, there is nothing like facing a flic to clarify one's ideas.

It is a sad fact that theory is far behind action in this new revolutionary movement. It is one thing to say that May, 1968, is explained by a revulsion against war and racism (the role of Vietnam as catalytic agent is of the first importance), to attribute the students' role to the heightened sensitivity and, to a lesser degree, consciousness that is theirs as members of the intelligentsia. Nairn attempts even more than this—he places the whole movement into theoretical perspective as the rebellion of the producers of alienated mental labor.

Now, students are workers, and they do produce, not merely consume, knowledge. Learning is an active process, an exchange between the teacher and the taught in which the respective roles are often reversed. The students' sense of this has long been implicit in their criticism of professors who lecture but do not teach, who think of their audiences as paying guests. It was explicit in demands that they be paid a wage—the slogan of the Union Nationale des Etudiants de France a few years ago. It lies at the base of the current revolt.

But this subjective prise de conscience proceeds from an objective base. Nairn argues that mature capitalism is a period "in which the forces of material production—the mainspring of all historical change so far—have brought about a decisive development in the forces of mental production." In order to survive, capitalism needs to generate an ever-increasing mental product in the form of the communications industry and information processing and, of course, to subordinate this mental product to the dominating power of material production. Consciousness is mass produced as a commodity. But "consciousness resists the form of commodity production by its very dialectical and social character." The bearers of consciousness fight against this misappropriation of their labor. The struggle is naturally concentrated in the universities, the factories in which consciousness as commodity is produced and where, consequently, deprivation is most directly felt.

Nairn is conscious of the audacity of his hypothesis and makes no excessive claims for it. As he points out, this is a time when theory has to be audacious merely to keep up with the practice. We have heard a good deal recently about the role of intellectuals in the making of revolution from writers like Mills and Marcuse, but Nairn is the first, to my knowledge, to offer us a reason to expect that revolution to come to pass. So whether he is right or wrong—and it is, clearly, too early to say—matters less than the use that may be made of his suggestions as analytical tools.

May demonstrated several things. First, that students and intellectuals have an unsounded revolutionary potential. It is to the eternal shame of the Communist Party and the traditional French Left in general that they failed to recognize the fact. Ouvrierisme or workerism has long been a feature of French Communist politics; at what cost is demonstrated by Georges Marchais' characterization in l'Humanité of Cohn-Bendit as a German Jew who dared to give lessons to the French working class. Leaving aside the chauvinism and the scarcely disguised anti-Semitism, we need only note how effectively this attitude serves to disrupt a militant and fruitful revolutionary alliance.

And that is the second demonstration of the May days, that French workers are still capable of thinking and acting in revolutionary terms, despite the much vaunted depolitization of the Fifth Republic. A substantial number of the 10 million strikers put themselves on the line for more than wages and a shorter work week. Pace Seale and McConville, they were not dreaming of their summer holidays whilst on the barricades. How hard contempt for the working man dies, even when he shows what he is capable of!

This is an era of political alliances, revolutionary and otherwise. So far on the Left, most of these have proven sterile, viz., the now defunct French Federation of the Democratic and Socialist Left. The words Popular Front still have magic to them, but the only way they can have any content is if cooperation around a common program is established among rank-and-file militants. Workers and students have got to take the initiative themselves in or outside of the traditional organizations, instead of waiting for party-union-club leaders to sign pacts vitiated at their inception by unwanted compromise and bad faith. The events of May showed that it could be done.

It is often said that there was no revolutionary situation in France last May, and this affirmation is used to denigrate the entire experience. But this is sour grapes of a traditional Left so well integrated into the system that it has long since ceased to believe in the possibility (or desirability) of revolution. May events must not be judged as one would judge the last ill-fated bid for power of some fading revolutionary leader but as a beginning.

Astride the Historical Schism

INTELLECTUAL ORIGINS OF AMERICAN RADICALISM. By Staughton Lynd. Pantheon Books. 184 pp. $4.95.

CLASS CONFLICT, SLAVERY, AND THE UNITED STATES CONSTITUTION: Ten Essays. By Staughton Lynd. The Bobbs-Merrill Company. 288 pp. $7.50.

CYNTHIA L. ADCOCK

Mrs. Adcock's studies in history and journalism have centered on American radicalism and the Progressive Party.

> In times of change and danger when there is a quicksand of fear under men's reasoning, a sense of continuity with generations gone before can stretch like a lifeline across the scary present.

With this John Dos Passos quotation, Richard Hofstadter introduced his 1948 book, The American Political Tradition, a work suggesting many themes typical of American historiography during the 1950s.

Today, for a new radical breed of historian, the American past is no more reassuring than is the future; a sense of continuity might well foster a sense of futility. Can one take pride in the New Deal reforms when one-fourth the nation still lives in poverty, and far more still are insecure, restless and resentful about their condition? The Puritan myth that we are a uniquely chosen people with a historical mission now seems dubious.

The idea of national mission is at issue in the split between the "consensus historians" of the 1950s and the "New Left" scholars rising to prominence. Staughton Lynd, the young radical historian who made news in 1967 by journeying to North Vietnam, seems to stand squarely astride the schism in these two books. In one, Intellectual Origins of American Radicalism, Lynd compiles a huge file of quotations on conscience, liberty, equality and human rights, as seen by 18th-century neo-Lockeans and abolitionists a century later. The American radical tradition is seen gradually expanding its definition of man's natural rights, into the belief that some ideas are innate in all men. Lynd defines the radical tradition according to this theory: that is, belief that a God has implanted in every man an "Inner Light" or conscience which speaks self-evident truths and demands natural rights. Here Lynd the Quaker takes over from Lynd the historian, for empirically, conscience is as likely to bolster feudalism as to posit natural rights.

The Intellectual Origins links Staughton Lynd to those older historians who saw Americans (with or without the Inner Light) as sharers of a common ideology of liberty, members of a consensus of long-standing continuity, men on the make who agreed on common rules of the game, rules given by God through the Constitution.

His other recent work, Class Conflict, Slavery, and the United States Constitution: Ten Essays, is quite different. In these fascinating, complex but clearly argued studies, events move in contradictory, crosswise fashion. Merchants and city workers unite in politics; rebel tenants support the British King; the South gladly agrees to prohibit slavery in the old Northwest territories, and conscience is mentioned only in its default.

In Class Conflict, Lynd resembles more other New Left historians. He reemphasizes conflict in American history; he rejects simple interest-group economic hypotheses for a complex interpretation using economic, cultural and psychological factors. (Other New Left approaches include the idea that America has been a prisoner of its belief in a unique, God-given mission, a prisoner of the long dream of American expansion: that frontier expansion did not always promote democracy, but rather, geographical mobility obscured the lack of social mobility from the beginning, and permitted the nation to avoid resolving crucial social and economic conflicts. The Civil War, for instance, came only after the slavery issue could not be further compromised by westward expansion.)

Both conflict and compromise are essential to this historiography, and a good illustration is the three major tenets of Lynd's Class Conflict: (1) the American Revolution was waged by a coalition of diverse groups united only against British rule (groups like the neo-feudal manor lords of the Hudson Valley and their resentful rebellious tenants); (2) the diverse upper-class interests of this coalition were principal movers in enacting a Constitution to curb the small farmers and city artisans then dominating various state governments; (3) the basic conflict in writing the Constitution was not between large and small states, farm and commercial interests, nor even rich and poor, but rather between North and South as they divided over slavery, the one issue of "conscience."

Such new approaches to history have corollaries for politics, even if unintentional. Lynd wrote the Intellectual Origins to show that his was not the first generation of radicals antipathetic to economic determinism. Class Conflict is less polemical, but Lynd's purpose appears behind two statements. He quotes Jefferson, saying that "in the last analysis, one stood by and watched the great tree (of liberty) fall" repeatedly throughout history; earlier, Lynd explained one such case when a libertarian revolution was cut short:

> unable to summon the moral imagination required to transcend race prejudice, unwilling to contemplate social experiment which impinged on private property, too ready to rationalize their failure by a theory of economic determination, the (Founding) Fathers, unhappily, ambivalently, confusedly, passed by on the other side.

Lynd opposes a radicalism that relies on the forces of history, and supports a radicalism of "conscience."

In his individualized prophetic radicalism, Lynd voices, ultimately, a despair of democracy similar to that of many consensus historians. They often celebrated United States pragmatism and progress, but cast a jaundiced eye on most popular movements for greater equality and liberty. The Progressives were tinged with racism; the Populists were vulgar and backward-looking; the abolitionists were crabby men from a declining social class.

Most New Left historians accept these descriptions as accurate, but their mood is not soured thereby, nor do they in turn celebrate American moderates. A brief view of three of the more influential will illustrate their approach:

Without losing sight of Southern plantation owners' economic interests, Eugene Genovese equally emphasized the deep cultural values that shaped their commitment to slavery, and that ideologically ruled the whole South. "Slavery and its aftermath emasculated the black masses; they are today profoundly sick and shaking with convulsions," was his estimate, however reluctant.

The diplomatic historian, William Appleman Williams, wrote of the early American ideal of a corporate community guided by a strong moral sense; he demonstrated how the new Republic chose geographical, commercial and political expansion rather than face the issue of actually building that community. This helped explain the South's revulsion at Northern laissez-faire capitalism. Successful expansion and foreign investment fed the economy on capital from underdeveloped countries, but did not solve our domestic conflicts.

Christopher Lasch in The New Radicalism in America 1889-1963 proceeded smoothly from a socio-economic class analysis of most 20th-century intellectual progressives and radicals to a sensitive psychological description of their characteristics—portraying them as confusing politics with culture, distrusting middle-class culture, and distrusting intellect itself. Thus many preferred to identify with "the laws of historical necessity" or "the working out of the popular will." Lasch's Nation study, "The Cultural Cold War" [September 11, 1967] suggested that this radicalism meant replacing that preference with greater trust in one's own values and powers.

The New Left historians focus on the interaction of material interests and psychological and cultural forces. To them, America shares the characteristic needs and foibles of all humanity; it is not unique, nor does it bear a special duty to history.

This approach is useful because it guards against dividing the world into villains and saints, progressives and reactionaries. Such an "existentialist" treatment builds no false opposition between "conscience" and "property rights." It shows how our forefathers, like us, struggled for a variety of goals—from paying the rent to building community. It avoids materialistic fatalism about change because it sees many possible paths for economic motivations. The New Left historians have the advantage of avoiding uncomfortable corners into which some scholars have been driven by their view of history. Not for them an oppressive sense of occupational irrelevance to "the forces of history"; after all, intellectuals play a major role in destroying restrictive systems of thought and encouraging change. Neither, for them, an elitist contempt for other, presumedly benighted, social groups; these, too, have a right to their own values, their own needs, their own conscience.

Biafra in Dixie

THE AMERICAN SERFS. By Paul Good. G. P. Putnam's Sons. 188 pp. $4.95.

R. M. ELMAN

Mr. Elman's most recent book is Lilo's Diary (Scribner).

The process of enforced starvation, dislocation, desperation, neglect which Paul Good's fine report on rural poverty discloses is commonplace today for many hundreds of thousands, perhaps millions of black and white families in the Deep South and Southern Appalachia, is not the result of individual backwardness, cultural lag, or family breakdown. As Good shows, it is the result of deliberate governmental policies and economic strategies. It is also an impoverishment that is not being alleviated, but is ongoing, proliferating; for to change the situation might involve discomforting wealth and privilege, might even involve some redefinition of widespread notions of productivity, or social and personal worth, or men's responsibilities to one another.

The roots of this American Biafra are, of course, to be found in our ruthless individualism, the insularity and ignorance of our prospering classes. It is that kind of ignorance which entrusts manpower training programs in South Carolina, for example, to white supremacists who then utilize such federal funds to subsidize the local resort industry with black chambermaids and kitchen help at less than poverty-level wages; and it is that kind of individualism which permits greedy coal operators or plantation owners to ravish Kentucky or Mississippi, leaving behind a human detritus

(Continued on page 58)

MAHLER
SYMPHONY NO. 10
DAS LIED VON DER ERDE
LILI CHOOKASIAN
RICHARD LEWIS
EUGENE ORMANDY
PHILADELPHIA ORCHESTRA
3 RECORDS COUNT AS 2 SELECTIONS

7158-7159. Mahler: Symphony No. 10; Das Lied Von Der Erde
Ormandy conducts the premiere recording of this recently completed symphony; Lili Chookasian, Richard Lewis are soloists in "Das Lied"

The Great Romantic Symphonies
Leonard Bernstein
New York Philharmonic
3 RECORDS COUNT AS 2 SELECTIONS

2911-2912. Bernstein Conducts Great Romantic Symphonies
Franck's Symphony in D Minor; Dvorak's "New World" Symphony; Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony; Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony

"I CAN HEAR IT NOW"
EDWARD R. MURROW
1919-1949
CBS
3 RECORDS COUNT AS 2 SELECTIONS

5853-5854. I Can Hear It Now
Here is Edward R. Murrow's unique "audible history" of 1919 to 1949. The actual sounds and voices enable you to relive the great events of these momentous years

Bernstein Conducts For Young People
New York Philharmonic
3 RECORDS COUNT AS 2 SELECTIONS

7680-7681. Bernstein Conducts For Young People
Peter and the Wolf; Night on Bald Mountain; Carnival of the Animals; The Sorcerer's Apprentice; Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks; 3 more

Now you can save almost 50% on the great Classical Recordings of our time!

Savings are off regular Club prices

TCHAIKOVSKY "Pathetique" Symphony No 6 EUGENE ORMANDY
A Golden Treasury of Great Piano Concertos
TWO-RECORDS COUNT AS ONE SELECTION
MOUSSORGSKY Pictures at an Exhibition Night on Bald Mountain EUGENE ORMANDY
HOROWITZ ON TELEVISION
Brahms SERENADE IN A LEONARD BERNSTEIN
RIDE OF THE VALKYRIES LEONARD BERNSTEIN
OF THE FLOWERS The Great Tchaikovsky Waltzes EUGENE ORMANDY
GREENSLEEVES The Philadelphia Orch. EUGENE ORMANDY, Cond.
THE MORMON TABERNACLE CHOIR'S GREATEST HITS, Vol. II
THE GLORY OF GABRIELI E. POWER BIGGS, organ
GROFE: GRAND CANYON SUITE Bernstein N.Y. Philharmonic
ORMANDY: PHILADELPHIA ORCHESTRA'S GREATEST HITS Clair de Lune Sabre Dance
THE SPECTACULAR CLEVELAND ORCHESTRA
TWO-RECORDS COUNT AS ONE SELECTION
WILLIAM TELL and Other Favorite Overtures LEONARD BERNSTEIN
SABRE DANCE EUGENE ORMANDY Philadelphia Orchestra
HOROWITZ IN CONCERT Recorded Live at his 1966 Carnegie Hall Concerts
Rossini Overtures GEORGE SZELL THE CLEVELAND ORCHESTRA
BEETHOVEN Symphony No.9 ("Choral") EUGENE ORMANDY
A Golden Treasury of Favorite Violin Concertos BEETHOVEN TCHAIKOVSKY MENDELSSOHN
TWO RECORDS COUNT AS ONE SELECTION
MAGNIFICENT MARCHES EUGENE ORMANDY
BERNSTEIN'S GREATEST HITS NEW YORK PHILHARMONIC
JOHN WILLIAMS RODRIGO DODGSON
TABERNACLE CHOIR'S GREATEST HITS EUGENE ORMANDY God Bless America
FAVORITE OPERA CHORUSES from AIDA, CARMEN, 9 others THE MORMON TABERNACLE CHOIR
THE PHILADELPHIA ORCHESTRA'S GREATEST HITS Vol. 3 EUGENE ORMANDY
"ITALIAN" SCHUBERT "UNFINISHED" LEONARD BERNSTEIN
MUSIC FROM 2001: A SPACE ODYSSEY
ORFF CATULLI CARMINA EUGENE ORMANDY
PROKOFIEV LEONARD BERNSTEIN
GRANADOS: 12 SPANISH DANCES FOR PIANO Alicia de Larrocha
PHILIPPE ENTREMONT piano RITUAL FIRE DANCE
GERSHWIN RHAPSODY IN BLUE
TWO-RECORDS COUNT AS ONE SELECTION
TCHAIKOVSKY BALLETS Swan Lake
TWO-RECORDS COUNT AS ONE SELECTION
PHILIPPE ENTREMONT PIANO Fantasy Impromptu CLAIR DE LUNE LIEBESTRAUM
MAGIC FIRE MUSIC Wagner Favorites ORMANDY
MAHLER: Symphony No. 8 Symphony of a Thousand LEONARD BERNSTEIN
KOSTELANETZ Conducts PROMENADE FAVORITES
Russian Sailors' Dance LEONARD BERNSTEIN
Holiday for Harpsichord E. POWER BIGGS
TCHAIKOVSKY: CAPRICCIO ITALIEN
LEOPOLD STOKOWSKI
MAHLER Leonard Bernstein
THE BAROQUE OBOE HAROLD GOMBERG OBOE SEIJI OZAWA
BLESS THIS HOUSE The Mormon Tabernacle Choir
ROBERT FRANCIS KENNEDY A MEMORIAL
TWO-RECORDS COUNT AS ONE SELECTION
VERDI: FALSTAFF Leonard Bernstein
ESPAÑA BERNSTEIN SPANISH FAVORITES
VIVALDI THE FOUR SEASONS Leonard Bernstein

6915 · 6607 · 6703 · 6550 · 6383 · 6481 · 6510 · 6202

6143 · 6141 · 1645 · 3628 · 6920 · 2267 · 3792 · 3767/3768 (2-Record Set)

5569 · [illegible] · 6162 · 5373 · 5236 · 5836 · 3780 · 6084

6152 · 5964 · 6769 · 5407 · 5403 · 3889 · 3760 · 4302

3890 · 3525 · 2652 · 3764/3765 (2-Record Set) · 2704 · 2875 · 2887 · [illegible]

2509 · 6062 · 2570 · 2640 · 7080 · 3595/3596/3597 (3-Record Set) · [illegible] · 2213

© [illegible] Direct Marketing Services 727/S69

Magic Moments From The World Of Great Classics
10 RECORDS COUNT AS 6 SELECTIONS

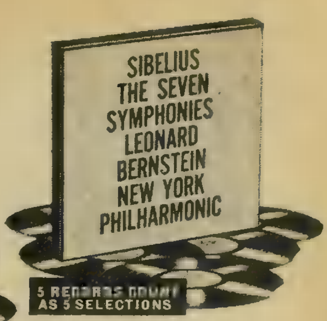
7060-7061-7062-7063-7064-7065. Magic Moments From The World of Great Classics
118 breathtaking selections from the best-loved works of the world's great composers: Mozart, Verdi, Debussy, etc.

THE FOUR SYMPHONIES OF CHARLES IVES
3 RECORDS COUNT AS 2 SELECTIONS

6841-6842. Charles Ives: The Four Symphonies
Three of the finest conductors of our time – Bernstein, Stokowski, Ormandy – in masterful performances of these truly revolutionary works

Beethoven The Nine Symphonies Ormandy Philadelphia Orchestra
7 RECORDS COUNT AS 5 SELECTIONS

2919-2920-2921-2922-2923. Beethoven's Nine Symphonies
Eugene Ormandy and the world-famous Philadelphia Orchestra capture all the drama, lyricism, beauty and excitement of these great symphonies



SIBELIUS THE SEVEN SYMPHONIES LEONARD BERNSTEIN NEW YORK PHILHARMONIC
5 RECORDS COUNT AS 5 SELECTIONS

6880-6881-6882-6883-6884. Sibelius: The Seven Symphonies
Powerful performances by Leonard Bernstein and the New York Philharmonic – from the stirring and romantic First to the mysterious Seventh!

COLUMBIA RECORD CLUB

now invites you to take

ANY 11

for only $4.98

if you join the Club now and agree to buy only nine more records during the coming year

TERRY RILEY IN C
MUSIC OF OUR TIME
COLUMBIA

7082

MOZART
FOUR SONATAS FOR PIANO AND VIOLIN
GEORGE SZELL, piano
RAFAEL DRUIAN, violin

5839

BERLIOZ
SYMPHONIE FANTASTIQUE
SEIJI
Conductor
TORONTO SYMPHONY
CBS

5532

MUSIC OF JUBILEE
Bach Favorites for Organ and Orchestra
E. POWER BIGGS
COLUMBIA

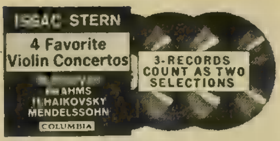
1605

Trans-Electronic Music Productions, Inc. presents
SWITCHED-ON BACH
COLUMBIA

7150

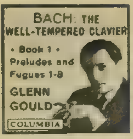
RACHMANINOFF
No. 1 in D minor
EUGENE ORMANDY
Conductor
THE PHILADELPHIA ORCH.

5234



ISAAC STERN
4 Favorite Violin Concertos
BRAHMS
TCHAIKOVSKY
MENDELSSOHN
COLUMBIA
3-RECORDS COUNT AS TWO SELECTIONS

1940/1941

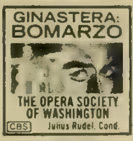


BACH: THE WELL-TEMPERED CLAVIER
Book 1
Preludes and Fugues 1-8
GLENN GOULD
COLUMBIA

1264

MAHLER
"Resurrection" Symphony (No. 2)
LEONARD
N.Y. Philharmonic
Tourel · Venora
Collegiate Chorale
COLUMBIA

2348/2349
(2-Record Set)

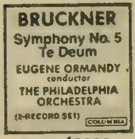


GINASTERA: BOMARZO
THE OPERA SOCIETY OF WASHINGTON
CBS
Julius Rudel, Cond.

6210/6211/6212
(3-Record Set)

BARTOK: COLUMBIA
Concerto for Orchestra
JANACEK: Sinfonietta
GEORGE SZELL
Cleveland Orchestra

2479



BRUCKNER
Symphony No. 5
Te Deum
EUGENE ORMANDY conductor
THE PHILADELPHIA ORCHESTRA
(2-RECORD SET)
COLUMBIA

5898/5899
(2-Record Set)

LORD'S PRAYER
MORMON TABERNACLE CHOIR
COLUMBIA
BATTLE HYMN REPUBLIC
LORD'S PRAYER–9 MORE

1090

Beethoven Fifth Symphony
COLUMBIA
BERNSTEIN
N.Y. PHILHARMONIC

[illegible]

Here [illegible] [illegible] wonderful opportunity to get, at once, 11 classical recordings for less than the price of one! Yes, it's true – if you join the Columbia Record Club now, you may have ANY 11 of the superb recordings offered here – ALL 11 for only $4.98. And all you have to do is agree to buy only nine more records during the coming year.

In short, within [illegible] year you'll have a sizable library of 20 classical recordings of your own choice – but you will have paid for just half of them . . . that's practically a 50% saving off regular Club prices!

Free Music Magazine. You'll have no problem in selecting records during your membership, because each monthly issue contains up to 300 different records to choose from. In addition to a dazzling list of great classical records each month, you will be able to choose hit albums from every field of music.

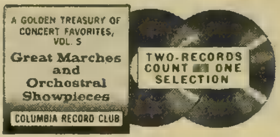
You may accept the monthly classical selection . . . or take any of the other records offered . . . or take [illegible] record in any particular month.

Records sent on credit. Upon enrollment, we'll open a charge account in your name . . . you pay for your records only after you have received them – played them – and are enjoying them. They will be mailed and billed to you at the regular Club price of $5.98 (Popular, $4.98), plus a mailing and handling charge.

Generous bonus plan. As soon [illegible] you complete your enrollment agreement, you will automatically become eligible for the Club's bonus plan – which entitles you to one record free for every record you buy! There are no "savings certificates" to accumulate, no delays, no limitations – every time you buy a record, you get another one free.

Mail the coupon today! Just write in the numbers of the eleven records you want, for which you will be billed only $4.98, plus postage and handling. Send no money now – just mail the coupon provided at the right.

Note: Since stereo records may now be played on monaural phonographs, and cost no more than monaural records, all of your records will be sent in stereo.

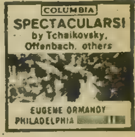


A GOLDEN TREASURY OF CONCERT FAVORITES, VOL. 5
Great Marches and Orchestral Showpieces
COLUMBIA RECORD CLUB
TWO-RECORDS COUNT AS ONE SELECTION

6848

STRAVINSKY
L'Histoire du Soldat
LEOPOLD STOKOWSKI conductor
(2-RECORD SET)
VANGUARD

5320/5321
(2-Record Set)



COLUMBIA
SPECTACULARS!
by Tchaikovsky, Offenbach, others
EUGENE ORMANDY
PHILADELPHIA

2244

RAVI SHANKAR
IMPROVISATIONS
WORLD PACIFIC

6092

BRAHMS
PIANO CONCERTO No. 2
RUDOLF SERKIN
Piano
GEORGE SZELL
Conductor
THE CLEVELAND ORCHESTRA

5372

Richard Strauss
ALSO SPRACH ZARATHUSTRA
COLUMBIA
ORMANDY
Orch.

1680

PORTS OF CALL
Clair De Lune
La Valse
Bolero
COLUMBIA
PHILADELPHIA ORCH.
EUGENE ORMANDY

1296

COLUMBIA RECORD CLUB, Terre Haute, Indiana 47808

Please enroll [illegible] [illegible] a member of the Club. I've indicated below the eleven classical recordings I wish to receive for only $4.98, plus postage and handling. I agree to purchase nine more recordings during the coming year . . . and I may cancel my membership at any time thereafter. If I continue, I will [illegible] eligible for the Club's generous bonus plan of one record free for every record I buy.

SEND [illegible] THESE 11 RECORDS FOR ONLY $4.98

Name...
(Please Print) First NAME Initial [illegible] Name

Address...

City.......................................State...................Zip..........

Do You Have [illegible] Telephone? (Check One) ☐ YES........NO ☐

APO, FPO addressees: write for special offer

209-8/z9

COLUMBIA RECORD CLUB

TERRE HAUTE, INDIANA 47808

CRC Where classical collectors get the best buy!

SERKIN PLAYS BEETHOVEN FAVORITES
Emperor Concerto
Pathétique
Appassionata
COLUMBIA
TWO-RECORDS COUNT AS ONE SELECTION

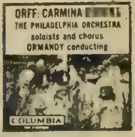
6947

BEETHOVEN SYMPHONY No. 8
MENDELSSOHN SYMPHONY No. 4
("ITALIAN")
PABLO CASALS
THE MARLBORO

4387

VLADIMIR HOROWITZ
Chopin · Liszt
Rachmaninoff
Schumann
COLUMBIA

1067



ORFF: CARMINA
THE PHILADELPHIA ORCHESTRA
soloists and chorus
ORMANDY conducting
COLUMBIA

1281

of the unemployed and unskilled, miners and farm hands ignorant and maimed by their former trades, to whom we then minister with inadequate, short-term welfare programs, insufficient and unappetizing surplus foods, and so-called rehabilitation courses during which hundreds of boring and impertinent hours are scheduled to teach work habits (or the filling out of IRS forms) to men without the prospect of a job.

This is the post Kennedy-Johnson-OEO rural South, a seeming disaster area, but that same South which, we are told, is rapidly changing, being reformed. To the rural poor such changes mean that they are being squeezed off lands put in soil bank to migrate to the big cities of the Northeast, Midwest and California. To black tenant farmers it guarantees discriminatory agricultural services and growing quotas, at best; at worst, being thrown off your land for joining a co-op, or "redishin" to vote.

In short, if you're black, or just poor, it means that all the institutions of a purposely inadequate welfare state apparatus, administered for and by the privileged, can be turned against you so that an application for relief is viewed as anti-social behavior, the practical effects of your ignorance about birth control as lust, and the suffering and deaths of your loved ones as neglect.

With the eye for telling visual details, the ear for moving diction, of a skilled TV documentarian, and the outrage of a good journalist (but with only occasional lapses into bathos, sentimentality, special pleading), Paul Good has been able to put back all of that living nightmare quality into a Southland that has been bleached out for us by decades of chamber of commerce propagandists. It's a nightmare in which children die of starvation and disease while state governments turn down inadequate federal assistance programs as one way of encouraging the black man to go North. The rich and powerful are subsidized; the poor and weak are left to practice free enterprise; and the function of community action programs, alas, is to insure that the local socio-political-economic structure remains unthreatened.

As Good wisely points out, the effects go beyond the Mason-Dixon line. His report is based on a trip he took in the summer of 1967 when Newark and Detroit were burning at the hands of some of these refugees from federally subsidized genocide while the phony-baloney poverty hucksters were advising liberals and reformers to concentrate their efforts on the Negro's family structure.

Good's manner is impressionistic; he seeks to move us by evoking the scene, the people (often at the expense of explaining how the various political shenanigans occur), but he integrates this with interview data, the hard facts of incomes, policies, and who is doing what to whom. The problem is: who cares? Who really gives a damn? In the end, we all still prefer to blame it on the backwardness of the poor. In Orwell's day they were said to keep coal in their bathtubs; now we think it is a matter of who is sleeping with momma. We just don't care to know about any other kind of human evil. How does one go about relating to economic murder, malnutrition or the overkill of Kentucky's defoliation? Or public health policies of free enterprise pediatrics in our enlightened and modernizing era? How to swing with it?

Even interested parties, such as state civil rights commissions, are apt to be disconcerted when they are forced to look beyond their legalistic official rhetorics at this revival of Southern tribalism which our middle-class-oriented, technoparl, "modernizing" South is working toward. I recall reading some testimony by black Mississippians who told the civil rights people that they lived outside the cash economy, landless, workless, disease-ridden, hungry, without friends. One liberal member of the panel was astonished. He asked how they were managing to get by. The black faces replied: "That's just it. We're trying to tell you we're dying . . . dying."

I submit that to get people to really consider that fact is like asking Americans to dream that they will some day choose socialism.

MAN WITH BROOM

Driving home alone or with Angela,
I saw a sad 4:00 a.m. light in the windows of one room in a gradeschool by the road.

He's alone,
sweeping, looking at the floor
in front of him:
maybe twelve more years of school.

GEORGE BOWERING

Model-City Murder

SAMMY YOUNGE, JR.: The Story of the First Black Student To Die in Today's Liberation Movement. By James Forman. Grove Press. 282 pp. $5.95.

CHARLES SHAPIRO

Mr. Shapiro teaches in the English Department at Briarcliff College.

It seems a million years ago, the Southern summers of 1964 and 1965. College students and teachers, mostly Northern, mainly liberal, journeyed into Alabama, Mississippi and Georgia to help work on such projects as freedom schools and voter registration. Though there were beatings and jailings, a good deal of steady fear and much brooding self-analysis, there were also the wonderful moments: the singing in churches before the marches, always ending with We Shall Overcome; the obvious improvement of what seemed, at first, to be almost helplessly backward students; the potential voters who, after all the threats, the cowardly night attacks and the doubt, did finally register.

But there was always the knowledge among the white volunteers that this was, in essence, a hit-and-run operation, that they were leaving before the job was done and, for many, the painful and increasing awareness of being resented and often hated—not merely by the white community, for this was to be expected—but where it really hurt, by the young black militants. Black Power was on the way, nonviolence was soon to be openly denounced both as a philosophy and tactic, and the Northern white liberal didn't quite understand why he was no longer loved, admired or listened to. Those who longed to be martyrs too often ended up as clowns.

For me, one of the black men who epitomized this attitude was Sammy Younge (whom I met briefly and admired) who seemed to delight in constantly putting down the eager white volunteers. After reading James Forman's biography I begin to understand. This careful study of Sammy Younge's tormented life and death (he was murdered on January 3, 1966, at the age of 21) is presented via a series of connected interviews with those who knew him best. It is the story of an extremely light-skinned Negro from a conservative black community (the "model city" of Tuskegee, Ala.), a portrait of an often effective but too often wild militant. If ever there was a born leader it was Sammy Younge. And if ever there was a confused man, often irresponsible, it was Sammy Younge. As this biography shows, he was all too dedicated, all too selfish, all too human. A mixed-up and exciting fighter whose eventual maturity, if it came, would have helped us all. Sammy Younge's life, his hang-ups, could be studied with profit by all those white liberals who continue to insist on being loved or even liked by black men at a time when this isn't possible.

What I remember of him are just a few scattered moments: Younge, driving like a maniac as he veered his Volkswagen around Alabama dirt roads; his open contempt for too many of his allies; and the two times I received the famous open smile so often mentioned by Forman's informants. They were probably the only two moments when we made real contact.

Both times were outside a Methodist Church in Tuskegee. As the book so well documents, Tuskegee was unique, "as a pocket of black affluence amid the poverty of a typical Black Belt county, and as a center of high educational and professional achievement in a seat of semiliteracy (white as well as black)." Along with some Tuskegee Institute students and some outside agitators Younge was trying to integrate the church services to prove to a community that was too proud of its accommodation to the status quo that all was not as it seemed. He had spent some time in an Eastern prep school, a fairly common experience for the more affluent blacks from the Tuskegee middle class, and he had often played the game of passing as white for the amusement of his buddies. That Sunday, he pulled back his shirt sleeves to prove to the deacon who was barring our entrance that, in fact, the church official's skin was darker than his. I was stupid enough to laugh. The deacon threatened to punch my head in and, stealing an often used line, I replied that if it were part of the churchman's religion to clobber people on Sunday, why go right ahead. Younge smiled. A week later, outside the same church (the little homily of the week posted on their bulletin board to the effect that God commands all Christians to make proper use of their leisure time) we were set upon by a mob swinging bats and bottles, carrying knives and guns. After it was over I was leading Sammy Younge's friend, Wendell Paris, who was bleeding from a serious head wound, into my car and got into a brief hassle with an officer. Sammy, standing by, threw me his second smile. What I did not know then was that Wendell had been injured protecting Younge, who had had one kidney removed while in the Navy. The other kidney was only partly functioning, and any blow to his side might have been fatal. His civil rights agitation was, in a real sense, a life or death proposition.

His death came six months later. Forman heard the announcement over a New York City radio station. "Samuel Younge, Jr., a student at Tuskegee Institute, was killed last night at a gas station in Tuskegee, Ala. Samuel Younge had been active in civil rights activity

Why America needs war In this shocking new book, Dr. Juan Bosch, former President of the Dominican Republic, documents a disastrous new form of imperialism practiced by America called "pentagonism." Under "pentagonism" — the war machine of the mother country exploits not her colonies, but her own people, using them as a source of labor and taxes to support an economy based on a perpetual state of war.

Dr. Bosch, who has seen the American military machine in action in his own country, offers firsthand insight into how "pentagonism" works and how it justifies its actions to the rest of the world. His book is must reading.

PENTAGONISM
A SUBSTITUTE FOR IMPERIALISM
BY JUAN BOSCH

$5.00, now at your bookstore, or order directly from GROVE PRESS, 315 Hudson Street, New York, N. Y. 10013. (Please enclose payment with order including 25¢ postage) in the county. It is reported that he was killed while trying to use a white rest room at the gas station. Civil rights leaders plan massive demonstrations protesting his killing."

An article in The Nation ("Murder in Tuskegee: Day of Wrath in the Model Town" by Arnold S. Kaufman, January 31, 1966) has discussed this murder and the effect it had on the Tuskegee community. Needless to say, the killer was freed, the anger began to fade, but in some ways, Tuskegee Institute, and perhaps the town itself, would never be the same. Sammy Younge was their conscience.

Forman's work is at its best when Sammy's friends are heard from, but Forman's interjections are often an intrusion. The editor, for example, wastes too much time in a personal attack on Martin Luther King's role in the famous Selma march. What should have been important, for the sake of this book, was the effect it had on Sammy Younge.

For this biography is important as it shows us Younge's development, his hopes and his gradual exhaustion. His death served as a catalyst to others, but to try to understand his life might add knowledge to fervor. We try to do our best. But for the Northern liberal who often feels betrayed by former black colleagues Forman's book should prove that to be unloved is not exactly the ultimate punishment.

THEATRE / Harold Clurman

Tyrone Guthrie has written "What we of the 20th century have inherited is not a Shakespearean tradition, it is merely a legacy of 19th-century conventions." If, despite all the erudite guesses, we know little about how Shakespeare was acted in his day, we know even less about the performance of the classic Greek drama. And if we did know there would still be little point in producing those plays as they were done in the fifth century B.C. Theatre is as much the creation of its public as of its artists.

When Guthrie chooses to direct The House of Atreus—which is the Oresteia of Aeschylus as adapted by John Levin—for the Minnesota Theatre Company with an almost all-male cast (there are several women in the Chorus) and with all the play's characters completely masked, who shall say him nay? The masks and the costumes, which appear to be made of metal, induce a hieratic atmosphere; the vocal ambiguity resulting from the masculine sonorities in women's roles removes a sense of common humanity.

So far, so good: the masks and costumes are extraordinarily striking. The voices—particularly those of Lee Richardson as the Watchman, Agamemnon and Apollo; of Robert Pastene as Aegisthus, and of Douglas Campbell's Clytemnestra and Athene—possess admirable timbre. Robin Gammill's Cassandra is memorably poignant in its plaintiveness, while his Elektra expires in utterly woebegone tones.

The adaptation, except for the intrusion of prosaic clichés which may be designed for "comedy," is a lean and lucid extract from the mighty waves of sound and sense of the original as translated by acknowledged scholars.

But no play ever emerges; we receive only fragmentary impressions. Not without surprise, I laughed occassionally; by and large I remained indifferent. At no time was I convinced that Guthrie believes in the play as a serious statement about life. Guthrie's prodigious talent moves in the area of robust comedy. It is addicted to playfulness and to swirling melodrama; it is alien to tragedy. Occasionally in The House of Atreus he seems to guy the proceedings: a fact particularly notable in the final episode of the trilogy. Where Aeschylus may have intended irony, Guthrie's "atheism" winks.

The greatness of the Oresteia is its total vision of human history as an endless skein of crime, retribution and further agony to which men must adjust, find "right" and finally glorify. "God's most lordly gift," says the text in Richard Lattimore's translation, "is decency of mind." This is grandeur. Aeschylus' scope is the cosmic: he wishes to say everything possible about all of life. Of this the production gives no more than a provincially formalistic inkling. One may regard it as an ambitious and thus commendable gesture, but it is more theatre exercise than flight of the spirit toward tragic wisdom, which is the essence of Aeschylus' art.

The demands of Brecht's The Resistible Rise of Arturo Ui are modest compared to the Greek challenge; thus the Minnesota Theatre Company makes a pretty good and, in one respect, a brilliant, show of it. I might perhaps be more enthusiastic if I had not seen the Berliner Ensemble in one of the most completely realized productions anywhere in the theatre of the past twenty years, or that of Warsaw's Contemporary Theatre, which was fierce rather than funny. Still, the Minnesota production under the direction of Edward Payson Call is superior to that of Tony Richardson's in 1963, because, for one thing, in that fancy exhibit the director was more interested in himself than in the play.

Brecht wrote Arturo Ui in 1941. It was first produced in 1958, two years after his death, when its "lesson" was pertinent to a generation which had already begun to forget or never knew what had happened in Germany between the depression and the advent of the Nazis.

Brecht decided to make his instruction humorous. Another motivation for the style he chose to employ in this instance, a parody of Schiller's verse combined with elements of Shakespeare's Richard III, was to rob Hitler of any charisma which might still attach to his memory. Brecht made him a clown of the sort only a degraded society could have mistaken for a hero. His Arturo Ui is a mock gangster show, absurd in plot detail and in its bombastic doggerel. At every point Brecht makes unmistakable the analogy between his story of petty racketeers in a mythical Chicago with the rise of Hitler.

I was given evidence that he succeeded in this and that his enterprise is still useful when the young lady who was my guest at the show asked, "Did all this really happen?"—referring not to the crazy events of the play but to the historical recitation which is its "Chorus." So that the closing speech addressed to the audience by the actor playing Hitler continues to have a rousing impact: "If we could learn to look without gawking, we'd discover the truth in the heart of farce. If we could act instead of talking, we wouldn't always end up on our arse. This is 'the thing' we nearly mastered. Don't yet rejoice in his defeat, you men, for though the world stood up and stopped the bastard, the bitch that bore him is in heat again." Though more elaborate than the original German, George Tabori's translation is remarkably apt.

The focal point in the Minnesota production is Robin Gammill's Ui. He is not a better actor than Christopher Plummer, who played the role for Tony Richardson, but his Ui is more extravagantly vivid, vocally exciting and physically graphic.

There is a slight but significant contradiction between what the interlocutor says in the course of the evening about Big Time Buck White and what the playbill prints. In the latter it is called "a Play by Joseph Dolan Tuotti"; in the performance Big Time (the man himself) declares in answer to a question: "This is not a play but a meeting. If we had advertised it as a meeting you would not have come to see it."

Play or meeting, it is something which happens happily on the stage of the Village South Theatre at 15 Van Dam Street. First produced in California under the auspices of Budd Schulberg's Watts Writers Workshop, it is partly improvised by the original cast which still acts it here.

It is eminently worth seeing—and hearing: I phrase my commendation this way because the most original attribute of the show is its language. It is not routine black man's lingo or hippie talk, though it resembles both; it is speech new minted in the mouths of the actors or the folk of the vicinity. It is richly expressive.

Almost completely identified with the show's language is the cast that speaks it. One gets the impression that the dialogue is the spontaneous explosion of the company's impulse. I shall not name any of its individual members because they are all integral to the play's texture, and thoroughly winning.

In robust frolic the show kids the innumerable splinter groups which may rise within the "civil rights" movement. It is in no wise a tract but a cartoon lark, a kind of stage jazz developed from a serious theme. The figures are fun-loving, rambunctious, competitive, canny, conniving, teasing, crooked and upright by turn—and always convincingly "real." The "ideology" of freedom, of kinship among all races, is communicated more naturally here than in most shows which aim at "reform" through exhortation. There is nothing so embarrassing in the theatre as the presentation of minority types as model human beings. Big Time Buck White is joyously free of that practice.

Very pleasant too and in every respect most agreeably presented is God is a (Guess What?), a light morality play about a lynching (!) written by Ray McIver with nice music by Coleridge-Taylor-Perkinson, produced by the Negro Ensemble Company at the St. Marks Playhouse, 133 Second Avenue.

Coming back to Broadway, Murray Schisgal's Jimmy Shine, at the Brooks Atkinson, is a comedy which deals with the kind of disoriented youth who lives in complacent disorder, a fellow supposedly typical of the beat and the hip.

The show's chief asset is Dustin Hoffman, an actor with a true gift for wry characterization. He was at his best in the Donald Ribman play (inspired by Turgenev) which was given several seasons ago at the American Place Theatre. He was also very good in Henry Living's Eh? at the Circle in the Square. He is also good without precise characterization, as in Jimmy Shine, because he is naturally a "character."

His quality is one of disengagement from every situation in which he finds himself: he always stands a little outside, looking in with a curiously bemused skepticism. He fits his present role perfectly. But I would suggest that he seek parts which require more particular delineation. Playing his quality only, he will repeat the pattern of his personality and become monotonous.

Also very tasty is Eli Mintz as a fishmonger. The "musical" number about the profits and pleasures of the fish business which Mintz and Hoffman do together is the high spot of the show.

It has other bright moments but it is composed of gags rather than observations. The material is similar to that of Huui Huui, recently produced at the Public Theatre, a play in which I found a certain health. That health was certainly not in its central figure—a would-be poet as Shine would be a painter—but in the author's understanding. Schisgal's play, even if it were proved autobiographical, is not written with true fellow feeling but with an eye to surface events. It is shoddy showmanship.

POWER IN THE KREMLIN FROM KHRUSHCHEV TO KOSYGIN
by Michel Tatu

"A rigorous, even daunting, analysis, impeccable in its handling of prime Press material and authoritative enough to stamp real meaning upon the confused and involved course of the Kremlin's politics since 1960. . . .

"Gives the most closely argued account of Khrushchev's role in [the Cuban crisis] presently available. . . .

"So cogent is Mr. Tatu's analysis of the past and the immediate past that his observations on future developments clearly command close attention." —JOHN ERICKSON, Sunday Times (London)

640 pp., index $10.00

THE VIKING PRESS
New York 10022

FILMS / Robert Hatch

Ingmar Bergman is a man sensitive to human suffering, but over the years it has become increasingly ambiguous whether this awareness moves him to compassion or disdain. Pain disfigures and, aside from his Protestant implacability, I feel in Bergman an aesthetic withdrawal from a species so prone to it. His viewpoint is not only stern but remote.

Thus it is characteristic that when, in Shame, he makes an anti-war film, the war seems less an affliction than a punishment. Bergman is quoted (in Atlas) as saying that he made it "to convey the intense fear I experience," and yet the catastrophe described does not seem one that could conceivably happen to him.

As in almost all Bergman films, guilt broods over Shame. The central couple, both musicians, have fled the threatened city to live on an offshore island, and there they stubbornly blot out the darkening rumors of war. But it is clear from the start that they are blotting out much more than that. The man (Max von Sydow) is afflicted by a nervous disability that on occasion immobilizes and dehumanizes him. Thus when he turns bestial under the shock of bombardment one does not know whether to attribute his deterioration to the war or to an accelerated subjective decay. The wife (Liv Ullman) demands a child of him, but it seems evident that what she really seeks is the security of his masculinity. He does not have that to give, and their life together is subject to ugly outbursts and abject apologies. They are hideously ill at ease and in misery have turned their backs on so much common experience that it might be thought war befalls them because their induced aphasia makes them susceptible to external disaster. It may be that Godard is saying we are all guilty of war because we do not prevent it, but with his couple he does not indicate that any prevention, even any protest, was within their power. They resemble the Vietnamese, on whom bombs fall like a virus.

The war, when it reaches the island is nasty, but it does not look like modern war. It resembles rather armed delinquency. Like Godard in Les Carabiniers, Bergman does not want to acknowledge war's technical proficiency. Since its ends are mad, its means must be seen as feckless, a matter of neighborhood viciousness. But it does no good to deny war its competence, and the effect is to make the combat soldier the agent rather than the instrument of evil. I doubt that the revulsion against war can be propagated by reducing it to lethal bullying.

This particular conflict sweeps in upon the couple from one quarter and then there is an eye of calm. Into this steps Gunnar Bjornstrand, the local commissar, again playing one of Bergman's self-proclaimed hollow men. That character is one of his tics, and it doesn't much interest me because I don't much believe in it. There is a taint of easy poignancy about the self-indicted husk; I don't say he is synthetic, but the empty men I have met have for the most part been full of themselves.

The wind of war shifts, cutting down the commissar (whom the husband will not save because he has caught the man copulating dolefully with his wife in a ruined greenhouse). The couple then drag themselves toward the coast—the husband now reduced to the point where he will kill a boy for a pair of boots—and the illusory safety of flight in an open boat for hire to refugees with ready cash. The master of this crowded, unprovisioned vessel lets himself overboard in apparent remorse for taking his charges on a journey into the void (personal guilt dominates the film to the end), and the castaways drift into a sargasso of dead troops, which they attempt in feeble horror to fend off with boat hooks and oars. This is a "big scene"; it will be harked back to for years to come. It is, I think, too obviously labored over, and it is extended so far beyond its shock value that one begins to study its mechanics (how many of the "corpses" are floating extras, how many mere bundles of ghoulish gear?) with appraising curiosity. The film ends effectively with the boat a rind of expiring life on the horizon of an otherwise featureless sea.

RECORDS

FREE 40 PAGE CATALOG offers hundreds of recordings of rare Renaissance, Baroque and Classical music. Some records priced as low as $1.00 each! All late recordings in stereo only. MHS RECORDS, Box [illegible] NA, New York, N. Y. 10023.

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, ALgonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

PERSONALS

BIRTHCHART/HOROSCOPE computed and drafted for reference and display 9½ x 11. Send $5.00, date, time and place of birth. INPROMA, Box 224, Lake View, N. Y. 14085.

HIGHLY educated, interesting, do-gooder wants to meet female. Write Mr. L., 522 Van Duzer, Staten Island, New York 10301

PARTICIPATE in an intriguing nationwide dating project for alert, literate, Jewish singles. For FREE literature write, giving age, to: OPERATION MAZEL TOV, 550 Fifth Avenue, N.Y.C. 10036.

MEET YOUR IDEAL MATE. Computerized Dating Service (All Ages). "Let TEAM Make You a Team". For FREE questionnaire write: TEAM Project, 245 E. [illegible] St., New York, N.Y. 10016

The Best Way
To Get
THE NATION

THE NATION 1-13-69
333 Sixth Ave., New York 10014

☐ One Year, $10
☐ Two Years, $18
☐ 6 Months, $6

☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed

(Add $1 per year postage for Canada; $2 foreign)

Name ....
Address ....
City ....
State .... Zip No. ......

As film making, Shame is one of Bergman's great pictures. Its texture is a grainy, volcanic gray—very pure—with the sky providing the bright, cold gleam of metal. As often with Bergman, it uses objects sparely and with respect, so that everything well made can be appreciated (though there is one scene in which von Sydow takes out his violin and lectures his wife on its history, which seemed to me absurd between musicians who had been living together for years). There are haunting passages—a Hill of Calvary scene, for example, and when the boat arrives the emergence of the refugees from among the rocks, like marmots streaming from their burrows. The photographer is Sven Mykvist and he deserves great credit.

As for Bergman, he deserves great respect, but his stature diminishes as he withdraws. Artists cannot avoid observing and judging, but they must also manage to participate. Bergman, it seems to me, no longer does so: we are down here and he is out there, and I ask myself how he won that immunity. The situation can be seen in that last shot—a spark of life, remote and fragile on the knife of the horizon, awaiting extinction in the blink of Bergman's eye.

Jules Dassin, who is ever on the lookout for ingenious ways to instruct us, has rescreened Liam O'Flaherty's novel, The Informer, as a melodrama of Negro militancy. He calls it Up Tight.

SELF-PORTRAIT AT THIRTY

At last I've mastered getting nowhere. Even my shadow, as I kill time, comes from behind
to surpass me.
It is an awkward moment.
But I tip my hat to him,

his to me.

PHILIP DOW

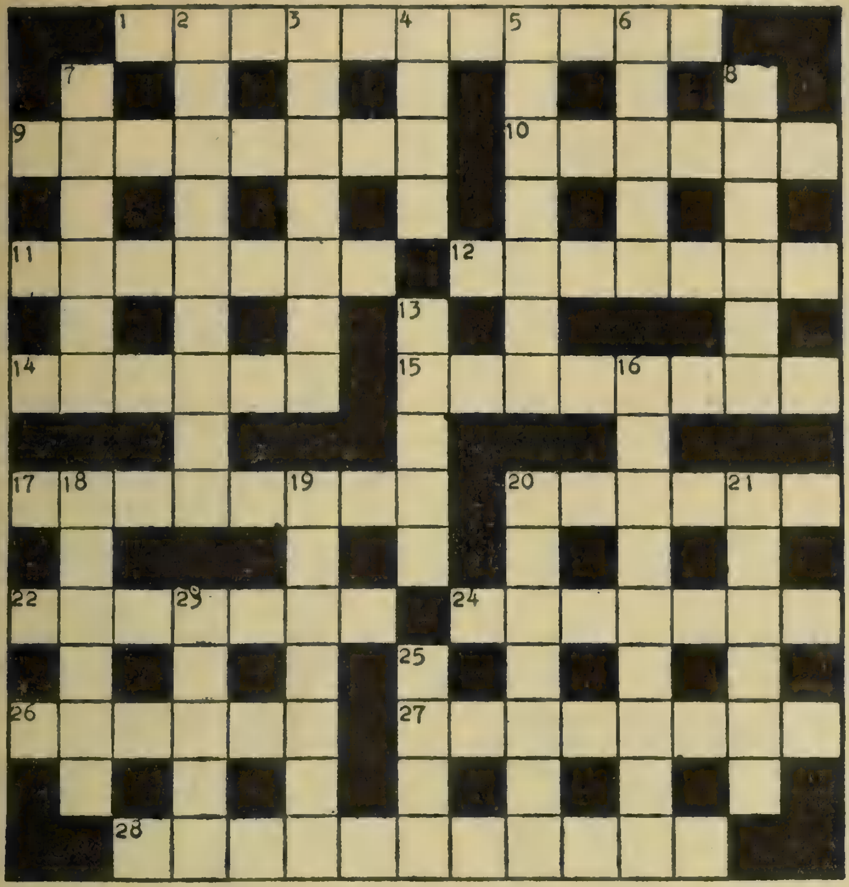
The cast, including Raymond St. Jacques, Ruby Dee, Frank Silvera, Roscoe Lee Brown and with Julian Mayfield, until now a writer, in the title role, looks fine, but seems self-conscious with mission and very much aware of Dassin as the boss. The text, on which Mayfield and Miss Dee assisted the director, is a compulsive glossary of all the clichés, pro and con, that have grown up around the black revolution. The disconcerting effect is that the performers, while they look like real people, sound like brainless puppets. If the young Negroes who have repudiated and to a considerable degree supplanted the nonviolent movement are really this much addicted to mental knee jerks and ritual action the future is indeed unpromising. Flamboyant dress and assertive behavior are understandable and not unattractive, but rote thinking is a disaster in any group, and particularly in one that has decided to lay violent hands on its destiny.

I no longer remember in detail the action of The Informer, but I doubt that it could have been as knuckleheaded as it now seems in this version. How is it conceivable that a group of ruthless urban guerrillas would turn a weak member out into the streets to be snapped up by the first police agent who notices him drifting by? They could have locked him up, they might well have killed him; sending him to Coventry is schoolboy stuff, entirely out of character with the vaunted implacability of the "movement." Mayfield plays the pariah role with a good deal of feeling, but it is a weary business waiting for him to flounder into the inevitable snare.

Of course, Dassin may intend to warn the country, and particularly the blacks themselves, that ignorance of human nature and the history of uprisings is leading the movement into disaster. But I doubt that he was so motivated or that this cast would have willingly abetted him in such a venture. O'Flaherty's story was grim enough, but it played against the background of Ireland's eventual emancipation from the Crown; it does not seem to me likely that it would have been resurrected—rather awkwardly, for the details hardly coincide—unless those overtones were intended. In any case, Dassin, if he was issuing a warning, should have been explicit, and not allowed the viewer to wonder whether the implication he senses are no more than ineptitudes of presentation.

Crossword Puzzle No. 1280

FRANK W. LEWIS



ACROSS

1 The last mark of the man of letters, perhaps winding up a court appearance. (5,6)
9 Having many relations. (8)
10 Points of view for old people? (6)
11 Reveals a number of things, when ordered to be so. (7)
12 See 13 down
14 Rather restricted pose about art, looking back at it! (6)
15 Up to a certain time in the bottom of the fortress? (8)
17 Teardrop in the shape of an owl, perhaps. (8)
20 Responds as a modern source of power does? (6)
22 The sort of mousetrap a helper might want to make? (7)
24 See 13 down
26 Place in Italy where work has to be organized about four. (6)
27 Given a lift (by the British, particularly)? (8)
28 Turning ill-gotten gains into it shows a certain amount of provocation. (11)

DOWN

2 See 13 down
3 One that might crawl to a stop on the street? (7)
4 Look like someone in Burke's? (4)
5 Stretches out and tacks on either side of them? (7)
6 See 19 down
7 Like Gray's ray serene. (6)
8 Canal boat? (6)
13 2 down, 24 across, 23 down and 12 across Implying captured fliers couldn't be exchanged on a one-for-one basis, particularly if Australian. (1,4,2,3,4,2,5,3,2,3,4,)
16 Romeo, for example. (9)
18 Such as Harvey might be Welsh as a matter of course. (6)
19 and 6 down Present type of free speech? (3,4,2,3)
20 Honor a point of view? (7)
21 One who makes doilies out of a rag? (6)
23 See 13 down
25 Might be a good safe opener! (4)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1279

ACROSS: 1 Bar Association; 9 and 12 Catcher in the Rye; 10 Chiefly; 11 and 23 Square number; 14 Heckler; 15 Ended; 17 and 21 down Shallower; 19 Cuticle; 21 Overtake; 25 Elastic; 26 Emanate; 27 Permissiveness. DOWN: 1 Backstops; 2 Retouch; 3 Spherical; 4 Ogre; 5 Incinerate; 6 Thigh; 7 Offered; 8 Dyne; 13 Place kicks; 15 Encourage; 16 Deserters; 18 Average; 20 Embrace; 22 Totem; 24 Kepi.

Readers are invited to send for a free copy of Mr. Lewis' "ground rules." Address Puzzle Department, The Nation, 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014.

PUBLICATIONS

BOOKS LOCATED on any subject. Extensive Search Service. Satisfaction guaranteed. Hoffman Research Service, 124-N Whitmere Road, Irwin, Pa. 15642.

SOCIETY FOR THE PROMULGATION OF THE UNDERGROUND PRESS (SPUP)
The support of those who are interested in the news, etc., that is suppressed by the conventional press is invited.
SPUP, 434 East High, Lexiington, Ky. 40508

'THE PRESS AND THE BAY OF PIGS'

A detailed study by

Victor Bernstein and Jesse Gordon

The role played by The Nation in breaking the Bay of Pigs story to the American public, reprinted from the Fall issue of Columbia University Forum.

Single copies—15c; 25 copies at 10c each
Orders over 25 at 7c per copy

THE NATION

333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014

WORKERS WANTED

PHYSICIAN, PHARMACIST, Spanish-speaking RN wanted: 1 year old rural California medical clinic with 6,000 patients, mostly Mexican-American, Okie and Filipino farm laborers, needs professionals with energy and interest in community medicine. Should be interested in helping train community people—in medical-legal test cases, in group therapy and education programs, in helping build community medicine residency with university hospital. No government fund involved. Two year commitment asked. Should be eligible for COs after 2/1/69. Low wages. Write or visit: David Brooks, M.D., Salud, Woodville, Calif. 93257.

The Nation

BOOK SERVICE

Offers the following at a discount:

☐ VIETNAM FOLLY by Sen. Ernest Gruening and Herbert W. Beaser (National Press, $8.95) $7.15

☐ FRIENDSHIP AND FRATRICIDE by Meyer A. Zeligs (Viking, $8.95) ...... [illegible]

☐ THE GOODBYE LAND by Jose Yglesias (Pantheon, $4.95) .... [illegible]

Remittance accompanying orders should be made payable to THE NATION, 333 6th Ave., N.Y. 10014

Readers can avail themselves of our regular offer to send them any book (except paperbacks), published in the U.S. at the retail price post-free. When ordering, please give title, author and publisher.
1-13-69

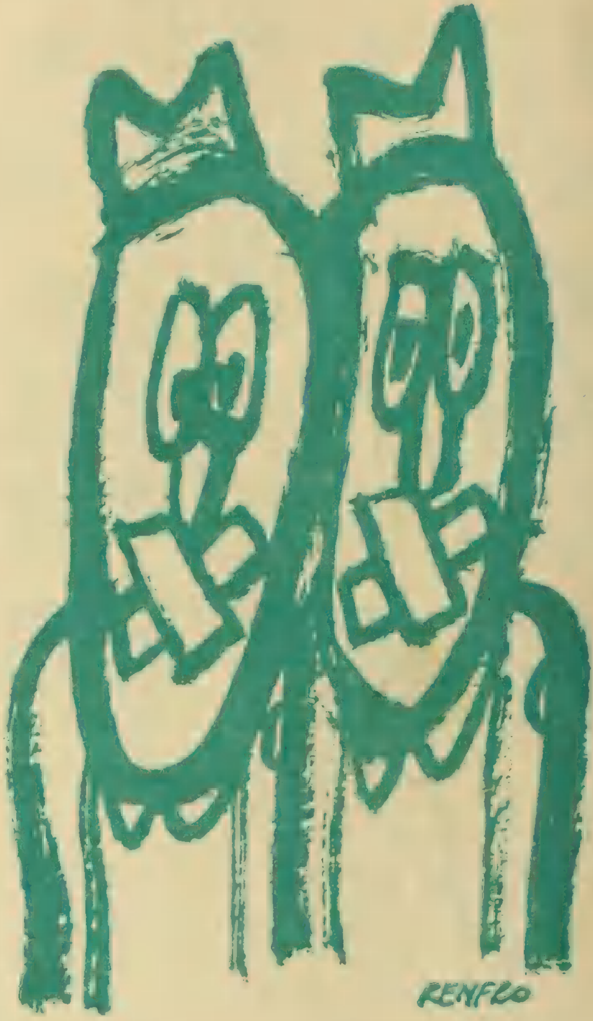
Printed by Milford Publishing Inc., Milford, Conn.

Do we need your subscription?

Frankly—yes. Without loyal support, we couldn't continue. And it's always a struggle.

But we're not just asking; we're giving. We offer our subscribers information, stimulation, a forum for unpopular opinion.

Join the voices in the wilderness. Subscribe now. Who knows? Someday "we" may outnumber "them."



BONUS OFFER: If you join us now for 1 year, we will add four bonus issues to your subscription free of charge.

THE NATION 333 Sixth Avenue New York, N.Y. 10014

☐ I'll join you for 1 year (48 issues). I enclose $10 and understand you will add four bonus issues to my subscription.

☐ I'll try you for 6 months (24 issues). Enclosed is $6.
(Add $1 per year postage for Canada & Mexico; $2 other foreign.)

Name ....

Street ....

City .... State .... Zip ....

N1-13

The good fight is now in THE NATION —Why not join now?

FIRE CONTROL AT THE UN ANNE TUCKERMAN

THE
NATION

JANUARY 20, 1969 35 cents

5-69R PL-5337
BURLINGAME PUBLIC
LIBRARY
BURLINGAME CA 94010

BURLINGAME
JAN 20 1969
LIBRARY

Civil Rights
NIXON'S FIRST TEST
GARY ORFIELD

Life on the Line
Conversation with Cleaver
HENRY E. WEINSTEIN

'Buy Something' 5 Myths of Consumership
DALLAS SMYTHE

French Characters HAROLD CLURMAN

Joey and Sebastian Grown Up SHAUN O'CONNELL

LETTERS

on their own

Little Rock, Ark.
DEAR SIRS: Just finished reading Edward Witten's "Rhetoric of Ambivalence" [The Nation, Dec. 16] and I hope that his opinion of the New Left is not shared by too many of our young college students. . . .

Mr. Witten seems to think that a radical movement has to be tied into another radical movement to be successful. Student radicalism toward college administrations doesn't necessarily have to be linked to Black Power advocacy or labor movements to be successful. On their own, the labor radicals of the early 20th century helped to push labor to its high point of today. Radical students have overturned governments in South America, and student protests in America have lead to the "resignation" of a President and a change in foreign policy.

The New Left is just a name for a group of ever changing individual radical movements that can be successful individually. If the students, Black Power advocates, radical laborites and other radical groups were ever to successfully merge, then the downfall of the New Left would come. The New Left would then emerge as the norm and not the radical.

Sgt. Joseph A. Van Jossen

mailman's fight

Ithaca, N. Y.
DEAR SIRS: John Stark ["A Letter Carrier Fights Back," The Nation, Jan. 6] has for several years been a friendly, courteous mailman. He reads and thinks, and we have had many pleasant conversations. Last November, however, I discovered that he is a hero, and I suspect that 25,000 other Ithacans have made the same discovery. Stark is courageously bucking the postal system . . . at considerable risk to himself and to his family. I think he will win his case, but in the meantime he will need some financial support. The address is: 413 North Geneva St., Ithaca, N. Y. 14850. Incidentally, I am writing this without having consulted Mr. Stark. He will probably be embarrassed. He is that sort of person.

Robert B. MacLeod

next mission

San Antonio, Tex.
DEAR SIRS: With the spectacular success of project Apollo, the Nixon Administration will be hard put to it to think up a program that can capture the imagination of the nation. The national goal of landing on the moon having been virtually achieved, what national goal does the Republican Administration have for the next four years?

One that could engage the energies of the nation and achieve many subsidiary goals is a program to blow up the moon before the next Presidential election. . . . With man literally making rings around it . . . the moon is seen for what it actually is—a useless hunk of matter. It might have served a purpose in lighting the path of wayfarers in primitive times, but modern man has far better ways of finding his way around. A crude and ineffective way of providing light, the moon is offensive to anyone acquainted with modern theories of illumination.

Blowing up the moon would be a warning to all potential aggressors, terrestrial or extraterrestrial, of the awesome powers in the hands of the nation. The goal of national security, which everybody is striving for, would be immeasurably enhanced. It would, indeed, be the ultimate deterrent. . . . By destroying a lifeless planet, the United States would have demonstrated its belief in the basic sanctity of all forms of life.

Thein Wah

EDITORIALS

The Packard Dilemma

According to James Reston (The New York Times, January 8), when Robert McNamara resigned as president of the Ford Motor Co. in 1960 to become Secretary of Defense, his net loss was estimated at slightly more than $4 million. That is, after his seven years of service in the government, the appreciation of his Ford holdings (which he was obliged to sell), plus accrued dividends, lost salary, and possibly some stock option arrangements, would have totaled more than $4 million.

Mr. McNamara was a harsh taskmaster at the Pentagon, in the sense that while he was a big spender he tried to get the government its money's worth and to quash some of the fantastic projects that the generals and admirals sought to put over. There is no reason to believe that if he had been allowed to retain his stock, Mr. McNamara would have given Ford a better break than it got during his term in office, but the conflict of interest would have been blatant. Divestiture was a ritual that had to be performed. And it is to be noted that, far from rushing back to the lush pickings of the military-industrial complex, and there restoring his shattered fortunes, Mr. McNamara took another job in government service.

The case of David Packard, Mr. Nixon's appointee as Deputy Secretary of Defense, is far more complicated than that of Mr. McNamara in 1960. Mr. McNamara worked his way up in the corporate hierarchy and was adequately rewarded for his services, however valuable. In contrast, Mr. Packard is one of the founders of the Hewlett-Packard Co., a leading electronics firm which, perhaps even more than Ford, is in the thick of the military-industrial complex. As board chairman of the company which he largely created, Mr. Packard owns, with Mrs. Packard, 3,610,700 shares, worth approximately $289 million at the market. Dumping more than 3 million shares of an important company would create chaos on the New York Stock Exchange, and even the prospect of a gradual distribution would seriously depress the stock, which is now quoted at about 80.

In an effort to solve the problem without losing his nest egg, Mr. Packard has offered to turn over his shares to a short-term trust managed by members of the Hewlett-Packard board, with profits, if any, going to charity. Should the stock rise while Mr. Packard is in office, the gains will likewise be donated to charity. What is left, which presumably will not be too painfully depressed, will be returned to Mr. Packard on his retirement.

There is every reason to believe that Mr. Packard is entering on his Pentagon duties with only the purest of motives, yet the proposed trust arrangement does not really solve the problem. For even though Mr. Packard, with $300 million, more or less, under the mattress, could have little concern about whether his stock goes up or down a few millions during his absence, he must have some solicitude for the aerospace, electronics and other military-oriented industries as a whole, and what is good for them will be good for Hewlett-Packard.

Congress will probably accept the trust arrangement as the best that can be made. It has the outward appearance of equity and solicitude for the public interest, and there is a real need for someone with Mr. Packard's technical background to advise the Secretary of Defense. Yet it is a compromise that will not satisfy some observers. As Hobart Rowen points out in The Washington Post (January 5), Packard is "the very prototype of the industrialist half of the complex that owes much of its success to the vast U.S. military budget." Rowen continues the argument by calling attention to the pressure for a continuance of big military budgets after peace is concluded in Vietnam, and questions Packard's ability to view impartially questions relating not only to his own company but to the whole philosophy of defense spending.

On this ground he is critical of Packard's appointment. But almost anyone else who had the necessary experience and know-how would be in the same position, with only a quantitative, not a qualitative or moral, difference. The only real solution would be to shrink the military-industrial complex to a magnitude actually required for defense. If anything of the sort happens under the Nixon-Agnew Administration, it will be a miracle indeed.

A Shift Not a Shake-up

The election of Sen. Edward Kennedy as Democratic Whip in the Senate by a 31-to-26 vote, and of Sen. Hugh Scott as Republican Whip by a 23-to-20 vote, represents not the highly significant "shake-up" it has been reported to be but rather a slight shift in power within both parties. Senators Kennedy and Scott should be distinct improvements over Senators Long and Hruska, but their victories reflect only a slight shift in power (the voting in each case was close) from the right wing of each party toward the center. Both the Dixiecrats in the Senate and their counterparts, the Far West and Midwest conservative Republicans, gave a little ground to their respective oppositions. In brief, it is a development that deserves to be mildly applauded but not "hailed" as a major triumph.

Senator Long, incidentally, was not the only loser in the Senate vote. The reasons which Senator McCarthy cited for supporting him were not at all convincing. Dislike and distrust of "the Kennedys" might be a reason for abstaining, as might personal political indebtedness to Senator Long. But personal political loyalty scarcely justifies a vote for Long. At some point, such loyalties must be subordinated to what is best for the party and the nation.

The Welfare Burden

As cities and states face the new year, it is abundantly clear that most of them are in serious financial trouble. From Los Angeles, an innocent among the big cities, comes word that the government faces "the darkest financial crisis in its history," with anticipated appropriations far outstripping sources of revenue. Connecticut will probably double its sales tax in order to meet the expected deficit. Wisconsin, a frugal state under a Republican Governor who promised a surplus, is faced with a huge deficit

MAR 2
Apr 28 69
NOV 2

IN THIS ISSUE

January 20, 1969

EDITORIALS

66

ARTICLES

70 Fire Control at the UN
Anne Tuckerman

71 Color in the Classroom:
There Is No Panacea
Ivor Kraft

74 Life on the Line:
Conversation with Cleaver
Henry E. Weinstein

77 Scholarship or Commitment:
A Hassle of Historians
James Gilbert

79 Civil Rights:
Nixon's First Test
Gary Orfield

82 "Buy Something":
Five Myths of Consumership
Dallas Smythe

BOOKS & THE ARTS

85 Joey and Sebastian Grown Up Shaun O'Connell
86 Isolated Successes Stanley Meisler
88 French Characters Harold Clurman
89 Playing the Game Harry Barnard
90 Where are the Playwrights? Catharine Hughes
92 The Third World (poem) Lawrence Ferlinghetti
93 Music David Hamilton
94 Theatre Robert Hatch
95 Crossword Puzzle Frank W. Lewis

Publisher
JAMES J. STORROW JR.

Associate Publisher
GIFFORD PHILLIPS

Editor
CAREY McWILLIAMS

Associate Editor
PHIL KERBY

Executive Editor
ROBERT HATCH

Literary Editor
HELEN YGLESIAS

Copy Editor, MARION HESS; Poetry Editor, JOHN LOGAN; Theatre, HAROLD CLURMAN; Art, MAX KOZLOFF; Music, BENJAMIN BORETZ; Science, CARL DREHER; Advertising Manager MARY SIMON.

Editorial Associate, ERNEST GRUENING

Washington, ROBERT G. SHERRILL; Paris, ALEXANDER WERTH; London, RAYMOND WILLIAMS; Bonn, C. AMERY; Canberra, C. P. FITZGERALD; United Nations, ANNE TUCKERMAN.

The Nation is published weekly (except for omission of four summer issues) by the Nation Magazine Company and copyright 1969 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014, Tel: CH 2-8400 West Coast office (for editorial correspondence only); 825 South Barrington Avenue Los Angeles, Calif. 90049. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. and at additional mailing office.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Add $1 per year postage for Canada and Mexico; $2 other foreign.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Book Review Index and the Public Affairs Information Service.

THE NATION
Volume 208
No. 3

caused largely by an "unprecedented increase" in welfare costs. New York City, where deficits are eternal, needs an additional $500 million, but the word from Albany is that the state itself seeks $700 million in new revenue.

A common theme runs through all these stories: the welfare burden is increasing. New York City is, of course, a special case, but its figures are instructive. Ten years ago, the city spent $235 million on a welfare caseload of 239,000 people. Today the city has 1 million on welfare —one out of eight New Yorkers—and the budget request for welfare is now $1.7 billion. According to Welfare Commissioner Jack R. Goldberg, it is "perfectly conceivable" that the relief population could reach 3 million in the next decade. This constitutes an insupportable burden —insupportable, that is, in its present distribution of roughly 37 per cent federal, 33 per cent state and 30 per cent city. If there is anything to the proposition that there is no resisting an idea whose time has come, it should be possible today to shift the entire welfare burden—in stages—to the federal government, where it belongs.

The case for federal assumption of welfare responsibility is unassailable. First of all the problem is national. "The welfare phenomenon in New York," to quote Mr. Goldberg again, "is a national phenomenon. What's happening is happening in every urban community in this country, and what is necessary is for some specific and pointed changes in national, social and political policy." In Great Britain, as in most European countries, eligibility determination and funding are regarded as national responsibilities. And with the exception of welfare, most subsidy programs here—maritime subsidies, farm subsidies, etc.—are nationally administered. No one suggests, for example, that the city of Des Moines should make a "contribution" to the farm subsidy program. Migrants from Southern rural areas require assistance in the cities to which they are drawn, but the cities did not create the "push" behind the migration. Increased mobility alone is a strong reason for national administration of welfare.

Federal administration would remove the sharp discrepancies in standards and practices which currently exist and would be much more efficient. Welfare imposes an enormous administrative burden on cities, diverting energies and attention from problems which cities might be in a position to do something about—they can do little to minimize welfare caseloads. Local administration creates tensions and frictions, which in turn aggravate problems of municipal government.

Full assumption of welfare responsibility by the federal government could be accomplished for a sum which the Pentagon would regard as a pittance—by some estimates no more than $3.5 billion. President Nixon has had an able task force at work on welfare and related problems, and they have given serious consideration, we are told, to the desirability of shifting, by stages, the welfare burden to the federal government. This might give Congress a better understanding of the social consequences of policies for which it is responsible, and it might also dampen enthusiasm for larger military appropriations. Even a slight adjustment of the welfare-warfare ratio in the allocation of federal funds would be a step—if not a giant step—in the right direction.

Changing the Guard

The return of Ambassador Averill Harriman from the Paris peace talks will conclude the latest chapter of the long career of an energetic, patient and gifted man. In the unlikely event that Mr. Harriman never again lifts a finger in the public service, his community, his state and his country will remain deeply indebted to him.

Henry Cabot Lodge, who will replace him in Paris, has been lately denounced for his espousal, in the past, of the misguided war in Vietnam and for his perverse defense of the odious Saigon government. His repeated and clumsy misinterpretations of the Vietnamese situation clearly disqualify him, it is said, from occupying the U.S. seat at the peace table, in whatever shape it finally materializes. But of this we are not entirely sure.

If it is Mr. Nixon's determination to negotiate a swift settlement, who is in a better position than Ambassador Lodge to slap down, finally and without recourse, the pretensions of the preposterous Ky and his entourage? If even Mr. Lodge is impelled to repudiate his old protégé, Ky's farcical game should be ended once and for all.

Moreover, if Mr. Nixon foresees that peace can come only through compromise—which the American intransigents will decry as being "soft" on communism—he may be protecting his position in advance by sending into the fray a man whose reputation with regard to Communists is hard to the point of mulishness. If Mr. Nixon's strategy embraces one or both of these gambits, his diplomatic talent would have to be rated rather high. It could be.

Political Peonage

From the moment when we first learned of the extraordinary political generosity of the Seafarers' International Union, which bestowed $100,000 on the Democrats under rather unusual circumstances (see "Finger Pointing," The Nation, December 16), we have wondered how this union —by no means one of the largest—could spend money in politics like a sailor on shore leave. Its political fund is said to be the biggest maintained by any union.

Now, thanks to the curiosity and enterprise of The Wall Street Journal, we know where at least a large part of the answer is to be found. (The Journal also turned up the original story about the union's large gift to the Democrats, which was made in the wake of a ruling by Dean Rusk denying Canada's request for the extradition of Harold C. Banks, who had jumped $25,000 bail and fled to this country after being convicted of a conspiracy charge involving the beating of a rival union leader.)

It seems that the Seafarers have, over a period of years, collected unreported "contributions" from alien seamen. These seamen work on high-paying ships that fly the American flag—ships bound, for example, to Vietnam. Some of the ships are owned by the government or chartered to the Pentagon's Military Sea Transportation Service. Many, perhaps most, of the alien seamen are not even members of the union. They are needed because many American seamen jump ship in ports such as Subic Bay, in the Philippines, or Yokohama, in Japan, or get sick, or simply want to return home.

All told, the Journal estimates that several hundred thousand dollars have been contributed by these alien seamen to the union's political fund. Some individual "contributions" have been as high as $500 for a single voyage, with the donors not knowing the names of the candidates, nor the candidates the precise source of the funds. To say that these aliens "contribute" is a euphemism; they have little option in the matter, and indeed the whole procedure has the smell of a shakedown.

If American members of the union had been the sole contributors, then the 12,800 men would have had to contribute $39 each to account for the $497,338 which the union collected for political purposes through November 10 of last year. By contrast, the average steelworker or auto worker gives $1 a year for political activities. Under the Federal Corrupt Practices Act, public accounting is required only for contributions to candidates for President, Senator and Representative. But this year the Seafarers, in addition to such contributions, paid out $20,000 in speaking fees to Congressmen and $313,000 in campaign contributions to candidates for state and local office. Granted that the Seafarers have a vital interest in legislation—perhaps a more direct interest than other unions—still the way the union has been spending money in political campaigns now takes on special interest, in view of what is known about a major source of these funds. Union officials, of course, refuse comment. However, a combination of federal agencies, or possibly a Congressional committee, should be able to provide an answer to this question: what percentage of the funds so lavishly spent in politics by the union is contributed by alien seamen unable to vote in U. S. elections?

The Gadflies

One of the difficulties that confronts every conscientious reporter, even those imbued with the crusading spirit, is that most of the people he interviews are personally nice fellows and it is no pleasure to crucify them in print. The lower they are in the corporate or governmental hierarchy, moreover, the less point there is in giving them the works. The big shots, on the other hand, are not easy to reach and when the reporter does succeed in setting up an appointment, they often manage to persuade him of their good intentions, their duties to their stockholders (or the higher bureaucracy) and their own limited powers.

Ralph Nader is an exception to this journalistic weakness. His guiding principle is that the bigger they are, the harder they fall. He has been both forceful and fortunate. When he launched an attack on General Motors (first published in The Nation), some professional maligner in the company's employ tried the usual tactics, which backfired so badly that Nader became famous overnight.

Prominence has not mollified him in the least. He celebrated the new year by building a fire under the Federal Trade Commission, whose pants had been flammable for years, if anyone had had the temerity to apply a match. A team of seven investigators, organized by Nader, has completed a 185-page report calling for the resignation of Paul Rand Dixon, the head of the commission, and demanding a thorough overhaul of this agency's somnolent practices. According to John D. Morris, who reported on these salutary events in the January 6 New York Times, the investigators spent three months last summer interviewing officials and checking files, and such was their enthusiasm and persistence that they became known around the offices as "Nader's Raiders." Nader himself disclaims the honor; all he did, he says, was give the team, the members of which paid their own expenses, "some guidance and some leads." The active head is John Schultz, a 1968 graduate of the Yale Law School, which supplied a $500 grant. But without Nader's name, the project would probably never have been undertaken.

The FTC has been investigated before, but not by a band of law school guerrillas. In 1949, a commission headed by former President Herbert Hoover called the commission's record "disappointing" and said it had become "immersed in a multitude of petty problems." The Schultz team was more blunt; it said that "alcoholism, spectacular lassitude and office absenteeism, incompetence by the most modest standards and lack of commitment to their regulatory missions are rampant at these [high staff] levels."

Coming down to cases, the investigators accused the commission of relying too heavily on complaints by aggrieved consumers, instead of going out into the field, particularly in ghetto areas, or monitoring television commercials and the other kinds of hornswoggling that have become an accepted part of the American "free enterprise" system. Another commission failing is its touching confidence in "voluntary" enforcement by industry; too seldom, therefore, does it go into the courts and force compliance with reasonable standards of probity.

Recruiting practices are what one would expect. Partisan politics permeate the offices, graduates of Southern colleges are favored over those of Ivy League schools, and Negroes are hired "in their place," which is usually in the four lowest civil service categories.

This new and blunt report is refreshing and its importance is recognized by a long story in Advertising Age (January 6) under the caption "Naderites Blast FTC for Foot Dragging." A whole catalogue of frauds is listed—irritating mouthwashes, snide cigarette ads, subtle deception through image manipulation, and "the creation of demand through associations with sex, fear and power fantasies." The Advertising Age account is, in fact, much more severe than the one in the Times. And in another story in the same issue, Advertising Age reviews the gentle treatment of Geritol, which has been under a cease-and-desist order since December, 1967. What it amounts to is that Geritol's advertising agency experiments with formulas that will deceive the suckers as efficiently as before, while satisfying the lenient FTC requirements.

The Schultz-Nader report may signal the beginning of the rise of a new social ethic in the United States. A group of young lawyers and law professors, inspired by a successful crusader against the untrammeled evils of business, have here taken their social responsibilities seriously and put a negligent agency on the spot. One of them has the name of William Howard Taft IV. He does honor to his name, and so do all his colleagues to theirs.

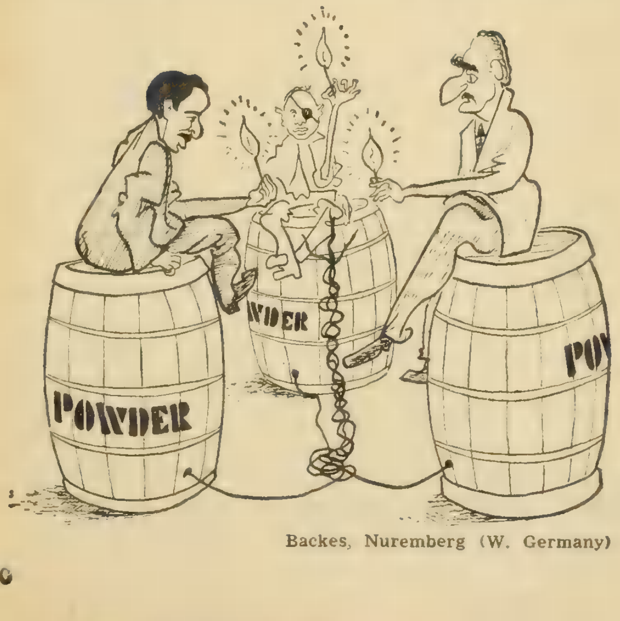
FIRE CONTROL AT THE UN

ANNE TUCKERMAN

The new year has brought a sense of renewed urgency to the task of finding a political settlement of the Middle East conflict, lest the rising spiral of terrorism and violence lead once more to a full-scale war. The Arab commando attack on the El Al plane at the Athens airport and the massive retaliatory blow inflicted by Israel on Lebanese civil aircraft—which was unanimously condemned by the Security Council—are but the latest manifestations of the guerrilla warfare which characterizes the present phase of the Palestine conflict. It has become obvious in diplomatic circles outside the Middle East that the situation must not be allowed to continue in this fateful direction.

A more effective political effort must be undertaken than a police precinct role (in the words of the representative of Brazil) now being played by the Security Council—it takes down complaints of incidents after they occur—and the disappointing mission of Ambassador Gunnar Jarring who, through no fault of his own, has been able to function up to now only as a letter box. The Soviet Union is especially eager for new initiatives because it finds itself in a position not unlike that of the United States in 1965, when Washington had to decide whether or not to increase its commitment in Vietnam. Moscow is being pressed by Cairo and other Arab states for additional military assistance, but is reluctant to supply them, lest they precipitate another Arab military venture. This time the Soviet Union might not escape involvement as easily as it did during the six-day war.

The alternative to this course is a political settlement, which Soviet diplomats have been urging on President Nasser with some measure of success. The natural framework for such a settlement is the Security Council resolution of November 22, 1967, which set forth among its basic principles the evacuation by Israel of recently acquired Arab territory, the cessation of Arab belligerency against Israel and freedom of navigation for all through Suez and the Straits of Tiran. (The reopening of the Suez Canal is a priority item for Soviet expansionism and its shipping of supplies to North Vietnam.)



Backes, Nuremberg (W. Germany)

The U.A.R. has announced its acceptance of this resolution as a "package deal," the timetable to be arranged by Ambassador Jarring. Israel continues to assert that each point must be the subject of agreements between the parties, in the presence, if necessary, of the United Nations mediator. Weary of losing diplomatic battles after winning military victories, Israel denies the right of any UN organ, or any outside power—or powers—to impose a settlement.

So far, the United States has backed the Israeli formula for direct negotiations between the parties, and the Johnson administration in its dying days was not likely to change its attitude. The Soviet Union hopes that under the new Administration a reorientation of American Middle East policy will produce a more "balanced" attitude that would translate itself into pressure on Israel by the withholding of arms. The Nixon team is proceeding very cautiously on this difficult terrain and is not likely to show its hand prematurely. However, the raid on Beirut airport—in response to which the United States for the first time condemned Israel—may provide a new element, because Lebanon is the only Arab country in the Middle East where a Western political and economic orientation survives—with American help. The government crisis brought about there by the Israeli attack may be followed by a dangerous upheaval of the sort only too common in the area.

In this climate of increasing tension, the United Nations—or rather its corridors and private chambers—provides an excellent ground for careful diplomatic moves between the big powers. President de Gaulle has revived an earlier suggestion—supported by U Thant—for a four-power conference or consultation to promote a settlement in the Middle East. The Soviet Union has emphasized the UN angle and is at present carrying on a major diplomatic campaign to have the permanent members of the Security Council (that is the same "four powers": the United States, the USSR, Britain and France) work out a formula to implement the November 22 resolution. As an additional enticement for support in international circles, Moscow is hinting at a territorial guarantee which would be exercised by four-power forces stationed, under the aegis of the Security Council, on both sides of the Arab-Israeli borders.

The detailed formulation of this program in carefully planned leaks is part of the war of nerves that Moscow is determined to wage on Israel, and which the Beirut episode has made easier. The big question that remains is whether or not President Nixon will decide to explore such schemes seriously. Will he be willing—and able—to exert pressure on the Israeli Government to accept a settlement on terms other than its own?

COLOR IN THE CLASSROOM

THERE IS NO PANACEA

IVOR KRAFT

Mr. Kraft, formerly child development specialist with HEW, now professor at Sacramento State College, has written frequently for The Nation on educational issues.

At the start of this decade, the educational debate reached a peak of heat and complexity not previously matched for a generation. The elements principally contributing to the emotionalism were integration and compensatory education, with minor controversy supplied by busing and IQ measurements. Cultural deprivation was an evil to be stamped out: normal achievement was a standard difficult to define.

Recently something new has been added to the Babel of voices and viewpoints. It is called community control or decentralization of the inner-city or ghetto schools (although it can be applied across the board to all the large-city systems). The question arises: have we entered a new stage in the great educational debate of our era? In order to show that we have not, a short summary of how things currently stand in education must be provided for those who do not regularly attend the debate.

The movement to integrate the schools across class and race lines is seriously wounded and languishing, but it is not yet dead and never will be. Some promising steps have been taken in Syracuse. Berkeley, somewhat of a special case but with a Negro enrollment of 41 per cent, has chosen complete desegregation, with support from black moderates and militants. Communities as diverse as Galveston, Tex., and Pontiac, Mich., are giving the Berkeley approach serious consideration. Complete integration remains the only logical and morally defensible long-term solution of America's public school problem, which is a white and not a black problem.

Even when achieved, however, integration is no panacea. Many teachers are themselves inept in a racial situation, they harbor conscious and repressed prejudices, they are fearful of confronting race conflicts, they resent having to live with a whole new set of psychological tensions. The children too have problems. Even a 7-year-old can be a confirmed segregationist, and some black children are ashamed of their color, having been indoctrinated to a sense of inferiority. These and similar problems are tenacious, and it will take more than one generation to achieve truly creative racial harmony in our land, where racism has been the rule for 300 years.

In a previous Nation article ("Retreat to Separate but Equal," November 27, 1967) I mentioned some of the evidence then available as to the effectiveness of remedial programs in black schools—"compensatory education," it is called. The verdict then of ineffectiveness and failure stands after a year. The More Effective Schools (MES) program of New York City is all but forgotten. Early childhood education (Head Start) does some good, but not much. Oddly enough, remedial and compensatory programs are perhaps best justified in higher education, despite conventional wisdom to the contrary.

Few bother any longer with the old chestnuts about IQ and cultural deprivation. More alert researchers take it for granted that ethnic minority children have adequate intellectual endowment, and that it is a failure of the schools and not the children when this endowment does not surface. Preoccupations with once popular cultural deprivation ideas are seen as useless, since they are only crudely descriptive, not prescriptive.

We have learned to be wary of the power of the courts to redeem public education. The fourteen-year struggle to implement Brown vs. Board of Education has been sobering. Still, not all is lost. Now shaping up, in Michigan and Illinois, are test cases to challenge unfair state allocation procedures, which routinely reinforce fatter educational budgets for the suburbs at the expense of the needier central cities. [See "The Quality of Inequality" by Thomas P. Wilbur, The Nation, December 23.] This may result in more just apportionments, but it will by no means funnel enough money into the slum schools to resurrect them.

Seductive notions about the blitzkrieg power of nursery, elementary and secondary schools to lift the poor from poverty are also being abandoned. Those who run America's elementary and secondary schools have never dared to change the class and social order, and even if they did they would fail. Higher education is something else again, for by the end of the century more than 80 per cent of the citizens will attend colleges and universities. These adult student bodies and faculties will wield potentially great power for influencing America's chief institutions. Even now they command 35 per cent of the total educational budgets, and that percentage will grow. Today's wild and woolly student radicalism is not a transient digression from panty-raiding. Long overdue, it is an evidence of talent, conscience and emerging power (witness the influential anti-Vietnam activities of the campus).

But there is as yet no counterpart to such a power base at the elementary and secondary levels. There masses of children are being managed by a corps of teachers who are mediocre, meek and underpaid. Not only are they timid and prim in their middle-class status; they are inordinately protective of their professionalism, and unlike college faculties cannot be prodded and shamed into activism by their student constituencies.

While there is no power base for change in the elementary and secondary schools, there can be no doubt that a "power structure" rules the roost in American education. But it is a structure, not a monolithic center. The rulers are not an autocratic junta who impose their policies at will. The structure of power has three key elements, with conflicts among them: the fiscal authorities, the conservative boards of education and the mass teachers' organizations (NEA and AFT). There are certain peripheral factors—including the federal government, the courts, the lay citizens' groups, the schools of education—but these enter into the power structure only insofar as they affect the allocation of the money, hiring or firing of superintendents, and the control of teachers.

Does anything unite all elements of the educational power structure? Yes, briefly it is this: a desire for docile, conformist schoolrooms (law and order) which will successfully process the individual child through his 16th or 17th year, at which point he will enter either the college, the labor force or the armed services. All else, including intellectual achievement, spiritual growth, creative exploration, optimum development, freedom and joy, are sacrificed when they interfere with a lawful and orderly processing of children through the grades. The fiscal authorities, the boards, the administrators and teachers are united in dread of anything that may rock the boat of public elementary and secondary education with its $34 billion budget, 45 million pupils and 2 million teachers.

This does not mean that American public education is a wasteland of unmitigated mediocrity and conformity, as we often hear. Not quite so. A power structure rules the roost, all right, but it does not say where each egg shall be laid. Schooling can be deadly, yet there is something so intrinsically healthy about learning and teaching, at root it is such a nonconforming and individualized process, that it is bound to make allowances for human yearnings and exuberance. Quite a few children are doing good things, under decent teachers, in the best suburban schools.

Moreover, one tricky admission must be made in favor of the power structure—it is tricky, because the point is so easily misunderstood in the absence of a thorough discussion. Simply put, it is that a minimum degree of law and order must prevail in the schools if education is to go forward. Freedom, respect for the child, joy are simply not enough. Children must be told on occasion to shut up, and they must do so. They must not constantly bullyrag one another and their teachers. And when managed in groups they absolutely must learn to read and write by the 4th grade, otherwise all else reduces to futility.

With respect to the inner-city public schools, it is folly to romanticize the renascent element in ghetto unrest. Black is beautiful, but the ghetto is not, nor are its schools. America has never had a noble poor, black or white. In America, the goal has always been to get out of poverty as rapidly as possible. And when masses of the children of the poor are crowded into squalid, inferior schools, they do not behave like noble learners but like troubled, suppressed kids who reflect the wretchedness of their environment and upbringing. Bertrand Russell, who for a number of years ran an experimental school—and not for slum children—learned early that freedom and respect for the troubled child was not a cure-all:

> Whatever may have been the cause, many of the children were cruel and destructive. To let the children go free was to establish a reign of terror, in which the strong kept the weak trembling and miserable. A school is like the world: only government can prevent brutal violence. And so I found myself, when the children were not at lessons, obliged to supervise them continually to stop cruelty. We divided them into three groups, bigs, middles, and smalls. One of the middles was perpetually ill-treating the smalls, so I asked him why he did it. His answer was: "The bigs hit me, so I hit the smalls; that's fair." And he really thought it was.

Does this sound like a plea for law and order? It isn't. Russell and his wife put freedom, creativity and joy above law and order, but they realized that to get the former they did require a minimum of the latter.

Ghetto children are not maimed for life, and they can learn. But the atmosphere of the inner-city slum school is profoundly alien to learning. Community control will not dissipate this alienation. Only massive budgets—three and four times those now available—and extraordinarily dedicated and wise teachers (so rare that when one comes along, he spends a year in the classroom, writes a book, and then moves on to something else) can salvage the inner-city school. That is why, during the past decade, those who have known the score about public education have never been taken in by crash programs, compensatory education, teaching machines and schemes of reorganization; but have insisted from the start that only an end to class and racial isolation in the schools will initiate a regeneration of public education in America.

Community control does not bring with it increased budgets. That is obvious. But neither does it bring with it a new breed of teacher. The majority of black teachers are products of third-rate black teachers' colleges; their chief aim in life is to get away from the ghetto, not to sanctify it. Their major skills, alas, are those of custodianship. To be sure, here and there certain faddish devices will be introduced by community leaders, but children are not so easily conned. Dashikis, natural hair-dos, soul music in the cafeteria, and introductory Swahili all have some symbolic significance, but the children will still leave these schools unable to read and write. Moreover, dashikis and the rest can easily be absorbed into the educational establishment, which in its day has absorbed jitterbugging, sex education, conversational Chinese and the miniskirt. There is nothing in community control which threatens the white bourgeoisie, the black bourgeoisie, the Ford Foundation or a really clever union leader.

Speaking of union leaders and the Ford Foundation, a word is in order about the recent New York City fracas. It is instructive, but one must not generalize from it to other big-city systems. New York's educational Armageddon, still inconclusive, is unique. No other city has such a massive system, such a Byzantine educational bureaucracy, a union so militant and sure of itself, or an ethnic confrontation so intricately explosive as that between a 50 per cent Jewish teaching corps within black metropolitan communities numbering nearly 2 million. When to this is added inadequate budgets and raging politics, it becomes obvious that the New York situation does not invite solutions; it encourages survival tactics to avoid annihilation. The teachers fought, or thought they fought, for basic security, and who can blame them? A powerless and enraged community, long deluded by spurious promises of integration, fought for some measure of power, and who can blame them? The Ford Foundation and the bureaucracy were caught in between, but they were less blameless. They must have known that they were inviting chaos. Like the wily British promising the Holy Land to the Jews and the Arabs, it is as if they had got together and said: "Let's give them everything they want, and then wash our hands of the whole thing." Of course, not one got what he wanted.

McGeorge Bundy, in offering his scheme for New York City, said that it had nothing to do with power, and everything to do with better education for children. It is precisely the other way around. Assuming that we get various decentralization plans for the hundreds of inner-city schools of New York, Detroit, Philadelphia, Washington, D.C., and elsewhere—and it will come easier in most places than in New York—after the dust settles the schools will continue very much as they were before. Here and there a courageous and enterprising community board may recruit some really fresh blood to staff its schools, and there will be the usual honeymoon episodes. That is no different from what we have been getting occasionally from reform boards of education. But in the end the old pedagogical creeds will prevail; the slightly modified power structure will settle into a slightly modified rut. There will be certain redistributions of power and, as we all know, power is its own excuse for being. Certainly more blacks, Puerto Ricans and Mexican Americans will become principals and administrators, as they should. But this will merely repeat a phenomenon made familiar by the war on poverty: the slogan says maximum feasible participation of the poor, but the outcome is more upward mobility for the minority middle classes. That is good, but will it make the children well taught?

As for the somber and extreme argument that decentralization and community control will sink us deeper into the mud of segregation, producing the permanent institutionalization of inferior black schools, that view is probably no longer defensible. It is hard to imagine the black inner-city schools as being much worse than they are today. The trend is toward separate but equal, but community control is a response to this trend rather than its cause. Nor is community control necessarily hostile to integration in the long run. Under present circumstances we must honor black America's cry for self-determination; but community control or no community control, we must never agree to apartheid concepts of "black" and "white" education. There is only education. It is the responsibility of white America to keep alive the ideal of integration, and to prove its integrity, despite all frustrations.

It will not be easy. According to an AP release of August 7, the Secretary of the Department of Health, Education and Welfare offered this "realistic" advice:

> I think we have to be realistic. In a large number of big-city areas we have a lot of neighborhoods that are going to be completely black. If we can have good schools and good police protection, maybe that's better than to have fear and riots. And maybe another generation will have to deal with integration.

Whether or not this is realism, it is obviously not going to hasten America along the path of integration. And if this is what amounts to the progressive viewpoint under a Democratic administration—a view of "fear and riots" as the ultimate abominations, and a conception of "good schools" as being in the same order of goodness as "good police protection"—then it is foolhardy to think that Richard M. Nixon and his crew will hold high the banner of racial integration in schools, or anywhere else.

Thus, it is now impossible to quarrel with the determination of black militants and moderates that if the schools are to be black—and ever blacker—they are going to be black controlled. That is honest; that is fair. That is why community control deserves one little cheer.

LIFE ON THE LINE

CONVERSATION WITH CLEAVER

HENRY E. WEINSTEIN

Mr. Weinstein, a third-year law student at the University of California, has written of the Huey Newton case for the Daily Californian and of a student delegation's visit to Governor Reagan on the issue of Eldridge Cleaver's lectures at the university for the Sacramento Bee.

> You sit on your cold, steel-mattress bunk and watch a cockroach crawl out from under the filthy commode and you don't kill it. You envy the roach as you watch it crawl out under the cell door.
>
> Johnny Cash at Folsom Prison

Berkeley

On the evening of November 21, six days before he was scheduled to return to prison as a result of parole revocation, Eldridge Cleaver made his last public speech at California Hall in San Francisco. He was visibly shaken as he stepped to the rostrum and commenced by saying, "I'm kinda stuck for words tonight." It was plain that Cleaver was more than upset by the prospect of going back to prison. He was "freaked out" in a manner akin to Rubashov in Koestler's Darkness at Noon.

Cleaver no doubt had been reflecting on how things could have been different. After all, he didn't have to become involved with the Black Panthers, or he could have left the group when the heat was turned on. He could certainly count on making enough from Soul on Ice and his writing for Ramparts to live comfortably. Without attempting to deify him, it suffices to say that Eldridge Cleaver is not that sort of man.

As I entered Eldridge Cleaver's house on the 24th of November and watched the double-bolted door close behind me I was more than ever impressed by the fact that Cleaver had made a leap that is characteristic of the true revolutionary. He had put his life on the line for his beliefs. His words transcended mere verbiage and were continually translated into action.

And just before I left his house that afternoon Cleaver provided an insight into his thoughts at a moment when he must have been undergoing some serious self-examination. My roommate Dan Lang, who had accompanied me that afternoon, asked Cleaver if he would autograph his copy of Soul on Ice. Cleaver smiled and responded warmly as he inscribed the following:

> For Dan Lang. On a Sunday afternoon, the Sunday of Sundays for me. Perhaps my last Sunday. I don't know. No matter what, however, the truth is still the truth and the struggle must and will go on. All power to the people. The spirit of the people is greater than the man's technology.

In the preceding hour we had taped the following interview:

Weinstein: This fall there was considerable controversy over your participation in a class on racism at the University of California. What have your experiences been as a guest lecturer in the course on "Dehumanization and Regeneration in the American Social Order"?

Cleaver: The dialogue that we have been able to develop in the classroom has been satisfactory. The discussions have been fruitful. The conditions in the class are good but we have been hampered by political interference, for instance by the regents and the Governor. It is, of course, unfortunate that the students may not get credit for the course. They will simply have to balance that against the realization that they have come into contact with some new ideas. I would also comment that the class has been very helpful to me in developing my ideas.

Weinstein: Many of your public statements and also comments in Soul on Ice indicate that you think education and work with young people is extremely important. In this context what is the relationship of the Black Panther Party to black student union groups on high school and college campuses?

Cleaver: We have had good relationships with the black student unions at local high schools; indeed some of them have changed their name to Black Panther student unions.

The situation on the college campuses has been different. Before forming the Black Panther Party, Bobby Seale and Huey Newton tried to do some organizing at Merritt College, where they were students. They started the Soul Students group at Merritt. They discovered that there are problems with starting a revolutionary movement among blacks at the college level because almost all black college students are from the black bourgeoisie.

The black middle class are the most alienated from their roots; when the idea of black consciousness began to develop they had the furthest to go. Curiously enough, though, you also had the development of what is called "cultural nationalism" and some of this was a form of black racism.

The black students now in high school find it much easier to relate to the revolutionary ideas than do the black college students. When they get to college they will wash away this regressive phenomenon.

Another problem has been the compartmentalization of black college students. They have been viewed as a separate entity, but they must be seen as part of the larger community. They must be united to that larger community so that these groups can function together. This goes for white students as well. They have compartmentalized themselves too. Liberation must come and can only come from the entire community, not just from the colleges.

Weinstein: Huey Newton has been imprisoned; and you are due to go back to jail in a few days. Thus a significant portion of the leadership of the Black Panther Party will have been put out of circulation in one form or other. What have you been doing to develop new leadership?

Cleaver: This is obviously an important problem. We are continuously trying to develop new leadership in the party. We have some people ready to take over if the current leadership is put in jail, or something similar, but not enough. We want the Black Panther Party to be a self-perpetuating group, not a one-man organization.

Weinstein: It has been asserted that one of the major problems of the Panthers and other such militant groups is infiltration from hostile organizations, such as the police. What difficulties have you had with provocateurs?

Cleaver: There is no question but that the pigs have attempted to infiltrate our group. This is something we have been aware of for a long time and we try to cope with it. For obvious tactical reasons I can't go into details, but I will say that provocateurs were involved with that recent gas station holdup.

Weinstein: The mass media play a large role in shaping attitudes about race relations. The major television networks and newspapers are often critical of black militants. In this regard, what do you think is the role of the Black Panther paper, in terms of both the black and white communities?

Cleaver: The establishment press has a monopoly on the dissemination of information in the United States. This monopoly can be broken. It is absolutely essential that we develop our own media. Political movements and political organizations need media both for ideological reasons and for the interpretation of events. In this regard, the establishment press is unreliable and must be viewed as an enemy. Our own media can serve to further communication between blacks and whites. Indeed our own media will serve as the "glue" that holds the movement together.

Weinstein: Do you think that the material presented in the Panther paper has a similar impact on most of its readers or is subject to varying interpretations?

Cleaver: The Black Panther paper is not fully developed as yet. We have had many problems with the paper. I am the editor but I do not have the time that really needs to be given to the paper. There certainly has not been a standardization of much of the material in the paper. As a matter of fact, there have been many contradictions in the positions taken in the paper. Part of this is because of time pressures and the fact that we don't have uniform editing processes.

Some of these contradictions in the paper have been detrimental; they have had an adverse effect on the goals of the Black Panther Party. We need a full-time staff, but there are financial problems. And the paper must appeal to some people who are politically unsophisticated.

We need the paper though, and given all the problems we do have it is still better than nothing.

Weinstein: Many individuals do not seem to understand the meaning of some of your rhetoric. Phrases such as "Free Huey or the Sky's the Limit," for example, have been interpreted in several ways. Could you elaborate upon this?

Cleaver: When we use an expression like "Mickey Mouse Reagan" or "Donald Duck Rafferty," I think it is clear that this is a put-down; it is meant to be derisive.

The phrase, "Free Huey or the Sky's the Limit," is also clear, but has broader ramifications. When we say this we mean that Huey must be set free or the country will be destroyed; there should be no misunderstanding about this.

But you also have to consider that when we were saying this before Huey's trial we were engaged in psychological warfare. We were striving for a mass mobilization. We were attempting to educate the public. The establishment uses psychological warfare too. They were trying to railroad Huey Newton into the gas chamber. The Black Panther Party countered by threats and by focusing attention on what was going on in that courthouse. We kept Huey out of the gas chamber, but he still is not free. This is due to the effects that establishment propaganda had on the jury.

"The Sky's the Limit" is an old American term; people should understand it. They just would rather interpret it differently. The police felt that they understood what we meant and that's why 15,000 National Guardsmen were called up, ready to move at the end of the trial. They expected a certain sort of reaction and wanted to wipe out the Black Panther Party. But right after the end of the trial we told all the Panthers to stay off the street that night. Huey said we should carry the legal case as far as possible. This freaked out the cops; two of them shot up our office. This was another form of psychological warfare on our part and it worked to some extent.

This psychological warfare must now move in other directions. But it must be remembered that our actions are always geared to our position and resources. If we could take Huey out of jail forcefully we would, but right now this simply is not possible. So it becomes a question of getting into a position to implement what you have to do. And that is why we still mean it when we say "Free Huey or the Sky's the Limit."

Weinstein: Is your paper staffed solely by blacks, and if so how does this fit in with your coalition with the Peace and Freedom Party?

Cleaver: The paper is put out solely by black people. We do, however, print articles by white people in the paper. I think that this is a policy to be encouraged because the final movement must unite whites and blacks if we are really going to deal with the problems that confront us.

R. Cobb

Weinstein: What is the relationship of the Black Panther Party to organizations such as CORE, SNCC and the Mississippi Freedom Labor Union?

Cleaver: We have no relationship to CORE. As far as I am concerned they have become part of the power structure. This concept of "black capitalism" is merely part of the welfare-capitalist phase of oppression. It is simply another example of indirect control of blacks by the power structure. The forms of exploitation have been modified so as to continue to deceive the oppressed classes.

SNCC was essentially a movement rather than an organization. SNCC never had a membership as such. To do what has to be done in this country you have to include the masses in the machinery of your organization; SNCC couldn't do this. Lately, SNCC has been attempting to make this transition from a movement to an organization.

The movement orientation is certainly a large part of black history in the United States. Such an orientation is now obsolete. There is a pressing need to proceed to the organizational stage.

We need national organizations. We must unite all the regional organizations of blacks, even though they are acting to solve local problems. The Mississippi Freedom Labor Union, which you referred to, is a case in point. At present such a group can have only a transitory effect.

We need a national organization to unite the various efforts into one. That is one of the things the Black Panther Party has been attempting to do. This national organization, however, need not be the Black Panther Party. We would join a better group if such a change becomes necessary. Certain members of SNCC fell into a "reactionary trap" in this regard, and were reluctant to effect certain mergers because of their desire to maintain themselves in positions of power. What we need is merger rather than internecine conflict.

Weinstein: There has been a lot of talk about the potential for a revolutionary movement in this country which would unite blacks, students and poor whites. Yet what seems to be happening is not a revolution on the Left, but a revolution on the Right with lower, middle-class whites rallying behind the standard of George Wallace. Do you see this development as a serious problem?

Cleaver: The people who are supporting Wallace are simple-minded and politically naive; they do not understand the problems facing this country. When Wallace renounces the Establishment these people respond to him. But I do not feel they are really sympathetic to his alternatives, so I have no long-range fear of Wallace.

It requires a shrewd mind, however, to understand, deal with, and break through racism in this country. At the present time you have working-class people who are basically comfortable and who won't come into the streets: this is the problem of the Left. Although these people have jobs and are relatively comfortable, they are miserable and dissatisfied. They are suffering spiritually as a result of the oppressive lies that have been imposed upon them. This deterioration of their condition is increasing. Politically conscious people have to make these working-class people see how racism is affecting their lives and project a Left alternative to these problems. That is what it will take to get these "comfortable people" to move.

Weinstein: In recent lectures that you have given at Berkeley and in a current issue of the Black Panther newspaper you have talked at length about the origin and nature of "ethnic power." You have talked about Mayor Alioto evolving from Al Capone, Police Chief Cahill evolving from Machine-Gun Kelly, and Arthur Goldberg evolving from Arnold Rothstein. Although people weren't talking about Jewish, Irish and Italian power the way people are talking about Black Power today, a similar process was taking place. In terms of this sort of group consciousness, what direction do you see the Black Power movement taking?

Cleaver: We don't want black people to go through the melting pot and perpetuate the system. If this happens, black people will simply be functional lackeys and torpedo the possibility of black liberation. We want to change the system.

The melting-pot theory is the basic myth of the United States. This theory defines the United States strategy and tactics develop from the definitions created by this theory. The melting-pot myth has created an artificial "oneness" that obscures many problems.

The type of ethnocentrism that has developed in the United States is not a good thing if we want the earth to continue to exist. It was once a social apparatus created to survive certain sorts of hostility. It was a protective device. But times have changed, and we need non-ethnocentric people who are able to identify with humanity in a broad sense. This sort of unity is the only way to solve the problems we have here in the United States and in the world.

For example, the Irish, as an oppressed group, used to put pressure on the power structure. But eventually the Irish moved into the system, and their ethnic loyalties soon were manipulated by politicians. The Irish are now among the bourgeoisie, but they are still manipulated by ethnic loyalties. Now these loyalties perpetuate the status quo, and thus many of the Irish are now being manipulated by their enemies. This is indicative of a basic development among ethnic groups in this country—that the ethnics who are in a better position manipulate the less fortunate in their own group.

Weinstein: Revolutions are usually brought about by individuals who feel desperate about their circumstances. As a class students are comfortable, at least in a material sense, as contrasted to blacks. Will coalitions between white students and groups such as the Black Panther Party ultimately break down because of this difference?

Cleaver: Students are not politically naive in contrast to the white adults we were just talking about. They have a social consciousness. Therefore it doesn't matter if they are well-off materially because their values are affronted by what they see in society. Throughout history we can see revolutions that were led by people who were well-off but had an intellectual and spiritual motivation.

Thus far, students have pursued a course of radical dissent but not that of revolutionary action. It has been like an extended field trip to upset their elders and it has not gone far enough. The students have stopped short of what is needed. They probably won't be willing to take up guns and execute the regents, as they deserve.

The revolutionaries of the future may come from the students when they go out into the world. Some will not be able to find their place in the outside world. But the foundation for a real revolutionary movement is not here yet.

Weinstein: At the present time the Black Panther Party has a coalition with the Peace and Freedom Party. One of the major dilemmas facing such coalitions is what sort of critical role the whites will play in terms of what the blacks are doing. Since the National Conference on New Politics (NCNP), held two summers ago, what we have seen for the most part is not viable, working coalitions but whites acquiescing to the blacks, somewhat because of guilt feelings, rather than offering constructive criticism. What effort does this have on such coalitions?

Cleaver: The guilt problem is part of the racial heritage of America. But such guilt feelings make many people nonfunctional from our point of view. This stance of acquiescence can be detrimental if a black is advocating a bad program. Such a white cannot distinguish between what different blacks are saying; all he recognizes is that a black is saying it. Motivation that is spurred by guilt doesn't make for reliable whites, and we have had many problems with people of this type.

Weinstein: In a recent issue of the Black Panther paper, Huey Newton issued a position paper discussing the nature of the BPP-PFP coalition. One point which he made was that while white radicals used psychedelic drugs extensively, blacks should not do so. How do you account for the apparently different types of discipline that are needed in groups of black militants and white radicals?

Cleaver: The Black Panther can't be effective in dealing with the power structure if its members are high or drunk. Some of the people getting high will have to stop. I realize that some people will react to this by calling us the "New Puritans" but it simply will have to be done. People will have to begin to relate to a sort of revolutionary morality.

Drugs are one of the means that people have used to escape, but we must concentrate intensively on revolutionary struggle. Sex and LSD can't be used any more as escapes, and the leadership must set an example.

When we first started our police patrols this was not much of a problem. The desire to be with the cadre was the source of discipline. The people wanted to "be in shape" because they knew this was necessary if they were carrying guns on the patrols. Morality flowed from activity.

This has lapsed for some people because the patrols have ceased. The notion of morality from activity must be recaptured. The source of this, of course, is political awareness. We conduct political education classes in the Black Panther Party. Developing political awareness is hard to achieve but we are making progress.

The white radical movement is at a different stage, and thus their concepts of morality can be expected to be different. When the white movement moves into the stage of organizational activity they will see the wisdom of the sort of morality I have been talking about. It will develop naturally.

Weinstein: According to the current status of your parole revocation case you are due to return to prison on Wednesday. What will happen on that day?

Cleaver: I am supposed to call my parole officer at 8:30 in the morning on Wednesday. I am planning on continuing my daily life as normal. I will give my scheduled lecture on Tuesday at the University of California. We will have to wait and see.

Weinstein: Any concluding remarks?

Cleaver: I may be cut off from the movement here. I would encourage people to develop an intransigent attitude toward the enemy. They should view the enemy and his efforts with contempt.

Pain should incense us all the more to speed up the movement for liberation. But the people also must use their minds to understand the enemy and his tactics, to develop counter-tactics, and to break his strategy.

Let the struggle continue. It should intensify, come hell or high water.

I'm not going to say good-by because I'm not gone.

SCHOLARSHIP OR COMMITMENT

A HASSLE OF HISTORIANS

JAMES GILBERT

Mr. Gilbert, a member of the history faculty at the University of Maryland, is at present a visiting lecturer at Teachers College, New York. He is the author of Writers and Partisans: A History of Literary Radicalism in America, 1900-1950 (John Wiley).

Milling around in the corridors of New York's Statler-Hilton during the American Historical Association meeting, December 28-30, thousands of graduate students and professors must have felt that this was Mayor Daley's revenge. The meeting, originally scheduled for Chicago, was moved to New York after a strong demand by the membership not to convene in the city that had shown the world the grim guts of the Democratic Party. Enormous confusion resulted from overcrowded halls and elevators which seemed to run nonstop from the basement to the roof. Long lines of graduate students waited patiently to use house phones, that didn't always work, trying to establish get-it-yourself job interviews. Interesting positions were available, of course, but these were filled by a process resembling the National Football League player draft. And for those few superstar historians, always looking for a new job, there was the ritualistic greeting which has become almost like a fraternal handshake: "Are you happy at . . . ?" The skillful answer blends present dissatisfaction and a suggestion of wanderlust with a denial of disloyalty to the current alma mater—into one word.

Aside from an unusually heavy dose of frenzy, this convention was most notable for its politics and for the efforts to organize a caucus of radical historians. "We all know that something is wrong with the AHA," claimed Arthur Waskow, "but we don't know what it is." The American Historical Association is one of the largest liberal organizations in the country. But its political leanings are incidental to its function, and the result has been a liberalism of indifference. The Association publishes a journal, acts as a clearing house for jobs, and holds conventions which are both reunions and scholarly events. Behind these benign activities, however, there lies the power of numbers of men who command the attention of a great many students and who carry publishing houses into the black with the purchases they require for courses. As in other professions, the AHA reflects the activities of its members. Scholarly papers presented at such conventions sample the work being done in the field, whether radical or conservative. The search for originality insures attention to such ideas.

The current convention suggested, however, that the detachment of the historical profession may not be permanent. The political function of the historian, whether he likes it or not, is up for grabs. He is under pressure from students to make his work reveal something about the nature of social change. And often he is concerned to reconstruct the past because of his malaise about the present nature of American society.

Such attitudes provided the gist of the panel discussion on Saturday night, December 28, of the relationship of the historical profession to politics. However irrelevant or disastrous it may seem to the younger generation of historians, the cold war showed itself alive and well in the mind of Arthur Schlesinger, Jr., who chaired the meeting. Countenancing the decision to quit Chicago, Schlesinger suggested that historians also might take a swipe at the Russians for their invasion of Czechoslovakia by refusing to attend, or if in attendance, by protesting, at the International Congress for Historical Sciences in Moscow two years hence. The more traditional position was expressed by AHA president, John K. Fairbank, who suggested that no political position ought to be implied in the organization's activities or in the selection of convention sites. Perhaps he understood, as Schlesinger did not, that if it were a policy to make symbolic protests against countries for the evils of their foreign policies, very few meetings could be convened anywhere. Both Schlesinger's and Fairbank's remarks were wide of the focus provided by the most important speech of the evening. Christopher Lasch's appeal to historians to involve themselves with new ideas and with unused concepts, his demand that they stop being ideologues for the status quo, brought the question of history and politics to the point where it belonged.

Lasch's suggestions were echoed in efforts to organize a radical caucus within the AHA. Perhaps, since historians are among the last of the large social sciences to produce a radical caucus, it was inevitable that there should be a twin birth. The reason for two competing caucuses stems primarily from the growing separation between scholarship and political activism within the university. The aim of radical historians can no longer be merely the confrontation of conservative ideas and establishments. They must deal also with the problems which beset the whole Left today.

The first radical caucus was held on December 28, sponsored primarily by graduate students from the University of Wisconsin. Before an audience of about 700, several speakers chided the AHA for some of the statements of its past presidents, defended the usefulness of scholarship, and called for the creation of some sort of formal organization. After twenty minutes or so of groping around, avoiding arguments and issues, a newsletter was established—in lieu of further talk. As the audience melted away, some to publishers' cocktail parties, the meeting folded. It looked as if the scholarly Left might once more paste over its splits and factions with newsprint.

But the second caucus on Sunday, December 29, revealed that the first meeting had been merely a dress rehearsal. A smaller audience heard Eugene Genovese, Christopher Lasch and Helmut Gruber tackle the problem of radical scholarship. Lasch's remarks best caught the meaning of the present dilemma in personal terms. The breakdown of liberalism, he argued, had destroyed the rationale for the disjointed work which historians were doing. Isolated monographic studies could still be written in pursuit of truth; nothing diminished their value, but the historian himself had difficulty seeing the relevance of his work to social change. The meeting itself was testimony to the desire of historians to alter this situation. To overcome this isolation, Lasch proposed a larger, national organization whose aims would go beyond the academic world—an organization to which scholars could contribute their work and political activities.

This translation of the acknowledged split between scholarship and activism into political terminology stated what was unsaid on the previous afternoon. As Eugene Genovese put it, the issue was whether to defend the university and work within it to transform it according to the ideals it glibly asserts, or by a revolutionary act to confront it and expose its links to other institutions in society. The issue was between professionalism and 100 per cent radicalism, even though most positions were between these two extremes.

Behind Genovese's statement was the question of the meaning and uses of radical scholarship. The radical professor, because of his successes in working within the structure of the university, is obviously on the defensive. The internal structure and the exterior relationships of that institution have all been called into question by the left-wing students, who demand that the historian make his work relevant. The results of such demands have so far been inconclusive; much of the dialogue among scholars has broken on the definition of terms. Relevancy, radicalism, even professionalism, are words sufficiently ambiguous to serve as slogans for different programs of educational reforms.

However, some clear points are emerging from the confusion. Historians have been asked to write about the past with an eye to the present and the future. They have been asked, and rightfully, to deal with American history as if it were made by all men, not just by elites. They have been reminded that they must illuminate not only the textual obscurities of New England theologians or literary intellectuals but also the shadowy and insubstantial record left by the inarticulate. But that is not all. Historians have also been asked to create in their own work a guide to a better future. Here all detachment falls away, and scholars find themselves caught in the dilemma of their own success in the university, and confronted by their own students.

New Left history with all its incoherence and its internal squabbles, is today established in American historiography, and is fast producing an impressive collection of works. Whatever it means—which is at least several things—New Left history has contributed some permanent conceptions to understanding the American past. It makes its way, even though stumbling and blocked at times. Those, for example, who scoffed ten years ago at new interpretations of American foreign policy, generally do so now, not to students but in the privacy of their own generations. Yet the very success (and first signs of aging) has brought New Left scholarship to an impasse.

Sunday's meeting expressed a whole range of attitudes about the role of historical scholarship—from defense of its present circumstances to one lone call that the historian quit the university and organize for the revolution. In all the positions, one tendency is clear: a great deal is being asked of the historian—perhaps far more than he is capable of as a scholar. If he quits historical research and leaves the university, he gives up the battle for the past. Yet he cannot remain oblivious to the demands of the present. Even if he cannot predict the future, he can suggest a great deal about the process of social change. He can teach about the present by learning about the past. But more important, if the historian is really committed to teaching and to the ideals of education he must challenge careerism, outmoded classroom forms, formal and inhumane social relations with students. The ideals of scholarship and teaching need no more defense than the ideal of the university. But what these ideals mean in reality is yet a mystery. At a minimum, however, the defense of the university ideal must mean an assault upon the educational process as it exists today, and an end to pitting students and faculty members against one another, and to compartmentalizing and isolating knowledge. Historians have often compartmentalized their lives, have spurned students, have pursued careers, have published and then perished as human beings. It is not the AHA that has created this situation. No organization or profession is in the long run much worse than its members.

CIVIL RIGHTS

NIXON'S FIRST TEST

GARY ORFIELD

Mr. Orfield teaches in the Department of Government and Foreign Affairs, the University of Virginia. His Reconstruction of Southern Education will be published by John Wiley & Sons this spring.

If Richard Nixon as President fulfills his Southern campaign pledges, he will dismantle the civil rights enforcement machinery which, since 1964, has brought much of the South to the brink of a successful social revolution. While public attention has been focused on riots and black militancy, federal power has seriously weakened some of the main props of Southern segregation. At a time when many in the North are concluding that integration is impossible, it is working well in much of the South. A permanent transformation of Southern institutions seems possible if federal pressure can be maintained for a few years more. The choice must be made by the new President and a few members of his Cabinet.

Victory for civil rights in the long Congressional battles was but a first step. The declarations of national policy embodied in the 1964 and 1968 Civil Rights Acts and the 1965 Voting Rights Act gain meaning only as the resources of the Executive bureaucracies are committed to forcing action on issues of great political sensitivity.

The new Administration's decision on the hotly debated issue of the school desegregation guidelines provided by the Department of Health, Education and Welfare will be the first clear indication of Mr. Nixon's intentions. His Administration will confront a spectrum of other civil rights questions, ranging from voting rights and equal employment to open housing. In most cases, decisions will be incremental, gradually determining a policy through key appointments, budget decisions and determinations on individual cases. On the central symbolic issue of schools, however, President Nixon will be faced with a clear policy choice on an unambiguous deadline.

More than a year ago, in October, 1967, Southern school officials were given until September, 1969, to comply with the 1954 Supreme Court decision and the 1964 Civil Rights Act. After fifteen years of gradualism, the Johnson administration set that date for ending federal subsidies to local governments that continue to defy the Constitution. Richard Nixon has threatened to suspend the deadline and permit indefinite continuance of separate and unequal education in the Deep South.

Mr. Nixon describes himself as a "liberal" on civil rights. In his victory statement he promised to "bring us together." His commitment to racial justice, however, has been heavily discounted by those most vitally concerned—the black voters. The day after the election the nation's leading black newspaper, the Chicago Defender, covered its front page with a drawing of a weeping Martin Luther King, tearing up his 1963 Lincoln Memorial speech that told of his dream of victory over racial bias.

Southern power in Congress has traditionally forced blacks to look to the President and the courts for protection of civil rights. The conventional wisdom of American politics is that the President is particularly sensitive to the interests of the Negro community because of its great significance in the city vote of the large swing states where national races are often decided. In the 1968 election, however, Nixon demonstrated that at the present level of racial polarization it is possible to win the Presidency, while writing off the black vote in the South and in the metropolitan centers. No President in recent times has owed less politically to the black community.

But Nixon is a minority President and he must decide whether he will attempt to construct the majority he needs to govern and to be re-elected through a moderate strategy of racial accommodation, or through a conservative approach that appeals to Wallace supporters. The "Southern strategy" of his campaign suggests a preference for the latter course, and an ominous confirming sign is his appointment of John Mitchell, architect of that strategy, as Attorney General. Washington columnists Evans and Novak have recently reported that Harry Dent, Strom Thurmond's understudy in South Carolina politics, will coordinate school desegregation policy from his position on Nixon's White House staff.

In Southern speeches during his campaign, Nixon strongly hinted that he might abandon the bipartisan coalition committed to completing the task of desegregating Southern schools, as mandated by the 1964 Civil Rights Act. While George Wallace lashed into HEW bureaucrats, and Hubert Humphrey called for full enforcement, Nixon took a confusing middle position that satisfied many Southern conservatives without fatally damaging his support by progressive white Republicans. His statements permitted Strom Thurmond to promise the South that Nixon would retreat on the school issue. The GOP carried five states of the old Confederacy, including Senator Thurmond's South Carolina. Nixon's political debt to Thurmond is large, and it is clear that Thurmond will ask the new President to do by Executive fiat what the South Carolina Senator could not achieve in the Senate.

In his first Southern television address, Nixon implied that he did not believe in withholding federal aid to force desegregation, and that he felt that the 1964 Civil Rights Act could be carried out under a system called "freedom of choice." The phrase sounds democratic enough, but it describes an approach to desegregation based on the assumption that local authorities have no legal responsibility to end racially separate school systems. "Freedom of choice" provides that each student be offered an opportunity to transfer once a year. It is based on the theory that the Supreme Court did not order actual integration in 1954 but only an end to some of the formalities of legally enforced segregation. In practice, it permits localities to maintain separate black and white school systems indefinitely, the constitutional right to an equal education being made available only to those families willing to take the risk involved in openly challenging the caste system. It is as if, for example, the constitutional right to freedom of assembly were extended only to those willing to demand it publicly from a hostile local group bitterly opposed to free assembly and dominating both the local government and the local economy. After extensive trials the courts have found that "freedom of choice" generally fails to meet the requirements of the Constitution; they have accordingly ruled that local authorities must promptly take whatever affirmative action is needed to abolish separate school systems.

Speaking in North Carolina, Nixon not only supported "true freedom of choice" but also expressed his skepticism about the one real enforcement tool available to the federal government. Short of military intervention or decades of district-by-district Justice Department litigation, the only federal lever to encourage local compliance with the Constitution is the threat to withhold aid funds. A provision to end federal subsidies to defiant local governments was overwhelmingly supported by both parties in Congress when it was written into the 1964 Civil Rights Act. Nixon, however, said that it was "dangerous" and "going too far" to withhold federal school aid.

Later, under criticism by such GOP progressives as Senator Brooke (Mass.) and Senator Goodell (N.Y.), the Republican candidate took a more ambiguous position. In news conferences in Anaheim, Calif., and in Detroit, he said that federal aid should be denied in "a clear case of segregation." He claimed, however, that HEW had exceeded the intent of Congress and was trying to implement "enforced integration." These key terms were left undefined. In an October campaign stop in Williamsburg, Va., Nixon again supported "freedom of choice," except where it was "a subterfuge for perpetuating segregation." Once more, the words simply indicated that some decision would be made after the election.

Should the new President decide that "free choice" is all that the law demands, he will put himself in direct conflict with the rulings of the federal courts. In the historic Jefferson County case in the spring of 1967, the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals, with jurisdiction over the Deep South, ruled that desegregation plans did not satisfy the demands of the Constitution unless they actually eliminated separate school systems. The court held that local officials have the responsibility to take any necessary steps to create a unified school system.

In May, 1968, the Supreme Court completed the job of destroying the basic legal arguments for "free choice." The court held that the Fourteenth Amendment guarantee of "equal protection of the laws" could not be fulfilled so long as a "pattern of segregation" remained. State and local governments, responsible for creating and perpetuating a school system that subverts this right, were now responsible for dismantling the illegal separate school systems. "In the context of the state-imposed segregated pattern of long standing, the fact that . . . the Board opened the doors of the former 'white' school to Negro children . . . merely begins, not ends, our inquiry whether the Board has taken steps adequate to abolish its dual, segregated system. . . ." Local authorities were ordered "to convert to a unitary system in which racial discrimination would be eliminated root and branch."

In his North Carolina speech, Nixon castigated the desegregation program as an attempt to "force a local community to carry out what a Federal administrator or bureaucrat may think is best." Later, he repeatedly charged that HEW had gone beyond the law. But the school desegregation guidelines are not bureaucratic whims. The HEW standards are actually very little more than a distillation of the case law defining unconstitutional discrimination. Since early in the program, the standards actually enforced by HEW have tended to lag seriously behind the most recent court decisions.

Nixon's decision will be crucial because the South is only now beginning to move in the direction of eliminating separate schools. While Thurmond and Wallace claim that segregation is eternal, two-thirds of the 4,500 school districts in Southern and border states now have unitary school systems. Hundreds of the remaining districts have tentatively agreed to merge their separate school systems to comply with the HEW deadline of September, 1969. Even in South Carolina, a third of the districts have filed such plans already and another sixth are under court orders to comply with the recent Supreme Court decision. Under combined administrative pressure from HEW and legal pressure from the Justice Department and the NAACP Legal Defense and Educational Fund, the job could be largely completed during the next school year.

A lapse in federal determination would give a new lease on life to the most flagrantly unequal schools in the South. Remaining opposition is concentrated in the rural areas where the caste system has been most rigid and the schools most systematically unequal. Nowhere is the myth of "separate but equal" a greater mockery. A recent study of the almost completely segregated schools of Alabama's rural black belt, for example, found black children in schools that typically cost to build one-fourth as much as those housing white students. The white schools had broader curriculums and more than twice as many library books per child. A black child was four times more likely to find himself in a school with an enrollment below the minimum size for an adequate educational program, as specified by Alabama education authorities. For the foreseeable future, that is what local control means in the Deep South. Unless the President is prepared to enforce federal laws requiring local change, generations of black children may be doomed to such schools.

Should Mr. Nixon continue present enforcement policies, he would not be supporting the overenergetic use of the fund withholding power. Approximately 98 per cent of Southern and border state school districts are at present receiving federal aid. Funds are cut off only after lengthy negotiations have proved completely fruitless and after a hearing examiner, the Justice Department and the secretary of HEW have reviewed the case. National civil rights groups, local black leaders and the U.S. Civil Rights Commission have all criticized the Johnson administration for excessive caution in enforcing the law. During a 1967 hearing of the House Judiciary Committee, Rep. Clark MacGregor, a regional manager of the Nixon campaign, accused HEW of transforming what Congress had intended as a clear and simple regulatory function into a protracted negotiating operation permitting long-term local defiance of the law.

If the Nixon Administration retires from the school desegregation battle, the entire burden will be shifted to the civil rights organizations. Primary reliance would have to be placed on the NAACP Legal Defense and Educational Fund, which has handled the vast majority of Southern school litigation. In the words of Jack Greenberg, director of the Legal Defense Fund's program, the consequences would be "extremely serious." Existing manpower is barely adequate to handle current litigation covering fewer than 10 per cent of Southern school districts. Moreover, federal district judges are products of their home states and are appointed with the approval of state politicians. They would find themselves in an exceedingly uncomfortable position if asked to force local officials to do more than the President, the Attorney General and HEW's Office for Civil Rights said was necessary. The probable result, Greenberg says, would be token integration and "interminable litigation." In a recent interview Attorney General Ramsey Clark predicted a "tragic erosion of black respect for law should Nixon refuse to enforce the Civil Rights Act."

Pierre, Aux Ecoutes (Paris)

The school issue is only a part of the immense task Mr. Nixon must undertake to fulfill his pledge to reunite the country. It is true that in few areas does the law so clearly demand full equality, but on few issues is the political pressure against enforcing the law so intense. When Southern segregationists approach the new President for payment of his political debt, he will perhaps recall his advice to his party in 1966: "Southern Republicans must not climb aboard the sinking ship of racial injustice. . . . Any Republican victory that would come of courting racists, black or white, would be a defeat for our future in the South, and our party in the nation. It would be a battle won in a lost cause." Perhaps he will also reflect on his debt to the moderates. Just a week before the election, a Harris survey showed Nixon receiving the support of 38 per cent of those who believe that racial change should be accelerated, and 43 per cent of those who favor a continuation of the existing rate of progress.

The decision on Southern schools will have an importance far beyond the South. If there is to be any hope of a peaceful solution to the racial crisis, the new President must demonstrate that he is as committed to enforcing laws protecting human rights as he is to those protecting person and property on the city streets. Should he abandon the struggle to carry out the simple demands of the Constitution, he would give the clearest possible sign that there is little hope for lawful change. Promises of a new departure in overcoming racial division would be discounted as worthless rhetoric from a President who refused to protect the basic right to equal education.

'BUY SOMETHING'

FIVE MYTHS OF CONSUMERSHIP

DALLAS SMYTHE

Mr. Smythe, who heads the division of Social Sciences at the University of Saskatchewan, was chief economist of the Federal Communications Commission from 1943 to 1948, during part of which time James Fly was its distinguished chairman.

Andrew Fletcher said in 1704, "I believe if a man were permitted to write all the ballads, he need not care who should make the laws of the nation." Our culture includes not only traditional forms of "high" culture such as painting and literature but also "popular culture"—the radio and TV, the screen and theatre, pocket books, phonograph records, popular songs, pornography, both "hard" and "soft," etc. Indeed the borderline between popular culture and all consumption goods has been obliterated by Madison Avenue. For at least a generation now we in North America have become accustomed to endowing our automobiles with virility, our refrigerators with sensual pleasure, our breakfast cereals with athletic prowess, our shaving cream with the taste of lemon/lime. I argue that our popular culture is dominated today by an economic system that regards life, people and things primarily as aspects of consumption. The basic myth of our culture is that consumption is the goal of life.

Twenty years ago Harold Innis said that the purpose of institutions is to help us make the right decisions at the right time. He went on from there to say that the application of mass production to the communications industry (referring then just to print media and radio) had atomized previous institutions—the family, the church, the labor union—over the preceding eighty years. We must now recognize that the constituencies of these institutions are substantially under the control of the private government which is our privately owned economic system. This is not to say that evil men run the economic system, or that a conspiracy has betrayed our nonbusiness institutions or taken them over. But it is to say that, pursuing its rational self-interest, the business community as a whole has created a situation whereby we subordinate our lives to its values. We live according to the consumption myth. How does it work?

A society, looking at North America as a unit, is like a voluntary organization—a club, or a neighborhood improvement association—in that it works from an agenda that is agreed to either explicitly or implicitly. What is left off the agenda does not get considered attention. And popular culture, by filling our time with commercial actions and values, sets an agenda which gives consumption the top priority. I recall a recent advertisement in The New York Times which filled a full page with the message: "Buy Something." The popular culture's imperative—"Buy Something"—is the most important educational influence in North America today.

Just as a society lives by the agenda set by its popular culture, the popular culture rests on the agenda established by mass communication. The top priority for the mass media is consumption. Mass communications market mass-produced consumer goods. Without the marketing services of the communications media, the consumer goods industries—food, automobiles, drugs, etc.—could not dispose of their mass-produced products.

The mass media perform this marketing function by educating the population to be dutiful consumers. The educational process starts early. Before they can read, almost before they can talk, children are exposed to the bombardment of advertising messages on TV and radio. Skillfully engineered "point of sale" displays reinforce the educational experience when a mother shops the supermarket, with her child perched on the shopping cart, monitoring the whole operation. In this way, the child learns the importance of products. Lessons so learned are reinforced daily throughout our lives.

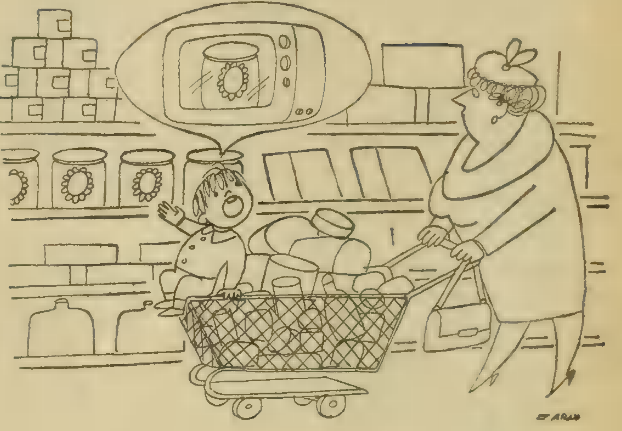
The explicit commercial message is thus the prime item on the commercial mass-medium agenda. Commercial announcements on TV cost much more per minute than do the entertainment programs they frame. They are engineered with great care and much experimentation by the most sophisticated techniques.

This raises an interesting question. Is the broadcast program material the product which the commercial broadcasting industry produces? The program material cannot be the chief product because it brings in no revenue from the audience to the broadcasting station. In fact, in economic terms, the program material broadcast commercially is a giveaway—an inducement to the population to become viewers or listeners. The chief product of the commercial broadcasters is the audience itself. Viewers and listeners are counted by market surveys, evaluated in terms of income level, age and sex, packaged and sold to advertisers.

In saying that the program material is a giveaway, I do not mean to overlook its importance. It is in fact carefully engineered. Take The Monkees, for example, which was engineered as any consumer commodity is engineered. The market was researched. Other entertainers, and particularly the Beatles, were analyzed to determine what characteristics in a program would "deliver" a young audience to the advertiser. A formula was developed, and the agency or network set out to recruit the elements that would fill it. The young men who came to comprise the Monkees did not even know one another until this process was near completion. From among hundreds at auditions, each was selected because he best embodied some appeals, some myths, which would "draw" and "hold" the audience. But this was only the beginning. The Monkees had to be publicized, advertised. Crowds had to be created and manipulated to produce pushing and fighting for autographs. The public had to be taught to resonate when the myth which is The Monkees was mentioned. At that point the broadcasters were ready to produce the audiences for The Monkees which could be sold to the advertisers.

Finally, on this point, national advertisers tell their writers just what sort of entertainment they wish to broadcast. One major advertiser of breakfast food in the United States and Canada not long ago was instructing its writers:

> In general, the moral code of the characters in our dramas will be more or less synonymous with the moral code of the bulk of the American middle class, as it is commonly understood. There will be no material that may give offense, either directly or by inference, to any organized minority group, lodge or other organizations, institutions, residents of any state or section of the country, or a commercial organization of any sort. This will be taken to include political organizations, fraternal organizations, college and school groups, labor groups, industrial, business and professional organizations, religious orders, civic clubs, memorial and patriotic societies (Anti-Tobacco League, for example), athletic organizations, women's groups, etc., which are in good standing.
>
> We will treat mention of the Civil War carefully, mindful of the sensitiveness of the South on this subject. No written material may be used that might give offense to our Canadian neighbors. . . . There will be no material for or against sharply drawn national or regional controversial issues. . . . Where it seems fitting, the characters should reflect recognition and acceptance of the world situation in their thoughts and actions, although in dealing with war, our writers should minimize the "horror" aspects. . . . Men in uniform shall not be cast as heavy villains or portrayed as engaging in any criminal activity. There will be no material on any of our programs which could in any way further the concept of business as cold, ruthless and lacking all sentiment or spiritual motivation.



Similar instructions go out to writers from many national advertisers. If such a process took place in schools or universities we should call it indoctrination and brainwashing. It is no less brainwashing when it takes place on the instruction of private business. Commercial indoctrination educates us in the myth that consumption is a sufficient goal, a sufficient substance for life. This is the basic myth.

A second, correlative myth cultivated systematically by mass media and the private enterprise system, is that the consumer is king; that he rules the system; can always turn off the switch, is in fact free to choose among products. If there were any substance to this myth, the Madison Avenue myth makers and their platoons of consumer preference engineers would not have done their job and not earned their salaries. Unfortunately, they have done their jobs and earned their salaries, large though they may be.

A third myth grows directly out of the pivotal importance of the commercial mass media to the marketing of goods. This is that some special magic resides in "communication." When an institution, be it the family, the church, a government agency, a business organization faces any kind of internal problem, the up-to-date "sophisticated" reaction is to call the difficulty one of communication. The aura that attends the doctor, or for that matter the medicine man, now surrounds those who call themselves experts in communications. Possibly no single person has contributed more to this mystification than Marshall McLuhan, whose brilliant but unsystematic essays serve to confuse people and thus create the mystery which requires the services of a medicine man for practical application. The hearty welcome which McLuhan's theme, "The medium is the message," receives from advertisers, their agencies and broadcasters is not surprising. If the content of the mass media is not important, if the medium is the message, then criticism of program policy is irrelevant. "The medium is the message," whatever McLuhan means by it, translates only too easily into the proposition that the act of consumership is the sufficient object of the exercise.

The fourth myth connected with the consumer system is designed to obscure the fact that the huge corporations which dominate North American economic life have preempted large chunks of the roles formerly played by other institutions. In the United States, where this myth originated, it centered on the assumption that the corporation is a legal entity and hence similar to an individual. Thurman Arnold put it this way in The Folklore of Capitalism:

> Since individuals are supposed to do better if left alone, this symbolism freed industrial enterprise from regulation in the interest of furthering any current morality. The laissez-faire religion, based on a conception of a society composed of competing individuals, was transferred automatically to industrial organizations with nationwide power and dictatorial forms of government.
>
> This mythology gave the Government in Washington only a minor part to play in social organization. . . . Government in Washington was supposed to act so as to instil "confidence" in great business organizations.

One way of exposing this myth is to define government. It is any organization the final decisions of which are subject to no immediate appeal. In North America, then, there are parallel systems of government; the private and the public. And in essential matters the former has the last word. President Kennedy came off second best when he tried to overrule the steel companies a few years ago and his successor learned the lesson.

The fifth myth arises out of the fourth. It is that if the public government makes decisions in matters of communications policy application, this is censorship and automatically bad, but if private government makes such decisions, all will be well. A relatively small number of such decisions, made in the operation of the mass media of communications, involves the mass production of enormous amounts of content. I suggest that the myth that public government is malevolent while private government is benevolent is insupportable, especially in the absence of democratic process in the private government's decision making.

If this analysis of the myth-making picture of our consumption-tied economy is valid, what could, what should, be done about it? This is a question which the young people who so disturb many of us have been wrestling with for some time. While there is no single explanation for the increasingly urgent protests being made by beatniks, hippies, the New Left and the Yippies, one evident basis for their behavior is that they reject the consumer-tied system as inhuman, immoral and indecent. Their studied defiance of convention in matters of dress, hair styling and domestic arrangements is a protest against the irrelevance of the pursuit of consumption on a continent and in a world where other goals should prevail.

They tell us what these problems are: stubborn pockets of poverty where the delights of consumption are bitter illusions; neglect of the right of minority groups to a cultural identity of their own; abuse of the environment by the pollution of air and water which an unplanned economic system forces on us; irrational military adventures; imperial exploitation of underdeveloped by developed nations, and so on.

The young people's protests overlap those of the blacks whose concern for "soul" is also a defiance of consumership values. By their irritating, even infuriating, tactics, the young people are trying to force our attention upon these problems. Before cracking down on them from positions of power in the North American institutional structure, we should listen carefully to what they—the young and the blacks—are protesting.

If these protest movements do not manage to get the agenda of problems sorted out more sensibly—if the consumer society manages to absorb these rebellious people into safe, Establishment niches, then we shall be in trouble even deeper than we are today. We shall have proved ourselves so indoctrinated to the consumption-based life that we no longer care enough to take over our own institutions and make them serve our human needs.

Do I have a panacea—any easy solution to the problems arising from our slavery to what Erich Fromm calls the "homo consumens" myth? Of course not. I do feel that an essential first step toward that solution is to confront the facts honestly and, as Freud said, to face our guilt squarely. Assuming that that was done, I would say the next step was to rub the brainwash off some traditional notions. For example, the notion of planning. Faced with the necessity of planning for survival, the people of this continent have never shrunk from it. And I mean by planning simply policy making, followed by action, regardless of whose toes are stepped on.

We face a seamless web of persuasion and power based on the consumption drive of North American private industry. If the people are to be masters of their own fate they must plan for cultural survival. Planning does not mean breaking the machines or denying ourselves the benefits of modern technology. The Scandinavian countries, Holland and Switzerland, have disposed of that bugaboo. Planning does mean that public decisions must be accepted even when they tell private enterprise when and where and how to invest its capital. That is the nub of the planning issue and it must be squarely faced. If we do not accept planning on those terms, we have no real proposal for putting man first and consumption second. If we do plan on those terms, the mass media and the popular culture will be obliged to cultivate myths more compatible with human dignity and human values than the cluster of myths surrounding the consumption which now guide our lives.

BOOKS & THE ARTS

Joey and Sebastian Grown Up

AND OTHER STORIES. By John O'Hara. Random House. 336 pp. $5.95.

THE BEASTLY BEATITUDES OF BALTHAZAR B. By J. P. Donleavy. Delacorte Press. 403 pp. $6.95.

SHAUN O'CONNELL

Mr. O'Connell teaches English at the University of Massachusetts.

There they stand, O'Hara and Donleavy, brooding out at us from the dust jackets of their latest books, both dressed in herringbone tweed jackets, placed boldly before their possessions, two American Irishmen who have made it and damn well act the part. Though the part seems less an act with O'Hara. He stands before his grand house and Ford wagon, under his Eton cap, pulling away at a nonfiltered cigarette, a fearless man of means. Donleavy's photograph, on the other hand, looks like a put-on which didn't come off. He hides behind his trim beard, in his knickers and socks, leaning on a carved cane, before a castlelike country manor. But there is a slouch in his shoulders and a wince in his eyes which work against his jaunty pose. O'Hara seems a Pal Joey grown rich and old, Donleavy a Sebastian Dangerfield grown heavy and wistful. Perhaps this analysis is a bit of fancy. (Johnson said, "The Irish are a fair people—they never speak well of one another.") But, if so, I am only projecting onto the photographs of O'Hara and Donleavy impressions conditioned by their latest works of fiction.

And Other Stories collects eleven O'Hara stories and a novella. About status, passion and aging, they are in a way footnotes to his major novels. O'Hara's characters are here punished excessively for breaches in decorum, like Julian English in Appointment in Samarra. They are driven by uncontrollable passions, like Grace Caldwell Tate in A Rage To Live. They make it and then wonder whether it was all worth while, like Joe Chapin in Ten North Frederick and Alfred Eaton in From the Terrace. They kill the things they love best, like Robert Millhouser in Ourselves To Know. In other words, these stories are redundancies, perpetuations, without variations of themes.

O'Hara's techniques have not changed either. These are sensibility stories, often dependent upon delayed revelations. Self-revelations: a woman discovers that it was Lesbianism not infidelity which drove her into divorce; a young man discovers he lacks the quiet self-mastery needed to be a gangster; a playwright discovers that his dead, father-obsessed beloved, was wrong about her father's merits and, therefore, not worthy of love. Mutual revelations: a farmer who had to leave college (like three others in this collection) confesses to a girl that he is forever trapped; an aging couple confess their infidelities to each other; an aging society widow confesses to Arthur McHenry (Joe Chapin's law partner) the sexual perversions of her dead husband.

O'Hara's characters fittingly adjust themselves to his theme and docilely help him complete his patterns. They cannot sustain the kind of self-mastery they and O'Hara value. Joe Chapin—whom we know will have an affair with a girl his daughter's age, then consciously drink himself to death—tells his law partner:

> I'm not a puritan, but if people like you and me don't follow certain rules, how can we expect other people to? I'm speaking of the people that grew up without our advantages and the young people you hear so much about today.

But, even if there are "rules," O'Hara's characters cannot abide by them. They slip down—infidelity, Lesbianism, parti à trois, alcoholism—victims of themselves and counters for an author who slides them over a glaze of realistic details toward their carefully arranged ironic ends.

Though they are always fun to read, O'Hara's stories leave you with nothing, patterns without purpose. His famous dialogue is always bright, assemblages of American jargon: went the limit, putting out, all the way, on the make, snatch, quail, gash, dike, madly in love. You can be interested, too, in his gratuitous information: distinguishing the status implications of the Packard roadster and the Mercer phaeton; learning when they began to drink Rob Roys in Pennsylvania; discovering just who George Olsen, a 1920s dance band conductor, was. But finally, irony is all. His stories impinge, when they do, because they make striking cases for disillusionment; they embody poor (though often rich) schmucks driven by passions, aspiring to successes which will turn empty on them. But the characters are too weak and the patterns too strongly contrived to be plausible. Besides, O'Hara has told it all before and better.

It is no surprise that Donleavy cannot sustain the jaunty pose he is attempting in his dust-jacket photograph. Unsustained poses and qualified jauntiness have been his concerns since The Ginger Man. There, Sebastian Dangerfield sought unqualified happiness—"ease and comfort and quiet is all I want"—by absorbing into himself all people and all things without giving a drop of himself in love. When circumstances won't yield to his insistence he overwhelms them with his imagination, as when he becomes the suave Percival Buttermere, O.B.E. He runs through those who love him, across Dublin, increasingly aware of the impossibility of his quest. He senses that if he cannot absorb all, he will eventually lose all; he will die. The best he can manage is a shaky, jaunty pose before this awareness. "When I die I want to decompose in a barrel of porter and have it served in all the pubs in Dublin."

This is Donleavy's simple, touching theme: the impossibility of fulfillment, no matter how many advantages—of vitality, wit, beauty or money—one presses into the service of one's quest. George Smith, in A Singular Man, is rich, unselfish and shy, but he can only feel happiness for a night. In Donleavy's shorter works—Meet My Maker the Mad Molecule and The Saddest Summer of Samuel S—he clearly turns a corner. The undercurrent of sad awareness becomes dominant; the jaunty poses and wild ways of his picaros become muffled in tones of pathos.

In The Beastly Beatitudes of Balthazar B, Donleavy posits a hero who is everything that Dangerfield was not. Balthazar ("possessor of treasure") is blessed with wealth, beauty, the capacity to love and be loved in return. But he can hardly survive, despite his advantages, in a world split by war, raddled by bad luck, rife with meanness. Balthazar is separated from those he loves—his father, his uncle, his nanny—and seeks completion by loving others, a simple but impossible quest. He learns in bed with Bella, a new nanny, that "love is for everybody wherever it may be no matter what you are." Sexual love then becomes his "holy grail." But, when he and Bella are discovered by his mother, Balthazar learns another lesson: "true love is always sure disaster."

Dangerfield reappears in this novel as Beefy, a character of uncompromising charm and selfishness. Like Balthazar, he will try to win happiness from those who, themselves thwarted, would deny its existence, like the boys' headmaster, who knows "that without rules chaps would be waltzing naked in Picadilly." While O'Hara's Joe Chapin feels he should be sustaining "rules" in which he disbelieves, Donleavy's Balthazar and Beefy try to break past impediments. Beefy imagines bawdy breakthroughs—"do the indecent thing to do, if possible"—and Balthazar imagines an ideal love with his beautiful Fitzdare, "away in the soft green peace Fitzdare." Both fail. They are caught with women in Beefy's room and chucked out of Trinity; Beefy is disinherited; Fitzdare dies. "Life is always travelling to a sorrow," Balthazar says.

Though both O'Hara and Donleavy would agree with the sad findings of Fitzgerald—that other American Irishman to whom they both owe much—when he said, "the natural state of the sentient adult is qualified unhappiness," they have different ways of demonstrating their sadnesses. O'Hara's people are pushed around by his plots and their own impulses, puppets to whom things happen. Donleavy's people press the possibilities of life with high style and win many tactical victories of great hilarity—Balthazar has the joy of seeing a sex-hating Irish landlady become so infuriated that she drops her false teeth onto a floor soaked by his broken bottle of urine—before they are defeated. Donleavy's vision of sadness seems earned, won by a search of all the possible routes toward happiness. O'Hara's vision of nada seems contrived, slickly stacked cards blocking straw men. So, finally, the photograph of O'Hara, looked at more closely, reveals a hint of desolation which seems more convincing than his writing. But it is hard not to fancy a hint of joyfulness behind the pained eyes in Donleavy's photograph, the joy of the artist who can embody his vision, however bleak, the self-certainty of the writer who can so eloquently move his hero to name his pain:

> Reach up and gather all this world. Before dark or any other people should ever come. And find you sheltering. As all hearts are. Worried lonely. Your eyes quiet. By the waters cold. Where sadness lurks so deep.
>
> It doth
> Make you > Still.

Isolated Successes

AGENTS OF CHANGE: A Close Look at the Peace Corps. By David Hapgood and Meridan Bennett. Little, Brown & Co. 244 pp. $5.95.

STANLEY MEISLER

Mr. Meisler, Africa correspondent for the Los Angeles Times, was formerly deputy director of the Office of Evaluation and Research in the Peace Corps.

Since the beginning, most writers about the Peace Corps have either derided it or heaped praise on it, but never understood it. In this book, David Hapgood and Meridan Bennett, two former officials of the organization, never mock or gush about it but always understand it. Their work is tough, realistic criticism, so tough and real that it is sometimes cruel and occasionally unfair. But it tells us, as no other book has, what the Peace Corps is all about.

In assessing the work of the 30,000 volunteers sent to the Third World since 1961, Hapgood and Bennett conclude that "as a contributor to development in the Third World, the Peace Corps can make no great claims to accomplishment. . . . Volunteers have filled a lot of jobs, but their utility on those jobs, and often the utility of the jobs themselves, is questionable."

The writers do see more hope for the future. "An enormous potential clearly exists in the Peace Corps. . . ." they write. "If the Peace Corps can build on the isolated cases of its success that its volunteers have registered, then its help to the Third World could be much greater than it has been to date."

But, even if the potential for development is unrealized, Hapgood and Bennett see a great deal of worth in the project. "Though they have not yet contributed much to development . . ." the writers go on, "the volunteers have justified John F. Kennedy's idea many times over by what they have learned. What they do with that learning in later years will be the measure of what the American people are getting for their money. In our opinion, we Americans are likely to draw high dividends from our investment in the Peace Corps. Americans are getting a very special education at a bargain price: This is the clearest result of the Peace Corps experiment. . . . Returning volunteers have helped to take a lot of the mystery and fear out of the American view of the Third World."

Although it may not sound that way, their assessment is gloomy and their praise rather faint. The surest way to destroy the outfit would be to encourage volunteers and officials to look on themselves as part of a great educational experiment instead of a serious attempt to deal with the development problems of the Third World. If the Peace Corps really is no more than "a very special education at a bargain price," it ought to pack up. Despite what they say, the conclusions of Hapgood and Bennett make the venture seem like a failure.

In reaching their conclusions, Hapgood and Bennett set down the most debilitating problem of the Third World, the syndrome of poverty that makes its victims feel dependent, suspicious, hostile, and inadequate:

> The victim of the syndrome often sees his survival as beyond his control. . . . He is suspicious of the people he has grown up with, unwilling to extend them confidence enough to cooperate in mutually beneficial projects. . . . He meets the outside world with hostility, and frequently the familiar world as well. . . . Hope is a luxury he cannot afford.

Moreover, they go on, "change is a threat. The citizen of the underdeveloped world tends to be inflexible, to resist that which is new."

Development comes when these poor overcome their resistance, inflexibility and fear, and accept some change. A volunteer can contribute to this development if he serves as an "agent of change" and helps the fearful poor build enough self-confidence to overcome the inner barriers. A good "agent of change" recognizes that he must deal in small, timid steps, for even the smallest and most timid change seems awesome to those afflicted with fear.

The book acknowledges that some volunteers show "apparent effectiveness" as agents of change. The best volunteers are those who understand the local culture, use and adapt local techniques to improve production, keep their own powers limited and unobtrusive, and help open new channels of communication among the poor. But Hapgood and Bennett believe very few volunteers have so far had the sensitivity and guidance to do this job well.

Volunteers and planners in Washington have failed, according to the authors, because they have often attempted to impose American attitudes and techniques on the people they were trying to help.

This faith in the innate goodness of American ideas reaches deeply into the Peace Corps. The writers describe Corps officials in Washington who sometimes assigned volunteers overseas without too much concern over what they would be doing, confident that any contact with volunteers would have to be valuable to people of the Third World. "If you peel this assumption to its core," Hapgood and Bennett say, "you find a colossally ethnocentric attitude: That we Americans are so good (or skilled, or democratic, or whatever) that our very presence among the less fortunate is a benefit in itself."

The book rightly describes the work of the Peace Corps as cultural imperialism, as intervention in the affairs of others. "Do Americans have any right to thrust themselves into distant societies so different from their own?" Hapgood and Bennett ask. They never answer the question, except to note that American intervention is probably inevitable. But it is clear from the tone of the book that they do not like the idea much and are troubled by it.

In fact, Hapgood and Bennett seem hung up on this issue. They sometimes assess the value of a change on how American or un-American it is. Since the idea of change itself or development or modernization can be construed as somehow American, or at least Western, a reader sometimes gets the feeling that the authors might be uncomfortable with any change at all that is provoked from the outside. That, of course, is a false impression, but Hapgood and Bennett do seem to carry their argument to an unfair extreme in their discussion of Peace Corps work in education.

There is sharp criticism of the organization for its mad rush into teaching at the beginning. "Teaching was . . . the easiest job for the Peace Corps to take on," and it blindly filled almost any request by a Third World government for teachers. But the schools of the Third World are often less concerned with development than with the perpetuation of an elite class. The writers call these schools "the stronghold of the elite . . . a class of overprivileged rulers, more concerned with cars and other material goodies than with progress, holding the masses in profound contempt." By supporting such schools, the Peace Corps "has laid itself open to the charge that it is implicitly encouraging the ruling elite to spend lavishly on an irrelevant school system while starving the nation's other needs."

Hapgood and Bennett are justified in making so sharp an attack on this rush to teaching. But they are just as sharp in condemning the Peace Corps's attempts to reform its teaching programs. In the last few years, some officials have insisted that volunteer teachers are useless unless they make an attempt to reform the elitist, unthinking, rote-learning educational systems of the Third World. But the book dismisses this as another form of cultural imperialism, insisting that a volunteer teacher who helped his students to learn problem solving, democracy and creativity would be helping them learn American values. Recalling that French colonial teachers once required their African students to read from a book that began, "Our Ancestors, the Gauls, were tall men with fair hair and blue eyes," Hapgood and Bennett say, "it does not take too great a leap of the imagination to visualize . . . the school children of the Third World reciting to their approving volunteer teacher: 'Our ancestors, the Founding Fathers, were democrats and innovators. . . .' "

This strikes me as a rather churlish and offhand way to dismiss the work and potential of almost half the volunteers in the Peace Corps. Since most Third World school systems are irrelevant, and since most will continue to caterpillar

6

Caterpillars are strange, hard to tell which is The head — OLSON, DUNCAN — sort of medieval armored horse — McCLURE — or hind end like helmet of knight — SCHWERNER — front end sort of tribal — ADRIENNE
RICH! — be feathered, fanged — ESHLEMAN — whiplash form — KELLY,
BIALY, HELLER, EARLY, EIGNER,
A caterpillar shaped like an octopus! Infinite variety — WAKOSKI,
DAUMAL! IRBY, ROTHENBERG,
JESS, LANSING, so shy under all the freakish garb. Buy it many places for $1.25. 160 pages!!! Vital poetry! Brazilian — with a black mane ☆☽
☆☆☆☆☆☆☆☆

Send me 4 issues of CATERPILLAR, beginning with #6. $5.00 enclosed.
Name ____________
Address ____________
____
make check to: CATERPILLAR.
mail to: 36 Greene St. / NYC 10013 exist anyway, it does not shock me when Peace Corps volunteers infuse them with a few American values to try to make them more relevant to the Third World. Perhaps I am just a little less squeamish than Hapgood and Bennett about cultural imperialism. But, though I see more hope for reform in the teaching programs, I would agree that the Peace Corps has spent too much of its energy on education and not enough on activities like rural development that are more relevant to the modernization of the Third World.

In a sense, the publication of this book itself is a tribute to the organization. Both Hapgood and Bennett were members of the Peace Corps Evaluation Division, a staff of writers, journalists and lawyers whose job was to travel abroad and analyze the work of the Peace Corps. Under the leadership of Charles Peters, a former West Virginia legislator who is now publishing the Washington Monthly, the evaluators were tough critics who forced the Corps into painful self-analysis and helped it profit from its foolish blunders. For years the Peace Corps had been hearing the same kind of tough talk from Hapgood and Bennett that they are now dishing out to the public. This kind of self-criticism is rare anywhere and probably unique in the United States Government.

All in all, I found the conclusions of the book too harsh. I think the volunteer group is more successful than it admits, at least compared to the massive blunderings of other American organizations on the murky, ironic and heartless paths to development. But Hapgood and Bennett set the terms for any intelligent discussion of the matter. They know the problems of Third World development. They know the terror of change in the frail bodies and souls of the poor. They know the cultural snags that entwine the volunteer. They know the limitations and potential of young and innocent Americans. Tough and harsh, they help us see the real Peace Corps.

French Characters

AN IMPERSONATION OF ANGELS: A Biography of Jean Cocteau. By Frederick Brown. The Viking Press. Illustrated. 438 pp. $12.50.

SACHA GUITRY: The Last Boulevardier. By James Harding. Charles Scribner's Sons. 277 pp. $6.95.

HAROLD CLURMAN

Frederick Brown does not love Jean Cocteau, whose biography he has written; he is fascinated by him. Or to put it more precisely, he is dazzled by the world and times which Cocteau sparked. An Impersonation of Angels is a scintillating portrait of that remarkable period, from 1900 to 1929, which the French have named la belle époque.

It was the time "when fashion, politics, literature and journalism milled together with noisy self-acclaim in surrounding cafés, torn by the Dreyfus affair but united by a common passion for theatre on stage and off. Everybody played a role." For all that, there was more to that enchanted day than the twitter of "café society." It was a time of creative ferment in a constellation which included such varied luminaries as Proust and Picasso, Bergson, Valéry and Gide, Stravinsky and Matisse, Debussy and Ravel, Diaghilev and the Surrealists.

What is especially notable in Brown's book is that though he was born in 1934, and could not have seen Cocteau act Mercutio in a dilettante but highly decorative version of Romeo and Juliet, his description of the occasion is altogether accurate. This is as true for the figures he discusses. They are drawn with an unfailing eye for the telling detail: we actually seem to be in the presence of these talented men and women.

Brown is severe—at moments almost "bitchy"—with Cocteau, but I regret to say that he is more or less right. He sums up at one point by saying that Cocteau "devoted more of his energy to the persona than to the self." He speaks further of Cocteau's being "fertile in stillbirths," and "opining brilliantly." His more substantial criticism of the Cocteau oeuvre is genuinely perceptive, displaying an understanding of Cocteau, not only in his work but in his person. Brown is an acute psychologist whose animadversions are not limited to malicious anecdotes or gossip. While he divests Cocteau of his motley he makes us comprehend the tragic aspect of the naked man underneath.

Why, one may ask, if Brown cannot admire Cocteau, should he have taken the pains to write so thoroughgoing an account of his life? The answer is not only the one I have suggested above: that Cocteau in his incessant activity tried to make himself part of every significant literary and artistic movement but because his undoubted gifts were of a kind—common everywhere among the smart sets—which glitter and flash to the astonishment and applause of all those to whom the arts are a show, a rarified circus rather than an essential human communication. "He invented a style," Brown says, "a style . . . melodramatic yet spoofing, wise and wisecracking, irreverent but somehow sadly aware that it lacks the confidence or the energy to make a statement of its own touting and mourning its own sterility." Its spirit tends toward the "sleek and invertebrate, given to cumulus landscapes, ghosts, clowns, pierrots and pale, pale children."

This is well said as is almost everything else in the book. Brown possesses an extensive vocabulary which errs occasionally in the ornamental use of words denoting exotic finery and gems. He also is given to Anglicizing foreign terms. Among other blemishes—the book may arouse resentment in certain quarters—is his inclination to generalize from his subject's particular case to areas where the author is on unsure ground, as in his slighting of certain phases of Picasso's and Stravinsky's art. And though what Brown says in regard to Cocteau's homosexuality is in itself penetrating and convincing, there are misgivings when he extends the diagnosis to homosexuals as a "breed."

Still this biography conveys a sense of Cocteau as a man—versatile, witty, thoroughly aware, deeply troubled: a flawed poet but a poet nonetheless. The reader still cannot help being attracted to the handsome elegant of intense gaze who could say "that the writer [is] a prison from which the works escape, only to be pursued by police the world over." Such a man merits all the attention Brown has lavished on him.

James Harding's biography of Sacha Guitry covers almost exactly the same historical moment as Cocteau's. Cocteau was born in 1889 and died in 1963: Guitry, born 1885, died in 1957. Both were fantastically voluble and precocious: Cocteau entered the social whirl at the age of 15, Guitry had his first play produced at 17 and achieved success at 20. Both were prolific, but while Cocteau wished to reign in the world of (pretty nearly seven) arts, Guitry's realm was that of that bright-light theatre once supreme in all the continental box offices and salons of haute couture entertainment. He wrote, acted, staged about 120 plays, and did the same for more than thirty films.

Though Harding summarizes the plots of many of these plays and films, his book conveys greater excitement about the froufrou of the boulevards than about the theatre as craft or art. We learn very little about Guitry's rehearsal methods, his work with actors, his technical procedures; we hear a good deal about his fabulous art collection, his bons mots, his five glamorous wives, his fashionable coterie; Harding's Paris is gay Paree. The subtitle of his book—The Last Boulevardier—is most appropriate.

One of my first attempts to write theatre criticism when I returned from my student days in Paris was a profile-essay on Guitry. It began with the phrase, "Sacha Guitry, the minnesinger of cads." What I meant is exemplified in some of the Guitry quips quoted in Harding's book: "To be married, to have a mistress and to desire her with somebody else makes it look as if one is becoming faithful to one's wife again—more or less"; or, "As for the man who runs away with your wife, there's no worse punishment than to let him keep her"; or again, "Beware of the women you marry, because the ones who don't deceive you will reproach you for it all their lives—as if it were your fault, while often enough it isn't even theirs!"

Guitry no doubt possessed seductive charm, a gracefully flippant ease as an actor combined with perfect diction, and a voice of pleasantly nasal sound. He had a voracious appetite for pretty things and pink sentiments from jewels to fine paintings and other objets d'art. He was the prime courtesan of the Parisian stage.

It is good to learn from Harding's book that Guitry had never collaborated with the Nazis as had been reported. (His two months' imprisonment on this unfounded charge is the one truly painful note in his career.) The greatest pleasure I derived in reading the book was a nostalgic one, induced by its cast of "characters." The charming playwright, Tristan Bernard, the odd and crotchety dramatic critic Paul Léautaud (Maurice Boissard) about whom I wrote my first published piece, and the writer, Jules Renard (author of Poil de Carotte), were "originals" as captivating or eccentric as anything they created. Such beings aglow with the full folly of living seem to be extinct in our contemporary American cultural galaxy, which has seldom little more to recommend it than intellectual fuzz, secretive backbiting or moneyed gloss.

Is EDWARD DAHLBERG
America's Henry Thoreau of Today?

Dahlberg has spent most of his 65 years in poverty, lack of recognition and the recipient of no major literary award. Now there is a growing awareness of his place in literature. Critics are saying:

"The most remarkable writer in America today." N.Y. Times Book Review

"Dahlberg's prose is the crystalline vein of the Bible, Shakespeare and Sir Thomas Browne." Sir Herbert Read

Now, the first critical book on Dahlberg—

EDWARD DAHLBERG
American Ishmael of Letters, 1968
Harold Billings, Editor $8.95
ROGER BEACHAM, Publisher
Box 8254 Austin, Texas 78712

'THE PRESS AND THE BAY OF PIGS'

A detailed study by

Victor Bernstein and Jesse Gordon

The role played by The Nation in breaking the Bay of Pigs story to the American public, reprinted from the Fall issue of Columbia University Forum.

Single copies—15c; 25 copies at 10c each
Orders over 25 at 7c per copy

THE NATION

333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014

Playing the Game

THE REMNANTS OF POWER: The Tragic Last Years of Adlai Stevenson. By Richard J. Walton. Coward-McCann. 255 pp. $5.94.

HARRY BARNARD

Mr. Barnard is writer-in-residence at Roosevelt University, Chicago. He is the author of Eagle Forgotten: The Life of John Peter Altgeld (Bobbs-Merrill) and other biographies.

Richard Walton, who served as Voice of America correspondent at the United Nations, quite properly views the last years of Adlai Stevenson as tragedy. The subtitle of this long lament—reminiscent of a betrayed lover's sad grieving—is quite apt. But Walton errs, I think, in viewing the tragedy as wholly Stevenson's. Rather, it concerns Stevenson's personal following, especially those individuals in very high places in the current Establishment who professed to be his very dear friends.

A good many of them used Mr. Stevenson for their own purposes. They professed to share his values with respect to the issues of war and peace. But they were really hawks. Or they were merely opportunists who did not care one way or another about the cold war, Cuba, the Dominican Republic, Vietnam, or even the United Nations.

They allowed Mr. Stevenson to think that they agreed with him. They applauded his speeches. No doubt they were sincere at times in their enthusiasm. Especially the lovely and chic ladies whom he continually attracted. But what he apparently did not realize was that many, if not most, of those admirers were really applauding his rhetoric, while they went on supporting the cold war, and accepted everything we were doing in Vietnam.

They also "accepted" Adlai, for all his eccentricities. They eagerly invited him to their posh apartments and country estates, gave him the use of their offices and other personal privileges, laughed at his jokes, lent their women as his escorts. But their hearts belonged to the Establishment that stood for nearly everything Stevenson opposed. And why not? Most of those in his intimate circle were Establishment people, or its servitors, including several top-flight columnists.

Was not Stevenson also an Establishment man? Yes, he was: member of a "first family" of Illinois, a product of Choate, Princeton and Harvard (with Northwestern's Law School only a kind of afterthought), member of prestigious corporation law firms, and all that. But there was a difference. He wanted, perhaps naïvely, to reform the Establishment's ways and thinking. Such, at least, was the tenor of his great utterances. But precious few were his associates who showed that they took to heart his "call for greatness." Later, when the chips were down, and they had a choice between Eugene McCarthy and Hubert Humphrey, or between Steve Mitchell and Dick Daley, most of them were with Humphrey and Daley, right down the line with the cold-war Establishment.

Then there were the leaders who were not especially bosom friends. One may start with the Kennedys and then go on to include Truman, Johnson, Acheson, Rusk, and so many others who had what Stevenson did not have—the power to shape foreign policy. They too praised him.

Worse than that, they took him in. Frequently, they made him an instrument of their policies. "Adlai is my official liar in the UN," John Kennedy supposedly once laughed about the man who had so eloquently urged that our public leaders "tell the truth."

Rusk paid him great deference, as he should have. Stevenson apparently had everything he needed—beautiful women as assistants, both staff and secretarial; sleek limousines and liveried chauffeurs; luxurious offices and more luxurious living quarters in the Waldorf; jobs for all his friends—everything, that is, except what he apparently most prized, an intelligent, honest foreign policy.

True, Walton documents that Stevenson declined to the very end of his days to disavow publicly the Johnson-Rusk policy on Vietnam. Also, that Stevenson positively rejected the idea that he resign in protest over Vietnam—this section forming one of the most interesting and revealing parts of Walton's valuable book. But there is no doubt that Stevenson did in fact oppose the Johnson-Rusk foreign policy.

There is also no doubt that he intended to resign at the end of 1965 because he could no longer stomach his dubious connection with Johnson and Rusk. Yet he would not have given his opposition to them as the reason. As he several times told friends, "That would not be playing the game." He was a gentleman and gentlemen abide by the rules, be it soccer or the fate of the world.

That, of course, was Stevenson's tragedy. Not even for the sake of his own integrity could he rise above being a gentleman in politics. But, as I have indicated, this book really documents, and well, the point that the greater tragedy concerns the influential people who formed the Stevenson coterie.

They live on to continue their high-level mischief. Stevenson was what he was. Even in violating his own principles, and Walton insists he did, much to Walton's anguish, Stevenson was true to himself as a gentleman.

But those others—the hypocrites and sycophants in the worst sense—remain influential. That is real tragedy, not only for them but for the country today.

Where Are the Playwrights?

CATHARINE HUGHES

Miss Hughes covers Off-Broadway and Off-Off-Broadway for Show Business. She has worked off Broadway as an assistant director, and her play, Madame Lafayette, was produced there successfully several years ago. She is a theatre consultant for the New York State Council on the Arts.

Every so often drama critics, human despite all, have moments of optimism—usually early-season moments. And occasionally they lead to such headlines as: PLAYWRIGHTS ARE ON THE WAY BACK.

The Sunday Telegraph (London) being an eminently respectable medium and its critic, Frank Marcus (The Killing of Sister George, etc.), being a responsible journalist, one's heart leaped with hope. Perhaps, against all evidence to the contrary, Mr. Marcus had come upon something. Perhaps there was still room for other than the Living Theatre—often admirable—Tom O'Horgan, and derivatives of Peter Brook. Perhaps we really were about to rediscover words and ideas in the theatre.

Alas, no. After slaps at Britain's National Theatre ("It was clear that [playwrights] were disqualified . . . on account of being alive"), which seemed gratuitous, given present repertory and future plans, and at the Royal Shakespeare Company (where they were disqualified "on account of being British"), which seemed more accurate, given the RSC's markedly mediocre "American season," he placed his hopes on new signs of life at the Royal Court. May they be fulfilled. But as no one, certainly not Mr. Marcus, needs reminding, the Royal Court is not what it once was. And the fall entries in its proposed resurgence have been something less than auspicious.

Nevertheless, Marcus did raise the question: "Where have all the playwrights gone?" Obviously not to visit the Queen; and by common consent, they were not on Broadway in this season's first semester. Israel Horovitz, Terrence McNally and Leonard Melfi, with the collectively titled Morning, Noon and Night, have scarcely set the populace to shouting. Joseph Heller's We Bombed in New Haven was noteworthy only for its good intentions.

Are they, then, Off-Broadway, where once the action was? Today, Little Broadway might be a better name. Allowing for the one or two exceptions that prove the rule (Mart Crowley of The Boys in the Band, and perhaps Horovitz, will be worth watching next time round), what once was the playwright's hope is now more often his despair. Its most successfully recent offerings—both artistically and financially—have been musicals: You're a Good Man, Charlie Brown, Jacques Brel Is Alive and Well and Living in Paris, In Circles—all perfectly splendid in their own terms—or plays such as Futz! and Tom Paine, more interesting for directorial techniques and supposed shock value than for the writers or ideas they revealed. Lincoln Center's great discovery of late last season, 22-year-old Ron Cowen, may some day prove as good as a few indulgent reviewers say he is. (His recent television special, however, was not encouraging.) But Summertree was little more than a sentimental, poorly structured soap opera. One had the feeling that some critics, overanxious for the Repertory Company to succeed, were patting it on the head a trifle prematurely. Perhaps some day someone will explore fully why, in almost exactly the same five-year period that Lincoln Center Repertory has been in existence, Olivier's National Theatre has developed into what is probably the finest company in the English-speaking world. Surely the desire of actors to work with Olivier is not the only reason. Nor is the British Arts Council subsidy, which in fact is rather small.

Perhaps Off-Off-Broadway has attracted the writers? Here, one treads with care. It is the current sacred cow (more often for those who have seen a half-dozen of its productions at two or three of the better theatres than for those who have seen several dozen more widely scattered). It is to the late sixties what Off-Broadway was to the fifties—the place where it's happening. It can be good, and it can be absolutely atrocious, and the risk is for the taking.

Unfortunately, the risk is getting greater. With some fifty or sixty "theatres" now functioning on one basis or another, quality is in some cases markedly off. (I have seen more rank amateurism in the past two or three months than in all of the preceding year.) But that is not the only disturbing thing about the current state of Off-Off-Broadway. With occasional exceptions, it is only marginally what it set out to be. When it began—an event variously dated as September 27, 1960, when a Greenwich Village coffeehouse called Take 3 presented Alfred Jarry's turn-of-the-century avant-garde play King Ubu; somewhat earlier with Cafe Cino; or in terms of consistent production of new works, at the Judson Poets' Theatre in 1961—the intention was to provide new writers with a forum, a place to experiment, a place to fail. To some extent it has done so, and reality has perhaps dictated the departure: fifty or sixty theatres, some of them offering a new production every few weeks, often in the form of two or three one-acts per bill, will quite obviously run out of new writers, at least of writers worth attention. The consequence is an increasing number of revivals, fine in their own right, but seldom sufficiently well produced to do the plays justice; and a plethora of indifferent to shoddy work.

One dares to hope that some day soon the chaff and the wheat will be separated, that Off-Off-Broadway will undertake the sort of self-reappraisal that alone can save it from what it threatens to become—the province of dilettantism, narcissism, and self-celebration. The threat of fifty or sixty small groups speaking only to themselves is not an idle one, as anyone can attest who has been in lofts, basements and back rooms containing an audience of a dozen or less (and those not infrequently in some way related to the production). If theatre is not a "popular art," neither is it, as someone remarked recently, an exercise in artistic masturbation.

All of this is not to deny that some interesting work, even some exciting and potentially important work, is being done OOB. It is unquestionably to be found —at the Judson Poets' Theatre, at Theatre Genesis, at Cafe LaMaMa, at the tiny Playbox, and a few others. The odds are not of the best, but theatrical odds never have been. However, the approaches taken by a few of the theatres provide some indication of just how curiously the OOB deck is stacked.

Al Carmines, the energetic young associate minister who guides the arts program at the Judson Memorial Church (and wrote the music for the hit In Circles), describes Judson as a playwrights' theatre. And, to a greater extent than some of the others, it remains so, despite increasing specialization in musicals. At least there is more emphasis on text, somewhat less inclination to directorial self-indulgence and novelty for its own sake. It gave Sam Shepard's Red Cross, revived Off-Broadway last season, its first production (though the newer Theatre Genesis is really Shepard's base), and has presented some of the work of Rochelle Owens, Rosalyn Drexler, Maria Irene Fornes, Lanford Wilson, H. M. Koutoukas and others.

By contrast, Thresholds is an intimate third-floor loft theatre, seating forty people. One recent production, a dramatization of Lewis Carroll's The Hunting of the Snark, is representative of the let's-scuttle-the-playwright approach. According to the director, the aim was to take Carroll's narrative poem about an unlikely crew that sets out in quest of a snark as the basis for "a redivision of responsibility for the theatrical event," in which the actor takes on "the responsibility of making the play happen," and the acting ensemble "can share in the playwriting." It brings seven actors into the playing area, where they then begin to stretch, exercise, and utter sounds ranging from guttural to musical. They study themselves in mirrors and, in theory, prepare for the roles they are about to create. Eventually, they go off on their voyage, each assuming what the director terms a "facial mask"—of a beaver, a rabbit, a Britannia-Rules-the-Waves bellman, etc.—as an external aid to the achievement of an inner reality.

The evening had its moments, but far from enough of them. And one could ask oneself whether there were not many more of them for the director and cast than for the audience, whether the repetition of such approaches will, in the long run, suffice even for the performer. Mr. Carroll was not around to complain.

At Cafe La Mama, now firmly established in a new foundation-endowed home, director Tom O'Horgan holds forth. O'Horgan (Hair, Futz!, Tom Paine) is a talented young man, perhaps the most inventive and enterprising that the New York branch of the New Theatre possesses. Whether he, and what he represents, is good for the playwright is another matter. If it is sufficient for a director to take a bad play, most recently Rochelle Owens' Futz!, and make it into a Theatrical Event, O'Horgan is very good indeed. Probably, neither he nor Miss Owens sees it that way; quite possibly, both think it a good play. What it is, of course, is a good excuse.

Everyone has heard of Futz! by now —that little love-in-the-barnyard drama about a man and his pig, Amanda, and how they make out together; how the wicked villagers, ignoring the fact that Amanda's obviously the right girl for him, do in poor Cy Futz for the crime of being different. It is a mediocre play, with no originality of thought and deprived as to language; a modern morality about people blind to their own faults and self-righteous about what they consider the faults of others.

Futz! is important, if that is the word, as a symptom of the increasing sublimation of script to displays of directorial virtuosity, or what sometimes passes for it. In the article referred to in the first paragraph, Marcus lamented the "disdain for the writer" in London's experimental theatre, "the actors preferring to strip to mumbled improvisations of their own invention." In America, this tendency has gone a good deal further. Joseph Chaikin's Open Theatre workshop set out to evolve a form in which playwrights, directors and actors, working together from the start, create the play. Jean-Claude van Itallie's interesting America Hurrah and Megan Terry's Viet Rock are its best-known achievements thus far. Richard Schechner and his Performance Group have carried matters somewhat further with Dionysus in '69, a work with antecedents perhaps less in Euripides than in Antonin Artaud.

Artaud, that tragic and erratic genius to whom the New Theatre, and Peter Brook in particular, owes so much, asserted: "We shall not act a written play, but we shall make attempts at direct staging, around themes, facts or known works. . . . I propose a theatre in which violent physical images crush and hypnotize the sensibility of the spectator seized by the theatre as by a whirlwind of higher forces." Proclaiming "No more masterpieces!" he called for "a theatre which eliminates the author in favor of . . . a director who has become a kind of manager of magic, a master of sacred ceremonies."

With or without Artaud, O'Horgan's aisle-hopping, let's-be-friends actors, nudity, animal noises, consistently high decibel level and acrobatics; Brook's ritualistic howls, hisses and gasps, huge gold phallus, and jazz band in his production of Seneca's Oedipus for the

"UNIMPEACHABLY THE BEST PICTURE I'VE SEEN IN YEARS!" —Rex Reed, (Women's Wear Daily)

Palomar Pictures International presents an Associates and Aldrich Production.

"The Killing of Sister George"

FROM CINERAMA [illegible] CORPORATION

Metrocolor®

ⓧ PERSONS UNDER [illegible] ADMITTED

ON THE WEST SIDE
ORLEANS
in the new Broadway Triplex Theatres
47th St. bet. Broadway [illegible] 8th Ave., 757-3503

ON THE EAST SIDE
BEEKMAN
65th St. at 2nd Ave - RE 7-2622

British National Theatre, are all perfectly valid, at least for as long as they do not become ends in themselves. Too often, they do.

Irving Wardle of the London Times wrote: "For me [Oedipus] represented the dead end of the Artaud movement in Britain: a tragedy by the ultimate master of the 'theatre of cruelty,' whose equal eminence as a stoic philosopher was blotted out by stage bloodshed. . . . What remains are the bare bones of a mighty legend, supporting a mounting series of empty horrors presented by a ritualistic group of principals versed in Oriental movement, and a chorus who intensify the ceremony with drumming, Karate gestures, and spasms of mirthless laughter . . . . [It is] concentration on mindless visceral emotion at the expense of intellect."

THE THIRD WORLD

This loud morning sensed a small cry in the news paper caught somewhere on an inner page
I decide to travel for lunch & end up in an automat
White House Cafeteria looking thru a little window put a nickel in the slot and out comes fried rice
Taking a tour of the rest of that building
I hear a small cry
beyond the rice paddies between floors where the escalator sticks and remember last night's dream of attending my own funeral at a drive-in mortuary not really believing
I was that dead
Someone throwing rice
All the windows dry
Tipped the coffin open & laughed into it and out falls old funnyface myself
the bargain tragedian with a small cry followed by sound of Che Guevara singing in the voice of Fidel

Far over the Perfume River the clouds pass
carrying small cries

The monsoon has set in the windows weep
I
back up to the Pentagon
on a flatbed truck and unload the small brown bodies fresh from the blasted fields!

LAWRENCE FERLINGHETTI

But somehow it works—or, rather, it worked in Oedipus and it has worked in at least some of Brook's other productions, though certainly not in all. The reason, I suspect, is that, Wardle notwithstanding, Brook's direction is not nearly so "mindless" as the work of some of his imitators and emulators. Although often self-indulgent, Brook is not a director discovering a new toy. "I have sometimes been accused of wanting to destroy the spoken word, and indeed in this absurdity there's a grain of sense," he observes in The Empty Stage. "Is there another language, just as exacting for the author, as the language of words? Is there a language of actions, a language of sounds—a language of word-as-part-of-movement, of word-as-lie, word-as-parody, of word-as-rubbish, of word-as-contradiction, of word-shock, or word-cry? . . . The theatre needs its perpetual revolution. Yet wanton destruction is criminal; it produces violent reaction and still greater confusion."

Brook, at least, realizes that heat is not really a substitute for light, that the idea of "shocking" the audience into a new awareness, of evoking its response and moving it from its lethargy is legitimate only to the extent that where it is moved is not simply another vacuum. Young though it is, the new, highly physical, visceral theatre already finds itself threatened by what must seem the greatest curse of all: the dullness of repetition. The second or third time round, nudity is taken more or less for granted; by now the assorted Anglo-Saxonisms produce the same glassy-eyed indifference as does an Arthur Miller Home Truth; and the actor who hands out flowers had best bring the watering can the next time.

One thing the New Theatre—and by this I do mean the relatively quiescent Theatre of the Absurd—hasn't done for us lately is make us think. (Neither, for the most part, has the old, but that is another matter.) And, of course, it is still ideas, rather than effects, that are likely to do so. The New Theatre has not been able to go beyond the surface; achieving momentary immediacy, it has not shown that it has anything to say. Often visually arresting, it has thus far not known what to do with the attention it may fleetingly compel. (Does one respond in any way deeply—assuming one is not a voyeur—to the extended nudity of Terrence McNally's Sweet Eros, or to being dragged into participation in the orgy or rock dancing of Schechner's Dionysus?)

All this might be less depressing if it were not for the fact that, by relying on the actor's experience of his art—and, presumably, of himself—and the director's ability to startle, shock or surprise, today's experimental theatre steadily and consciously diminishes the playwright's role to that of providing only the framework. Frameworks are notably lacking in perception, sensitivity or depth. Theatrical experimentation with form—even sheer theatrical gimmickry—is vital as a force for breaking with the stereotyped thinking of the past. But when the audience begins, as it inevitably will, to shrug and ask what's new, the New Theatre may find itself with writers who have never created a true character, fully explored an idea or motivation, or followed it to its conclusion; with "playwrights" who can do little more than provide the outline for a directorial extravaganza. Extravaganzas are notoriously short-lived.

MUSIC

DAVID HAMILTON

As a postscript to the Ring operas recently reported in these pages, the Metropolitan Opera presented on December 21 its only other Wagnerian presentation of the current season, a revival of Die Meistersinger that, by comparison, vividly demonstrated the shortcomings of "normal operating procedure" in such repertory. This opera is, after all, one of the half dozen summits of the art, and in its requirements of both mass and detail provides a touchstone of an opera company's resources and capabilities.

While the Ring operas were presented without cuts, Meistersinger is currently abridged to the extent of about thirty minutes. These cuts are neither as numerous nor as brutal as those practiced in the 1950s, but some are exceptionally ill chosen. To remove Hans Sachs's "Hat man mit dem Schuhwerk" (at his renunciation of Eva in Act III) is rather like playing Act III, Scene 3 of Hamlet minus the "Now might I do it" speech; a visible gesture may express the decision made at this point, but it can hardly convey the structural climax implied by Wagner's crucial development of the "Wahn, Wahn" music and the "Shoemaker's Song" from Act II. This particular deletion leaves major musical threads untied and must, moreover, be effected by a harmonically clumsy splice—all for the sake of four minutes' running time. I suspect that these cuts are made to avoid running into orchestral overtime, but if they are done to minimize audience fatigue, they bespeak a dubious comprehension of the nature of musical time: there is no easier way to make a coherent work seem "long" than to fragment its coherence by omitting essential musical discourse.

The level of orchestral execution was disappointing throughout the evening, save in the Prelude to Act III, where the relaxation of Joseph Rosenstock's generally precipitate, underarticulated tempos gave the wind and brass a chance to relax and play not only accurately but also musically. And, for all its flaws, the orchestra shone by comparison with the chorus, which is by and large, day in and day out, the most consistently trying feature of Metropolitan performances—ragged in ensemble, uncertain of intonation, and raw in tone. A particular visual offense, amidst the generally attractive staging, was the gaggle of buxom altos and middle-aged tenors who passed for "apprentices," although the campy ballet that accompanies the procession of the guilds runs a close second.

Aside from a few gaggy double-take routines, the stage action was well planned, subject to the acting limitations of some of the singers. And, to complete the picture of an average night at the Met, there was a wide spectrum of vocalism, including at least three highly satisfactory performances: Karl Dönch's brilliant Beckmesser (if only he would sing the Doctor in Wozzeck this well!), Loren Driscoll's elegant David, and Giorgio Tozzi's consistently improving Sachs (already a distinguished dramatic portrayal, but lacking ultimate vocal security). Ironically, the cuts were primarily at their expense (especially Tozzi's), although all the singers suffered equally from the mucilaginous and hasty orchestral proceedings, and none could overcome the absence of structural articulation in the performance as a whole.

The point of all this is not once again to belabor the Metropolitan management for its way of doing things. Nearly every improvement one can imagine for this performance would have cost money: more rehearsals, some restaging, more and better choristers, a better conductor—for that matter, even restoring the cuts and adopting more reasonable tempos, which would run into overtime. And money is just what the Metropolitan hasn't got (it is, naturally, irritating to see them spending money on such trivia as Adriana Lecouvreur, or new productions of Tosca and Trovatore, but these were paid for by funds donated specifically for the purposes. It is an unhappy fact that operatic works as large and complex as Meistersinger are subject to a special kind of inflationary spiral: they cost so much to present that they are done less frequently; therefore their revival, at increasingly longer intervals, requires an even heavier schedule of rehearsals, especially by the orchestra.

Once upon a time—say in the 1930s—when the entire Wagnerian canon was performed every year, the orchestra needed (and doubtless got) less rehearsal. Nowadays, given the turnover of orchestral players, a production such as next year's Siegfried (last performed in 1962, and before that in 1951 and 1957) may well need as much rehearsal as if it had not been played in decades. Even Karajan's highly polished Walküre of last season has lost some of its luster a year later, and when Wozzeck was "revived" in 1965 after a four-year lapse, the original significant (if hardly triumphant) effort turned into a disaster.

Along with the economy of rehearsal time that was feasible three decades ago,

KNOW CANADA BETTER!

See world affairs from a different perspective!

Read CANADIAN DIMENSION

Independent, lively, and original. Canada's leading forum for radical thought.

$4.00 for eight large issues

Write to:

CANADIAN DIMENSION
P.O. Box 1413
Winnipeg 1, Manitoba, Canada

Notice to Subscribers

Because of postal regulations, The Nation's mailing list must be arranged according to Zip Codes. Therefore—with any correspondence about address changes, renewals, etc.—please enclose the address label from your Nation. If you don't have a label, be sure to include your Zip number, and be sure it is correct. Without it, we cannot find your name plate.

The Best Way To Get THE NATION

THE NATION 1-20-69
333 Sixth Ave., New York 10014

☐ One Year, $10
☐ Two Years, $[illegible]
☐ 6 Months, $5

☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed

(Add $1 per year postage for Canada; [illegible] foreign)

Name ....
Address ....
City ....
State .... Zip No. ......

there was also the general indifference to dramatic and visual values (between 1920 and 1948, only one Wagnerian opera was invested with fresh scenery). These factors meant that, given suitable singers (Flagstad, Melchior, Schorr and the like were in residence for much of the season) and a competent conductor (Artur Bodanzky, later Leinsdorf, Szell, Busch, Reiner and others), the operas of Wagner and Strauss—nothing more difficult was attempted in those years—could be managed as part of a routine repertory operation. (I am not suggesting that the performances of thirty years ago were significantly better—but much more was attempted, and the musical achievement, if not its visual counterpart, was quite comparable.) Today, the need for more rehearsal, the expenses of adequate staging, and the jet-propelled unwillingness of leading singers and conductors to spend the entire season in New York—combine to make steady diets of Wagner and Strauss (let alone anything more complex) almost indigestible for a repertory company. As a result, only a few such works can be done every season, and the spiral continues (sometimes in peculiar ways: one leading Wagnerian tenor—almost the only respectable one, at the time—stopped coming to the Met because they couldn't offer him enough performances).

In compensation, the Metropolitan now offers a more varied repertory, if hardly an up-to-date one: instead of nine Wagner operas and two of Strauss, we have this season three Wagner, two Strauss and one each of Britten and Berg. But this kind of opera depends least on what the Met provides best (singing), and most on great conductors and adequate rehearsal. If the Met cannot continue to present these works adequately, we shall need more than the operatic "Museum of Modern Art" that New York's musical life now so grievously lacks; we shall not even have a respectable historical museum. The forthcoming revivals of Die Frau ohne Schatten, Peter Grimes and Wozzeck will provide important evidence as to whether such works are still viable in a normal operatic economy.

THEATRE

ROBERT HATCH

Jules Feiffer's first play, Little Murders, has arrived at Circle in the Square in Greenwich Village after vicissitudes on Broadway and out of town. It is an excellent evening in the theatre; that it is an excellent play I would not be so quick to say, but it has been directed by Alan Arkin to resemble a most eventful one. Actually, not a great deal happens.

Happens, that is, in terms of human intercourse. Feiffer's stock in trade is the multiple-frame cartoon in which a contemporary type thinks aloud, his ruminations rising, station by station, from specious rationality to veritable dementia. That, basically, is the device he has adapted to the stage, both for the overall development of the play and in its individual scenes.

By his title, I take Feiffer to mean that we are killing one another, institutionally and interpersonally. Gunfire can be heard in the streets at the opening and it has risen to a pandemonium of urban violence at the close. Meanwhile, within the depressed but almost classless apartment that is the single set, familial guerrillas are at work. The father is a pugnacious loser, the mother a believer in the power of aphorisms to uphold standards; there is a disheveled son, stewing in idleness, who confides that what he wants to do, really, is direct movies.

A daughter comes home with her latest fiancé ("another of those fags," her father fears in advance), and these two set the domestic sound tracks in motion. It is a cacophony between the generations, but also intragenerational. The daughter is a revolting combination of two repellent types—daddy's best girl and the competent American female. She can spar three rounds with anything in pants, she is Little Miss Fixit and she is determined that everyone shall live up to what she sees as the best in them. She is perfectly miserable in her frustrated need to be bossed around, but unhappily her young man (and apparently all her previous young men) is supine in combat, passive in love, disengaged from tradition, and bored with his own professional success. These nonentities in a vacuum aggress at one another according to their several humors, but it is here that Feiffer's gift for lampooning his age in isolated boxes works against his aspirations as a playwright. Little Murders never generates an organic life; there is a good deal of physical contact, but almost no intellectual or emotional reaction. The characteristic episode is a monologue on a rising pitch, with the speaker flinging himself into a chair or out the door on the climax, and his recipients left gazing at their shoes. Indeed, three persons—a Jewish judge who blesses America for having allowed his immigrant parents to wreck their health on his behalf, a Greenwich Village pastor to the hippies and a paranoid police captain—are brought on to give just one long monologue apiece. The interplay on stage is so minimal that I could not understand why, after the girl is killed by a sniper's stray bullet, her husband (there has been a marriage) should be suddenly transformed into a relentless operator. If you were to ask me what the play is about I should be reduced to ticking off the illusions, prejudices and perversions that Feiffer cites as disfigurements of our society. More comprehensively I could not say, because plays are about what people do to one another, and these people do nothing.

That, I have no doubt, is how Feiffer sees us—a multitude of isolated mouths prating poisonous nonsense—and he has a point, if a somewhat simplified one. It may be, though, that the stage is not the best place for stating it. One comes from Little Murders feeling more beaten upon than enlightened.

Nevertheless, the script is funny—dangerously funny, because Feiffer draws his characters from among his audience, and his lines can be heard in the lobby during intermission; more humiliatingly, they can be heard coming from your own lips on the way home. Feiffer is one of those artists who compel life to conform to their visions.

Linda Lavin is a small-boned girl who has some trouble living up to the physical specifications of the daughter; otherwise, the cast gets itself well set in Feiffer's uniforms. The three walk-on monologists, Shimen Ruskin, Paul Benedict and Andrew Duncan (in the order mentioned above), have obviously been polishing their lines for weeks before audiences of delighted friends. Each of them now possesses a sure-fire night-club turn.

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, ALgonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

The Nation

BOOK SERVICE

Offers the following at a discount:

☐ VIETNAM FOLLY by Sen. Ernest Gruening and Herbert W. Beaser (National Press, $8.95) $7.15

☐ FRIENDSHIP AND FRATRICIDE by Meyer A. Zeligs (Viking, $8.95) $7.15

☐ THE GOODBYE LAND by Jose Yglesias (Pantheon, $4.95) $3.96

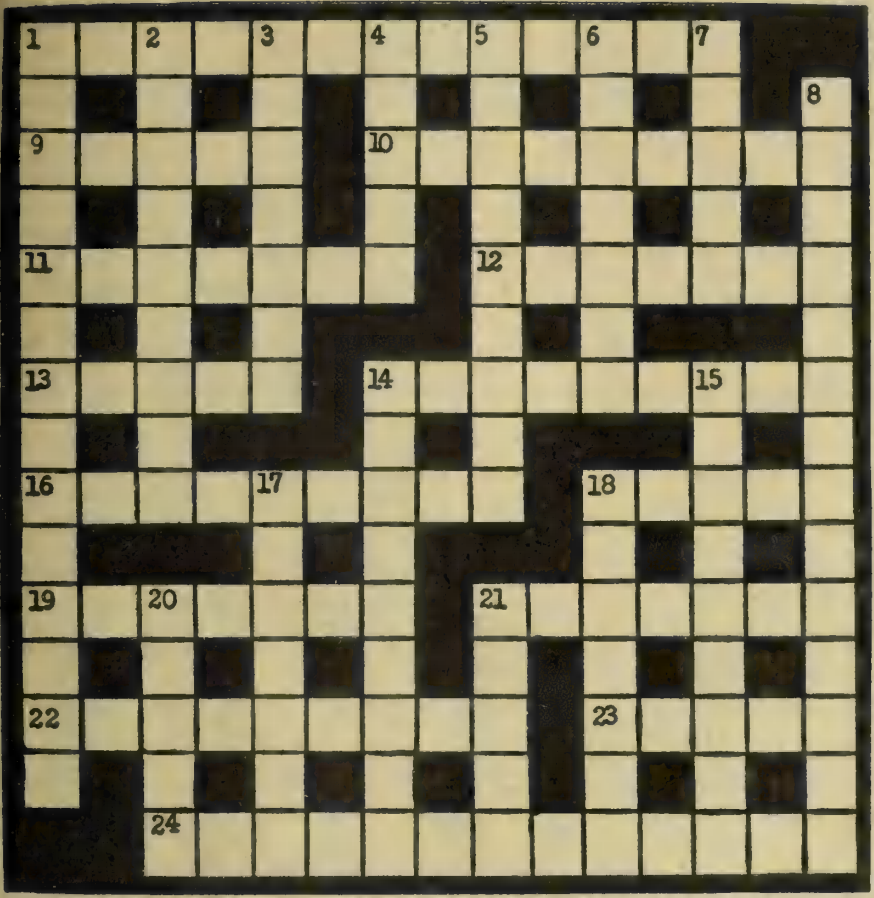
Remittance accompanying orders should be made payable to THE NATION, 333 6th Ave., N.Y. 10014

Readers can avail themselves of our regular offer to send them any book (except paperbacks), published in the U.S. at the retail price post-free. When ordering, please give title, author and publisher.

1-20-69

Crossword Puzzle No. 1281

FRANK W. LEWIS



ACROSS

1 Those in it are not the heaven's brightest! (5,8)
9 Sound guides for the city. (5)
10 Broken out as sure as a union outfit, in a way. (9)
11 Surpass an alternative exit sign? (7)
12 Within it I always show up first. (7)
13 A pseudonym for a writer or two. (5)
14 No charge for minor surgery, depending on what the writer might do. (4,5)
16 Spray starch around and push their form of power, perhaps. (9)
18 Let out, or taken on? (5)
19 Arranged in layers. (7)
21 See 14 down
22 Moore's charms, when young? (9)
23 Does it have nothing to offer in architecture? (5)
24 By doing it, one can create items of contemporary revolution. (8,5)

DOWN

1 Thieves' haven of dissenters? One hopes not to resort to it! (4-3,7)
2 What athletes shouldn't do in obvious downpour. (9)
3 One who is stupid gets in before long to pose as an English writer. (7)
4 One might give us character, subject to review. (5)
5 They dispense things in fine shape. (9)
6 Insinuate it might be not yet out? (7)
7 Kernel emission containing resin. (5)
8 Was being stubborn the sometime quality of the Minotaur? (14)
14 and 21 across Good grief, why the megaphone? (3,6,3,4)
15 Did De Quincey have it, or perhaps even Rip Van Winkle? (9)
17 Might be associated with coffee, if you're thinking of Bach. (7)
18 Is the toe matched by this? (3-4)
20 Looks like a Tarzan-type statement of a dwarf, after drinking too much of it? (5)
21 Pipe and barrel represent two types of it,

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1280

ACROSS: 1 Final period; 9 Multiple; 10 Angles; 11 Several; 14 Strait; 15 Bastille; 17 Predator; 20 Reacts; 22 Abetter; 26 Tivoli; 27 Elevated; 28 Instigation. DOWN: 3 Asphalt; 4 Peer; 5 Reaches; 7 Purest; 8 Vessel; 13, 2, 24 and 12 A bird in the hand is worth two in the bush; 16 Inamorato; 18 Rabbit; 19 and 6 The gift of gab; 20 Respect; 21 Tatter; 25 Yegg.

Readers are invited to send for a free copy of Mr. Lewis' "ground rules." Address Puzzle Department, The Nation, 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014.

RECORDS

FREE 44 PAGE CATALOG offers hundreds of recordings of rare Renaissance, Baroque and Classical music. Some records priced as low as $1.00 each! All late recordings in stereo only. MHS RECORDS, Box 932 NA, New York, N. Y. 10023.

EDUCATIONAL

QUAKER STUDY CENTER—Suburban Philadelphia. Special program for study in social change, non-violence and radical living. Also year's seminar on man's search for meaning, confirmation and dialogue. Write: L. W. Lewis, Pendle Hill, Wallingford, Pa. 19086.

PERSONALS

MAN CANNOT LIVE BY BREAD ALONE. He also needs love. Support free birth control everywhere. Box 4069, Grand Central Sta., New York City 10017.

PARTICIPATE in an intriguing nationwide dating project for alert, literate, Jewish singles. For FREE literature write, giving age, to: OPERATION MAZEL TOV, 550 Fifth Avenue, N.Y.C. 10036.

BIRTHCHART/HOROSCOPE computed and drafted for reference and display 9½ x 11. Send $5.00, date, time and place of birth. INPROMA, Box 224, Lake View, N. Y. 14085.

MEET YOUR IDEAL MATE. Computerized Dating Service (All Ages). "Let TEAM Make You a Team". For FREE questionnaire write: TEAM Project, 245 E. 30th St., New York, N.Y. 10016

WRITERS IN DESPAIR? Publishers reader-editor analyses, revises fiction, non-fiction. Including French. Box #621, c/o The Nation.

SOCK IT TO ME—over 225 other underground buttons. 1/25c, 5/$1, 50/$5, 125/$10 and 1,000/$75. Bumperstickers, beads and peace jewelry, too. Free catalogue to all! Free sample to stores. A BIG-LITTLE STORE, 1077 Mission, San Francisco, Calif. 94103.

PUBLICATIONS

BOOKS LOCATED [illegible] any subject. Extensive Search Service. Satisfaction guaranteed. Hoffman Research Service, 124-N Whitmore Road, Irwin, Pa. 15642.

An Atheist Speaks out! What does the atheist believe in? Does he have a positive philosophy? Read And The Truth Shall Make You Free. $4.95, Knight Publishing Co., PO Box 15, Hawthorne CA. 90250.

PAPERBACK PICK-NIC! You're invited! Free lists used bargains. Hard backs too. Harco, Box 52-NA, Carmel, Indiana 46032.

OVER 2,000,000 Back Date Magazines! Reasonable prices. Fast service. Send needs. MID-TOWN, Box 917-N, Maywood, N.J. 07607.

NATIONAL NEWSLETTER lists jobs for social change. Sample free, donation appreciated; 2010 B St., Hayward, Calif. 94541.

THINK BIG! Skyrocket your income and gain financial security, prestige and power. Learn secrets that make men rich. "The Magic of Thinking Big" is a 'must' for anyone who wants to get ahead. 256 pages of inside facts, case histories, and the secrets of riches. Book #WB-123, only $2.00. James Associates, 708 Fresno, Plainview, Texas 79072.

Advertising Rates

Classified: 74c a line (6 words) 3 line min.
Classified Display: $7.42 per inch (min.)
THE NATION, 333 Sixth Ave., N.Y. [illegible]
242-8400

What will we be protesting next?

You don't have to be a fortune-teller to see into the future of human destructiveness. Sixteen scientists from six countries tell us what the Pentagon and others are planning for us in UNLESS PEACE COMES, edited by Nigel Calder. Each essay covers a different area of development: from conventional to geophysical warfare: from nuclear to microbiological weapons.

You cannot afford to be unprepared or unaware. Subscribe to The NATION now and we will send you free UNLESS PEACE COMES—A Scientific Forecast of New Weapons.

THE NATION 333 Sixth Avenue New York, N.Y. 10014

☐ I'll join you for 1 year (48 issues). I enclose $10 and understand you'll send me free UNLESS PEACE COMES, edited by Nigel Calder.

☐ I'll try you for 6 months (24 issues). I enclose $6.

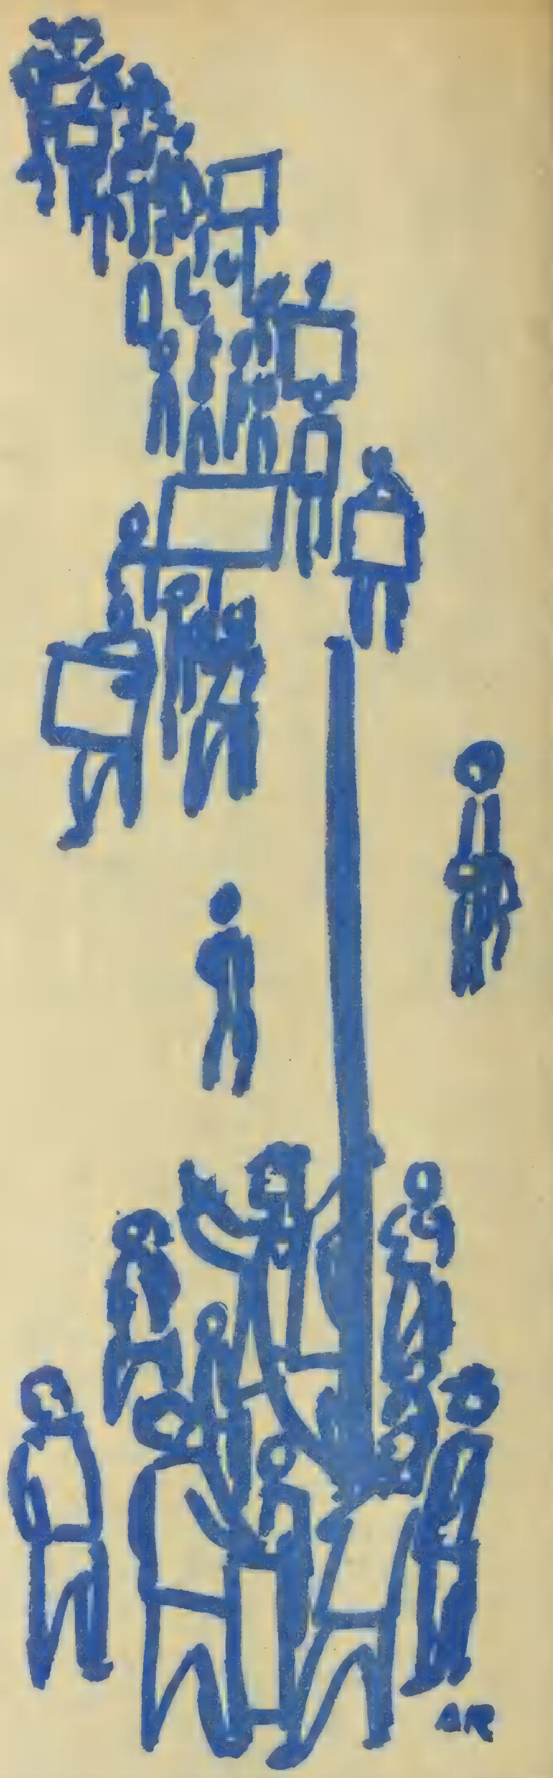
(Add $1 per year postage for Canada and Mexico; $2 other foreign)

Name ....

Street ....

City .... State .... Zip ....

N1-20



BURLINGAME
JAN 27 1969
LIBRARY

SHERRILL ON CONGRESS

THE NATION

JANUARY 27, 1969 35 cents

5-69R PL-5337
BURLINGAME PUBLIC
LIBRARY
BURLINGAME CA 94010

Mobsters in Pasture
NOSTRA JERSEY
FRED J. COOK

War Profits
THE TAX-COURT PEEPHOLE
SANFORD WATZMAN

West Coast Parties
California Weather Breeder
MICHAEL HARRIS

Medicine: The Calculated Risks GEORGE A. SILVER, M.D.

Morning Coffee With Sillitoe IGOR HAJEK

LETTERS

within the cage

New York City

Dear Sirs: "Nothing makes life safe," said Elizabeth Bowen in The House in Paris. Your editorial, "Bulletproof Illusions," in the Dec. 2 issue, pretends to give an answer to an unsolvable problem—something The Nation rarely does. . . . There is no answer at present as to how to protect our public officials from assassination. You give the impression that President de Gaulle is safer for not being surrounded by a battalion of security forces. But in an essay in Time magazine, printed after Robert Kennedy's death, I read the following, also urging the United States to look to France for helpful ideas:

> When de Gaulle travels, his car [this presumably applies also to the new Citroen] is flanked by tough Compagnie Républicaine de Sécurité troopers on motorbikes; helicopters hover overhead, and the pace is a brisk 80 miles an hour or more. In towns en route, operating rooms are reserved in hospitals and a supply of de Gaulle's blood type is stocked.

If de Gaulle has survived three or more assassination attempts (and does the fact of survival indicate lack of danger?) it is not because he has strolled alone and barefoot down the Champs Elysées, being wary only of stepping on sharp sticks and nails. Florence Victor

The intention of the editorial in question must have been obscure, since Miss Victor misunderstood it. We agree with Miss Bowen, nothing makes life safe; and for conspicuous politicians the risk is particularly great. All we meant to suggest was that the degree of safety which can be attained will be gained through the relationship of the leader to the people. Security measures taken in the absence of a harmonious relationship are largely showmanship. They may have a negative effect, since they advertise the fear of assassination and may stimulate the gunman to penetrate a shield which cannot be invulnerable if the man within it is to do his job. Editors

Marines on trial

Honolulu, Hawaii

Dear Sirs: This is an appeal for moral and financial support for two Marines, Lance Cpl. Thomas J. Met, 21, and Pfc. Young C. (Gary) Gray, 19, who are being court-martialed for having spoken out strongly against the Vietnamese War in a sanctuary held for them at the University of Hawaii in November. Because of the publicity generated by the four-day sanctuary in the midst of the largely military population of Oahu, unusually heavy charges have been made against these two men with possible sentences of more than twenty years' imprisonment for each.

The Hawaii Resistance's support of Met and Gray has included obtaining for them the best possible legal defense, by a civilian lawyer with a background and training in military cases. Legal fees for the two upcoming courts-martial, and likely appeals to follow, will be at least $2,500. Checks for this purpose may be sent to: Committee for Conscience, c/o Prof. James W. Douglass, Department of Religion, University of Hawaii, Honolulu, Hawaii 96822.

The Marine command in particular is determined to make these men pay heavily for making public their opposition to the war and appealing to the conscience of other Marines. Support for their right to make such a stand in conscience can be given by writing to: Col. F. C. Opeka, Kaneohe Marine Corps Air Station, c/o F.P.O. San Francisco, Calif. 96615.

James W. Douglass, Asst. Prof. of Religion
University of Hawaii

EDITORIALS

Auld Lang Syne

The occasion of the President's farewell address to the Congress—the setting, the overtones, the scene—was of more interest than his message. He always appears to best advantage when seen in this setting, in surroundings that are familiar to him, and among those with whom he feels at ease. The Congress was quite willing—even bipartisanly eager—to cheer him on his way. He is one of them; they know and understand him as he knows and understands them. He would have liked to go along with the $50,000 proposal for Congressional salaries, but the legislators were happy that he recommended $42,500. At the end the scene was rather like that in a fraternal lodge when Past Masters, Grand Vicars and Exalted Rulers are introduced one by one, smile benevolently, and with a little coaxing finally stand and bow to the inevitable "rising ovation." For a time Congress was rising and sitting with such frequency that some of the more venerable must have become a bit winded. It was auld lang syne, even if President Johnson was not exactly a jolly good fellow.

As to the message, about all that can or need be said is that the President ticked off what he regards as his major achievements—virtually all in the domestic field—and urged Congress to continue along lines he has charted. But what he said had a great emptiness. As in his prior State of the Union message, the President still does not seem to realize the character of the times, or sense what has gone wrong. It was still as though this country has no problems that a few more Great Society measures, generously funded, would not remedy. In brief, the occasion is more likely to be remembered than the message. With regard to the latter, one wonders if any of Mr. Johnson's aides reminded him of President Eisenhower's farewell address on the dangers of militarism and the military-industrial complex. President Eisenhower, on that occasion, left the country a message from which it will quote for a long time; President Johnson left us quoteless.

Battle for the Mind of Nixon

In a situation like the one the United States now faces in Vietnam, only the top of the iceberg is revealed to the public. The great submerged mass, however diligently the news media may try to discern its shape, is hidden from all but the immediate participants in the drama, who cannot afford to reveal much of what they know. They let out only what suits their purposes, personally or as members of a group.

Nothing else can explain the appalling lack of hard news regarding Vietnam in the days preceding the inauguration of Richard M. Nixon. There has been no end of conjecture regarding the shape of the table about which the negotiators would gather, but about the state of mind of Mr. Nixon himself—which is the element of paramount importance—we have been told nothing. That he was subject to all kinds of pushing and hauling there can be no doubt, and that this struggle in and around him will continue for at least a few weeks is highly probable.

Subjectively, Nixon is not impossible to figure out. Riding to McCarthy's hounds was a major factor in putting him where he is, and while he may now feel that redbaiting has served its purpose and that he would fare better with a more statesmanlike pose, he cannot afford to appear "soft on communism." It would be logical, then, for him to temporize, to regard the drag-out, wear 'em down technique as the least risky in dealing with the Vietcong and the North Vietnamese. This technique, moreover, dovetails with the wishes of the satraps who function as the government of South Vietnam and who, if they cannot have perpetual war, will postpone the advent of peace as long as possible. And it would explain the appointment of the hawkish Henry Cabot Lodge as the new U.S. chief negotiator, and the retention of both Ellsworth Bunker and William P. Bundy.

But there is the North Vietnam side to be reckoned with, and they are able to exert pressures of their own. They will want to show Nixon that they are not push-overs, that this war cannot be wound up as easily as some of the American generals have implied. If the enemy finds it militarily feasible, they may engage us in another round of vicious fighting, or instigate among those in the South Vietnamese government who are prepared to work with them a coup which would at the very least eliminate the ex-vice air marshal, now vice president, Nguyen Cao Ky.

Other domestic pressures are likely to come from the American business community—pressures not to be underestimated in a business-minded Administration. Except for such immediate beneficiaries as the aerospace corporations, U.S. big business has written off the venture in Vietnam as a losing proposition. These astute operators are more concerned about the stability of the dollar than about the precise terms of the settlement in Vietnam. They are prey to another worry—the increasingly explosive situation in the Middle East—and that must be Mr. Nixon's worry too.

All in all, Mr. Nixon would seem well advised to overcome his fears, grasp the nettle, and wind up the Vietnamese embroilment as soon as possible. Squawks he can deal with, on the ground that it was not a war of his making (few remember that he counseled sending in American aircraft when the French were dying at Dienbienphu), and he will stand before the public as the great peacemaker. He will find support among Democrats and Republicans, among Americans and foreigners. Clark Clifford's influence in Washington will not evaporate when he turns over the Pentagon to Mr. Laird; Stuart Symington remains in the Senate and so does George McGovern, together with the all-powerful Senator Russell. The Republicans would like to end those weekly U.S. casualty lists. The Swedes did not decide to recognize North Vietnam on a whim. And on the battlefield, while the morale of the American generals remains high, ominous reports are circulating about disaffection among the enlisted men, and racial conflict within the services. It all adds up to two words: get out.

IN THIS ISSUE

January 27, 1969

EDITORIALS

98

ARTICLES

102 Insurgents in Caucus:
Club Business on the Hill Robert G. Sherrill

105 Mobsters in Pasture: Nostra Jersey Fred J. Cook

110 West Coast Parties:
California Weather Breeder Michael Harris

113 War Profits:
The Tax-Court Peephole Sanford Watzman

116 Race Relations in England Thomas Land

BOOKS & THE ARTS

117 Medicine:
The Calculated Risks George A. Silver, M.D.

118 In the Woods (poem) Michael Goldman

120 To Be a Salvation Calvin Bedient

121 Slump in Sages Paul Roazen

121 A Slave in Our Time Oliver T. Myers

122 Morning Coffee with Sillitoe Igor Hájek

123 Articulation (poem) David Ray

124 Book Marks Sara Blackburn

124 Theatre Harold Clurman

126 Films Robert Hatch

127 Crossword Puzzle Frank W. Lewis

Publisher
JAMES J. STORROW JR.

Associate Publisher
GIFFORD PHILLIPS

Editor
CAREY McWILLIAMS

Associate Editor
PHIL KERBY

Executive Editor
ROBERT HATCH

Literary Editor
HELEN YGLESIAS

Copy Editor, MARION HESS; Poetry Editor, JOHN LOGAN; Theatre, HAROLD CLURMAN; Art, MAX KOZLOFF; Music, BENJAMIN BORETZ; Science, CARL DREHER; Advertising Manager MARY SIMON.

Editorial Associate, ERNEST GRUENING

Washington, ROBERT G. SHERRILL; Paris, ALEXANDER WERTH; London, RAYMOND WILLIAMS; Bonn, C. AMERY; Canberra, C. P. FITZGERALD; United Nations, ANNE TUCKERMAN.

The Nation is published weekly (except for omission of four summer issues) by the Nation Magazine Company and copyright 1969 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014, Tel: CH 2-8400 West Coast office (for editorial correspondence only); 825 South Barrington Avenue Los Angeles, Calif. 90049. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. and at additional mailing office.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Add $1 per year postage for Canada and Mexico; $2 other foreign.

Change of Address: It is essential that subscribers ordering a change of address give five weeks' notice and provide their old as well as their new address. Please give Zip Code numbers for both addresses.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Book Review Index and the Public Affairs Information Service.

NATION Volume 208
No. 4

Lost Cause

Dr. Edward U. Condon is a dedicated scientist who, on behalf of the integrity of science, allowed himself to get involved in the investigation of UFOs (unidentified flying objects). He never had a chance. The best that could be expected is that he would make a good try, and Dr. Condon has done that. In a lifetime of taking on tough jobs, he has always come out with credit. He proved to be too much even for Sen. Joe McCarthy, and when the Air Force asked him to tackle the flying saucer mystery, he was equally undaunted.

When he and the University of Colorado team accepted the assignment, The Nation editorialized ("Can Dr. Condon See It Through?" October 31, 1966) that if the investigators came up with anything less than the little green men from Mars, they would be "crucified." We also thought that the report might explain some of the small number of genuinely puzzling sightings, and perhaps more important that the psychologists on Dr. Condon's staff might be able to provide some insight into the reasons for so much credulity based on so little evidence.

That editorial is reprinted in the Condon report, 200,000 copies of which are being put out by Bantam Books with commendable celerity. In the meantime a disaffected staff member already has a book out, and undoubtedly there will be others. But anyone who is seriously interested should read what Dr. Condon and his associates have actually said, rather than some of the distorted compendiums of the 1,485-page report that are bound to get into circulation.

The Colorado report disposes convincingly of almost all the cases investigated, but three or four remain unexplained. Several involve puzzling radar sightings, and in one case an optical photograph was taken, and all the factors involved—geometrical, psychological and physical—"appear to be consistent with the assertion that an extraordinary flying object, silvery, metallic, disk-shaped, tens of meters in diameter, and evidently artificial, flew within sight of two witnesses." Fabrication of the photograph could not be ruled out, but the witnesses did not appear to be the kind of people who would engage in such tomfoolery.

The Colorado team concluded that "further extensive study of UFOs probably cannot be justified," thereby getting the Air Force off the hot spot which the flying saucer furor had created. Henceforth normal intelligence gathering activities of the Air Force should suffice. This conclusion was confirmed by an eleven-man panel of eminent scientists convened by the National Academy of Sciences. The panel was unanimous in the opinion that "this has been a very creditable effort to apply objectively the relevant techniques of science to the solution of the UFO problem."

Nevertheless a sizable section of the public persists in the belief that "flying saucers" represent visitations from other worlds. What can account for the existence of this mass of "true believers"? We are supposed to live in an age of ever increasing rationality—and to some extent, in some quarters, this is true—but science and its methods also inspire stout resistance, especially where the subject is one of ancient myth and emotional connotation. Since it would be sensational indeed if beings from another world thought it worth their while to come calling, many people are willing to believe that it must be so. And one result of the recent magnificent advances in cosmological knowledge, as of our tentative probings into space, is to make earthlings feel their loneliness—we yearn for neighbors among the stars. Hardly any of these true believers have seen, or even thought they saw, anything, but they insist on crediting the stories of those who did see something—stories which on investigation almost invariably turn out either to be unreliable or to have a naturalistic explanation.

A certain amount of intellectual damage is done by gullibility. Lord Russell insists that one should not believe anything for which there is no rational evidence; among other evils it makes systematic deception, such as that practiced by governments on the governed, all too easy. Those who are conditioned to credulity in childhood are likely to remain credulous all their lives. This indeed is one of the reasons why children should not be subjected to what has been aptly termed "science pornography." One of the conclusions in Section 1 of the Condon report is that children "are educationally harmed by absorbing unsound and erroneous material as if it were scientifically well founded. Such study is harmful not merely because of the erroneous nature of the material itself, but also because such study retards the development of a critical faculty with regard to scientific evidence, which to some degree ought to be part of the education of every American."

The report recommends that teachers should refrain from giving credit for school work based on reading of UFO books and magazine articles, most of which, like the astrological lore in the newspapers, present as truth material that is patently false or based on gross superstition. In this area alone the report performs a public service of no small importance.

Mayor Lindsay

John Lindsay is reported to be undecided about whether he will seek re-election this year as Mayor of New York City. We hope that he will decide, and soon, to announce his candidacy.

Mr. Lindsay's qualities as a person and as a politician impressed us long before he became mayor of New York, and his performance in that impossible office has fulfilled our confidence in his leadership. He has not performed any miracles, but we never thought he would; even miracle workers must have something going for them. That he has made some mistakes is not surprising. But he has never ceased to communicate his concern for the city's residents, his devotion to the city itself—its history, its traditions, its special qualities—and he has made a valiant effort to induce those who feel about the city as he does to help him find ways and means of mitigating, if not "solving," some of its more intractable problems.

It is no small achievement, and one due largely to his personal leadership, that the city has to date been able to avoid serious civil disorders. Being mayor of New York is a grueling experience. The rewards, if any, must be bestowed in heaven, for the office has been the graveyard of politicians throughout the city's history. Only someone who loves the city as Mayor Lindsay does could reasonably be expected to endure the daily punishments which the office inflicts on the incumbent.

The Democrats may come up with better candidates than they have offered in the recent past, and we therefore reserve judgment until the cast of candidates is known. But it would be a great misfortune for the city if Mayor Lindsay decided not to run again.

Justice–a Bit Deferred

In his farewell address President Johnson urged us "to make our country more just," an objective from which few would dissent. And we are perhaps moving in that direction, if at a sluggish pace. After nine security hearings, John Paton Davies, Jr., dismissed from the State Department in 1954 as a possible security risk, has finally been given clearance fifteen years later. Mr. Davies, a distinguished career diplomat, is clearly the beneficiary of the spasm of conscience that assails Washington officials as they are about to leave office.

On the same day the U.S. Court of Appeals ordered the release of Morton Sobell, who might be described as a bystander victim of the Rosenberg spy hysteria, after serving almost twenty years in prison. Clemency was not involved; Sobell won his own release by good conduct, but it took a court order to secure it. He should have been released long since. (See "The Sobell Case" by Stephen Love, The Nation, June 23, 1956; "Perspective on the Sobell Case" by William M. Kunstler, The Nation, November 12, 1960.)

Bodies or Ballots?

Six commuters on the Long Island Railroad were recently given rough and stupid handling by the police because they had sought to protest, by the only practical means available, the wretched service of a line which—to quote The New York Times—"insults 200,000 commuters every day." The six refused to hand over their tickets promptly to the conductor, although it was clear that they had them; one commuter displayed his ticket prominently in his coat pocket. All the same, the protesters were removed from the train at the next stop and turned over to the police. Three young secretaries, part of the group, were hustled off to the Women's House of Detention in Greenwich Village, where one of them, she later told the press, was forced to disrobe and subjected to the humiliating physical examination given narcotic addicts and prostitutes. The next day Judge J. Wolfe Chassen dismissed the charges. "Why aren't these people," he asked, "entitled to the service for which they paid?" A happy disposition of what might seem to be a minor incident, but a larger issue is involved.

Must a citizen use his body as he once used his ballot in order to force a public agency—in this case the Metropolitan Transportation Authority—to redress valid grievances which he shares with 200,000 similarly situated citizens? As we pointed out recently ("Lesson of the Year," January 6), it is becoming more and more difficult for genuine public grievances to win consideration on their merits. True, the courts are enlarging the scope of "representative" lawsuits—that is, actions brought on behalf of a group or class of persons to redress a group grievance—but this is a slow and costly process. The ombudsman idea is good, but more applicable to individual than to group grievances.

Besides, in most instances the trouble relates back to an earlier decision taken without due consideration of the issues, the options or the possible consequences. Government and quasi-government agencies are more and more inclined not to listen before they decide; if they listen at all, it is usually after the decision has been taken, and even then they attend in a perfunctory way. Nowadays most legislative and administrative reviews are at best pseudo-hearings, designed to create the appearance, not the substance, of consultation. For example, only five-minute presentations are allowed witnesses representing responsible organizations in testifying against a military appropriation bill, the magnitude of which has already been determined. They register their opposition, but they cannot secure the right of consultation. And decisions taken without consultation are difficult to reverse; sometimes the consequences are already irreversible. The habit of making decisions without proper consultation breeds an arrogance which is apt to brush aside subsequent protests as of little moment.

At a packed luncheon meeting during the recent Commonwealth sessions in London, Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau told a fascinated audience that the central political problem of Canada is to find a way to give "disenchanted minorities—the picketers and protesters—a voice in the government of the country. If the social order is a fraud, it should be torn down." Ways and means must be found, he insisted, by which grievances can be given direct and honest consideration. "We will have to restructure political parties," Mr. Trudeau said, "so they can become vehicles for dialogue, for protest and for involvement."

True, but this is only a part—and a small part—of the answer. We must go further and devise a variety of means, which can be tested, by which citizens in a mass industrial society can be consulted about decisions affecting them and the consequences of these decisions. (See "Where Power Belongs" by Anthony Wedgwood Benn, The Nation, August 26, 1968.)

No Work for the Hangman

For the first year in the history of this violent country, not one person was legally executed in 1968. Only one execution took place in 1966, two in 1967. In prior years there had been a marked and continuous decline from the large numbers (about 150 per year) in the period when capital punishment was generally approved by people of all creeds, ages, economic positions and education. Today the various opinion polls indicate that more and more people everywhere, and with greater vehemence, oppose the death penalty; despite the well advertised hue and cry against crime in the streets, a majority is now against execution for any offense. Legislative action, however, has not kept pace with popular opinion, because of pressure from the police and prosecutors, the passion of its proponents, and the same inertia that kept witch laws on the books long after they were ignored. In most of the Western world, the death penalty has either been abolished or is in disuse. Thirteen of our states have joined in abolition; virtually all the others have ceased to carry out executions.

At the same time, there is at present an "inventory" throughout the nation of about 500 persons under sentence of death. With respect to these, a dilemma confronts the courts, and particularly the U.S. Supreme Court: how may their lives be saved without the courts' doing violence to the principle that public policy is set by the legislatures? This problem confronted the California Supreme Court when it recently refused to end capital punishment by a 4-to-3 vote. One of the majority members, himself strongly opposed to the death penalty, felt he had no right to end it judicially. The same court set aside the death penalty in two cases directly before it and decided to review all pending death cases on the basis of the landmark Witherspoon decision of the U.S. Supreme Court, handed down in midyear.

In the Witherspoon opinion the Court said, for the first time in history, that prospective jurors may not be excluded merely for their scruples against capital punishment. [See "The Death Penalty and Fair Trial" by Walter E. Oberer, The Nation, April 6, 1964.] It affirmed Witherspoon's conviction, but set aside the death sentence. In a footnote, the Court declared its ruling retroactive—it would apply to all cases, regardless of when tried. Since then, cases everywhere in the country have cited Witherspoon with the same disparity of result that prevailed in the period between Escobedo and Miranda (cases involving police interrogation of accused persons), making it evident that the highest court will have to state more specifically what it intends the true meaning of Witherspoon to be.

The Court is already in the process of considering other aspects of the problem not resolved earlier. In its Witherspoon amicus brief (prepared by the writer), the American Civil Liberties Union pointed out that a jury in a murder case is given no legal guidelines for deciding between death and a lesser sentence; its power is absolute, and this can make it an instrument for passion and the gravest injustice. While the Court did not then consider the point—perhaps because it concluded that there can be no rational guidelines in an irrational situation—it has recently granted a review in another case in which that very point is raised. As this case and others reach the Court, it may conclude that in a practical and constitutional sense it alone, and no other tribunal or legislative body, can dispose of the dread "inventory" of 500 condemned persons (including Illinois' prime problem, Speck) and rid the nation of the extreme and irreversible penalty. After all, the death penalty has become "cruel and unusual" in the constitutional sense (since it is so seldom and so capriciously carried out), and this obvious fact may well be recognized by the Court.

Society will then be obliged to look to sensible solutions, rather than anger and passion, for its conduct of criminal justice.

ELMER GERTZ

INSURGENTS IN CAUCUS

CLUB BUSINESS ON THE HILL

ROBERT G. SHERRILL

Washington

The successful unhorsing of Russell Long as Democratic Whip in the Senate and the effort to depose John McCormack as Speaker in the House certainly do not portend a militant liberalism in either body of Congress. They were housekeeping ventures.

A few weeks ago Russell Long went around getting commitments of support for his re-election as Whip, and since at that time there seemed little likelihood that he would be opposed at all, he got thirty-nine assurances, more than enough to put him back in. But that was no token of his popularity. Since his election as Whip in 1965, the oilman-Senator from Louisiana has gone out of his way to offend other Senators, and since the spring of 1967 he has been viewed by much of the Senate as a dangerous scatterbrain.

On April 13, 1967, the Senate voted 48 to 42 to repeal a bill it had passed the previous winter, which appropriated $14 million for the election campaigns of both Democratic and Republican candidates, and $26 million for the expenses of Senatorial candidates. Long was determined to protect the slush fund if he had to destroy the session doing it. For a month he disrupted Senate business. His bullying tactics were denounced by his colleagues as a "vice"; Senator Symington upbraided him publicly for forsaking his duties. Senator Scott said: "The proceedings here have humiliated the Senate. They have humiliated the country. I think we have become a laughingstock." Long responded by ordering Scott to retract his "insults," and Scott shouted back, "Don't threaten me!" That exchange was not carried in the Congressional Record.

Nor did the Congressional Record convey the true bitterness which other Senators began to feel in their hearts for Long after those cockeyed weeks in which he carried out a semi-filibuster for a bill that nobody else in the Senate really cared about. The Wall Street Journal called Long's performance "extraordinary," and reported that his antics had "increasingly alarmed other Senators." The Journal, New York Times and other major newspapers predicted that Long had probably spoiled forever any chance he might have had of becoming Majority Leader.

By the time 1967 was out, it was also clear that Long had perhaps spoiled his chances to hold on to the Whip's job, and it certainly took no great jarring of loyalties for Edward Kennedy, a year later, to cut loose enough of Long's "committed" support to win. Senators don't mind too much that one of their colleagues is a racist or a devotee of the special interests—both of which Long is—but when he disturbs the decorum of The Club, he is in trouble.

One who had promised Long his support last fall but quickly switched to Kennedy was Ralph Yarborough of Texas. This was a significant switch because the two men are quite close on economic matters and Long had done little favors for Yarborough that might have been expected to hold the Texan in line. For instance, Yarborough lacked sufficient seniority to get a seat at John Kennedy's funeral, so Long gave him his own ticket.

In 1962, Long and nine other Senators tried unsuccessfully to keep the Telstar (Comsat) development from being given away to American Telephone and Telegraph. They took a lot of abuse, not only from colleagues but from the press as well, and from that ordeal they developed an enduring closeness. Long was the leader of the filibuster; Yarborough and Gore of Tennessee and Burdick of North Dakota are the only three others in the group who are still in the Senate, and it is noteworthy that they all voted against Long for the Whip's job. Aside from everything else (including Long's insistence that anybody who doesn't approve of the war in Vietnam must be no patriot), Long had offended many Senators by insulting and haranguing them in defense of Dodd when the latter was up for censuring.

Kennedy was not elected because he is looked upon as promising material for leadership; in fact, he has the reputation, justified or not, of being a little slow-witted. Nor was he elected as the result of "Kennedy charisma." The Senators voted for him simply because Long had for months been judged unfit. Kennedy will give more push to Democratic programs than Long did (that won't be hard; Long, according to Congressional Quarterly, supported the Administration less frequently than did Republican Bourke Hickenlooper of Iowa), but at the same time Kennedy has no record of being a strong fighter for liberal causes. His principal asset will be his ability to work with Majority Leader Mansfield, himself a rather weak man, who was made weaker by the fact that Long and he were incapable of working together and often found themselves working against each other.

The effort to unseat McCormack as Speaker of the House was much more interesting because it was more complex. The 243 Democrats in the House can be divided roughly into three portions of eighty each: Southern Democrats, big-city machine Democrats and program liberals (with some overlapping between the latter two groups). To win the speakership, alliances must obviously be made among the groups. Morris Udall thought he might be able to do it. He is sent to Washington by a rather conservative constituency but he votes moderate. Being a Representative from Arizona—which has no natural enemies—he figured he might wangle support from all three factions. He thought for sure that he could attract sixty or seventy votes on the first ballot, perhaps as many as ninety.

But several things went wrong. Udall never managed to persuade the Southerners that he wasn't being used as a battering ram by the wild-eyed liberals of the House—in this case meaning the Brock Adams Brigade. Adams, from Seattle, Wash., qualifies as wild-eyed by House standards because he is hot to correct the draft inequities and get on with cleaning up the city problems. His strategy offends the House leadership, moreover, because he is convinced that if he can stir up enough public indignation, the House will be forced to remove the old fogies from their positions of policy domination and put in some young fellows who are willing to make social changes. The House leadership resents the use of public opinion in this way, and Adams is considered far out of line.

Adams let it be known last fall that he was going to nominate somebody—he didn't know just whom—to run against McCormack. Shortly before the balloting caucus was held, he and fifteen colleagues sent out a telegram inviting others to attend a strategy breakfast. About forty accepted. Udall, because he was invited and because he was soliciting support, showed up, although he was leery of getting too close to the Adams group. It may have been a mistake for him to go, but it was a mistake he was almost forced to make. His opponents used it to warn the Southerners, especially, that "here come those liberals again," and the result was that Udall got a dozen fewer votes than he had been promised.

Pat Fink

Other forces were working against him. Udall had voted for the right to work law and McCormack has a spotless pro-labor voting record; so George Meany, president of the AFL, passed the word along to the Congressmen from the labor states that Udall was taboo. Another Udall miscalculation was his determination to try for a secret ballot. He thought that some who had promised McCormack their support when he solicited it last fall would, if they could switch secretly, be happy to vote for Udall now. It worked just the other way; Representatives, some who have a good liberal voting record are procedural conservatives, and although they would have been ashamed to stand up and vote for creaky old McCormack, they were content to do so in private. And although Udall is an extremely likable fellow, some liberals don't think he fits in with their crowd. One of these, a Californian, said later: "I looked at Udall and I remembered that he had voted for right to work and had led the fight to decapitate Powell, and I remembered that we don't vote alike on public power, and I said to myself, 'This guy ain't all that good anyway.' Udall is a marginal district guy, and they make bad Speakers. McCormack's district permits him to do whatever he wants to do."

The traditionalists made their share of mistakes in this engagement, too, and these may be costly in the long run. For one thing, McCormack's pals used pity as a weapon, urging members to cast their votes for the gangly old Bostonian because "John just wants one more time as Speaker and then he's going to retire." As soon as the voting was over, McCormack—who must have heard what his friends were saying, but who had made no effort up to that point to correct them—announced that he had no intention of retiring after this term. Many who voted for him out of sentiment, it is said, now feel like suckers and are just waiting for an opportunity to get even.

They also made the mistake of running over the insurgents in too brazen a fashion. Tom Rees of California, for example, came to the caucus with an innocuous and constructive amendment to the rules which would have required that any amendment of more than twenty-five words made on the floor of the House must be printed and distributed to the members before voting. Rules Chairman Colmer of Mississippi, running the caucus, refused to give Rees the floor. Colmer, not knowing what Rees was going to bring up, was afraid it might be something that would embarrass the leadership. Rees, needless to say, is still furious, and so are a number of his buddies. They are plotting trouble for the leadership in the weeks ahead. Don Edwards of California said: "All evidence is that the conservative coalition is hardening and the McCormack-Boggs-Albert arrangement with the Southern Democrats is pumping along better than ever. Two years ago, I was allowed to offer an amendment in caucus, but this year they wouldn't allow it unless we made prearrangement with the Establishment."

Just what are the insurgents unhappy about? Their discontent really has less to do with ideology than with procedure. They feel that they have no chance to be heard, to get consideration for their bills, to give their opinion on such critical items as the appropriations bills. They feel left out.

Adams puts it like this:

> The system, because of the way it's working—the procedures and the people who make them work—are becoming more and more removed from the controversies and the pain spots of America. Under the seniority system, the people who arrive at power are from the uncontested areas, from the South and from the one-layer big-city districts.
>
> When Congress continues on with business as usual, the newer people are unable to bring in a feeling for the issues that are really troubling the people back home. Each session Congress repeats what it did in the previous session. Appropriations discussions will be between McCormack, Mahon (chairman of the Appropriations Committee), and maybe Bow (ranking Republican on the committee). They don't discuss it with us. When it comes on the floor, only Appropriations Committee members talk, and they talk in order of seniority. No one else is supposed to know anything. Debates are pro forma.
>
> To my knowledge, the appropriations bill hasn't in eighteen or twenty years been ready when it was due. It goes on being discussed to September or October—long after the fiscal year has begun. Agencies don't know what they'll get to work with. Bills for agriculture, defense and housekeeping are passed first. Anti-poverty bills are passed last and therefore they are starved to death or allowed to dangle.
>
> Either we should change the fiscal year, or we should work five days a week to finish the appropriations legislation by June 30.
>
> This is all controlled by the leadership—the Speaker and the chairmen of fourteen committees, nine of whom are from the South and the rest from safe constituencies. The only way I know to break it down is to tell the public about it and hope public pressure will change things.

The insurgents are also unhappy with the House Democratic Campaign Committee, dominated by 81-year-old Mike Kirwan of Ohio, whose idea of how to win a campaign is to build a canal in the disputed district. The Democratic Campaign Committee has about one-tenth the money that is available to its Republican counterpart, and that makes disgruntled Democrats feel their side isn't trying. Kirwan's defenders, on the other hand, say that Lyndon Johnson has creamed off much of the funds that would normally have gone to the committee.

In an effort to appease the unhappy minority, McCormack has agreed to make some procedural changes. The most important of these is his promise to hold a Democratic caucus once a month (he has held only three caucuses in the past two years). But holding them is one thing, and permitting open debate is another. Heretofore he has discouraged the use of these meetings as family get-togethers, where Democrats would be allowed to fuss and stew and work things out. That freedom to grouse and propose would be the most beneficial thing that could happen to the House Democrats, but it is unlikely that McCormack, at his age, will develop enough flexibility to welcome debate.

Mobsters in Pasture: Nostra Jersey

FRED J. COOK

Mr. Cook, one of whose books, The Secret Rulers, deals with Mafia activities in New Jersey, has been a lifelong resident of the state. He began his distinguished career as a crime-and-police reporter on the Asbury Park Press.

New Jersey—an accident of nature and an accident of man—is undergoing one of its periodic and accidental crises. It is wracked by the inopportune rediscovery of ancient fact (whisper this: the state is the playground of the Mafia), and its legislators are playing out a high farce entitled, "Who, Me?" When it comes to farce there are no better actors in the world than the members of the New Jersey legislature, but then they have played the script so many times. The drama always begins the same way: Some earnest prosecutor, shocked by his discoveries, incautiously opens his mouth to assert that the state is infested by underworld vermin; he then asks the inevitable question, "How come?" Instantly, he finds himself transformed from prosecutor to defendant as those practiced legislative Thespians strut the boards and shout at him, "Who, me?"

The current comedy, which is convulsing an audience from the Delaware to the Hudson, began when Assistant State Attorney General William J. Brennan 3d (Supreme Court Justice Brennan's son) made an innocent little speech before a journalism society in early December. Afterward, some perspicacious soul asked him a question about official involvements with members of the Mafia, and Brennan, in an unguarded moment, rendered the off-the-cuff opinion that some legislators were "entirely too comfortable with members of organized crime." The indignation of the pure of heart, a fraternity that embraces each and every member of the New Jersey legislature, promptly filled the press with its clamor.

To appreciate the comedy in this breast beating, one must have a picture of New Jersey's past, recent and remote. When the great glaciers receded, they left behind two gouged-out river beds, the Hudson and the Delaware; in between was that jigsaw-shaped buffer that became known as New Jersey. The state has sometimes been described derisively as a cow pasture lying between New York and Philadelphia; and though the term is perhaps unjust—no cow pasture ever stank like the refineries and chemical plants of North Jersey, or was ever worth a fraction as much—there is about the description a nubbin of truth.

New Jersey from earliest colonial times has been the pawn of its great neighbors. Of all the thirteen original colonies, it was the most accidental. No hardy settlers from Europe set out envisioning "the Garden State" as their earthly paradise. The Swedes braved the ocean to settle Delaware; the Dutch, to buy Manhattan from the Indians. Then, gradually, both spilled over into the emptiness that was New Jersey—the Swedes in the south, the Dutch in the north. They were followed by Englishmen desirous of escaping the Puritan fanaticism of New England.

Uncharitable souls have suggested that New Jersey has no business existing as a state at all; that Pennsylvania and New York ought to carve it up and have done with it. Indeed, in colonial times, that was very nearly the situation. The Royal governor of New York was also the governor of New Jersey, which existed only as a sort of appendage to its big neighbor. This second-class status led some governors to consider New Jersey and everything in it fair game, and the looting was prodigious. When, in addition to patent official thievery, one Royal governor took to dressing himself up in female attire and parading upon the bastions of his New York fort, berouged and skittish, the humiliation became too much for the unruly, obstreperous colonists in New Jersey. They composed a scorching document of protest and finally got a governor of their own and their separate identity.

It is an identity that has been often compromised by the state's sandwich status between those two magnets of commerce, New York and Philadelphia. In the Prohibition era, this accident of geography led inevitably to the state's involvement in the major operations of gangland. The colossal, extralegal thirst of Manhattan and the City of Brotherly Love (not to mention the home-grown desires of Newark and Elizabeth and the state capital, Trenton) was a bottomless well—and New Jersey was the pump that did its best to fill it. The state's far-stretching bays, fed by innumerable creeks and rivers winding deep into the isolation of pine forests, made it an ideal haven for the rum-runner and bootlegger.

No one will ever know how many gallons of Scotch and gin flowed in over the lonely beaches or were unloaded into waiting trucks at rickety docks up some of the winding streams. But all the folklore of the times, plus all the evidence of easy inebriation, says that the total must have been huge, with official corruption to match.

After all, it was hard to keep the illicit traffic secret when the liquor trucks went rumbling right up "main street" in the small morning hours. A legend of the times relates how one county sheriff, usually soused to his official ears, rode shotgun on the bootleg trucks as they clattered almost past the columns of the courthouse. All of this, of course, was scuttlebutt—and remained scuttlebutt—for one good reason: no one looked; no one wanted to look. The monkeys who see, speak and hear no evil had nothing on the politicians of New Jersey.

There came that sad, unfortunate time, however, when even New Jersey officials couldn't remain absolutely blind and deaf. New York City, as it will once a generation, had decided to reform itself and had elected Fiorello H. LaGuardia as its mayor. That fiery little man set out to clean things up; he even took ax in hand and, defying a court order, personally demolished the slot machines of Frank Costello, a display of insolence that shocked the underworld. Then he announced on radio in his shrill voice that he was chasing all the "tinhorns" out of New York and "over the bridge" into Jersey.

LaGuardia made only one mistake. Those he chased weren't "tinhorns," but multimillion-dollar barons of underworld gambling fiefs—the new emperors of the underworld, harvesting a take even richer than that of Prohibition. Willie Moretti pioneered the New Jersey cow pasture for the mob, and he found the pickings so delightful and the climate so healthy that the rest of the troop came tumbling after. Frank Costello's right bower, Joe Adonis, set up shop, backed by his eminence grise, Albert Anastasia. For the entire decade of the 1940s, the mob under this leadership ran wide open in New Jersey, as though it owned the Statehouse and everyone in it.

Joe Adonis established some of the plushiest gambling casinos seen this side of Las Vegas and the Bahamas; even in wartime, with gas rationing in effect, fleets of Cadillacs made the nightly trip from New York across the George Washington Bridge to bring their cargoes of well-heeled sheep to the shearing. The operation was so vast, its business details so intricate, that Adonis set up a capitol of crime in the closely guarded back room of a tavern known as Duke's almost opposite the entrance to Palisades Amusement Park. There he held daily council with his board of directors, and one day each week was set aside for Apalachin-type conferences with the top powers of gangdom. The Federal Bureau of Narcotics, District Attorney Frank Hogan's office in New York, the New York Police Department's Bureau of Criminal Identification—all kept a check on the crime capitol in Duke's, but to this day there isn't any evidence that officialdom in New Jersey was aware that Duke's even existed.

Other kinds of awareness, however, were sometimes forced upon it. Occasionally, some busybody of a New York reporter would stick his long nose into the bubbling New Jersey pot, and then a Manhattan paper would come out with a nasty story about the Bergen County racket haven. When this happened, official wattles would turn turkey-red and there would be a counter-headline flap about a no-holds-barred investigation to re-establish the purity of the Garden State. When matters thus threatened to get out of hand, a prosecutor would be named to bust the rackets. The poor fellow who took the job, all sincere and trusting, had no notion that he had just been hired by Robespierre and that the tumbrel was waiting.

One dramatic decapitation that has always seemed to tell all one needed to know about New Jersey occurred in the late 1940s. John J. Winberry, a former Treasury agent, had been given one of these "cleanup" assignments, and it wasn't long before he began running into sand banks of quiet sabotage. Once, when he wanted to raid some bookie spots in Perth Amboy, he telephoned the Governor's office for help. The Governor notified the Attorney General; state police were assigned to make the raids—and within one hour and twenty minutes after Winberry had initiated action at the very highest levels of the state, the mob back in Perth Amboy got a tip-off and quietly closed up shop for the day.

With this kind of "help," Winberry's investigation dragged along without producing the kind of sensation that a special investigator needs if he is to justify his hire. If he can't make the headlines, a rackets buster is fair game for those who don't want the rackets busted. This was pointed out to Winberry one day in early November, 1948, when he was in District Attorney Hogan's office, exchanging information with Hogan's aides. Winberry agreed that he would have to produce a big case soon, and he decided upon a bluff.

Searching through mounds of tax records, he had uncovered the names of some underlings who worked in gambling establishments run by the mob in Middlesex County. Everybody suspected that Joe Adonis was the brains of the operation, but there was no proof. Winberry decided to gamble and see what he could shake out of a couple of the small fry who lived in Brooklyn.

Taking along a New Jersey state police sergeant and a New York detective, Winberry began to pound on doors. There had been an especially gory gangland murder in New Jersey not long before, and Winberry, by holding the specter of a murder rap over the heads of the Brooklyn underlings, finally broke them down and made them talk. And so he got the vital, clinching evidence he needed: two witnesses, men who had worked in the gambling halls, identified Joe Adonis as their boss, as the man who hired and paid them and directed the gambling operations.

Winberry scored his great coup on the afternoon of November 12, 1948, and the morning of November 13, a Saturday. On Monday, Winberry was fired.

Three years later, history repeated. This time New Jersey's innocence was upset by that champion disturber of the racket peace, Estes Kefauver. The late Senator from Tennessee was bearing down hard on the mob at the time; he had been given Winberry's detailed information on the New Jersey rackets; and he was threatening to come into the state and hold the kind of hearings that would make the roof of the Statehouse shudder. To ward this off, Nelson F. Stamler was appointed a special prosecutor and rushed into Bergen County to clean up the mess.

Stamler did everything that was expected of him—and more. He rounded up Adonis and several other gang lords, and the boys in the Statehouse would probably have been singing Christmas carols if he had stopped right there. But Stamler got carried away. Bergen County, as he later confessed, was an education to him; he had had no idea before he went there that crime and corruption could be so criminal and so corrupting. Possessed of an irrational desire to get to the bottom of things, he began to indict police chiefs and municipal officials all over Bergen County; he wrote a magazine article in which he suggested that the slaying of mobster Willie Moretti hadn't been gangland's private idea but had been motivated by the need to protect political interests from the loose wagging of Moretti's tongue.

One needs no crystal ball to know what happened next. Stamler was fired, and all investigation of official collusion with the mob went to the incinerator. Even the local small fry whom Stamler had indicted flitted away like minnows escaping through a gaping hole in the net. Nobody got hurted, as the mob would say.

Such are the New Jersey traditions that bring us down to the present—and Brennan. The year 1968 was rough all around, and not just for Mayor Daley and the Chicago police. First, as far as New Jersey was concerned, there was Life magazine. In its issue of August 6, it published what purported to be the transcript of telephone conversations between Rep. Cornelius E. Gallagher, a Hudson County Democrat, and Joseph (Joe Bayonne) Zicarelli, reputedly the Mafia boss of the city that has given him his nickname. Congressman Gallagher, Life charged, was the "tool and collaborator of a Cosa Nostra gang lord." The Congressman denied it, denounced Life, went off to the Democratic convention in Chicago, and got himself renominated and re-elected by the faithful in Hudson County.

The Gallagher unpleasantness was still fresh in memory when along came Prof. Henry S. Ruth, once a special attorney for the Justice Department's Organized Crime section and later deputy staff director of the President's Commission on Law Enforcement and the Administration of Justice—certainly a man in a position to know what he was talking about. Testifying at a legislative hearing in September, Professor Ruth declared that "official corruption in New Jersey was so bad that organized crime could get almost anything it desired." Another expert witness assured incredulous New Jersey officials that Professor Ruth had spoken nothing but the truth. It was enough to ruffle the feathers of any politician, and a state investigation was ordered. Enter Brennan.

Everyone who knows him agrees that Brennan is a thoroughly decent human being, with a high sense of honor and morality. That, perhaps, has been his trouble. He joined the staff of Atty. Gen. Arthur J. Sills a year ago, having had no previous experience in trying criminal cases; but Sills had such high regard for him that, after the Gallagher-Ruth episodes, he gave young Brennan charge of a Mercer County grand jury empowered to look into official corruption. In this capacity Brennan had access to state police files and to a number of federal investigative dossiers, and it is apparent that this reading matter shocked him. The result was that, in one unguarded moment, he committed himself to the "too comfortable with organized crime" yardstick for measuring official conduct.

That one phrase tripped all the political sirens in New Jersey. An indignant legislature denounced Brennan for having cast an aspersion on every member of its august body; it demanded that he name names, submit proof. Brennan said he had what he considered significant information on only three members of the legislature; later, he said there were some indications that three others might be "too comfortable" with you-know-whom. In the midst of the furor, as so often happens any time one lifts the lid on New Jersey, other voices contributed other charges.

Ronald Sullivan, New Jersey reporter for The New York Times, wrote almost offhandedly that, according to his informants, horse races were being booked and numbers peddled right in the office of the Hudson County prosecutor, T. James Tumulty, who sent Sullivan an invitation to appear before the Hudson County grand jury and reveal all—especially his sources of information. Sullivan respectfully declined the invitation to play detective for the prosecutor.

Still more unsettling, to the legislature at least, was the contribution of Mrs. Claire Curran Johnson, a former reporter for the now defunct New York Mirror and now an aide to Sen. Joseph C. Woodcock Jr., a Bergen County Republican and chairman of the Senate Committee on Law and Public Safety. Mrs. Johnson recalled that she had once telephoned Senator Woodcock's counterpart in the Assembly, C. Richard Fiore, of Newark, to request his cooperation on law and public safety matters.

Fiore, according to Mrs. Johnson, had said that he wanted to "talk to Woodcock about that." He went on to say, Mrs. Johnson reported, that he had obtained his position as chairman of the Assembly Law and Public Safety Committee to "stop these kind of things."

"There's a lot of pressure. You just don't know how much pressure. Jerry is unhappy about it," Mrs. Johnson quoted Fiore.

As a former reporter, Mrs. Johnson had a pretty good idea who "Jerry" might be, and she asked Fiore if he meant Jerry Catena. Again she quoted him: "Yes, Jerry Catena. I've got to stop these kind of things. I've got to stop these kind of things."

Gerardo (Jerry) Catena may not be well known to large segments of the public; he has never attracted the kind of publicity that attached itself to Al Capone or Frank Costello or the late Abner (Longy) Zwillman. But in the underworld he's a real power. As long ago as the 1940s, he was one of the eminents spotted in frequent attendance at Joe Adonis' crime councils at Duke's; his relatives were tied by documented records to the Middlesex gambling games that John Winberry investigated; and ever since the greatest power broker of the Eastern Mafia, Vito Genovese, has been secluded in federal prison on a narcotics conviction. Jerry Catena has acted as his deputy, ruler of the Jersey wing of Genovese's redoubtable "family." Against this background, Mrs. Johnson's revelation of her telephone chat with Assemblyman Fiore raised a gale. It became obvious to everyone that something would simply have to be done.

After much backing and filling and sparring over procedural matters, a special legislative committee headed by Sen. Alfred R. Beadleston, a Monmouth County Republican, was appointed to hear Brennan's charges. From the outset there wasn't much question who the defendant would be. Brennan was elected for this role by the virtually unanimous sotto voce vote of the New Jersey legislature. Even before the hearings opened on December 30, a number of legislators were denouncing the young prosecutor as the most irresponsible of men, and at least one assemblyman was suggesting that the Supreme Court should discipline him.

When the hearings began, the impartiality with which a legislature investigates itself went on display. The Beadleston committee's chosen counsel, Sidney P. McCord, Jr., described somewhat irrelevantly as an expert on constitutional law, showed by his questioning that he considered Brennan a rascal whose every statement must be examined with the utmost suspicion, but that, on the other hand, a legislator is a dignitary to be treated with all the deference due his title.

Brennan confirmed previous leaks in the newspapers that his three primary "too comfortable" targets were Sen. Sido L. Ridolfi, a Democrat of Mercer County and a power in the upper House; and Assemblyman John Selecky, Republican, of Mercer; and David J. Friedland, Democrat, of Hudson. All three are lawyers.

Senator Ridolfi's entanglement resulted from his having served as the attorney for John Simone in two house purchases and in the incorporation of Simone's Atlas Sanitation Service, Inc. Simone was identified in police files, Brennan said, as a captain in the Mafia family of Angelo Bruno, the reputed mob boss of Philadelphia and, according to federal informants, a member of the national commission of the syndicate. Bruno's underworld army carves up many of the lush rackets of South Jersey, and Brennan seemed to think it significant that two of Simone's associates in Atlas Sanitation were mobsters with ties to Bruno, and that a third was a bookmaker with a record of recent arrest. Senator Ridolfi told the committee he had had no knowledge of Simone's racket ties. "These were three regular, normal business transactions that any lawyer would have undertaken," he said.

Brennan's charges against Assemblyman Friedland involved a murkier bit of business. One John DiGilio was identified by Brennan as an associate and "enforcer" for Bayonne Joe Zicarelli and Harold (Kayo) Konigsberg in the loan shark racket. DiGilio had been arrested by state police on the charge of "threatening death or injury for the purpose of extortion or malicious mischief"—in plainer language, for telling a loan-shark victim to pay up, or else. While the case was pending before the Hudson County grand jury, DiGilio acquired Assemblyman Friedland for his attorney—and Friedland somehow "settled" the case: the complaining witness stopped complaining, the grand jury voted "no bill," and DiGilio was exonerated. Brennan said it appeared to him that Assemblyman Friedland had been a "go-between" in fixing the case.

Friedland was the most indignant of the committee's witnesses. He angrily repudiated the "go-between" imputation. He had had nothing to do with the criminal case, he asserted; he had merely represented DiGilio in a "civil matter." He acknowledged that he had understood a "usurious" loan was involved, but apparently he never connected usury with the underworld. DiGilio had been recommended to him through a labor union; he didn't believe then, doesn't yet, that DiGilio was a criminal or had any record; and he had merely talked to "the other lawyer" in the case to achieve "a settlement," never to the accusers of DiGilio. It had been a case of pure legal professionalism, and Sidney McCord, a pure legal professional himself, evidently saw it as such, for he expressed no curiosity about what might have been in Assemblyman Friedland's mind when he somehow became acquainted with that nasty word "usury."

McCord and the committee, no member of which uttered a question throughout, had to stretch the incuriosity of the human mind to almost superhuman limits when they came to the case of Assemblyman Selecky. In introducing this item on the agenda, Brennan had testified that the Newark Star-Ledger and the Trenton Times, both of which circulate in Selecky's East Windsor Township near Hightstown, had carried the following news item last April: A state trooper on patrol in a wooded area of Millstone Township had come upon a man standing beside a most suggestive excavation. It was a hole 6½ feet long, 2½ feet wide and 3½ feet deep—dimensions that would be instantly recognized by any gravedigger. The man who was standing by this opening had dirt on his hands and clothes, and dirt was caked on a shovel and pickax the trooper found in the trunk of his car. But when the trooper asked the other what he had been doing, he replied: "Thinking and meditating."

The author of this instantaneous bon mot turned out to be Salvatore Profaci, Jr., a nephew of the late Joseph Profaci, ruler of a Brooklyn Mafia family that has long been among the most dreaded of the five families of New York. Parenthetically, it should be noted that the Profaci name is not entirely unknown in this section of New Jersey. As Brennan pointed out, it was on a chicken farm near Roosevelt, only about 20 miles from the site of Salvatore Profaci's digging, that FBI agents last year uncovered several corpses in an old Profaci burial ground.

Salvatore Profaci was later arrested on a motor vehicle charge and for using loud and abusive language to a state trooper. When his case came up last September 19, Assemblyman Selecky appeared in court for him as a character witness. There also, for the same purpose, was the police chief of Selecky's home town. Sidney McCord, in questioning Brennan, tried to show that Assemblyman Selecky might very well not have read the papers closely on gravedigging day. Brennan acknowledged that the prosecution in the traffic case hadn't made any mention of the incident; acknowledged that he thought it would have been brought out if the prosecutor had known about it. Ha, McCord proposed in triumph, if even the prosecutor didn't know, what right have you to assume that Selecky must have known?

The implications in this comforting assumption endured only until Selecky got on the witness stand. Yes, the Assemblyman said, he had read about the gravedigging incident. He had "looked at the article in disbelief." He said he knew Profaci as the part owner of a bar in Hightstown; that he had represented Profaci in three different real estate transactions; and that he had the highest regard for him "as a good citizen in the community where he resides." As for the gravedigging incident, "When I saw him afterwards, as gentlemen will, I joked about it and he told me in essence what it was about."

Probably no more titillating aside was ever dropped into the middle of a crime hearing. Assemblyman Selecky's reference seemed to open the gates to a host of questions. Just what does one gentlemen say, in jest, to another who has been found digging a lonely grave? Wouldn't such an incident raise some doubts in the mind of one gentleman about the sterling character of another? And just what was "the essence" of it? Though one could almost hear the jaws drop in the press gallery as Assemblyman Selecky testified, Sidney McCord and the members of the committee were inattentive at this point and McCord, with no interruption from anyone, passed quickly to other matters.

When his turn came, Assemblyman Fiore testified that he couldn't "recall" ever talking to Mrs. Johnson and implied she'd made the whole thing up. As for Jerry Catena, Fiore put it this way: "I never met Jerry Catena and I wouldn't know him if I fell over him." Subsequently, a telephone call slip was introduced into evidence showing that a thirteen-minute call had been made from Mrs. Johnson's home to Fiore's number on the day she said she had talked to him. Fiore couldn't explain it.

The names of the three lesser "too comfortable" legislators were eventually leaked to the press. They are veteran Sen. Frank S. (Hap) Farley, of Atlantic City, a long-time Republican power in the upper House; and Assemblymen John J. Horn (D., Camden) and Lee B. Laskin (R., Camden). All three indignantly denied any indiscreet associations, and Sidney McCord denounced Brennan's material on them as even "flimsier" than that against the first named legislators.

The investigation still goes on, but William Brennan at his own request, so it's said, has been removed from further contact with criminal investigations and will devote himself to more mundane matters in the Attorney General's office. A federal task force has come into Newark to probe New Jersey crime, and Attorney General Sills has named a new crime-fighting team.

All this makes headlines, but the principal loser so far seems to be Brennan, the crime fighter. He has taken a pounding. The tone was set by McCord and the legislators after that first public hearing. "Flimsy," they shouted about Brennan's charges. "Flimsy," read the headlines, echoing them. It became the editorial fashion to beat Brennan over the head because he had opened his mouth—and then failed to "make" a case against anybody. Even so distinguished a journal as The New York Times lashed out at Brennan and seemed to miss the real point of the issue he had raised.

Brennan had never contended that he could prove legislators guilty of any crime. He had merely suggested that being "too comfortable" with organized crime is unethical in a public official. Anyone familiar with the long history of official ducking of the crime issue in New Jersey, anyone who realizes that the state, despite repeated exposures, still harbors some of the most notorious thugs in the East, must be forced to suspect that some powerful influence is operating somewhere. It can hardly be by chance that in New Jersey it is the rackets buster who is busted—not the rackets boss. This situation has repeated itself again and again, and if the legislature of New Jersey cannot recognize the implications in that repetition, it is so much the worse for the people of New Jersey.

What William Brennan has suggested is a higher standard. It is not enough for a public official to be able to prove that he did not have his hand in the cookie jar; he has no business representing or associating with someone so discovered. In some cases, it is true, legislators may honestly not know, but they cannot always not know. And because they are officials, because they have a public trust; because they certainly have sources of information not available to the citizens at large, it is their business to know. If they neglect this business, there should be no place for them in public life.

Until that kind of tough high standard is adopted, it is safe to say that the mob will continue to get almost anything it wants in New Jersey.

WEST COAST PARTIES

CALIFORNIA WEATHER BREEDER

MICHAEL HARRIS

Mr. Harris is on the staff of the San Francisco Chronicle.

San Francisco

Jess Unruh, when he served as Speaker of the California Assembly, was recognized as the most powerful Democrat in California. He earned the cautious and not altogether friendly respect due a leader who channeled campaign funds to his fellow Democrats, gave favors to obedient Republicans, and won a measure of national prominence from the unlikely base of a seat in a state legislature. Now that the Republicans have regained control, he is often described in flattering terms that, however gratifying, may portend a lack of power. At 46, Unruh seems to be regarded by an increasing number of his associates as an elder statesman like Alf Landon or former Gov. Edmund G. Brown. In short, the belief grows that Unruh's career may be rapidly closing and that California is about to offer a new slate of Democratic leaders to the nation.

The extent of the defeat suffered by the California Democrats last November is not apparent from reading the election returns. The Democrats found comfort in the capture of a United States Senate seat and in retaining the party's 21-to-17 edge in the California delegation to the House of Representatives. And though the Republicans now have control of the state legislature for the first time in a decade, the margin is as thin as mathematically possible—an Assembly of forty-one Republicans and thirty-nine Democrats, and a Senate of twenty Republicans and nineteen Democrats, with one seat to be filled in a special election which the Democrats are expected to win. (A Republican lieutenant governor will cast tie-breaking votes.) But it took an astonishing combination of luck and gerrymandering by the Democratic legislatures of the 1960s to produce those results.

The voters' sentiments can be understood better by looking at the vote totals. Unofficial though complete returns show that the Republican candidates for Congress in California amassed a total of 3,741,454 votes to win seventeen seats. The Democratic candidates gathered only 3,036,062 to get their twenty-one. The story was the same in the legislature, where the Republican dominance would have come earlier and far more solidly if there had been proportional representation.

Nor can the new U.S. Senate seat be classed as a triumph. It wasn't won by the Democrats; it was abandoned by the Republicans. Thomas H. Kuchel, more popular with Democrats and independents than with his own party, lost in the June primary when militant Republicans decided to be true to the spirit of Orange County and back Max Rafferty, ever eloquent in his warnings about communism, pornography, lawlessness, sex and exuberant beards. The returns showed the militants were right about their part of the state: Rafferty carried Southern California, which has more than 60 per cent of the state's population, by a narrow margin, but lost the state because his ideas proved too primitive for the San Francisco region, where Shirley Temple Black, a candidate with a similar appeal, had been defeated in her campaign for Congress a year earlier. All nine counties bordering San Francisco Bay voted against Rafferty, and among them they provided Democrat Alan Cranston with his victory margin. If they had run a more presentable candidate, the Republicans would have won the Senate race easily.

For the third election in a row Republicans could point to gains in the state legislature as a result of their Cal-Plan—a carefully devised program to regain control of the state's political machinery by concentrating on districts where the Democratic incumbents were vulnerable. The strategy was well financed, and last year was expanded to include special help in the few districts where Republican Assemblymen were in danger. But 1968 was a preliminary skirmish for the 1970 election. The state legislature elected then will draw new district lines for its own two Houses and for the forty-odd Congressional seats California will have as a result of passing New York in population. Development of the areas dominated by what Southern Californians like to call "conservatism" will mean a substantial increase in representation for the new suburbs that have replaced the orange groves between Los Angeles and San Diego. This is the fastest growing area of the United States, and it has regularly re-elected Congressman James B. Utt, sponsor of the Liberty Amendment to wipe out the income tax; Assemblyman E. Richard Barnes, who opposes the teaching of evolution in the public schools, and state Senator John G. Schmitz, who laughingly said he publicly acknowledged his membership in the John Birch Society "because I had to do something to get the liberal vote in Orange County."

The mood in California's southern counties is often described as a distillation of the drift to the right throughout the country. Gov. Ronald Reagan has demonstrated how the blue-collar voter can be won over to the GOP by a tactful appeal to his feelings of insecurity. In recent years voters in the modest suburbs have been the ones who have most enthusiastically rejected new schools for their own children, turned down bond issues for parks, and shown the greatest skepticism about proposals for social and economic reforms. This has not been a matter simply of regionalism. Both the wealthiest and poorest neighborhoods of San Francisco overwhelmingly endorsed a bond issue last November for playgrounds in the ghetto area of Hunters Point, but opposition from lower-middle-class districts caused the measure to fall slightly short of the two-thirds affirmative vote required for passage.

But moods change, and Mayor Joseph L. Alioto of San Francisco, who hopes to be elected governor in 1970 and President in 1972, thinks he can take over the delicate middle ground that served as the political foundation for Republicans Hiram Johnson and Earl Warren and for Democrat Brown. The battleground on California campuses may be between the Left and the rest of society, but in elective politics the contest is between the Right and the middle.

The Presidency seems a distant and scarcely realistic goal for a man who has been Mayor of his home town for only a year. However, the dynamic Alioto will be able to boast of being one of the four or five most electable Democrats in the country if he can accomplish the extremely difficult task of winning the governorship—a challenge the literary Mayor might compare with the dreadful quests imposed on knights in the days of chivalry, quests which, completed successfully, brought all kinds of rewards. There are not at present many heroes to enter in the jousts of Camelot—Sen. Edward M. Kennedy may be the last until a new generation grows up—and there are not many Democratic governors of major states either.

Being mayor of any American city or governor of California are hazardous jobs today, and no one can predict how well Alioto will survive. He is a lively new figure in elective politics. He replaced another candidate who died of a heart attack and, in a campaign lasting only fifty-nine days, defeated a well-known liberal and a better-known conservative. He is a millionaire lawyer, the son of a Sicilian fisherman from San Francisco's North Beach. Alioto went through law school on a scholarship at Catholic University in Washington, D.C., and joined the New Deal as an antitrust lawyer in the closing days of the depression. Unlike many of his trust-busting colleagues, Alioto did not switch sides and begin defending corporations when he went into private practice. He chose the riskier, but as it developed, far more prosperous role of representing clients who sued major companies for price fixing, restraint of trade and other monopolistic abuses. Alioto's most celebrated success was a $1.9 million settlement he won in 1966 for Sam Goldwyn after fifteen years of litigation against Twentieth Century Fox and a regional theatre chain; many of his other big cases have gone almost unnoticed. Few people in the country have ever heard of a chlorine trust, for example, but Alioto has won a series of cases against chemical companies. The agreement in the New York portion of the cases alone called for recoveries of about $7 million for the city and its schools.

Alioto took office last year in a festive mood, and San Francisco was excited by what it saw. The man seemed to catch the spirit of the city as fully as the sullen Mayor Samuel W. Yorty of Los Angeles typified his community. Alioto enjoyed city life. He had gone to the opera twice a week every season for years, he flew to Paris or Rome when he could get a brief vacation, and he was a director of the Spoleto Festival in Italy. He decided to brighten up his entry into office by holding a six-hour series of receptions—a big musical program at the Opera House, the traditional receiving line in the domed City Hall, and two neighborhood receptions in black and Mexican-American neighborhoods that had contributed heavily to his victory. When he appeared before the Latin audience, he borrowed a fiddle from one of the musicians and joined the mariachis in a chorus of La Paloma.

The Mayor makes, thus, a lively but rather old-fashioned political appeal. Not everyone is enchanted. He has not proved to be a man who can stir students as Eugene McCarthy did, and he cannot capture the idealistic magic that marked Adlai Stevenson's 1952 campaign. Alioto supports social reform but his critics accuse him of settling for tokenism. He is tolerant of individualism among the young, including his own children, but he has dismayed some of his strongest liberal supporters by backing up the Police Department's controversial tactical squad when its husky, combat-equipped young officers have moved violently against demonstrators. He has tried to pursue a middle course by bringing in mediators between the adamant protesters at San Francisco State College and the equally adamant Governor Reagan. Perhaps his most interesting quality is one that few politicians possess. Like Franklin D. Roosevelt, Alioto seems to be able to keep his supporters from defecting even when he is doing things they don't like.

The Mayor's Presidential ambitions were enhanced when he met last year with top governmental and political officials in Washington and Chicago. Alioto found that it was he who was dominating meetings with men of much larger reputation. When the Democratic Mayors held joint press conferences at the Conrad Hilton Hotel during the Democratic National Convention, Alioto was surrounded by reporters after the sessions broke up, while mayors of larger cities walked off the platform alone.

Alioto displayed some interesting strengths and weaknesses at Chicago. Toward the close of the convention he looked out the window of his 25th-floor suite at the Hilton and said: "Look at those troops and all that barbed wire. Who the hell needs barbed wire? Think how it must look to those kids there. I think I'll go down and talk to them."

Followed by several nervous aides, the Mayor went past a line of rifle-bearing National Guardsmen and joined a group of Yippies and other protesters listening to speakers denouncing the Democrats' choice of Hubert Humphrey, whom Alioto had nominated the night before. The Mayor was recognized by some visitors from San Francisco's Haight-Ashbury district.

"Shake hands with a neo-Fascist," Marvin Garson, columnist of the underground San Francisco Express-Times, said sardonically. Alioto had provoked the New Left a few months earlier when he applied that term to demonstrators who threw bricks and bags of animal blood at Secretary of State Dean Rusk during a San Francisco visit. The Mayor shook hands with Garson and his friends, listened quietly for a while and then said, "Get behind Humphrey. You have no real objection to Humphrey."

The listeners groaned. Alioto had shown his personal courage by walking among the angry demonstrators, but it was not the first time that he had seemed unable to grasp what those who disagreed with him were talking about.

Chicago marked a climax for Unruh, the man still regarded as Alioto's chief rival for the Democratic nomination for governor. He had come to the convention as the leader of a delegation committed to the late Sen. Robert F. Kennedy. He led a move for Edward Kennedy, gained informal commitments from 900 or more of the delegates and then, after losing with dignity, returned to California. He commanded a strong precinct organization in Los Angeles and had good areas of strength elsewhere, but Unruh ignored the Presidential race until almost all the McCarthy forces were ready to switch over to Humphrey—and by then it was too late.

A Humphrey victory in California on November 5 would have thrown the race into the House of Representatives. Instead, Unruh concentrated on trying to preserve his party's control in the Assembly, where the Democrats had a 42-to-38 edge. When the Republicans took control, Unruh suffered a major personal defeat.

But this was only part, perhaps the least important part, of Unruh's troubles. Though Chicago showed him milder and more fair-minded than leaders of other major delegations, Unruh has been the closest thing to a political boss many Californians have ever known. Californians who might otherwise approve of Unruh and his ideas reject him as "Boss Unruh," calling him by his damaging old nickname, "Big Daddy." Though there are many in both parties who believe that he would make an outstanding governor or a brilliant Senator, he appears increasingly unelectable.

Perhaps the brightest recent news for California Democrats was Sen. George Murphy's announcement that he would run for a second term. It had been expected that the ailing Republican ex-actor would decide, after several years of scarcely detectable accomplishments in Washington, to retire in 1970. Some persuasive Republicans may still succeed in talking him out of the race, so that he can be replaced by the seemingly unbeatable Robert H. Finch. At least Finch looked invulnerable on his safe perch as a lieutenant governor who mildly deplored Reagan's cutbacks in mental health and social welfare programs without ever seeming disloyal to the state administration. The new jobs of serving as Nixon's chief domestic aide and as Secretary of Health, Education and Welfare should prove more interesting and rewarding for Finch, but they pose political risks. He will be forced to make hard decisions on racial and social matters.

It appears that the Democratic nomination for the Senate may settle in 1970 on 34-year-old John V. Tunney, a three-term Congressman and close friend of Sen. Edward Kennedy. The two young politicians were roommates in law school, and each is godfather of one of the other's children.

Tunney, a son of the former heavyweight champion, is a transplant from Connecticut who settled in the desert area of southeastern California. Despite a liberal voting record, he has been building up his majorities in successive elections in his conservative district. Last November Tunney had a remarkable triumph, winning re-election by 52,800 votes. While he was gathering 63 per cent of the vote—carrying even the idle-rich oasis of Palm Springs for the first time—Humphrey picked up only 39 per cent in the same district.

"The people in my district had the feeling they could vote for me even though my political philosophy was not the same as theirs because I had stated my views to them honestly," Tunney said during a recent swing through the major cities of the state. He got good receptions at meetings with "checkbook Democrats" in Los Angeles and

San Francisco in his quest for financial support for the Senate race.

"The voters knew my opinions, and they knew what they were getting," Tunney continued. "It's my feeling that California is going through a phase where the voters want officials who are sincerely outspoken on the issues."

It may be that Californians, as Tunney suggested, have become more interested in voting for forceful candidates than they are in what the candidates are forceful about. California will help determine the nation's political philosophy over the years, but its choice may be made not on the basis of ideas or even of slogans. The decision whether the future will belong to the Center or the Right may depend on who looks more appealing on television—the familiar Ronald Reagan with his snappy wardrobe and perfectly preserved black hair; or the interesting new Joseph Alioto with his expensive New York suits and retreating hairline; the comfortable looking George Murphy with his blandly friendly air, or the youthful John Tunney with his bustling, toothy vigor.

WAR PROFITS

THE TAX-COURT PEEPHOLE

SANFORD WATZMAN
Mr. Watzman is a reporter in the Washington bureau of the Cleveland Plain Dealer.

Washington

Although much is known about some costs of the war in Vietnam—for instance, casualty figures and spending totals are updated and reported endlessly—it is still premature and rather naive to ask how much profiteering there has been. Those in the know realize that to get an answer one must peer through the only peephole in Washington which affords an overall, if imperfect, view. Anyone may go and squint; the place is the Public Records Room of the U.S. Tax Court, where corporations that are secretly accused of profiteering make their troubles known when (but only when) they file an appeal.

But this peephole is like an astronomer's telescope. Because it takes time for starlight to reach the earth, scientists see galaxies, not as they exist today but as they blazed in space hundreds or thousands or millions of years ago. Similarly, a sighting through the Tax-Court peephole reveals almost nothing yet about Vietnam. Instead, more than fifteen years after the truce at Panmunjon, one gets today, for the first time, a panoramic view of the Korean War. It takes that much time to adjudicate cases.

December 16, 1968, was a great day for the excessive-profits watchers. For them, the Korean War was finally brought to a close in a ruling handed down by Judge Charles R. Simpson. It was the end of an era, and those at the peephole were now free to turn their attention to the war in Vietnam. Patience will be required, for the first tantalizing glimpses of the stepped-up war in Vietnam, as it was in 1965, are just now coming over the horizon in Tax Court.

Judge Simpson held that the LTV Aerospace Corp., a subsidiary of Ling-Temco-Vought, Inc., No. 8 on the fiscal 1968 list of the top 100 defense contractors, had indeed realized $750,000 and $3.5 million in unwarranted profits. When? Why, in 1952 and 1953. Judge Simpson told the story in a highly technical written opinion that covered 92 pages, including charts and statistics. The opinion was noteworthy because it decided the last of the so-called "air-frame" lawsuits which, taken together, dominated profiteering determinations made by the U.S. Renegotiation Board as a result of the Korean War and its aftermath. The first such dispute to be resolved involved the Grumman Aircraft Engineering Corp. A Tax-Court action on October 12, 1959, upheld board findings against Grumman that totaled $3 million for 1951 and $5.5 million for 1953. LTV Aerospace, too, wound up getting no relief in the court.

Eight corporations were hit in the "air-frame" cases.* Each is a member of the select 100 club. The biggest blow was dealt to the Boeing Co., which the board assessed a total of $34,284,165 for four years. Boeing challenged the board's gross accounting methods and took its chances on an appeal to the court, thereby laying its books open to a more detailed audit by the FBI, as provided in the Renegotiation Act of 1951. The result was that Boeing was found to have amassed not $34 million plus in excessive profits but $41 million. North American Rockwell Corp. had better luck; a determination of $33 million for four years was knocked down to $27 million. Martin Marietta Corp. went from $19,175,000 to $17,875,000; Lockheed Aircraft Corp. from $19,579,227 to $15,750,000; McDonnell Douglas Corp. from $19.5 million to $18.5 million, and Fairchild Hiller Corp. from $2 million to $1.8 million. As already indicated, Grumman and LTV came out "even." These figures do not include interest paid the government, but that was a relatively minor factor. Interest on the assessments stopped running three years after appeals were filed in court. Not until 1962 was the law changed (but not retroactively) to keep the interest going until cases were finally settled. In any event, the rate is only 4 per cent with no added penalties, compared with the 6 per cent and heavy penalties that individuals and corporations pay on income tax debts. On the other hand, what the eight corporations paid out in lawyers' fees is not visible through the peephole, and government officials will not even hazard a guess. The findings of the board in the eight groups of cases came to

---

* In each case the corporation is identified here by its current name; for instance, the LTV litigation was begun by the old Temco Aircraft Corp., a predecessor of Ling-Temco-Vought, Inc.

$140,288,392. Justice Department attorneys acting for the board did not lose a single case; they were sustained on a total of $134,675,000 in the decisions and settlements that followed appeals.

Viewing all this as background, the observer begins to develop a sense of eternity. For now emerging in the context of Vietnam are two of the same eight corporations that figured in the Korean War "air-frame" cases. On July 26, 1968, McDonnell Douglas returned to the court to protest a board finding of $8 million. Thirteen days later, Grumman reappeared to challenge a determination of $7.5 million. Both cases involved the companies' 1965 fiscal years, but watchers with visual acuity were treated to a surprise bonus. The McDonnell papers referred incidentally to a 1960 case in which the board and the corporation quietly agreed that McDonnell should refund $2 million to the U.S. Treasury. This brought the known cases against McDonnell (since 1953) to four, not counting the current appeal. Like the Internal Revenue Service, the board is bound by strict laws of confidentiality. It must not divulge the identity of any corporation that it duns; its proceedings are conducted in private. Therefore, except for McDonnell's own disclosure, tangential to the 1965 case, the 1960 finding would not have become a public record.

The McDonnell papers included a letter from the board dated last April 30. The communication praised the company for its production of the F-4 Phantom airplane—"one of the finest of its type"—and the Gemini spacecraft—"an outstanding success." But the board went on to say: "It is apparent that the government's requirements were responsible for the contractor's significant growth." And: "In view of the contractor's long experience in the . . . space programs and the years of development and production of the F-4, the Board is of the opinion that the government should receive significant benefit from this expansion of [sales] volume, either through lower prices or in renegotiation." The letter continued:

> In conducting its renegotiable business during the review year (1965), the largest volume in its twenty-six years of operation, the contractor benefitted greatly from government financial assistance. In addition to the use of government-owned facilities reported at a cost value of $43.7 million at the beginning of the year, the contractor also received a very large amount of progress payments. Such payments amounted to $323.4 million at the beginning of the year, or 63.9% of inventory applicable to contracts in process.

The board observed that renegotiable sales (those sales falling under the board's jurisdiction) were up 15.6 per cent over 1964, were 77 per cent higher than in 1963, and more than double those of 1960. The letter concluded:

> Returns on capital and net worth at the beginning of the review year, allocated to renegotiable business on the cost of sales ratio, amounted to 32.6% and 76.6% respectively. In the prior year the return on capital was 25% and on net worth 52%. In fiscal year 1960, returns were 26.6% and 58.9% after elimination of excessive profits. . . . The effect of the determination is that the contractor will retain a renegotiable profit of $75,420,000, or a profit margin of 7.6% on adjusted renegotiable sales of $990,915,000. . . . The determination would leave the contractor returns on capital and net worth of 29.4% and 69.2%.

McDonnell replied that the board juggled figures, with the result that it "bunched earnings" of the company in the year in question, to the disadvantage of the corporation. It also disputed the board's decision to disallow $2.5 million in charitable contributions as part of the company's cost of doing business. McDonnell asserted that the board erred in failing to give weight to the contractor's efficiency, to the financial risk that was involved, and to the company's inventive contributions to America's defense.

Grumman in 1965 was a designer and developer of naval aircraft, a major subcontractor for the F-111 fighter plane, and a producer of an orbiting astronomical observatory and a lunar module for the Apollo space vehicle. A board notice dated last May 21 alleged that the company had renegotiable sales in 1965 of $813,717,000, with a profit of $52,76,000, or 6.5 per cent. Grumman was said to have had "a return on beginning-of-the-year allocated net worth of 81 per cent, a rate which, in the opinion of the board, clearly indicates excessive profits." The board asserted that the company benefited from government-owned facilities valued at $61 million. It further charged that "44 per cent of . . . renegotiable sales were under comparatively riskless, rapid-pay type contracts that put no great financial burden on the contractor." The board found that "an increase of 47 per cent in sales was accompanied by an increase of 162 per cent in profits," and that the additional profits for the year "exceeded the contractor's total profits in any prior year in its history." The finding was intended to reduce the profit margin to 5.6 per cent. Grumman retorted that the board unfairly refused to allow certain costs, did not properly credit the company for its increasing independence from government aid, and that insufficient weight was given to corporate efficiency, know-how and risk. Grumman's view, paralleling McDonnell's, was that the board had acted "erroneously and arbitrarily and capriciously."

As these pleadings were entered in court, the board was fighting for its life in Congress—and, in fact, it was technically dead. This tiny and obscure independent agency, headed by five men who serve at the President's pleasure, subsists on a budget of merely $2.6 million and has less than 200 employees—making it something of a flyweight champion among government bureaus, both in terms of its size and its pound-for-pound (or dollar-for-dollar) effectiveness in recovering for the government far more than it spends. It is not a permanent agency; Congress must periodically renew its lease on life. By June 30, 1968, the board had "died," its authority to require annual statements from defense contractors having expired while a renewal bill was pending in Congress. However, the board remained in business, occupying itself with a formidable backlog as it waited for the lawmakers' decision.

At the beginning of the year, the Cleveland Plain Dealer, The Nation and a group of Ohio Congressmen, inspired by speeches delivered earlier by Rep. Henry Gonzalez (D., Tex.), had launched a crusade to retain and strengthen the board. During the Korean War the board had had 742 employees and a much broader jurisdiction. But its staff and its powers to review corporate records began to deteriorate after that war, and even the steady escalation in Vietnam had failed to revive White House and Congressional interest in the agency. The campaign to save the board ended with a measure of success last September, when Congress finally agreed to give it a three-year extension (a longer life span than it had ever been accorded before), and to enlarge slightly the scope of its operations.

During this period of tension for the board, some interesting disclosures were made. For instance, Gonzalez brought out the fact that fourteen corporations that kept getting called on the carpet by the board were having no trouble winning new defense contracts. The Texan had Congress' General Accounting Office (GAO) conduct an investigation for him. Then he reported to his colleagues that, in the four years before 1968, nine companies were cited twice for profiteering by the board, three others were accused three times each, and two corporations had become the object of proceedings in each of four years. GAO officials had informed Gonzalez that, "to the best of our knowledge, the Defense Department does not give weight to the Board's findings in selecting suppliers of defense materials . . . nor do the Board's findings diminish a company's chances of receiving another contract." GAO recommended exchange of more data between the Defense Department and the board, adding that facts supplied by the board could help the Defense Department to sharpen its procurement practices. Because of the rules of confidentiality, GAO did not identify the fourteen corporations. About the same time, Rep. William E. Minshall (R., Ohio) inserted a statement in the Congressional Record showing how the board was instrumental in disallowing excessively high salaries paid to executives of defense-oriented corporations. One case cited by Minshall concerned two brothers who had paid themselves a total of $94,000 in one year. But the board found that the pair had done nothing to earn their pay since they were devoting all their time to another company. Salaries are a factor in renegotiation proceedings because, to the extent that they are part of a company's overhead, they have the effect of ostensibly reducing profits.

The board's 1968 annual report, released on December 31, contains fresh indicators of excessive profits traceable to the Vietnamese War. Nearly one out of every five corporate statements filed with the board were denied immediate clearance and closer scrutiny was ordered. The comparable percentages were 16.8 in 1967, 13 in 1966, and 9.6 in 1965. Although only part of a contractor's business is reviewable by the agency, the board, reporting on what it did see, disclosed that 3,351 corporations, with renegotiable sales totaling $35.3 billion, enjoyed profits of $1.9 billion, while 676 other companies, with renegotiable sales of $3.5 billion, suffered a loss of $125 million. "When compared with earlier fiscal years," the board observed, "these figures indicate a continuing decline in both the number of 'loss' contractors and the amount of 'loss' sales." In fiscal 1968 the agency made forty-six determinations of excessive profits totaling $23 million, against eighteen for $15.9 million the previous year. Also, a new trend appears to be developing. In the first sixteen years of the board's existence, it won grudging agreement from contractors nine times out of ten when excessive profits were alleged. But in fiscal 1968, corporations refused to accept the finding in nineteen of the forty-six cases.

The annual report, the only meaningful document made public by the board in the course of a given year, deals with generalities and overall statistics. It never discusses individual cases. So one is forced back to the the peephole at Tax Court, and the confrontation with eternity. As it happens, eternity squares with the official view.

"There is no foreseeable end to the conditions which make [the Renegotiation Board] necessary," House Speaker John W. McCormack was advised in a letter from the Administration last February 23. Pleading for an indefinite extension of the board's authority, the letter pointed out: "Even if the Vietnam conflict were to end in the near future, the end of international tensions is not in sight. Hence, there will be a continuing demand for new and increasingly complex aircraft, missiles, space vehicles and other specialized items; and huge purchases will continue to be made under conditions similar to those now prevailing. Market-tested prices do not and cannot exist for costly, novel and complex military and space products. For this reason, prices must be negotiated, often with sole source contractors. Such negotiated prices are necessarily based upon uncertain cost estimates because reliable cost experience is not available. . . . The profitability of the contractor's performance of all his contracts are recorded for his fiscal year. Renegotiation provides an after-the-fact review of such profits. Thus it affords the only means for assuring that the profit outcome of procurement is reasonable."

RACE RELATIONS IN ENGLAND

THOMAS LAND

Mr. Land is a London-based political journalist whose articles appear in North America, Asia and Africa, as well as in Britain.

London

After a year of violent debates over the wisdom of granting a Magna Charta to Britain's racial minorities, the actual passage of the Race Relations Act—one of the most important new laws in the nation's postwar legislative history—has come as an emotional anticlimax.

Employers, trade unions, banks, finance and insurance companies, hotels, bartenders, school authorities and an endless list of others are now breaking the law today, and are punishable by heavy fines, if they discriminate against anyone because of his color. The argument over the race issue in Britain is being maintained only by the die-hards. What remains is the task of solving it in practice.

The law defines discrimination as treating a person less favorably than another on grounds of color, race or ethnic or national origins in the provision to the public of goods, facilities and services and in employment and housing. Immediately affected are more than 1 million colored people in Britain, drawn largely from Africa, Asia and the West Indies, and comprising roughly 2 per cent of the population. There are in addition an estimated quarter of a million colored Britons, most of them second-generation immigrants, who are either already on the employment market or will soon leave school.

It was largely to avert an explosion of disappointment from the young at being denied equal working and earning opportunities that the Race Relations Act came into force. During the first two years of the law, firms employing twenty-five or fewer workers will be exempt. In the third year, that number will drop to ten, and after four years all employers are to be covered.

If an employer discriminates in good faith in order to maintain a racial balance of workers, he does not break the law as long as that balance is "reasonable." What is reasonable remains a sensitive and controversial question, no doubt to be tested before the courts. Britain's lawmakers have at this point passed the buck to the judiciary.

People of whatever color who have been wholly or mainly educated in England are not, for the purpose of maintaining a "racial balance" in employment, to be counted as members of an immigrant group. This means that the colored graduate cannot be refused a job on that score.

One important exemption under the law is employment in domestic service.

In housing, the law makes it illegal for anyone with the power to sell or let residential accommodation, business premises or land to discriminate against colored customers. The principle applies in fixing the terms of an agreement as well as in deciding whether to sell or let.

The housing provisions of the law have been obviously designed to put a stop to the spread of racial ghettos in the industrial centers. They affect Britain's more than 6 million owner-occupiers of homes, the real estate business and, eventually, town planning.

By-products of the law include the disappearance of advertisements attaching racial qualifications to offers, such as "Europeans only," and the dispersion, so far as is known, of unofficial neighborhood pressure groups intent on keeping blacks out and home prices up.

Yet there remains a narrow field where the latter can still effectively operate. The sale of wholly owner-occupied premises is exempt under the law as long as no use is made of the services of a real estate agent or advertisements of any kind. And racial discrimination in housing is still permitted in cases where the owner shares the rented accommodation with his tenants.

Complaints of discrimination in housing are to be lodged with Britain's Race Relations Board, which initially seeks conciliation and, if possible, a written assurance against further discrimination. If it fails at that level, the board can instigate legal proceedings, seeking a court injunction to stop future acts of discrimination and asking financial compensation for damages. The court may grant compensation on many grounds, including "loss of opportunity" for benefits which a person might have expected to receive except for the act of discrimination.

In industry, all complaints of alleged discrimination are referred to the Department of Employment and Productivity, which has its own machinery for the elimination of the color bar. But if industry is unable to settle its race problems, the Race Relations Board may take them up. This would normally happen when a party was dissatisfied with a decision made by the industrial machinery.

Separate schemes for dealing with race relations are being established by the individual sectors of industry, and each one of them must be passed by Mrs. Barbara Castle, the Minister for employment and productivity. Her department has so far approved sixteen such schemes; twenty-four are under discussion, and ten others are still being prepared. This means that out of Britain's working population of 24 million, fewer than 5 million are thus far covered by schemes which have been approved.

The Race Relations Board, which may have to take up many cases affecting industry while the voluntary schemes are pending, was established under the Race Relations Act of 1965, the Labour administration's first, ineffective, attempt to rid the nation of the unofficial color bar. The new law has considerably increased the power of the Race Relations Board. However, conciliation remains its first and foremost task, sought by its local committees dotted throughout the country.

And conciliation is urgently needed in some fifty British industrial centers where the availability of work has attracted migrants from other parts of the country as well as from overseas. Britain's population density is one of the highest in the world. The problems of growing congestion experienced by its largely urban population provide a prime breeding ground for racial friction.

BOOKS & THE ARTS

Medicine: The Calculated Risks

HUMAN GUINEA PIGS: Experimentation on Man. By M. H. Pappworth, M.D. Beacon Press. 228 pp. $5.95.

GEORGE A. SILVER, M.D.
Dr. Silver is an Executive Associate of Urban Coalition.

With this opening paragraph Dr. Pappworth lays out the subject of his book:

"For several years a few doctors in this country and in America have been trying to bring to the attention of their fellows the disturbing aspects of what have become common practices in medical research. These practices concern experiments made chiefly on hospital patients and the aspect of them which is disturbing is the ethical one. In their zeal to extend the frontiers of medical knowledge, many clinicians appear temporarily to have lost sight of the fact that the subjects of their experiments are in all cases individuals with common rights and in most cases sick people hoping to be cured. As a result, it has become a common occurrence for the investigator to take risks with patients of which these patients are not fully aware or not aware at all and to which they would not consent if they were aware; to subject them to mental and physical distress which is in no way necessitated by, and has no connection with, the treatment of the diseases from which they are suffering; and in some cases deliberately to retard the recovery from that disease so that investigation of a particular condition can be extended."

For all practical purposes the above completes the discussion. The rest of the book is an extensive documentation, in some cases perhaps a little irritatingly high-pitched, but otherwise basically sober reporting. The book is divided into chapters, each of which explores another area of the thesis, such as, "Experiments on the Dying and Old," "Experiments on Infants and Children," "Patients as Controls," "The Inducement of Illness in Subjects," etc.

The illustrations are selected from scientific publications, and the variety testifies both to Dr. Pappworth's industry and the prevalence of the disorder he is describing.

Among the more harrowing examples he offers are:

(1) "In 1954 heart catheterization was performed on sixteen children, aged eleven to sixteen, and one adult aged twenty, ten of whom had active rheumatic heart disease, while the other seven were recovering from acute rheumatic fever. In the latter group the disease was considered to be inactive, although four had valvular disease.

"The experiment consisted in passing a catheter, under X-ray control, via the main arm vein into the subclavian vein of the chest, thence into the superior vena cava, thence into the right atrium of the heart, and so into the pulmonary artery. . . . At the same time a tightly fitting face mask and nose clip were applied to each child's face, so that samples of air breathed out could be collected for analysis. After blood samples had been taken from the heart (through the catheter) and pressure recordings within the heart were obtained, the children were made to 'cycle' on a special machine, and they did this with the cardiac catheter and face mask remaining in position.

"The conclusion reached as a result of this experiment was: 'Active rheumatic carditis interferes with the functional efficiency of the heart.' This fact, however, was not only already well known but was well established. The purpose of the experiment had been, as is so often the case in experimental medicine, merely to confirm some existing knowledge."

(2) "A group of Cuban doctors" (working in Cuba in 1935) "not only gave spinal anaesthetics to a group of pregnant women but then proceeded to perform translumbar aortography on them. This was the first time that translumbar aortography had ever been done on pregnant women and its purpose was to study the abdominal circulation in advanced pregnancy.

"After the spinal anaesthetic, with consequent paralysis and loss of sensation of the lower limbs and trunk, the patients were turned to lie face downwards. A six-inch needle was then pushed through the mass of muscles adjacent to the vertebral column until it entered the aorta, the main artery of the body. When blood flowed in 'a pulsating stream' a contrast medium was injected through the needle and serial X-ray films were taken of the aorta and the renal arteries. The experiment was done on twelve women during the eighth month of pregnancy. One woman died of meningeal haemorrhage following the lumbar puncture given for the spinal anaesthetic."

(3) "Diabetic coma is a very serious condition with a high mortality. The longer the patient has been in coma prior to its energetic treatment the worse the outlook. This condition is associated with a profound fall of blood pressure. In order therefore to investigate the mechanism by which this fall comes about, it was decided by a group of research workers to pass cardiac catheters for special estimations on a group of patients admitted in diabetic coma. Oxygen consumption was also measured by a special apparatus.

"This was done on five such patients, whose period of coma prior to admission varied between five and eighteen hours. One of these patients was aged seventy-one. All died, not because of this investigation, but because of the seriousness of the condition. I find it impossible to justify such a procedure which was purely experimental and very unlikely to have been of the slightest value to any of those particular patients."

In the last few pages of his book Dr. Pappworth undertakes to explore the ethical principles and legal considerations involved, proposes what he believes to be helpful legislation, and concludes with a noble sentiment—"the return of the physician friend."

Pappworth is concerned perhaps with what may be nothing more than an extension of the old "town and gown" conflict. The patient comes to the physician for help in a time of need, for counsel, relief from pain or fear, for a cure. He is not deliberately seeking the role of subject in an educational or investigational process. As Holmes (the doctor father of the Justice) says, in Scholastic and Bedside Teaching, "I pay the captain of the Cunard steamship to carry me quickly and safely to Liverpool, not to make a chart of the Atlantic for after voyages."

If the doctor's role is really only to help patients immediately and directly, and not to teach or learn, one can quote Hippocrates to the contrary. Certainly one aspect of the physician's role is the transmission of skill and knowledge, some part of which process may not always be entirely beneficial to the patient, since students of surgery are certainly not as skilled as the teacher of surgery. Yet they must attempt some surgical procedure for the first time, in order to become progressively more skilled.

This is not simple hair-splitting or

IN THE WOODS

"I grew like hair to your clothes."
In the woods, red ivy marked the way.
The ants streamed with nervous terror.
My hand fled over her breasts like a vine.

MICHAEL GOLDMAN

---

casuistry. At some point or another one must face up to the fact that the extension of knowledge requires tests, that the improvement of skills, techniques and knowledge itself requires experimentation and that at some point, "patients are human guinea pigs."

But this is not to say that there are no ethical principles involved. An earlier writer in the same field, Dr. H. K. Beecher of Harvard, exposed a whole series of useless, dangerous, even fatal experiments carried on in the name of science, pointing out that "An experiment is ethical or not at its inception. It does not become ethical post-hoc—ends do not justify means. There is no ethical distinction between ends and means."

To experiment on patients against their will or without their knowledge is inexcusable and does smack of the Nazi medical crimes. There is nothing that should prevent us from insisting on voluntary consent of the person upon whom the experiment is to be performed: from assessment of the danger of experiments on human beings by previous animal experimentations, or from assuring proper medical protection and management of the experiment. These proposals were adopted by the American Medical Association in a report of their Judicial Council over twenty years ago.

Pappworth insists on an enlargement of this thesis, and he formulates as his first principle his version of the Golden Rule, "Do not unto any man that which you would not have done to yourself," the advice of Rabbi Hillel. After graphic descriptions of some of the suffering to which subjects are exposed, where the advancement that might be made in research is small, for instance, or where the patient may die of the experiment though not of the disease, one is horrified. There are physicians, however, who do see these procedures as an advancement of knowledge.

I recall, as a soldier in the Second World War, reading an account of a campaign in which I participated, where the units with which I was fighting took heavy casualties. The report of the event stated: "The General took a calculated risk." In some of the experiments described in the book, the doctor (like the general) is said to have performed a "daring experiment," the patient, of course, taking the risk.

Pappworth's second principle is the principle of valid consent, that is, that the patient should know what he is consenting to and should be able intelligently to give consent. With children the matter becomes doubly complicated. Shall parents be permitted to allow experimentation on the children, particularly in those situations in which the benefit will not accrue to the child himself but to "other children" as the experimenter may say?

Pappworth's third principle is that certain subjects shall be prohibited from being experimented upon because their consent cannot be obtained validly: the mentally sick, the aged, the dying. He goes on to add the points made by the AMA years before that there should be previous animal experimentation and evidence of the experimenter's competence in performing the tests; that proper records should be kept in order to judge whether the patient had any ill effects following the experimentation and whether the results justify further investigation and use.

A good many unpleasant ghosts are raised in these discussions—the Nazi doctors, for example, and the concept of subhuman creatures upon whom one may and should perhaps experiment as much as one pleases. Who will be next after the retarded and the mentally sick? How can we stop the unnecessary duplication, dangerous and ill-advised tests already determined to be without value? What shall we say about the university hierarchy in which publication is desperately required for promotion so that innumerable tests and various clinical reports have to be submitted in order to accumulate bibliography?

At the time this book was written, Dr. Pappworth had not yet had the opportunity to become acquainted with what may be the grisliest of all examples in the field of human experiments, the heart transplants. His book condemns kidney transplants, which had had some publicity at the time of his writing. He mentions the risks to the donor, and the very small chance of saving the life of the recipient. He mentions the mystery of transplant rejection which the scientists are working feverishly to overcome. But in spite of the complexity of the procedures and the skills required, he points out the danger that many will undertake such transplants even where their skills and competence are unequal to the task, because of the demands of the community, or for prestige, or even for gain.

There is also the danger to the recipient. Just as a donor may be sacrificed "prematurely" for the sake of the experiment, may not a case be cleared for transplant where the risk of dying from surgery is greater than the risk of dying from the disease? And the pressures to find a recipient, corrupting the operator, may on occasion be as great as the pressure to find a donor.

It is impossible to discuss Pappworth's book without going into the question of heart transplants which have received such enormous publicity. In view of Desmond Smith's essay ["The Heart Market," The Nation, December 30], however, it is only necessary to relate this subject to the general matter of ethical principles with which Pappworth's book is concerned. Such new discoveries which are difficult to apply and very expensive, as the heart transplant operation or the artificial kidney, raise additional issues and offer perplexing dilemmas.

Will the lives of the mortally afflicted be saved? Do these discoveries offer promise to all? The heart transplant—clearly not. The artificial kidney—possibly, but at a great price. Will (and you might read "should") society earmark billions of dollars for artificial kidneys for a few thousand sufferers who will die otherwise, when it does not appropriate lesser amounts to save the lives of hundreds of thousands, perhaps millions, of inadequately fed or untreated fellow citizens who die prematurely of nutritional deficiency, correctable diseases uncorrected, preventable diseases unprevented? What are our priorities?

A new trend in hospital design is evolving to keep pace with the growing transplant business. Will this be an accelerating trend, always upward, medicine's biggest business in the next twenty years? It will undoubtedly accelerate the already soaring costs of medical care. Are we prepared to spend larger and larger percentages of our gross national product on medical care? It is over 6 per cent now. In view of the desperate needs for housing, education, food, do we want to spend 10, 50, 90 per cent of our treasure on medical services?

Will we see the motto—"Here where death rejoices to aid the living"—now restricted to the autopsy room, become the frontispiece of the hospital?

To all of the strictures offered by Dr. Pappworth and others on the dangers of uncontrolled human experimentation, the heart transplant adds a few others. Shall one wait until the donor is dead, since a heart which is still beating is much more likely to continue to beat in the recipient? And if one need not wait until the heart has actually stopped beating, at what point shall the donor be considered dead, or sufficiently dead, for the heart to be removed? And by removing the heart from a patient who seems to be nothing more than a vegetable anyway, due to an accident or incurable disease, isn't society letting him be of some use? But isn't this just one step from the following imaginary situation: An eager surgeon has his prospective recipient ready and waiting. A donor is not readily available (accidents that day were a little lighter, mortal disease lessened, the angel of death had moved to another hospital). Perhaps the surgeon would like to see a particular patient of the right size, or weight or age selected, and have him ready for use.

There is a story going around (it may be true) of a donor who was lined up for a heart transplant. The recipient, however, at the last moment decided against having a transplant, and died. The putative donor was recently discharged from the hospital.

This sort of talk may appear to be a reckless calumny on the medical profession, and a kind of smart-aleck antiscientific irresponsibility. But one cannot help recalling the "resurrectionists," the echo of Burke and Hare, and the situation in Edinburgh when anatomical specimens became so scarce that medical schools, in dire need, were prepared to pay huge sums for a body. Obliging local lads would then dig up bodies barely buried in order to meet the demand. Later a pair of ambitious entrepreneurs undertook to provide bodies before they were buried, and succeeded so well that an unknown number, whispered to be in the hundreds, were murdered for science and profit.

But these gloomy predictions reflect only one part of the ethical dilemma of medical experimentation. The physician's job is to heal, yet to do his job well, new knowledge must be constantly uncovered. The history of the past century is evidence enough that if it can, it will be done. However it may well be that the cause of mankind requires slow and careful developments, while the cause of science may be better served by an impatient unconcern for human values. Who will weigh the considerations? Is the cause of science separable from the cause of mankind?

Science sets up too many situations in which individual human beings are expected to make ethical decisions with too little guidance as human beings or professionals. The matter of "informed consent" has been struggled with to the point where experimenters who now operate with federal funds are obliged to give some earnest of their having obtained valid consent from the subjects. This cannot be transformed wholly into a mockery, but it can be circumvented. Many sincere investigators are nevertheless impatient under the restrictions placed upon them, and use every legal means to bypass the consent mechanism. In experimental cancer therapy and in the treatment of certain types of mental illness, where the cases are demonstrably hopeless, the temptation is unbearable.

Invasion of privacy is another area in which intolerable pressure is put upon investigators by their need to have information available, and the contrary ethical principle that no one should be deprived of the right to dispose of himself (or information about himself) without his consent. Many who are concerned about the invasion of privacy inherent in experiments that may do physical harm or injury are far less concerned about such invasion where it may do mental or emotional harm. The huge data banks that are in the process of being established will provide wonderful epidemiologic tools and will no doubt serve to provide more effective and efficient service for patients when their ills and quirks can be stored in the computer's memory to be called upon from any place in the country, or even the world. Yet to what other use this information may be put is hardly known, and a police state use cannot be discounted in the cyclically changing political attitudes of our country.

Not too long ago a patient is said to have lost a claim in a jury trial against a negligent driver, as a result of which accident he suffered serious injuries, because his medical record, subpoenaed by the court, contained a psychiatric note that he "may have been" a latent homosexual. Whether or not this influenced the jury cannot be known, but his attorney feels it may have weighed heavily against the plaintiff. What other kinds of medical evidence may be prejudicial for other reasons, and in other times used to imprison or punish victims whose innocent histories are stored in the computer?

Finally, in the promising and threatening field of genetic change manipulated by man, who will then become the subjects of professional decision when science learns to cope with the DNA molecule and genetic transformation? What steps will be taken to protect not only the individual but unborn children where the experiments may or may not have baleful effects on future generations?

Even now unconscionable tests are being conducted, loading the atmosphere with contaminators that may have long-range genetic effects about which we as yet know nothing. Substances that produce genetic change are sold commercially and any move to change the situation is adopted reluctantly for fear of interference with the entrepreneurial system.

A macabre sidelight on the potential shortage of "material" and necessity for offsetting legal consequences to the surgeon is offered by a conference held in September. This was amusingly titled "Social Aspects of Heart Transplants," and among other matters it concluded "that new legislation should be adopted to allow persons to carry cards donating their bodies upon death for transplants or other scientific uses."

The newspaper reported at that time that Dr. Denton Cooley of Houston, who had already performed eleven heart transplants, said he could have done twenty-five more if he had had enough hearts.

Dr. Francis Moore of Harvard indicated that ten times as many organs are needed as are at present available. It gives some force to the joke going

William H. Hinton
Author of FANSHEN
a documentary of revolution in a Chinese Village, will be speaking on "The Cultural Revolution in China—Victory for Socialism" during February and March.

February 15-28—West Coast
March 1-16—Midwest
March 16-31—Eastern Seaboard

For information write:
William H. Hinton
RD #2, Fleetwood, Pa. 19522
Tel: Area 215—944-8895

FANSHEN is now available in paperback. Random House, Vintage Press, $2.95, at most bookstores.

"An epic: one of the most important books about China which has been written since the revolution. For anyone who wants to understand anything important about the Chinese revolution of our time, the reading of this book is an absolute necessity." —Joseph Needham, Tribune (London)

". . . FANSHEN is the most exciting, fascinating, extraordinary document of Land Reform in China ever written . . . a classic to be compared with Red Star Over China."
—Han Suyin

"FANSHEN is an important book . . . The lesson of Long Bow village, so movingly and compassionately recorded by Mr. Hinton, should be studied and restudied by all who have a personal concern for the future of the majority of mankind."
—C. T. Hsu, Saturday Review

". . . one of the two classics of the Chinese Revolution, the other being Red Star Over China."—Martin Bernal, New Statesman (London) around: "Drive carefully, Dr. Barnard is waiting."

Others are recommending wider use of cadaver organs generally—such a small incision, how can the family object? This has more merit, of course, in the long haul—when cadaver organ banks may become as much a reality as blood banks. Actually such social usefulness of corpses ("we use everything from the pig but the squeal") may offset the strictures of selective use and reduce the probability of creating corpses on demand.

As work for man shades into work on man, how can we protect man from his fellow man, particularly when he comes in the guise of physician, friend, counseler and helper? Perhaps the tangle of health and hurt, of life and death, purveyed by the single agent—the doctor—is only a paradigm of the tangle and dilemma of all of us in our social relationships. Early man is known to have experimented with trephining, cutting holes in the skull for what purpose we will never know. Let the spirits out? The pus? Create exquisite suffering? Religious ritual? Scientific investigation?

We are well on our way to the exploration of the universe of space around us. But it seems that it will be a good many generations before we explore adequately the space within us.

To Be A Salvation

GEORGE ELIOT: A Biography. By Gordon S. Haight. Oxford University Press. 616 pp. $12.50.

CALVIN BEDIENT

Mr. Bedient teaches in the English Department at the University of California, Los Angeles.

George Eliot's life is heavy stuff for a biography. The mornings at the desk, the scratching pen, the headaches and colds, the deaths of relatives, the records of annual earnings, the exhausting Sundays "at home"—there was so little health, so little joy. A dank cloud of consciousness seems to have hung over everything. Nor is Gordon Haight, her latest and most thorough biographer, a man to make the most of the prosaic. Haight adheres unadventurously to the bare rock of record. The consequence is a biography that, though solidly built of stone, exists without echoes, without voices or laughter.

Not that this—or any other biography of George Eliot—could fail to interest. For as her life was the truest, so it was the noblest of her stories.

Quiet determination was its keynote, self-fulfillment its theme. "She is an honest woman," Thackeray's daughter, Annie, said of her, "and goes in with all her might for what she is about." So indeed had the young Mary Anne Evans gone into the religious question that racked her age; the result was a long alienation from her family. And so she "also went" into her liaison with George Henry Lewes ("I have done nothing," she said, "with which any person has a right to interfere"); the result, in this instance, was social ostracism. And so, at 60, she did enter into marriage with John Walter Cross, whom she had long addressed as "nephew," and who was twenty years her junior. She needed love, masculine management, intelligent companionship—and gained them. What others said or thought could not deter her. Her imperatives came from within.

Such was the tenor, the meaning, of George Eliot's life. And yet not even self-fulfillment seemed to satisfy her. When she began life with Lewes, she was 34—too old to escape, in Emily Dickinson's phrase, "a Doom of Fruit without the Bloom." The wells of delight had gone dry. Nor had life, as she saw it, ever been more than a barren conception. To the feelings, it was pain; to the spirit, a famine. At 46, after a decade of fame, she declared: ". . . to me early death takes the aspect of salvation." Affection and glory—not even these balanced the emptiness. To her, indeed, only one thing seemed better than death: "the greater blessedness of being a salvation."

It was chiefly through her fiction that George Eliot sought to be a salvation. Here was not merely another means of self-fulfillment but, even more, a reason for living. With Adam Bede, her first full-length novel, success enveloped her. She had written from her heart and—behold, had found the pulse of the day! Yet so titanic is vanity that her success did not astonish her. Nor was it ever to be enough. With each new effort she strove to increase her power. She was out, after all, to save the world; and in the last analysis this meant saving herself from despair.

And though her art could do little to help others to live, it did indeed help them to bear life. It was confession, inspiration, absolution, all in one. It told of the hungers of the self; it told of the need for self-denial. Dressing up Duty in the majestic robes of Fate, it conquered the age with a resonant abstraction. The conscience of the Victorians whispered "Renounce!"—and in tones ineffably sad, George Eliot echoed "Renounce!" And how learned, how wise it sounded when she said it! What a savior she seemed! Of Silas Marner, even Thomas Huxley could fervently say: "a book to do great good to people."

Her charisma grew. Worshipers fell to the ground and kissed her feet, waited outside concert halls to touch her coat, kept tear-stained handkerchiefs as relics. In her low, penetrating voice they thought they could hear "the mystery of a world of feeling that must remain untold." She became the enigmatic Gioconda of Duty. Lewes took to calling her Madonna. And all the while she showed in every tête-à-tête—F. H. Myers observed—"an almost pathetic anxiety to give of her best . . . —to utter words which should remain as an active influence for good." Decidedly pathetic, however, were words she let drop in the last year of her life: "I am so tired of being set on a pedestal and expected to vent wisdom." Playing Madonna had not proved so blessed after all.

The novels may be read as an apology for the life. Despite her determination and independence—indeed, because of them—George Eliot lived deep in guilt. In consequence, her work became a kind of anti-biography. Though she herself grew from a child into an adult, her heroes and heroines take the journey back again, only too glad to renounce their illusory right to rebellion. The novelist's life speaks of freedom and of the need to think clearly and act honestly; her books quash freedom under an "absolute and peremptory" Duty, and deluge the head with the "emotive" waters of the heart. This cosmopolitan novelist enshrined in her pages the provincial pieties of her childhood. Having fulfilled her own socially "wayward" impulses, she nonetheless persecuted waywardness in her fiction, demonstrating, in book after book, its "awful Nemesis." Through novels that urged others to content themselves with the "infinite issues" attending "everyday duties," she herself reached out for greatness and glory. Except as shadow meets with sunlight, her work did not meet with her life.

All that was weak in George Eliot went into her fiction; almost all that was strong was left out. And now her novels are growing yellow with age. The notable, the very tremendous, exception is Middlemarch. Here her clear head, her scorn of intolerance and conventionality, her belief in independence, break through and dominate. The book is worthy of her life; it is honest and true. And even though it may not do "great good to people," it helps to make up, as is the way of art, for that sorry insufficiency of things of which its author, beyond all wisdom, was so mournfully aware.

Slump in Sages

MEN IN DARK TIMES. By Hannah Arendt. Harcourt, Brace & World. 272 pp. $5.95.

PAUL ROAZEN

Mr. Roazen is the author of the recently published Freud: Political and Social Thought (Knopf) and teaches political theory at Harvard.

Political philosophy has fallen on bad times. There has been, as Sir Isaiah Berlin once put it, a slump in sages. In pragmatic America it is always easier for scholars to gain support and recognition for narrow empirical research projects than for more speculative examinations of the fundamental premises of our political and social thought. Thinking about how we think should be the theorist's job. But when political philosophy is pursued, too often it is simply academic and irrelevant to the contemporary world.

Hannah Arendt is that rarity, a public philosopher with an audience. She has fully earned the right to be considered one of our ranking social thinkers. Her Origins of Totalitarianism, which examines the links between anti-Semitism, imperialism and totalitarianism, is a splendid study, full of ideas. Her Eichmann in Jerusalem was capable of upsetting intellectuals, especially Jewish ones, all around the world; this book remains a shocker—for the terrible historical tale it tells, for the trial it records, and for the viewpoint it presents.

Men in Dark Times is a collection of assorted essays about leading Central European intellectual figures of the last century (with the exception of the opening essay on Lessing). Despite an occasional tendency to pontificate, Miss Arendt can be a very moving and eloquent writer. Some of these essays were originally written in German and their English translations do not read as smoothly as the ones composed in English. Though this is not a major book of the author's it does present some of her most characteristic outlooks.

A refugee herself, Miss Arendt is a messenger of ill tidings. The rise of Hitler put an end to the rich cultural life of a Continental intelligentsia, forcing many of its members to flee and scatter abroad. Other men at other times have found it easy to perceive the break in their personal lives as a shattering of the Western tradition. Maybe each of us is doomed to nourish his own provincialism. For those educated in the best of Western culture, the disruption of their own societies was almost bound to foretell the decline of the West. It is perhaps unnecessary to point out that, despite the holocausts of this century, culture—even of a distinctively Western variety—has in fact succeeded in flourishing outside the German-speaking world.

Against the background of her general theme that our era is one of public darkness, Miss Arendt's form of cosmopolitanism has given us some brilliant essays on individual figures. The study of Rosa Luxemburg, for example, is wonderfully evocative of a human being, and presents an outstanding account of a great and neglected figure in the history of socialism. A few pages on Pope John XXIII make him live as a simple man of faith and humanity, at the same time a most impressive Prince of the Church.

A very long and devoted chapter on Walter Benjamin attempts to give this man of letters his due recognition, although her essay fails to convey persuasively the sources of her enthusiasm for his talent. (Miss Arendt is responsible for some of Benjamin's work appearing in English now for the first time, and a debate is already under way over his contribution to literary and moral life.) A fine, clear essay on Bertolt Brecht illustrates her range of appreciation; she is most interested in him for his political and social convictions, and the way his ideology could conflict with his art. Yet it is the poet in Brecht, as well as his playfulness, which has captured her imagination. Miss Arendt also sensitively treats Isak Dinesen, Hermann Broch, her teacher Karl Jaspers, as well as her personal friends Waldemar Gurian and Randall Jarrell.

No such book of reviews, addresses, essays and tributes can be expected to have the satisfying coherence of a sustained or developed argument. Such a collection almost necessarily acquires a continuity more of mood than of logic. These articles do form a piece, however, with her larger body of work, which has focused on defining the limits of the public realm. Although she writes so often on literary subjects, and demonstrates a real talent for understanding the artist's dilemmas and inner conflicts, in the end Miss Arendt takes her stand on moral and political grounds. As a public philosopher she toils on, contributing by her illumination to relieving public darkness.

A Slave in Our Time

THE AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF A RUNAWAY SLAVE. By Esteban Montejo. Edited by Miguel Barnet. Translated from the Spanish by Jocasta Innes. Pantheon Books. 223 pp. $4.95.

OLIVER T. MYERS

Mr. Myers is chairman of the Department of Spanish and Portuguese at the University of Wisconsin, Milwaukee.

The possibility of running into a person who grew up as a slave, someone who might recall with a clear mind the circumstances of slavery and the event of abolition, has now about reached zero in the United States. This is not so in Cuba, where slavery did not end until 1880, nearly twenty years before independence from Spain was won. A few years ago, Miguel Barnet found Esteban Montejo, an ex-slave who had reached manhood almost at the same moment he became a free man.

Montejo was born into slavery around 1860 (he gives that date, although the interviewer and editor suggests a year or two earlier), ran away into the forests as a teen-ager for a life of solitary and illicit freedom, and did not emerge until he was convinced that slavery had indeed come to an end. In 1963 Miguel Barnet, a young poet and folklorist, gathered the story of his life through tape recordings and friendly chats over a two-year span, and this remarkable book is the result, a series of talks with a man whose mind is as free and open as his spirit had always been. It probably would not have attracted as much notice twenty or thirty years ago as it does now; for we have rediscovered slavery and have been forced to consider the cultural heritage of some of our friends and neighbors as Africans, and as American slaves.

Montejo (Barnet condescendingly refers to him as Esteban) was a born loner. He found slavery intolerable, not so much for its cruelty or repression, as for the total absence of independence, the independence he was to crave even during his years of freedom. "Lots of Negroes wanted to be friends with me, and they used to ask me what I had done as a runaway. I told them, 'Nothing.' I have always been one for my independence. Idle gossip never helped anyone. I went for years and years without talking to anyone at all."

It must have been something then for Barnet to get Montejo to talk enough to put together a book of this length. Reading it through at one sitting would make Montejo sound like a garrulous old man, which he was not. It should be kept in mind that this is not the usual sort of oral history, in which an articulate, sophisticated public figure, with the help of a skillful interviewer, creates his intimate portrait of an age; what we read in three or four hours was wrung from Montejo over a period of years of painstaking interviewing and creative editing.

But this is also one of the faults of the book. Barnet admits to extensive rewriting, paraphrasing and inserting "words and expressions characteristic of Esteban wherever they seemed appropriate." Adding to this the necessary checking of certain dates and historical facts, there is some doubt as to how much is Montejo and how much Barnet. The editor's introduction is brief, consisting of a few lines describing the meetings between the two and some historical background. It omits any information on Montejo's activities since the war with Spain, except that he was a member "for many years" of the Popular Socialist (i.e., Communist) Party, and had been retired for forty years. One must assume then that it is Barnet's personal interests which show up in the attention paid to exotic customs, descriptions of African rites, and the operations of the sugar industry in the 19th century. Since there are very few footnotes, it must be supposed that Montejo has a fantastic memory for detail or that Barnet has supplied some material from other sources which he is attributing to Montejo. In all this, the ex-slave remains too much a shadow figure.

The other major fault is that the translation, however accurate, fails to suggest the speech of an (illiterate?) centenarian of Afro-Hispanic birth. This is partly due to the Briticisms of the translator (treacle, bloody), which would slow down an American reader under any circumstances; but it is unbelievable that a person like Montejo should speak of "feckless drifters," or drop a "woe betide" into a conversation. And to read: "Then the swine had the cheek to start to explain . . ." is to think only of a British colonel at Khartoum. The careless editing of the English also leads to misspelled Spanish words (guerilla) and American Presidential names (MacKinley).

Once past these obstacles and into the genuineness of Montejo's experiences, the reader is drawn into intimate contact with an engaging personality. Old Esteban is a firm believer in magic but is patient with nonbelievers; he's more confident that his truths will prevail than the churchgoers are. He is on the whole tolerant of other sorts of people, including his enemies, although he has learned not to trust anyone.

He is in fact quite willing to concede some good to the Spanish and even to the Americans. He is basically a man of peace, but is ready at the age of 105 to take up the machete "in all the battles to come." His survival in the jungle was a triumph of instinct and common sense; these talents and his subsequent experience carried him through the war, and through a full century of life.

The lack of personal involvement with other people is perhaps the most striking characteristic in his make-up. He never sought people for companionship, but could feel personal loyalty in the extreme stress of combat. His greatest passion seems to be that expressed in his hatred of the Americans, which may be played up a bit by Barnet. But here is something more like racial and personal pride than politics or nationalism. His passion for women never led him into a permanent liaison, something that would have threatened his dearly loved freedom. He expresses a mild curiosity about possible children he may have fathered, but as he never felt any family ties to earlier generations there are none to the succeeding.

His detachment lends an air of objectivity to much of his story, but at the same time raises questions about his political involvement. It is difficult to comprehend his party membership; it seems inconsistent that a person who had shunned personal entanglements should have submitted himself to the discipline of the Communist Party. This part of his life is passed over very rapidly. Why? Certainly the political activities of Cuban workers in the early years of this century would have been as interesting as the processing of sugar. And the book would have gained by the inclusion of more of the man Montejo in his authentic accents, and less anthropological exotica.

Morning Coffee with Sillitoe

IGOR HAJEK

Mr. Hájek, foreign literary editor of the Czech Writers' Union weekly Listy (during the recent stormy period Listy was formerly Literarni listy, and before that, Literarni noviny*), is currently on leave of absence in London, interviewing English and American writers for his magazine.*

Alan Sillitoe does not radiate the self-assurance acquired through a good education and success: he is neither urbane, elegant nor eloquent. His self-confidence stems from a quiet conviction that the way he is going is the right one. Like his prose, his speech does not flow easily; each sentence has the sound of an irrevocable pronouncement, spaced with long pauses. He tends to be a little distracted and nervous, and I assume this is because he became an intellectual late in life. He does not smile very often and I did not see him laugh. For him, writing is hard work, not play, and a whimsical self-irony is alien to him. He was wearing a grayish shirt which by cut and color reminded me of a metal worker's overall. He gives the impression of a man engaged in a fight. But I begin from a different angle:

Hájek: In the middle of the fifties, there was much talk of the Angry Young Men, Kingsley Amis, John Braine, John Wain, Colin Wilson and others. A few years later, a number of working-class novels appeared by such writers as Len Doherty, David Lambert, Dave Willis and Margot Heinemann. Some critics put you at the head of this new list of proletarian writers. The so-called Angry Young Men refuted any suggestion that they ever were members of a literary movement; this was perhaps most vehemently denied by Kingsley Amis. Was there any organized movement as far as the working-class novelists were concerned?

Sillitoe: I'm not aware of anything of that sort and have not even read the books of some of the writers you have mentioned. I cannot understand why people are always looking for trends and movements. Writers work just as all others: miners, engineers, psychologists. From their point trends do not exist. Why should they exist in writing? Although I admit that looking from a distance some similarities may appear, the writer himself usually does not realize it.

Hájek: A few weeks ago you published a new book of stories, Guzman, Go Home, but many people still know you chiefly as the author of one short story, "The Loneliness of the Long Distance Runner," a story which seems to be overshadowing everything that you have written so far. How do you feel about it?

Sillitoe: I think those people are absolutely right. This story of a working-class youth is at the same time the statement of my artistic integrity. I shall never write anything to uphold this Establishment and this society. And I'm ready to stick to my principles even to a self-damaging extent. One has to be very careful about moral decisions in this society.

Hájek: Do you think that the English society can be potentially dangerous to you?

Sillitoe: Maybe to others, but not to me any more. Once you start to fight there is no danger, you either die or keep fighting. Each individual has to make a choice: either to accept this society or stand up against it.

Hájek: What are your main complaints about it?

Sillitoe: It's rather difficult to say; the English society is simply not part of me. Whatever I have against it I say through my characters: every character in my books has an opinion, and they are all mine. On the other hand, it is very difficult to write about something you hate, you have to try to understand and even show some sympathies. That is why people, who consider writers from a political rather than artistic viewpoint, accuse them of being treacherous: they take this for sympathizing with the enemy. Also, they want to know what exactly are the writer's own views. But a writer's views, that's a broad category. If they ask me what I am, a Communist or Socialist, etc., I can only answer that I'm on the Left, beyond that I can't say much. . . . A writer never stands still. When you are young, everything is simple, but I am not young any more, I'm 40 and that means that I am leaving a lot of simplicities behind. Basic beliefs stay, but things now look more complex.

Hájek: What do you think about young people today?

Sillitoe: I can hardly say anything about them, because I do not know them that well. After all, my experience may be different from theirs. . . . My own life has been shaped by the fact that at 17 I was working in a factory. There I became politically active; the three years that I spent in the factory seemed like an eternity: at 17 I was already an old man. I believe that work is finally the most important factor in a person's life and if you want to know about young people today you could learn all about them by exploring their work. . . . They say that young people are suspicious of the older generation who have an aim in life. At 17 I didn't have an eye on the future. I went to a factory which existed; I had a girl friend and she existed; everything else was beyond me. Earning a living takes from you the capacity to see into the future. And the majority of English young people work hard—in Sheffield, Manchester, Glasgow, that's where you would have to go to know them.

Hájek: It seems to me that the title story of your book stands a little apart from the others, dealing with the interrelation of art and politics. Would you say that it is in any sense programmatic?

Sillitoe: I had a hard time writing it; that was five years ago. As an old Nazi, Guzman was such a despicable character that I had to joke about him; otherwise I could have no sympathy for him. Making fun of him helped. The framework of the story is that an English artist getting away from politics arrives in Spain. There he meets a man, Guzman, who in his youth wanted to be an artist, but as he also yearned for a father to provide him with an intellectual shelter, he joined Hitler. The English artist is saved; he realizes that it is not possible to avoid politics. You cannot abandon political realities, otherwise you would have to hand it to people who would make it bad for you. There is much psychological engineering going on in England today to make art and politics separable. The aim is to make artists accept the Establishment and become part of it. But politics is a part of everyday life and a writer cannot avoid it just as he cannot avoid psychological research. However, for him the only way to engage in politics should be through writing. He should not address crowds and he should keep out of organizing. And he should make statements only if compelled to do so by a very deep inner force.

Hájek: What is the role of the mass media in all this?

Sillitoe: The role of the newspapers is to distort human life, the writer's duty is to preserve it. He is in direct conflict with newspapers. The lie by which newspapers live seeps down from their owners.

Hájek: But what about Capek, I suppose you would not know his journalistic work, but for instance Hemingway . . .

Sillitoe: . . . and Graham Greene, too. But they left after a time. They moved from lies to truth. On the other hand, highest ideals do not always work out in practice. Individual journalists may be honest people, but they have to do it because they have wives and children. I can understand that and excuse it. A factory is different; there you are not dependent, you can leave and find another job at any time. . . .

Hájek: Without risking unemployment?

Sillitoe: It is not that difficult to find a job nowadays.

Hájek: You said that there was no sense in looking for literary trends. But what is the present state of English literature?

Sillitoe: I think that for a capitalist country English literature is in a quite healthy state. There are, however, strong right-wing tendencies in literary circles here; those people are the Stalinists and Zhdanovites of English society and they have a few hundred thousand ready to listen attentively to their pronouncements. The recent scandal about Yevtushenko's candidacy for the Oxford professorship was instigated by them and by the English editors who traditionally like poets to attack one another. I do not remember two workers attacking each other in the factory and neither do doctors or engineers engage in that pastime. Writers do and they are being encouraged to do it, because the English dishonor their writers. In this country, as in any other, a writer is liked if he is loyal to the system. But it is the writer's duty in a sense to be disloyal. In the modern world, he is one of the few people who are listened to, and his primary loyalty should be to his integrity and to his talent. He can speak up in many ways; the best way is to write a book.

Hájek: What if he cannot publish it?

Sillitoe: I can only tell you what I would do if I were in that situation. If this happened to me in England, I would go back to work in a factory. I know that I would need some time to grow my muscles again, and I know that it is easy to say it in this marvelous flat. Perhaps I could work as a driver or find some other kind of job. If I were threatened by prison or asylum as well, then I would do everything to get out of the country, although I am quite aware that a lot of things may make this decision difficult—to face the drop in standard of living, etc.

Hájek: Would you be able to continue writing about England while living in another country?

Sillitoe: I'm absolutely sure I would. Even after ten or twenty years spent abroad. Actually I lived in Spain from 1952 to 1958 without any contacts with home. And it was there, in Fascist Spain, that I wrote "Saturday Night and Sunday Morning" and part of "Key to the Door." It is a desperate measure, however, for a writer to leave his country. And not all can stand the separation. Dostoevsky kept going abroad; he wrote The Idiot in Florence, and you cannot tell. Turgenev lived outside his country

ARTICULATION

Night.   The winedrinking begins
There must be something arbitrary about who you give your love. So let it be.
Let me go on dreaming floating on her hair.
Honesty is to introduce an instability into an instability.
I am the cloud, floating because I am still objective.
I am the black goat
by the thatched hut.
I am going to go out now into the mud. It is no good thinking it out for yourself.

DAVID RAY

longer and it began to show. Forcible exile is even worse: Bunin was steadily declining. But Gorki suffered as much for staying in Russia: they both deteriorated.

Hájek: Doesn't it also depend on . . .?

Sillitoe: . . . whether the writer comes from a large or a small nation, I know; I evaded this problem as I thought it may embarrass you. Certainly it does. Members of large nations may find it easier to live abroad, as they usually meet with influences of their own culture all over the world. This applies especially to the English. But it is not that simple: the French mostly do not stay abroad; they just travel a lot. A writer can never be safe; I can lose my ability to write in three months wherever I am. What has been very helpful in this respect is a capacity I gained in the factory to not look ahead. Perhaps it is not so good, but it is definitely part of me.

Coffee was getting cold on the simple plywood desk in Alan Sillitoe's study, suggestive of a workbench. We continued to talk for a while about his recent visit to the USSR and then we drank up the coffee and said good-by. Outside, it occurred to me that a man could acquire Sillitoe's feeling about everything being temporary even if he had never worked in a factory.

Book Marks

SARA BLACKBURN

BRUNO'S DREAM. By Iris Murdoch. The Viking Press. 311 pp. $5.75.

In her twelfth novel, Miss Murdoch once again invents a gallery of absurd and grotesque characters, marches them through a series of zany relationships that are wildly improbable, and makes us care intensely about them. The two who stand out here are the title character Bruno and his servant, Nigel. Bruno lies on his deathbed, ancient and deformed by illness, surrounded by the debris and bitterness of his past, and has a final vision of his life and death that is dazzling in its revelation. The mystic, omnisexual Nigel, possessed of powers he chooses to use only in moderation, provides insights into the lives of his fellow characters which grant them dimensions still broader than the considerable ones Miss Murdoch has allowed them to exhibit for themselves. There are at least two other truly memorable characters in this prophetic romp; all have it in common that they are at first pitiful, then hilarious, and finally, somehow, glorious.

CROSSINGS. By Chuang Hua. The Dial Press. 215 pp. $3.95.

Although there is something dreamily engrossing about her novel, Chuang Hua's young Chinese-American heroine is the kind of woman who seems to get consistently and literally beaten up by men, whom she both attracts and maddens by her mysterious and unalloyed passivity. It's all accounted for here in the flashback sequences, which sketch Fourth Jane's childhood as a member of a Chinese family that emigrated to America and continued its tight structure of loving but terrified obeisance to a powerful father; but, background or not, it is hard to care about Fourth Jane as she goes through the dainty, precise, emotionless motions of her affair with her married journalist lover in an unnamed European city. Instead of seeming charged with unreleased emotion, she seems only stunned by a past she can neither absorb nor discard. The descriptions of that past are interesting, but Fourth Jane is not.

TO FIND A MAN. By S. J. Wilson. The Viking Press. 185 pp. $4.95.

This book tries so hard to be a warm-hearted, funny-but-sad Jewish novel, and fails so badly, that it's a phenomenon. During a summer that is to mark the end of their childhood, the hero's beloved friend has need of an abortionist, and he is appointed to find one. All the characters are menschen. Mr. Krumhauf: "Look at it this way. Six million Jews were destroyed. If you married her and she had the baby, well, wouldn't it be like cutting the number to five million, nine hundred and ninety-nine. . . ?" There is a possibility that Mr. Wilson's tale might have made a creditable short story, but he can't decide whether he is Meyer Levin or Bruce Jay Friedman, and he's had to pad out the novel by pages of Broadway-type monologues by other Mr. Krumhaufs, so that it is finally not sad, not funny but only doggedly clever.

THE OTHER SIDE OF THE MOUNTAIN. By Michael Bernanos. Translated from the French by Elaine P. Halperin. Houghton Mifflin Co. 107 pp. $4.95.

What are they talking about? ("A great symbolic novel. . . ." L'Express; "A dark and beautiful exploration of interior landscapes, the craters of the mind." The New York Times.) It is difficult not to wonder what kind of attention this badly written and tedious novel would have received were it not written by the prematurely dead son of Georges Bernanos. Although it comes complete with human cannibalism, man-eating plants and the huge blue eye of a great Someone, the longest and dullest acid dreams on record don't begin to approximate it for boredom. I'm surprised that people who have no trouble making fun of Kahlil Gibran fall back in awe at M. Bernanos' baleful allegories. (Some typical pomposity: "While negotiating the various stages of our journey, we had headed toward an objective that for us could only mean salvation. Having achieved our goal, what would we really discover on the other side?") Audiences who admire either Mount Analogue or 2001 should particularly be warned away.

THEATRE

HAROLD CLURMAN

A prominent London producer's habitual word of praise is "clever." I am never able to tell whether it is an example of English understatement or indicates a reservation. Hadrian VII, Peter Luke's dramatization of Baron Corvo's novel (Helen Hayes Theatre), is a clever play. By this I mean that it possesses more cunning than content, more adroitness than substance. Its skill consists in flattering its audience with a comfortable feeling that what it is seeing is intellectually sharp, humanly perceptive, artistically polished, while in truth it is mostly hokum that employs a great many devices of the middle-class theatre ever since there was one.

The original author, Fr. Rolfe, who wrote under the pen name of Baron Corvo, recounts the story of a man (himself to a large degree) of strong religious conviction who, despite or because of his fanatic devotion to Christian (Catholic) faith, as well as his acerbic forthrightness, has been denied the priesthood he fervently desires. He imagines himself elected Pope—the Hadrian VII of the title—and in that lofty station bringing about extraordinary reformation in Church practices: the most significant (and impossible) being the abandonment by the hierarchy of all its secular interests and possessions. This fantasy is the novel which Rolfe writes while he remains an impecunious painter, photographer and author.

We see Rolfe as a person plagued by doubts about everything, beset by all manner of venial sins, including an aptitude for insult. But he is no hypocrite, he has an alert mind, he is especially talented in the use of language, and he will have no truck with anything but the core of Christian revelation.

The play's message suggests that religion is to be respected even by those who profess none, and that the truly devout are not to be identified with the often shady machinations of the clerical bureaucracy. This "lesson" is one that everybody can noncommittedly approve. It is here couched in well-rounded quips besides being animated by a villainous Irish-Protestant bigot as the antagonist, a shrewdly genial Italian prelate to add local color in splendid cardinal red (that blazes handsomely on the stage) and well-phrased invectives hurled at the myrmidons of the Church. All of this is softened by touches of sentiment on behalf of the humble, the modestly pure in heart, before whom the acidulous Rolfe himself melts to kindness. Every scene is composed of a disguised stereotype.

Though less strenuously stylish, the play is written after a fashion which reminds me of the literary self-congratulation in The Lion in Winter. Hadrian VII may therefore be set down as engaging, entertaining or whatever other encomium conveys an emollient without injurious ingredient. For purposes of publicity, one may go so far as to declare it "one of the best plays of the season," for on Broadway at the moment there is only The Great White Hope and The Man in the Glass Booth to set beside it. In itself the play is what the French characterize as le faux bon—the fake good, the "sophisticated."

Its unquestionable success is Alec McCowen's performance as Rolfe. His acting is a technical triumph. Every reading and intonation is meticulously calculated and hits the designated target of intention perfectly. The observation is sound, the execution precise, the effort tremendous. There is more intelligence than feeling, more craft than personality, more stage experience than experience. I admire the performance—high-grade professionalism is always gratifying—but it is not important acting except by comparison. It is basically dry and thin.

This brings me to a matter of general consideration in regard to the present state of the American theatre. The fact that the two outstanding current performances (apart from that of James Earl Jones in The Great White Hope) are being given by middle-aged English actors—Donald Pleasence and McCowen—is certainly not a matter of national superiority or of innate talent. It occurs because the English theatre provides its actors far more opportunities to act than does the American stage.

This is evident with Julie Harris in Forty Carats, a play from Paris by Jay Allen (Morosco). It is an innocuously smooth little comedy dedicated to the proposition that a man of 45 may marry a girl of 17 and a lady of 42 may marry a youth half her age without damage to any of the parties. It is nicely played by the entire cast and for Miss Harris, beautifully gowned and looking very pretty (I didn't like her third-act hair-do), it is a cinch of natural charm and ease.

Miss Harris is at least as good an actress as Joan Plowright, but while the English actress was playing Ibsen, Chekhov, Shakespeare and Harold Brighouse (Hobson's Choice), Miss Harris appeared in only a few minor movie roles, two near farces, and several television shows. Compare, to continue the parallel, the careers of such highly endowed actors as Alfred Lunt and Fredric March with those of Laurence Olivier, Michael Redgrave or John Gielgud. Marlon Brando, an actor of extraordinary subtlety and power, has done very little with his native capacity, while Paul Scofield, Albert Finney, Peter O'Toole, Alan Bates employ to the utmost their abilities on stage (and screen).

I understand the thoughtless exaggeration of the critical fraternity: we want to keep our theatre going. Thus pleasant shows are constantly greeted by such superlatives as "the best" of the season, of the year, of the decade. I fully expect any day that a review will recommend a show as being the best on the north side of 45th Street. Promises, Promises, a new musical with book by Neil Simon (from Billy Wilder's film The Apartment), music by Burt Bacharach, profits largely by such standards.

Bacharach's score, in particular, has enjoyed a highly favorable press. Its notable lack of good tunes is saved by "rock" noises, supported by conventionally soothing choral harmonies piped in from off-stage. The sentiment of the story is routine, but the permissiveness toward the ugly-vulgar—as in the case of the four elderly married gentlemen who use a minor employee's apartment for their weekly hanky-panky with sundry girls—is made genuine by audience recognition. There are a number of laugh lines, all of which I forgot ten minutes after they had been spoken.

The chorus provides one very cute girl (I'm sorry I can't identify her by name); Jerry Orbach in the lead is remarkable for his honest good will and hard labor; Marian Mercer does a winning bit as a good-humored, bright-witted lady on the loose, and Larry Haines is a practiced comedian of inevitable effect. Everything moves with reassuring dispatch, and a good time may be had by all those who can afford hot-ticket prices. The show is an enormous hit and one can safely call it the best musical on 44th Street—though there is always Hello, Dolly!

At the Forum of the Repertory Theatre of Lincoln Center are two one-act plays by Charles Dizenzo, collectively advertised as An Evening With Merlin Finch. The author takes a dim view of business office routine: it either freezes folk into perpetual foolishness or drives them crazy without liberating them sufficiently to break their bonds. He is even more scathing about middle-class family life, especially as it affects the young. These plays are extravagant farces with some truly merry moments.

Though he hasn't yet achieved the keen edge of Albee's The American Dream, the author may be said to show promise. I suspect that his plays might have been more telling if the director, George Sherman, had not forced the fun so much with raucous tones and breakneck pace, pressing the plays closer to burlesque than to satire. Or were the textual gags too sporadic to give the evening a consistently jocose body?

Some recent Broadway entries which I might have noticed closed too quickly to be worth the space. I mention them here simply to say that the "worst" in our theatre is not as inferior to the "best" as we might suppose from the harsh reviews the former receive. A comedy by Herb Gardner revealed an endearing strain and offered Robert Dishy, an unusually deft young character actor, and deliciously giving Brenda Vaccaro, both of whom afforded pleasure. Dorothy Loudon was really nice in a hapless musical.

KNOW CANADA BETTER!

See world affairs from a different perspective!

Read CANADIAN DIMENSION

Independent, lively, and original.
Canada's leading forum for radical thought.

[illegible] for eight large issues
Write to:

CANADIAN DIMENSION
P.O. Box 1413
Winnipeg 1, Manitoba, Canada

'THE PRESS
AND THE BAY OF PIGS'

A detailed study by

Victor Bernstein and Jesse Gordon

The role played by The Nation in breaking the Bay of Pigs story to the American public, reprinted from the Columbia University Forum.

Single copies—15c; 25 copies at 10c each
Orders over 25 at 7c per copy

THE NATION

333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014

BUY YOUR BOOKS through The Nation

FILMS / Robert Hatch

Grazie Zia, written and directed by the 24-year-old Salvatore Samperi, recalls Fist in His Pocket, the work of another young Italian, Marco Bellocchio, who is best known in this country for China Is Near. The pictures are similar in that they lure the viewer, lightly, with no appreciable pressure, into experiences much more excruciating than he is made ready for by the tone of the pieces. Centuries of fiction have conditioned us to trust that the author will not display a grinning skull without having given the preliminary warning of a thunder clap; we learn to survive life without the protection of portents, but in fiction we depend on them. Both Samperi and Bellocchio are candid about what is going on, but they take advantage of the audience's somewhat arrogant assumption that its expectations will be respected.

The two films are related also by the fact that Lou Castel plays the male lead in both of them. Castel is a commanding and eloquent young actor whose career may be in some peril from the fact that he conveys mental illness so convincingly. Let a handsome young actor play around with psychopathology a couple of times and no audience is going to be happy if he shows up on a third occasion in surgeon's kit or offering to drive the heroine home. Castel is in some danger of being typed.

Alvise, son of a wealthy businessman, is paralyzed from the waist down (or so everyone believes) and confined to a wheel chair. (Castel handles the wheel chair with a dexterity that would please Chaplin.) He is definitely not an object of pity. Bright as hell, and as nasty, he is arrogant, sadistic and cunning. No one can stand him except his aunt (Lisa Gastoni), on whom his self-concerned parents dump him for an extended visit.

The thing to ask yourself as the picture develops is why this aunt is such a striking exception to the chorus of detestation. True, she is a doctor with a strong sense of mission to the underprivileged, but her interest in Alvise does not seem to be predominately professional. One may get a better clue by noting that, though a bright and handsome woman, she has allowed herself for fifteen years to be the mistress of a complacent bore.

I don't want to go into more detail about the effect that Alvise and his zia have on each other, because in abstract the story would seem implausible, designed to shock. In Samperi's quiet, economic, completely sophisticated telling it is not only credible but almost inevitable. It is also, except for its ambience of Italian postwar wealth, wonderfully inventive. For example, reference to Vietnam has become a hallmark of the contemporary Continental film makers; Samperi uses it, however, not to vent moral indignation on the United States but as the avocation of a crook-minded boy.

The events in Grazie Zia are not things that happen every day, but it is more important that they could happen any day. I came from the theatre with that sense of guilt one feels when disaster has built up and overwhelmed a friend right before one's unseeing eyes.

Like most reviewers, I avoid reading other notices, at least until I have written my own, but Godard's Pierrot le Fou left me so blank-minded that I sneaked a few looks. It didn't help much. The consensus seeemed to be that it is a charming, witty and beautiful picture, superbly acted by Jean-Paul Belmondo and Anna Karina. I still don't know what it is about. Of course, it is about love: and about violence, of course. But in what aspects, precisely? And though Belmondo and Miss Karina are delightful of aspect and move like trout, how can one know that they are doing such whopping good jobs unless one knows what the jobs are supposed to be? It is difficult to judge acting in the absence of cause and effect.

When a dwarf is stabbed to death with a pair of scissors in the back of his neck, do we understand this to be funny, chic, socially significant, or plain gratuitous grue? When Belmondo blows himself up at the end, the sticks of dynamite are patently false, but the explosion is real; do we laugh or mourn? Do we, indeed, care about any of these people; are we perhaps being confused into the insensitivity that Godard is said to abhor?

I've been here right along and I know one isn't supposed to ask questions of this sort with respect to Godard; it shows lack of respect. He is a man of great talent who does as he pleases. One thing that pleases him is to insert a lot of printed and written matter into his films; another is to make out-of-context references to the movie archives. These are gadgets, and they don't gain by repetition.

Godard is indeed a brilliant director, we are much in debt to him, and he has earned the right to a degree of self-indulgence. The question is, how much self-indulgence has he earned?

François Truffaut has devised in Stolen Kisses a vaudeville for the natural charm and professional dexterity of Jean-Pierre Leaud. It is a picture stuttering with activity and devoid of content—humorous, well-mannered, amorous, picturesquely Gallic—which reminds me of René Clair in the period of Sous les Toits de Paris and Le Million. I suspect that such productions are intended to increase trans-Atlantic travel, but I don't object as long as they are impertinent without becoming pretentious.

Truffaut and Leaud, with an able supporting cast, could turn out this sort of thing by the acetate mile; it requires ingenuity and energy, but no real invention. Indeed, I suppose from a couple of non sequiturs in the finished print (as from the fact that the American distributor's resumé departs in a number of places from what appears on the screen) that the director was at work with scissors right up to the air-express deadline. Somewhere along the way he also inserted a shadowy figure who emerges at the end to give the tale a "twist." Truffaut was perhaps embarrassed by the innocence of his irresponsible romp (he is, after all, a director of world renown), but the appliquéd significance does not adhere. Except for that, Stolen Kisses is an excellent sleight of hand—chicanery to amuse.

Notice to Subscribers

Because of postal regulations, The Nation's mailing list must be arranged according to Zip Codes. Therefore—with any correspondence about address changes, renewals, etc.—please enclose the address label from your Nation. If you don't have a label, be sure to include your Zip number, and be sure it is correct. Without it, we cannot find your name plate.

The Best Way
To Get
THE NATION

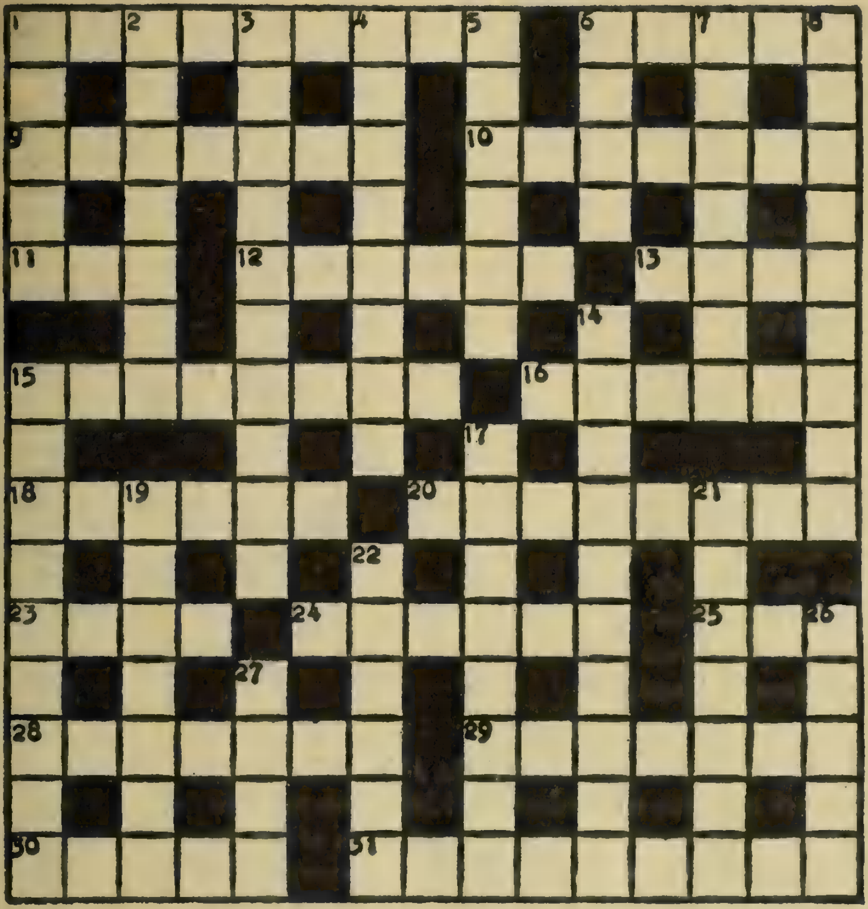
THE NATION 1-27-69
333 Sixth Ave., New York 10014
☐ One Year, $10
☐ Two Years, $18
☐ 6 Months, $6
☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed
(Add $1 per year postage for Canada; $2 foreign)
Name ....
Address ....
City ....
State .... Zip No. ......

Crossword Puzzle No. 1282

FRANK W. LEWIS



ACROSS

1 A teller of what's true can, or make it up. (9)

6 and 23 across Divide and unite, one by one! (9)

9 Police state composer? (7)

10 Its role might be to show what the time-waster does. (7)

11 and 13 Silk fit for those who want to rise to the top. (3,4)

12 Dined in the current fashion, getting ditched in the process. (6)

15 Dislike for what 1 across might have given differently? (8)

16 Franklin and a rather common girl brought to bay? (6)

18 Walker as a novelist? (6)

20 Inclined to be taken out of setting in the studio? (8)

23 See 6 across

24 Block up, shut up, and depress. (6)

25 See 1 down

28 Rust particles, despite internal lubrication, show the character of Virgil. (7)

29 Temporarily took over and gave out the letters. (7)

30 What a labor walk-out might lead to with management. (3-2)

31 Under date of this, with the original state altered. (9)

DOWN

1 and 25 across We might ride in one with stacks to the driver's left. (8)

2 Prisoner in one sort of underground opening within another. (7)

3 They don't exactly strike one as being the neighbor's daughters! (4,6)

4 No evader of trouble would make the effort! (8)

5 A stand-out job of assistance! (6)

6 See 21 down

7 The sound of Victory over the band—really swinging! (7)

8 Seat in colored material—paid for twice?

14 Tear about a foot off at the end, one answers! (10)

15 Material used in America's cities, when not cried over? (9)

17 Paid up with one offspring? Stop! (8)

19 One might be 2 in the service. (7)

21 and 6 down Used for a training cruise? It might pay to be educated! (11)

22 Didn't fail to get handed around. (6)

26 Got in deep? Not very! (5)

27 Project. (4)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1281

ACROSS: 1 Fool's paradise; 9 Leeds; 10 Trousseau; 11 Outdoor; 12 Initial; 13 Twain; 14 Free lance; 16 Handcarts; 18 Hired; 19 Laminar; 22 Endearing; 23 Ogive; 24 Changing times. DOWN: 1 Fall-out shelter; 2 Overtrain; 3 Sassoon; 4 Actor; 5 Atomizers; 6 Instill; 7 Elemi; 8 Bullheadedness; 14 and 21 across For crying out loud; 15 Narcotism; 17 Cantata; 18 Hot-foot; 20 Medoc; 21 Organ.

PERSONALS

BIRTHCHART/HOROSCOPE computed and drafted for reference and display 8½ x 11. Send $5.00, date, time and place of birth. INPROMA, Box 224, Lake View, N. Y. 14085.

MEET YOUR IDEAL MATE. Computerized Dating Service (All Ages). "Let TEAM Make You a Team". For FREE questionnaire write: TEAM Project, [illegible] E 30th St., New York, N.Y. 10016

DISCOVER an intriguing, fun way of meeting literate Jewish singles. FREE literature: OPERATION MAZEL TOV, 663 Fifth Avenue, N. Y. C. 10022.

WRITERS IN DESPAIR? Publishers reader-editor analyses, revises fiction, non-fiction. Including French. Box #621, c/o The Nation.

SOCK IT TO ME—over 225 other underground buttons. 1/25c, 5/$1, 50/$5, 125/$10 and 1,000/$75. Bumperstickers, beads and peace jewelry, too. Free catalogue to all! Free sample to stores. A BIG-LITTLE STORE, 1077 Mission, San Francisco, Calif. 94103.

KENNEDY '72—buttons 4/$1.00—bumperstickers 4/$1.00. Drum, Box 609-N, Fairfield, Conn. 06430.

RECORDS

FREE 40 PAGE CATALOG offers hundreds of recordings of rare Renaissance, Baroque and Classical music. Some records priced as low as $1.00 each! All late recordings in stereo only. MHS RECORDS, Box 932 NA, New York, N. Y. 10023.

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, ALgonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

PUBLICATIONS

BOOKS LOCATED on any subject. Extensive Search Service. Satisfaction guaranteed. Hoffman Research Service, 124-N Whitmore Road, Irwin, Pa. 15642.

DISPATCH breaks imperialistic traditions of reportage from Vietnam, other Asian countries; poem-letter by Hanoi negotiator Le Duc Tho; interviews with Buddhist, student militants, clandestine peace movement documents. 52 issues $10, 25-$5. Box 49986, Los Angeles, CA. 90049.

The Nation

BOOK SERVICE

Offers the following at a discount:

☐ VIETNAM FOLLY by Sen. Ernest Gruening and Herbert W. Beaser (National Press, $8.95) $7.16

☐ FRIENDSHIP AND FRATRICIDE by Meyer A. Zeligs (Viking, $8.95) $7.16

☐ THE GOODBYE LAND by Jose Yglesias (Pantheon, $4.95) $3.96

Remittance accompanying orders should be made payable to THE NATION, 333 6th Ave., N.Y. 10014

Readers can avail themselves of our regular offer to send them any book (except paperbacks), published in the U.S. at the retail price post-free. When ordering, please give title, author and publisher.

1-27-69

‘History will absolve me.’

With these words, a young lawyer closed his self-defense.

The scene: a secret trial in a hospital-turned-courtroom in Santiago de Cuba, October, 1953. The charge: insurrection against the state—the July 26th attack on the Moncada Barracks. The young lawyer: Dr. Fidel Castro, son of a prosperous sugar planter, Congressional candidate in the 1952 elections and leader of the Moncada attack.

What was the thinking of the man who commanded the July 26th attack, initiating the movement which led Cuba to freedom in 1959? In his passionate five-hour speech, defending not only himself but his comrades who were captured, tortured and murdered by the regime, Fidel Castro denounced the tyranny and unconstitutionality of the Batista dictatorship, the complicity of the oligarchy, and the cowardliness of the courts. He outlined a program of social reform which was later implemented and developed by the revolutionary government. And he presented a legal case for the rights of a people to take arms against an illegitimate government.

We will send you an annotated copy of this important historical document if you enter a new one-year subscription to The NATION. Join us now.

The good fight is now in THE NATION —Why not join now?

THE NATION 333 Sixth Avenue New York, N.Y. 10014

☐ I'll join you for 1 year (48 issues). I enclose $10 and understand you'll send me free HISTORY WILL ABSOLVE ME by Fidel Castro.

☐ I'll try you for [illegible] months (24 issues). I enclose $6.

(Add [illegible] per year postage for Canada and Mexico; $2 other foreign)

Name ....

Street ....

City .... State .... Zip ....

N1-27

BURLINGAME
FEB 1 1969
LIBRARY

HAWAII WILLIAM L. ABBOTT

THE NATION

FEBRUARY 3, 1969 35 cents

5-69R PL-5537
BURLINGAME PUBLIC
LIBRARY
BURLINGAME CA 94010

Nixon's Seventh Crisis

Diplomats in Disarray

SMITH SIMPSON

The Urgent East

SHORT FUSE IN JAPAN

ALBERT AXELBANK

The Crossroads of Jerusalem

HERBERT KROSNEY

Orwell in His Own Image PETER CLECAK

'Harlem on My Mind' LAWRENCE ALLOWAY

LETTERS

Maddox and the press

Atlanta, Ga.

DEAR SIRS: Arlie Schardt ["Crisis of The Constitution," The Nation, Dec. 23], reporting on "that zany 1966 gubernatorial race" which gave us Lester Maddox, asserted: "When dissatisfaction with the winners of both party primaries spurred a write-in movement for former Gov. Ellis Arnall, backers of Write-In Georgia (WIG) were thrashed by the Journal political editor Charles Pou, who referred to them in his news stories as the 'backbite vote.'"

I don't recall "thrashing" anybody, but I did try to tell in several columns, and quoting knowledgeable people in news stories, what I thought was going to happen. No one told me what to write. And the closest I came to brutalizing, I guess, was in an Oct. 17 Sunday column when I implied there used to be some mighty ignorant people in the Georgia legislature, added hopefully that the lawmakers had improved some, then commented: "The Georgia General Assembly is not the place to elect a Georgia governor. . . ."

The Atlanta Constitution and the Atlanta Journal had endorsed Governor Arnall, a great World War II governor, in the Democratic primary, but Maddox, with the help of some Republican cross-overing, which I reported was going on and likely was going to backfire, won in the Democratic primary. Bruce Galphin, author of The Riddle of Lester Maddox, tells how it was: "In addition to the Democratic enemies ganging up on Arnall, there also were campaigns among some Republicans to cross over into the Democratic primary to help Maddox in the belief he would be easier for Callaway to beat. As early as August, Atlanta Journal political editor Charles Pou warned: 'He who helps Lester may ride a tiger.'"

Then came the write-in movement for defeated candidate Arnall. . . . In the general election on Nov. 8, Callaway edged Maddox 450,387 to 448,259; the Arnall write-in got 57,834, or 6.1 per cent. That meant no one had received a clear majority and, under ancient Georgia law, the rural-run and something like 10-to-1 Democrat-weighted General Assembly would have to choose between the two top men. Result: Lester Maddox. . . .

Charles Pou

New York City

DEAR SIRS: The Atlanta newspapers had every right to say anything they pleased about WIG in their editorials, but this does not justify the way in which they consistently underplayed and even ignored legitimate WIG stories in their news columns. (Indeed, they went even further. One ad which WIG sought to place in the Sunday Journal-Constitution was so severely censored that WIG withdrew it altogether.)

Arlie Schardt

myth or dream?

Larchmont, N. Y.

DEAR SIRS: Your editorial of Jan. 13 ["Myths in the Middle East"] cited various myths listed in Charles Yost's article in The Atlantic about the situation in the Middle East, but overlooked the greatest myth of all—or may one hopefully call it a "dream"?

Agreed settlements and international guarantees have not as yet proved capable of protecting any nation, large or small, or any ethnic, economic, religious group in its right to mere basic survival. Shall Israel be a test case as to whether the millennium has arrived?

Was the UN able to defend the Arabs of Palestine (in 1947 and 1948) against invasion and take-over by Transjordan and Egypt (as well as by Lebanon and Syria in

(Continued on page 149)

EDITORIALS

The Inaugural

There is little point in attempting to guess how much of what President Nixon said in his inaugural address he really believes. He probably does not know himself. But we may be sure that in his view the directions and approaches indicated constitute sound politics, and as a political manifesto the address is reassuring. The overall theme was peace, emphasized at the beginning, in the middle and at the end; and affirmed, so to speak, on two Bibles. "For the first time, because the people of the world want peace and the leaders of the world are afraid of war, the times are on the side of peace." The political thrust is clear: the time has come to move beyond the stalemate in the cold war. Confrontations must be succeeded by negotiations. We need to lower our voices, not merely to encourage a more relevant dialogue at home but so that the Russians and the Chinese just might ponder our words, the better to assess our intentions.

The President had understanding words to say about the younger generation: "more committed, more passionately driven by conscience than any generation in our history." He readily acknowledged the existence of a crisis in values which his predecessor could never identify. On civil rights, he said that the laws have finally caught up with our conscience and that the need in future is to give life to the law. In these and other respects he raised a standard to which men of good will, in all their diversity, can repair. But he also set the standard by which he should be judged. The fact that he has presented the country with a good political script should now enable its citizens to concentrate on the performance.

In some respects the address was significant for what the President did not say. He engaged in no saber rattling. He did not mouth cold-war rhetoric. He did not attempt a self-righteous justification of the war in Vietnam. He refrained from holding forth on "law and order." He was chary of gestures and promises. It should be noted, also, that he said nothing about disarmament; military spending will no doubt increase. Nor did he have any words for the United Nations, an omission which perhaps foreshadows an emphasis on bilateral negotiations and "patient and prolonged diplomacy."

From the President's point of view, the address is politically astute. He has made what may well be a shrewd assessment of the mood currently prevailing in white middle-class America, namely a desire for peace, quiet and more "affluence." But sensing a dominant mood is one thing; turning it to good account, making it serve stated political objectives, is something else again. The mood may shift, it may evaporate, it may be impossible to sustain. For the time being, however, Mr. Nixon is probably right to think that current attitudes will support the kind of politics he has in mind: an end to the war in Vietnam, avoidance of similar "brush fire" wars in the future, and a more prudent allocation of resources.

In general, we found the address reassuring and were pleased to note that the President avoided saying some of the things he has been saying these many years and that he repeated throughout the campaign. In particular we were glad to hear his "sacred commitment" to consecrate his office, his energies, and all the wisdom he can summon to the cause of peace. Inaugurals—including this one—should not be accepted as the gospel writ large but neither should they be viewed with total cynicism. They are to be read and studied and kept on file, the better to remind a President who has charted a course of the course which he has charted. We intend to keep this address at hand and will no doubt find occasion to quote from it from time to time.

DEC 9

Circulating Elite

According to Stewart Alsop, only four men hold real power in Washington: the President, the Secretary of State, the Secretary of Defense and, in the Johnson administration, Walt Rostow who, as a kind of civilian field marshal, largely ran the Vietnamese War from the White House cellar. While Rostow was a special case, it is striking to what extent government power resides in a small group of men who come and go among the great foundations, the prestigious universities, the blue-chip corporations and the key posts in Washington. In the aggregate, they constitute a privileged elite, protected against the occupational hazard of the spoils system by informal arrangements which insure that they shall not want as they move into and out of the government.

Dean Rusk went from secondary posts at the State Department to the presidency of the Rockefeller Foundation, then back to Washington as Secretary of State, and now once more to Rockefeller as its first—but we may be sure not the last—Distinguished Fellow, a post which carries "a very comfortable stipend." Mr. Rusk will obviously be on call for future assignments. Daniel Moynihan served in the Kennedy and Johnson administrations and then took what might be called a "reverse sabbatical" at Harvard until pressed into service by President Nixon. McGeorge Bundy, a "crisis manager," is proceeding on the VIP circuit from Harvard to Washington to the Ford Foundation. The latter, which has a policy of seeking to "ease the transition" from public to private life—and, presumably, of expediting the return to public life—offered generous grants to various members of the staff of the late Sen. Robert Kennedy.

It is, of course, humane to provide for this "government in exile," and the interests of governmental efficiency may be served by having such a pool of talent to tap. But it is possible that the circulating elite may become ingrown, and that the interim assignments arranged for its members may not always be the best preparation for their return to power. Tours of duty as merchant seamen might, for example, better sharpen their perception of social realities.

Some time back, The Wall Street Journal suggested that the Nixon Administration was likely to "change elites." "In impression, if not always in fact," the Journal commented, "the men running the nation under the Democrats have been vaguely intellectual in outlook, Eastern in origin, Ivy League in social and cultural tastes. While

IN THIS ISSUE

February 3, 1969

EDITORIALS

130

ARTICLES

134 The Crossroads of Jerusalem Herbert Krosney

138 Nixon's Seventh Crisis: Diplomats in Disarray Smith Simpson

141 The Urgent East: Short Fuse in Japan Albert Axelbank

144 Jet-Age Diversions: World Law and the Hijackers Karl M. Ruppenthal

146 Hawaiian Nationalists: Trapped in a Mystique William L. Abbott

BOOKS & THE ARTS

150 In His Own Image Peter Clecak
153 Path to Total Destruction Norman L. Parks
154 Yiddish Poets in Translation (David Hofstein, Laser Wolf, Mani Leib) Nathan Halper
156 Art Lawrence Alloway
156 The Return (poem) Stephen Parker
157 Theatre Harold Clurman
159 Crossword Puzzle Frank W. Lewis

Publisher
JAMES J. STORROW JR.

Associate Publisher
GIFFORD PHILLIPS

Editor
CAREY McWILLIAMS

Associate Editor
PHIL KERBY

Executive Editor
ROBERT HATCH

Literary Editor
HELEN YGLESIAS

Copy Editor, MARION HESS; Poetry Editor, JOHN LOGAN; Theatre, HAROLD CLURMAN; Art, MAX KOZLOFF; Music, BENJAMIN BORETZ; Science, CARL DREHER; Advertising Manager MARY SIMON.

Editorial Associate, ERNEST GRUENING

Washington, ROBERT G. SHERRILL; Paris, ALEXANDER WERTH; London, RAYMOND WILLIAMS; Bonn, C. AMERY; Canberra, C. P. FITZGERALD; United Nations, ANNE TUCKERMAN.

The Nation is published weekly (except for omission of four summer issues) by the Nation Magazine Company and copyright 1969 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014, Tel: CH 2-8400 West Coast office (for editorial correspondence only); 825 South Barrington Avenue Los Angeles, Calif. 90049. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. and at additional mailing office.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Add $1 per year postage for Canada and Mexico; $2 other foreign.

Change of Address: It is essential that subscribers ordering a change of address give five weeks' notice and provide their old as well as their new address. Please give Zip Code numbers for both addresses.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Book Review Index and the Public Affairs Information Service.

NATION Volume 208
No. 5

there is much to admire in this cosmopolitan group, it is by no means the only source of ability." But in practice the Nixon Administration may find that there is no other elite. The big aggregates of power—public, private and quasi-private—are so interlocked today that the circulating celebrities have a near monopoly on certain posts. Political flip-flops do not disturb them. Their chances of returning to Washington sooner or later are good, and in the meantime they have no need to fret. There are, of course, exceptions. Walt Rostow, for example, may prove to be a permanent "dropout." When he was not invited back to Boston from Washington, he may have lost the chance of returning to the government; the chain was broken. But then he has his new post in Austin for consolation.

In Worth County

Worth County is in Georgia, and its political make-up is reflected by the vote it cast on November 5: Wallace, 3,049; Humphrey, 719; Nixon, 602. Mr. Nixon's campaign statement, indicating that enforcement of the federal laws against school segregation would be watered down if he were elected, did not help him much in Worth County. But in such areas it is bound to lead to intensified defiance of the law, and with the Negroes less disposed to accept abuse meekly, there will be trouble.

What Mr. Nixon said was that the Civil Rights Act of 1964 prohibited segregation and he supported the law, but it did not necessarily call for affirmative action to achieve integration. Even as a bid for votes during a hotly fought campaign, this takes the prize for double talk. But it was just what they wanted to hear in the Deep South. According to a spokesman for the Department of Health, Education and Welfare, out of 192 school districts in Georgia, federal aid has already been terminated in thirty-two districts and seventy-nine others are not in compliance with the guidelines. Thus almost 58 per cent are not complying. Worth County is one of them. Because it wanted federal aid (what school district does not?), it filed a plan that conformed with desegregation requirements. But last fall, when Wallace began campaigning in jackboots and Nixon was hinting that he would evade the intent of the law, the die-hard segregationists took hope again and Worth's integration proposal was withdrawn.

The outlook for the future in such localities is indicated by the way Negro children of Worth County are treated when they are permitted to attend school with whites. In the Los Angeles Times Jack Nelson reports on the case of two sisters, Yvonne Denice Young, 11, and Dorothy Bell Young, 14, who were accused of using "obscene" language at school in altercations with white students and teachers. Samples of the offensive language were "damn," "goddamn," "bastard" and "ass." At about noon on December 4, a deputy sheriff, acting on orders of Superior Court Judge J. Bowie Gray, arrested the girls at school in Sylvester, the county seat, and took them to a juvenile detention home at Albany, 20 miles away. The parents were not told where the girls were until 1 P.M. the following day. Judge Gray acknowledged that this was "unfortunate" but then detained the girls for six more days, placed the younger on probation and ordered the older girl confined to a state "training" school. Neither girl had a juvenile record. Their brother, who was 6 years old when the Supreme Court decided Brown v. Board of Education in 1954, graduated from an all-Negro school, served in Vietnam and was wounded in action.

The underlying pattern is plain. Once again local authorities have acted in a manner calculated to toughen resistance and provoke trouble. The basic cause of an incident like that of the Young children is that integration has not been carried out—as the school experience of their brother attests—"with all deliberate speed." And by his campaign statements President Nixon encouraged further resistance on the part of local Southern school districts. What his subordinates now do in situations of this kind will determine what he meant when he said in his inaugural address that, the laws having caught up with our conscience, all that remains to do is to give life to what is in the law. Worth County would be a good place to start.

Mississippi Muzzle

Greenville, Miss.

Freedom of speech on Mississippi campuses has been stifled in recent years by a strange set of regulations which guarded the students from speakers who might "do violence to the academic atmosphere," who were held in "disrepute," or who had been merely charged (no conviction was necessary) with a crime or "moral wrongdoing." Also outlawed were all political candidates or talks on behalf of candidates.

The policy has been selectively enforced by the state's college board—composed of political appointees and dominated by conservatives—through repeated bans against black speakers at the University of Mississippi and Mississippi State.

The latest victim was Charles Evers, long a leader with the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People and now national committeeman for the new Democratic Party in Mississippi. The board denied Evers permission to speak to Young Democrat chapters at both campuses during the Presidential campaign. It had earlier tried to block NAACP president Aaron Henry, who doubles as head of the loyalist Democrats, from campus appearances.

Federal injunctions were obtained to enable both men to speak. Carrying the issue still further, Evers' sponsors set up a court challenge of the policy, and on January 14 a federal three-judge panel threw out the rules governing campus speakers as "unconstitutionally vague." The decision came after the regulations had been defended by 73-year-old college board chairman M. M. Roberts in a performance which left skeptical even presiding Judge J. P. Coleman of the U. S. Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals, a former Governor of Mississippi.

"We had in mind," Roberts told the court, when explaining a section of the guidelines, "a sex expert in New York and that religious Pike fellow on the West Coast." He contended that speeches by Evers and Henry would "do violence to the attitudes of the fathers and mothers who send their children to school." Evers, a moderate who has cooled several explosive situations in the state, was called a "destructive influence." An appealed conviction connected with a questionable morals charge was cited against Henry.

Carrying the offensive against the college board were three young white lawyers, all alumni of Ole Miss, who claimed not only an abridgment of First Amendment rights but invidious application of the policy. A score of witnesses, including professors and students, were prepared to document numerous instances when white politicians had appeared on campus with the sanction of the college board. Their testimony was not necessary, since the regulations were invalidated after opening arguments. Roberts, acting as counsel for his board, proved his own worst enemy.

The court did not, however, strike down the control of the college board. Its order gives the board sixty days to draw up a new, more specific, list of rules governing speakers. University liberals, feeling that they have opened a chink in "the closed society," can only hope that the revised policy will be less restrictive. They have no assurances, except that another judicial review will be held this spring. CURTIS WILKIE

Trouble Ahead for Franco

Inspired by the example of one of our eminent contemporaries, toward the end of 1968 we thought of memorializing the "Event of the Year," and chose Czechoslovakia and the Czech resistance to the Russian invasion. While it is a bit early to make such a choice for 1969, it just might turn out to be Spain.

The signs all point to trouble for Franco. It is time. A new generation has come along since the disastrous Civil War, in which Hitler and Mussolini intervened on Franco's side and prepared for World War II. Much has happened, and Franco has accumulated a formidable collection of enemies, though he still has some friends—the police and the military; who else?

Certainly not the intellectuals, and in Spain as in many other countries they are becoming bolder and more powerful. Some 1,200 professional men, intellectuals and artists recently delivered to the Ministry of Government, which has jurisdiction over the police, 31 pages of testimony about police mistreatment of political prisoners. Even a year ago such a remonstrance would hardly have been conceivable.

Made indignant by the death of a student in police custody, nearly 2,000 Madrid students engaged in a silent march, carrying posters that charged the police with murder. Rock throwing and fist fights broke out, and the students gave as good as they took. Police fired shots into the air when one of their fifty jeeps was surrounded. In Barcelona extremist students ransacked the office of the university rector and tried to throw him out the window.

According to George Melloan, who has been investigating the situation for The Wall Street Journal, many priests are worried about the waning influence of the Church upon the traditionally religious Spanish working class. Workers tend increasingly to identify the Church hierarchy with the Franco regime and, striving to mend the rift, some priests do not hesitate to buck the regime and their bishops.

These priests make common cause with illegal workers' committees, which are trying to supersede Franco's authorized workers' organizations and which, judging by the number of arrests, have Franco worried. This worker movement is now on a national scale. At first glance it seems odd, but management in many plants is willing to deal with the committees. Melloan quotes a personnel man at a synthetic textile plant: "That is the heart of the plant," he said, pointing to a fiber-drawing machine that runs twenty-four hours a day. "If it is down ten minutes it can knock a hole in profits. I have to know what is in the minds of the men who run it. The official syndicates don't have a clue. The workers repudiate them. So I have to go behind their backs and deal with the workers' committee, which does know."

Then there are picturesque individuals like Isabel Luisa Alvarez de Toledo y Maura, twenty-first Duchess of Medina-Sidonia. She is spending a year in jail for agitating among dispossessed farmers, bankrupt fishermen and jailed workers. An attractive 32-year-old brunette with three young children, but separated from her husband, she had her lawyer ask in court: "What is a duchess for, if not to defend the poor? A duchess must be good for something besides going to charity teas."

In the December 28 New York Times Richard Eder recounts some half-comical stories about this remarkable woman. When a policeman was taking her to jail, she made scenes in inns, and when the officer begged her to be quiet she snapped: "Do you imagine I want people to think I am traveling with you because I like you?" At the Almería jail she made the prison hop with her demands. Franco probably does not find her funny at all.

Salud

It means "health" in Spanish and is the name Dr. David Brooks and his wife have given to the medical clinic they established in Woodville, Calif. (See "Medical Storm Center" by Ronald B. Taylor, The Nation, January 6.)

Salud won a significant court victory in Visalia recently, when Superior Judge Leonard Ginsburg ruled that hospitals supported by tax moneys may not discriminate against poor people in their admission policies. The suit was brought as a class action by a patient of Dr. Brooks, Eluterio P. Loredo, after he had been refused admission to a local hospital because his bills were to be paid by MediCal, the federal-state health program for the poor which has some 200,000 clients in California. According to the Salud release, the court's decision should have the effect of "desegregating" many hospitals which have made a practice of denying their beds to welfare recipients, who were often sent to distant and overcrowded county hospitals, thus defeating the goal of the federal-state health insurance program, which is to end class discrimination in hospital admissions by removing economic barriers.

One effect of hospital policy, as Dr. Brooks explains it, has been to deny continuity of care to indigent patients. "The physician," he says, "would care for the welfare patient in his office, but the local hospital board's policy kept him from admitting this class of patient for in-patient services. The physician then had no choice except to refer the patient to a county facility and a different physician." So much for the personal doctor-patient relationship which is so dear to the heart of the AMA.

Gary Bellows of Los Angeles, Mr. Loredo's lawyer, says that the court's decision "states clearly that the sick have a right to be treated in their own community hospital, regardless of whether the patient, the government, or a private insurance carrier pays the bill." The fight for equal health care for all citizens is far from over, but Dr. Brooks and the people he is trying to help have won a victory along the way.

Un-un-American Activities

Though not every legislative Red hunter has turned out to have had an impoverished view of political ethics, so many of them have suffered from this weakness that the correlation is worth noting. One recalls, for example, J. Parnell Thomas, who served a term in Danbury Prison, and other High Executioners of low standards.

For longer than one cares to remember, Sen. Hugh Burns—Democrat, Fresno County, president pro tem of the California Senate—has been chairman of California's Un-American Activities Committee. Recently, Robert Fairbanks of the Los Angeles Times discovered that Senator Burns and two associates had sold for $500,000 profit an insurance company they had organized five years earlier. The company had no office; it had no staff. In 1966 its total telephone and postage bill was $2.80. One of the associates of Senator Burns in the enterprise was permitted to use "extra space" in a room maintained by the State Senate Committee on Un-American Activities. Most of the profit from the sale came from insurance companies that had benefited greatly from legislation which Senator Burns helped enact.

The Senator, who has applied the whip to many an erring dissenter and for years has lectured the people of his state on their patriotic responsibilities, sees nothing "legally or ethically" improper in what he did. Nor, apparently, do his colleagues. Mr. Fairbanks reports that "members of the Joint Legislative Ethics Committee are not falling over themselves to become involved in the controversy surrounding Senate leader Hugh Burns."

Another Californian, Ambrose Bierce, in his The Devil's Dictionary, thus defined patriotism: "In Dr. Johnson's famous dictionary patriotism is defined as the last resort of a scoundrel. With all due respect to an enlightened but inferior lexicographer, I beg to submit that it is the first."

THE CROSSROADS OF JERUSALEM

HERBERT KROSNEY

Mr. Krosney, a frequent contributor to The Nation, is based in Jerusalem as head of documentaries for Israel Television. A former producer with National Educational Television, he is also the author of Beyond Welfare: Poverty in the Supercity (Holt, Rinehart & Winston).

Jerusalem

There's a narcotic in the air of Jerusalem. Some say it is the hashish which comes across from the West Bank at very cheap prices. A few believe it is the political tension, which occasionally blows in as an ill wind, seems to disappear, but is always lurking somewhere, ignored for the most part by the city's residents. But I think it is the city itself; a magnificent city, set high in the north of the Judean hills on a ridge that dominates the Dead Sea, the lowest spot on earth. That sea is part of the Great Rift, a valley that begins in and around Lake Nyasa, near the southern tip of Africa, and stretches to the Toros Mountains of Turkey in the north; it is one of the world's great geographical phenomena. Mankind associates height with spirituality; and Jerusalem is near the summit of the Great Rift.

The city is gray-brown, built on a rough-hewn stone. Only within, in hidden corners, does one sense any luxury of vegetation. Its winters, and it is winter now, can be cool and damp; but a bright day will bring warmth because the sun beats down on Jerusalem with penetrating clarity. One can see for miles on almost any day; the quality of light is extraordinary. I think it is this quality of the light that makes the city so special.

The old-time view, of course, is that Jerusalem is the center of the world. From it stemmed the three great religions, springing from the single Hebrew root, but blossoming in different manifestations of monotheism. For Jews, the city is David's, and it is the historic capital of the nation. For Christians, it is of central importance in the disputes which led to Jesus' death and the site of that death itself. For Muslims, it is the point from which Muhammed, in his night of fancy, ascended to heaven—from that very same rock where Abraham was almost made to sacrifice Isaac and which was supposedly the inner sanctum of the Jewish temples. The beautiful mosque called the Dome of the Rock stands quite deliberately on the place where the Second Temple stood. Muslims believe that thus their prophet's message gained a symbolic supremacy over all the faiths that preceded it.

Geographically, as well as spiritually, Jerusalem was believed to be at the center of the world. It was a crossroads on the trade routes for Asia, Africa and Europe—the known world. Once a crossroads, and now, once more a crossroads for Israel. And because of the conflicting claims about it, a city which is again at the center of world attention.

Each morning, beginning at 7:30, the traffic starts to pile up at the corner of Gaza and Benjamin of Tudela Streets. And every morning, between 6:30 and 9, hundreds of Arab workers from East Jerusalem flow across the old boundaries to their jobs in West Jerusalem. Shops on both sides of town display the most modern Israeli goods. Intra-city bus lines clog the roads; the thick, noxious fumes of the buses dissolve in the Jerusalem wind. Bus services connect the city with all points in the country, from Haifa to Hebron. And many of the Arab taxis promise even more—a trip to Amman across the Allenby Bridge, and from there to Damascus, Baghdad, Beirut, Kuwait.

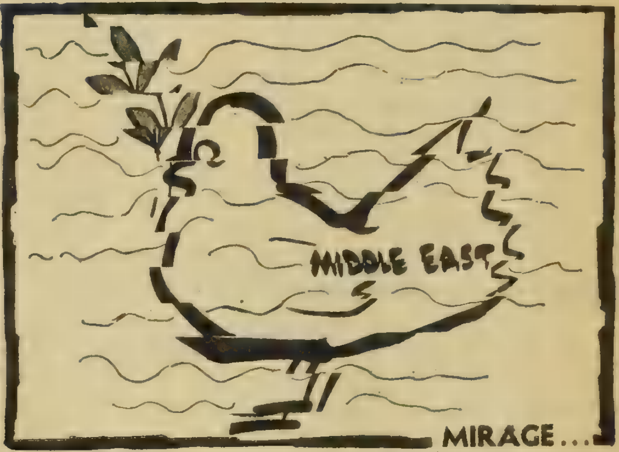
Crowded buses fall silent as riders listen to the Voice of Israel's hourly bulletins, but the news of the day does not affect the city's life. Arab guns can bombard Israeli positions 25 miles east in Jericho, or Israeli jets can streak for Jordan, to hit Irbud or Iraqi or Fatah positions on the hills; in Jerusalem, normal life continues.

The city's main problems have little to do with war; much more to do with the fact that, before June, 1967, both sides of the then divided city were little more than large villages. Today, the cosmopolitan Jerusalem of pre-1948 is again a reality. Government offices have moved to Jerusalem since the Six Day War; these, the new television service, and the increased number of students have brought additional thousands to the city. Housing is limited, so not only the traffic but also the rents are skyrocketing.

Yet the war tension is here. Big news, like the Arab attempts to hijack or destroy El Al airliners, or the Israeli retaliation at Beirut Airport, is quickly passed from mouth to mouth. The sound of the city is punctuated with blasts from construction work, and people have learned to ignore them. But an unusually noisy explosion brings people into the street by the hundreds. The other day, an Israeli jet broke the sound barrier over Jerusalem and one could not be certain that it was not Egyptian jets, or a rare success for El Fatah. Mayor Teddy Kollek quickly telephoned the Air Force and announced to the press: "Never again. That's settled. The Air Force won't break the sonic barrier over Jerusalem again."

The scars of war are few. The eastern side of town is dotted with stone monuments at the points where fell Israeli paratroopers and reservists who made the historic breakthrough to the east. Recently, Mayor Kollek honored a request of the Muslims to erect several similar monuments for the Legionnaires who had died bravely (and they did fight well) defending the then Jordanian territory. A minor controversy developed when the agreement became public, but it centered as much on the wording of the Muslim remembrance as on their presence. The inscription would read approximately: "Brave Soldier X died fighting for Allah." Kollek got assurances that the wording was nonpolitical and did not imply that the 1967 war was a jihad, or Muslim holy war. The Knesset refused to touch the small but quite hot potato, saying it was an affair of the municipality. Kollek prevailed in his civilized gesture. One wonders whether monuments to "brave North Vietnamese soldiers," or Vietcong, could ever be erected in the downtown streets of Saigon or Washington.

Tension in Jerusalem is beneath a peaceful surface. This is a bi-cultural, bi-national city in which two populations live in 99 per cent peace. A woman can walk alone at night on either side of town. One has the feeling that Jerusalemites, left alone, could solve their own problems. The economic contact between the two populations has become substantial. Socially, there is contact only on the fringes, and it is a fact that neither side wants substantially more. Why should they? The pressure here is not toward the integration of two disparate peoples but toward the hope that the two peoples can permit each other's individuality—if not nationality—to flourish in the same land, the same city, at the same time.



Myers, Evening News (London)

The Israeli position about the city is clear: Jerusalem is once again the capital of the Jewish nation and it shall always remain so. The whole of Jerusalem fell into Israel's hands through the stupidity of King Hussein, who ordered his Legionnaires to fire on civilian targets in Jewish Jerusalem. There is now no inclination to leniency on the Jewish side. Having for the last twenty years been denied access to the holiest spot in the Jewish religion, the Wailing Wall, by purposeful Jordanian abrogation of agreements, the Jews are in no mind to give back what was won with blood.

I have not met one Israeli who is for redividing the city. I have met none who favors "internationalizing" the entire city. Some believe that a peace settlement could mean a sharing of tax revenues with the Jordanians, and thus there could be some kind of secondary political status for the Hashemite Kingdom. A few see Jerusalem as the bi-capital of the two nations, Arab and Jewish, that inhabit the land of historic Israel, or Palestine; that is a possibility. Almost everyone agrees that the Christian and Muslim holy places should be under Christian and Muslim rule and that these particular spots should be internationalized. A few would accept some kind of internationalization for the Old City—not all of Eastern Jerusalem—so long as there is free access for everybody to Jerusalem as a whole.

Israelis have a habit of establishing facts to buttress ideological arguments. In the case of Jerusalem, the facts include settlements in and around Ammunition Hill, to the north of the city on the road to Ramallah; the refurbishing and reopening of Hebrew University on its breathtaking Mount Scopus campus; the reconstruction of the Jewish quarter in the Old City, dismantled by the Arabs in the years since 1948; plans for the national police headquarters which will be built on the eastern side of town, and for construction of homes and offices in the old "no-man's land" which divided the city.

The position of Arab Jerusalemites is more complicated. Almost all I have talked with favor a united city with free access for both sides. But, of course, the Arabs want self-rule and they refuse to be integrated into Israeli politics or cut off from their brethren in the wider Arab world. Arabs in Jerusalem, however, are a cosmopolitan people and it is not quite accurate to think of them as one community, or even, perhaps, as Arabs. More specifically, they are a series of religious and, to some degree, ethnic communities: the Roman Catholic, the Armenian, the Greek and Greek Orthodox, the Muslim. Until World War I, Jerusalemites referred to themselves as "Syrians" to distinguish themselves from the Arabs whom we refer to today as Bedouins and who lived in the Negev, the Sinai and on the other side of the Jordan.

Three families—the Husseinis, the Noshashibis and the Khaldis—have dominated the city for hundreds of years, each family backed at various times by outside rulers of the cities. The Husseinis, for instance, a comparatively new family, at the time, were chosen by the Turks more than a century ago to be "their" leaders; the Turks educated their sons in Constantinople and let them run Jerusalem. The British chose the Noshashibi family to be a counterweight to the Husseinis, especially after the performance of one Husseini who, upon becoming the Grand Mufti, both rallied the Arabs against the Zionists and tried to establish links with Hitler.

Palestinians cannot hide their disdain for their less educated fellows across the river. When I came one day to pick up my car at my East Jerusalem garage, all the workers were gathered around the radio. "Hussein is speaking," they told me. I asked a mechanic, a small, bouncy, smiling chap I had come to know quite well, what had happened. He said with a shy smile, "They're fighting in Amman." It was the day when the Legion and the terrorists squared off, with Hussein hoping to put an end to unauthorized terrorist activity. The mechanic continued: "They're fighting the Bedouins." The contempt in the word "Bedouin" was evident. I hesitated to ask for a more explicit expression of his political views because of the number of other garage workers around the radio—also because his Arab politeness would most likely have told me nothing more at that moment. However, I had talked with the mechanic previously, and he had indirectly expressed a preference for the economic—though not political—integration of the city. The reason is obvious: he wants to make the wages that good mechanics get on the western, or Jewish, side of town. He had been offered a job there, but couldn't take it because he wasn't officially a Jerusalem resident. He had been in his home town of Taibye when the Israeli census of the new territories was undertaken after the Six Day War, and was classified as a resident of the West Bank. (Jerusalemites are considered potential Israeli citizens; West Bank residents are formally under military occupation and law.) He had applied for a change in his card and hoped to get it within a few months. Meanwhile, like most Arabs—and other heads of families throughout the world—his main concern was supporting his family at the highest possible level.

The Israelis hope that this economic force—the equalizing of salaries, the improvement of living standards, the introduction of health and other social services—will be the decisive factor in inducing Arabs to accept Israeli political rule. Arabs are naturally wary about the high Israeli taxes which accompany social welfare and national defense, and they have been able to bargain themselves a nearly total exemption from income taxes for several years. I think this economic approach has a chance only if the outside political factors can be minimized; that is, if the Jerusalem Arabs are convinced that the Israelis will not leave them to the mercies of outside Arabs who will mark them for slaughter as "collaborators."

What troubles the city's Arabs probably the most is the possibility that they will be cut off from the outside Arab world. They feel psychologically threatened. Incredibly enough, in the war-pocked world of the Middle East, Jerusalem Arabs like to spend long weekends in Amman. They get their passes from the Israeli authorities, travel down to Jericho, cross the Allenby Bridge, and then spend a few days shopping in Amman (it's cheaper there) and seeing relatives. I know people who had never before been to Amman who decided they must make the trip. It's easy for Jerusalem Arabs to make the trip east; they must pass a rather innocuous security test, wisely based not on a person's political opinion but on his possible association with terrorist organizations. Coming the other way is more problematic. Israelis usually permit families to be reunited, if all members clear security, but they are cautious about entire family units attempting to cross from Amman to Jerusalem. The Israeli policy may be called liberal, considering that the country is officially at war with Jordan, but it could be more liberal. Of course, border policy is not the whole issue: many thousands, if not hundreds of thousands, of Arabs, will never come back to Jerusalem to live under Israeli rule.

The "open border" policy applies to goods as well as to people. A very great trade in agricultural produce and other West Bank goods has been crossing the border regularly. The terrorist organizations bitterly oppose this evident accommodation and collusion with the enemy, since it encourages the normalcy of life which they, as good guerrillas, would like to destroy. But to a great many Arabs the trade is essential to life. When Israel shut the border briefly after the Machne Yehuda bombing in which twelve persons were killed, Arabs throughout the West Bank pleaded that trade be restored.

The city has passed through various transmutations of feeling in the last six months. June 5, the anniversary of the war, was marked by Arabs with protest demonstrations and from Jordan a considerable amount of shooting at the Israeli border settlements in the Bet Shean Valley. In Jerusalem, 200 or 300 women and children engaged in a moderately heated shouting match with some Arabic-speaking Israeli police. There seemed to be none of that fierce antagonism and hatred which can mark a civil rights demonstration in the States, or that perhaps even marked the demonstration in Ramallah, a few miles to the north, which was composed mainly of 1948 refugees. The Israeli policy of permitting freedom of speech and assembly, but no violence, was countered in Jerusalem by the Arab tactic of sending women and children to demonstrate so that no one will get hurt—a policy learned during the Jordanian years when the men stayed home, knowing that no Arab policeman would manhandle a woman. Israeli policemen have evidently learned well from their Arab predecessors. A friend of mine, hurrying to the scene of demonstration outside Damascus Gate, had the situation quickly defined for her. Israeli soldiers in full battle dress stood in groups on the street corners. Suddenly, a voice in Hebrew gruffly barked out an order over the loud-speaker: "All soldiers, please return your empty pop bottles to the central depository immediately."

The first increase of tension occurred in late summer after the so-called "Night of the Grenades." Arab terrorists dropped grenades equipped with timing devices into six garbage cans in various parts of the city. One was discovered before it went off, but the grenade in the central bus station exploded and killed one person. I remember the night well, since I was present at four of the locations while helping to organize the coverage for Israeli Television. The reaction of my Israeli colleagues was: "The Arabs can't do anything well. We've lived with this a long time. It's lucky we have Arabs here; otherwise we might be in trouble."

The event of that night which sent a tremor of shock through the country was not the grenades; it was what happened in the hours following the terrorist attack. Jewish teen-agers decided to beat up any Arabs they could find and to invade the Old City and destroy and vandalize. Before police could stop them they had almost killed one Jew, mistaken for an Arab, and a number of them had managed to break some shop windows in Eastern Jerusalem. Thus the terrorists won a moderate success by helping to destroy the atmosphere of trust—mostly commercial trust, but trust nonetheless—between the two populations. Mayor Kollek heatedly denounced the teen-agers' actions and went on a walking tour of the Old City that night and the next day. He was followed a day or two later by General Dayan who received, as he always does, a warm reception on the eastern side of town. The Israeli Government paid for all the damages suffered by Arab businessmen, but the damage to mutual confidence could not be paid for.

Then, in November, two Arab terrorists, according to the claims of the terrorist organizations, wearing Israeli police uniforms, drove into the most crowded section of Western Jerusalem, the Machne Yehuda or Jewish Market. They walked away from the shopping area, leaving their explosive-filled car parked next to a barbershop. It was a Friday, the Muslim Sabbath and the day before the Jewish Sabbath. The blast went off at 9:30 in the morning, killing some thirteen persons and wounding more than fifty. Almost all of these were women, children or old people; several of the victims were Arabs. An hour after the explosion the market place was again filled, out of defiance as well as stoicism. But there was a quiet in the air, a wonderment that any human being could have the malice to come into a peaceful gathering place of women and children, and commit this act of willful murder. The atmosphere of wonder and shock has lasted even until today.

East Jerusalem was immediately cordoned off and a curfew imposed. The Christian shop owners closed up; the Muslim shops were already closed because it was Friday. I saw an Arab friend that day, a young man who would never express a desire to live under Jewish rule, and he could hardly look me in the face. "It will be a long time until there's peace here," he said sadly, ashamed. "It's horrible."

A Jewish friend insisted that his wife change her buying habits. Whereas she had shopped at her local market, she now began to buy in the Machne Yehuda. "Whatever you do," he seemed to be saying to the Arab terrorists, "your acts will not change my normal life."

The obvious aim of the terrorists, as before, was to destroy the possibility of normal contact and fruitful relations between the two peoples. A spontaneous and unspoken Jewish boycott of Arab Jerusalem lasted for weeks. My garage mechanic's business was very slow. I asked him why. "The Machne Yehuda," he said, with a concern obviously far more humanitarian than economic. "The Jews aren't coming to me now."

"Do you think they will come back?" I asked.

"Yes. I hope so. But they must forget first."

It took some time, but as the holiday season began, as Chanukah approached, as Ramadan ended, as Christian pilgrims poured in to mark the birth of their Saviour, normalcy began to be restored. The Arab shops filled with Israelis as well as foreign tourists.

I was not in Jerusalem at the time of the Beirut raid, and missed the reaction of the Arab side of town. I would guess that Arab Jerusalemites took some pleasure from the world reaction to the raid—and that it compounded their sense of tragedy. I am sure the raid was stupid, not from the viewpoint of morality or military effectiveness but within the context of world politics and possible political gain. But even this raid must be viewed against the background of lurking danger which can afflict anyone throughout the country, and particularly in Jerusalem, at any time. The terrorists had attempted to surpass the Machne Yehuda outrage by murdering fifty-seven persons in an El Al civilian jet at an international airport, and so to harm Israel's tourism and impair its links with the outside world. Terrorism may sound romantic from afar, but it is basically vicious and immoral; indiscriminate terror against civilian populations is, no matter who uses it, the nadir of modern "warfare."

In Jerusalem, normal life seems to have returned. The Arab shopkeepers are eager for Jewish business. The Jews spend their money in the narrow lanes and alleys of the romantic Old City. Their homes become ornate with tassled Bedouin rugs, Islamic embroidery, and antiques from throughout the Arab world. There is little Arab hostility to Jews on a personal basis and there is none of the fierce nationalism which characterized Jerusalem's Arabs in the days of the Grand Mufti.

Quiet prevails. One has the feeling that it is possible for Arabs and Jews to live together in the same city—if not in friendship, then at least in tolerance and harmony. Today it is winter in the city, a particularly mild winter with occasional downbursts of fierce rain, but with many bright and warm days. Dramatic clouds form over the hills, sweep and linger, dance over the harsh rock landscape and disappear.

I believe that peace is a difficult but possible goal, because no one—at least, no one in Jerusalem—wants war. The dangers are from outside Jerusalem, from across the borders. It is only from out there that war could come again to Jerusalem.

NIXON'S SEVENTH CRISIS

DIPLOMATS IN DISARRAY

SMITH SIMPSON

Mr. Simpson, a retired Foreign Service officer with twenty years' experience in and around the diplomatic Establishment, is the author of Anatomy of the State Department (Houghton Mifflin). He is also editor of the recent issue, "Resources and Needs of American Diplomacy," of The Annals, American Academy of Political and Social Science.

It seems that President Nixon did not relish as Secretary of State a man of great experience and skill in foreign affairs, one familiar with the State Department, the federal foreign affairs community, our foreign policies and the navigational skills which keep those policies afloat. There are such men in his party, some of them part of the Atlantic seaboard reservoir so often tapped for foreign affairs and defense appointments. But, for the first time in years, a President-elect shied away from the Eastern establishment. The indications are that Mr. Nixon did not even seek the advice of the Lovetts, McCloys, Dillons, et al.

Plainly, also, he had no inclination to resort to older precedent and appoint one of those who had challenged him for his party's nomination. "Forward together" is for national consumption, not for party politics, at least as far as foreign affairs are concerned. Instead of pursuing precedent, Mr. Nixon did something quite novel—novel, anyway, since 1925, when Calvin Coolidge appointed Frank Billings Kellogg as head of the diplomatic bureaucracy. This suggests that the slogan in foreign affairs is to be "Keep Cool with Nixon."

But another possible meaning to the appointment of William P. Rogers seems to have escaped the commentators. It is well known that Mr. Nixon has turned to this skillful lawyer during three of the six major crises which he says have beset his political career. By calling upon Rogers now for this particular position, does Mr. Nixon suggest that the diplomatic establishment has begun to loom in his mind as a seventh crisis?

Well it might. I have known the State Department and its Foreign Service for some forty years and never have I seen them in such a shambles. Policy planning in the State Department is still of a scatter-shot variety and diplomatic planning is nonexistent. There is no overall management, and therefore operations are not tied together, gaps are not filled, lapses are not anticipated, improvements are not systematically pressed. Even promotions, which should be one of the simpler operations, at least from the numerical standpoint, have been chaotic and without reference to need. Education and training are scandalously neglected, procedures fritter away experience, officers are frustrated rather than developed by conditions of service. Responsibilities, especially in the lower ranks, are vague and unchallenging. There is, in a word, no systematic control; only endless improvisation in administration, endless battling with momentary need, endless reaction to events —as in our diplomacy itself—rather than good, tight, dynamic leadership.

I hesitate to mention Vietnam in this connection, for it would seem to have been threshed down to the last grain, but several basic elements which it shares with everything else the Department does are being overlooked. One is the failure to bring to bear upon the Vietnamese experience the processes of research, analysis and planning. No systematic analysis of this involvement has been made by the State Department or any contractee of the Department. Hence, the Department has been, and still is, unable to deal profoundly with the problem of intervention, isolating the issues it presents or generalizing from the breakthroughs of technique and the constructive results which here and there ingenious diplomatic, military and aid officers have achieved. Further, there has been no attempt to systematize the errors of this venture for the instruction of future policy steerers and diplomatic pilots. From this failure, we risk not only losing in our negotiations the few precious accomplishments of intervention but of repeating our mistakes in the future. That future, as Thailand and Laos are trying to whisper in our ear, may come sooner than we think. If there is one way to insure a continuation of blunders in Southeast Asia, with their corroding effects on America's world position, this is it.

The Pueblo affair is another example of the State Department's chronic inability to subject its diplomacy to any kind of rigorous analysis. No methodical attention has ever been given to this type of spy operation, great though its impact is upon our diplomacy. This neglect led to the U-2 imbroglio in 1960; it will lead to others. The disjointed diplomatic agency has simply not prepared itself to cope with military and intelligence operations which affect the nation's general international efforts. Of course, diplomats would first have to be educated and trained in this area, and one of the more obscure but melancholy aspects of the U-2, Bay of Pigs and Pueblo affairs is that our diplomatic officers are not adequately prepared to run any phase of a modern diplomatic operation.

A part of the crisis which the diplomatic agency presents to Mr. Nixon arises from its astonishing failure to redefine diplomacy itself in up-to-date terms, so that it might have a clear idea of the kind of people it should be recruiting, the kinds of education and training it should be providing its officers, the criteria it should be following for assignments and promotions, the blend of policy, diplomacy and management it should be developing—all to effect a widespread improvement in our international performance.

Good management would encourage a contagion of know-how from the better-run to the sloppy offices, thus stimulating and bolstering the Department in areas where it is weakest. But lack of management isolates office from office, bureau from bureau. There is no means, for example, whereby the concepts and techniques of analysis and management employed by Covey T. Oliver to improve performance in Latin American relations can be transmitted to other areas. Nor is there any assurance that the gains in that bureau will be passed on to and developed by the Assistant Secretary who replaces Mr. Oliver.

In such an "anti-organization" department, morale is deplorable. In forty years of observation, I have never known State Department morale to be good, but it is now the worst that I have ever seen it.

Morale affects performance; so also do attitudes. They subtly penetrate and influence every view, every decision, every approach to a decision. They are the unspoken premises which cause men to assume they know things they do not know, understand situations they do not understand, are "managing crises" when they are only tinkering with them, disposing of problems when they are only postponing them to reappear in more aggravated form. They give rise, or are themselves generated by, clichés and myths. If Mr. Nixon wants to avoid his seventh crisis he had better put someone in a managerial position in State who knows what the prevailing attitudes are, their sources and their cures. Otherwise, both he and his Secretary of State, however shrewd and competent they may be as politician and lawyer, will be stymied.

A Middle East crisis is rising to one of its periodic crests and Messrs. Nixon and Rogers would do well to recall what lack of State Department management did to President Johnson and Dean Rusk on the last crest. For four and a half months, as that 1966-67 storm quietly gathered, the position of Assistant Secretary of State for Near Eastern Affairs remained vacant. Career diplomat Raymond Hare resigned in November, 1966, and could not be induced to remain. He was worn out; furthermore, he had given a year's notice of his departure. But no replacement had been prepared. The only one available when the time came, it was said, was Lucius D. Battle, then serving as ambassador in Cairo. But there was no seasoned successor for Battle, and one had therefore to be improvised. At the urging of Under Secretary Katzenbach who, like Mr. Rogers, had served as Attorney General and was not exactly sophisticated in the deployment of diplomatic personnel, the Department appointed as ambassador Richard Nolte, an intelligent, academic type not likely to have much influence on Nasser. Nolte's remark at the Cairo airport remains a classic. Asked by a journalist what he thought of the Middle East crisis, he replied: "What crisis?" He soon found out.

Congressional penny-pinching aggravates the shortcomings of management and planning. Secretarial vacancies cannot be filled; officers become increasingly distracted by clerical duties. Supplies are so parsimoniously inventoried that even telephone directories must be scrounged. The library—unlike those at the CIA and the Pentagon—is so understaffed that it cannot meet requests for service, cannot acquire needed materials, cannot shelve promptly what it gets, cannot bind what it shelves. This is a particularly illuminating situation, for it not only exemplifies the anti-intellectual attitude of the administrators who parcel out the Department's appropriated funds but shows also how really false is a lot of the economizing. Unbound periodicals stray; they must be replaced; and back copies cost more than the original subscription numbers. Furthermore, when funds at last become available for binding, costs have increased. The State Department is a perfect demonstration, top to bottom, from people to paper clips, that penny-pinching always results in waste.

An extraordinary cynicism pervades the diplomatic establishment. Even its liberals found themselves welcoming the outcome of the Presidential election. "Nothing could possibly be worse," they said; "a change—any change—just might bring relief." They did not remember that this same hope was engendered in 1932, 1952 and 1960, and gave way to souring frustration. It is not merely change that is needed—it is reform: organizational reform, procedural reform, attitudinal reform, educational and training reform, conceptual reform. That is what confronts Mr. Nixon as he prepares for his seventh crisis.

That being so, one of Nixon's most extraordinary pre-inaugural decisions was his choice of Secretary of State. William P. Rogers is by all reports a good lawyer; he is a former Attorney General of the United States, a good negotiator in a domestic context, perhaps a good one in an international legal context, a staunch upholder of civil rights, an upright citizen, a loyal friend and counselor of the President, a cool man. These attributes are splendid, but how completely do they meet the varied diplomatic needs of the President? How sufficient are they for a successful Secretary of State?

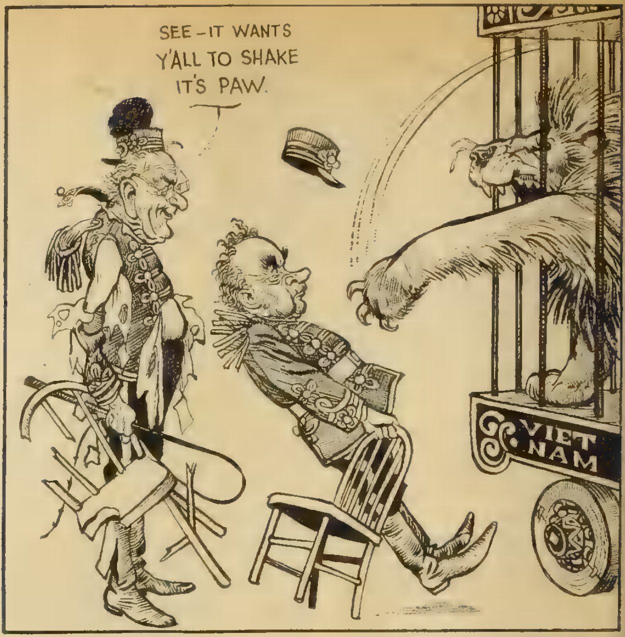
Mr. Rogers is not totally without exposure to foreign affairs. He served in 1967 as the United States delegate on the UN's fourteen-nation ad hoc Committee on South West Africa. Seven years earlier he headed the American delegation to the independence ceremonies for Togo, and took the occasion to visit the Mali Federation (then Mali, Guinea and Senegal) and Nigeria. He met a number of leaders in those countries (most of whom have since been ousted or assassinated). During the Hungarian revolution of November, 1956, he accompanied Mr. Nixon to Austria to investigate the plight of refugees. Another brief mission took him abroad in 1955 as chief American delegate to a UN conference on prison conditions.

That's about it and it is not very much. No continuous professional experience; not even a sustained professional interest. No background whatever with respect to the State Department or the Foreign Service. No experience or known interest in any coordinating machinery in the government's foreign affairs.

This lack of central involvement or even interest in his new area of responsibility becomes the more painfully evident when one sets Mr. Rogers' training alongside the preparation of some of his Cabinet associates. The Secretary of Agriculture has had extensive experience with agricultural matters. The Secretary of Labor has been a student of labor problems for decades, much involved in labor-management contentions, thoughtfully coping for years with the very challenges he will face in his Cabinet assignment. Both Clifford M. Hardin in Agriculture and George Shultz in Labor are seasoned experts in their fields.

In fact, Mr. Hardin seems to qualify better for the position of Secretary of State than does Mr. Rogers. His extensive international experience began in 1947 when he was sent to Europe by Michigan State University to explore the broad question of what roles universities and farm groups might play in the Marshall Plan. The following year, in furtherance of Point Four, President Truman included him in groups to study development possibilities in South America. His interest in this area has continued, and has led to his appointment as a member of the Council on Higher Education of American Republics, which takes him to a different country of South America each year. In 1950, as dean of MSU's School of Agriculture, Hardin helped found the University of the Ryukyus on Okinawa, and that added the Pacific area to his international involvement. Four years later, he became chancellor of the University of Nebraska and introduced in that one-time bastion of Midwest isolationism a Latin American studies program and a Far Eastern Institute; he also continued Nebraska's sponsorship of the new Ataturk University in Turkey which, among other things, has brought to Lincoln more than 200 Turkish professors for advanced study. He has also been involved in educational development in sub-Sahara Africa. This depth of familiarity with the country's overseas objectives and commitments suggested to President Kennedy that Hardin be added to the Clay committee to study the entire foreign aid program. Finally, Hardin thinks in imaginative terms. One of his pet interests is promoting "a massive, long-range innovative effort unprecedented in human history" to solve the world's food and population problem.

Compared with all this, Mr. Rogers and the man he has picked as his deputy are rank amateurs. Neither can innovate because they do not know where to start. Neither can reform because they do not know what is wrong. Neither can appreciate the need for any "massive, long-range, innovative effort" to bring our diplomatic establishment up to date because they have yet to learn in what respects it is out of date. As they gradually become enlightened, they will tinker, as all unprepared innovators do. Moreover, they will by then have become overwhelmed by current crises.



SEE–IT WANTS Y'ALL TO SHAKE IT'S PAW.
VIET NAM

Macpherson, Toronto Star

Melvin Laird was smarter than Mr. Rogers. Realizing that as Secretary of Defense he would be handicapped by his managerial inexperience, he picked an expert manager for the second spot at the Pentagon. Rogers picked a man in his own image. Mr. Richardson is also a lawyer, also an Attorney General, also inexperienced in management, also a novice in foreign affairs, in the State Department, in the Foreign Service, in diplomacy.

This, together with the fact that Laird has been deeply involved in the problems and issues of the Defense Department for fifteen years, with a fairly clear idea of how it operates—its weaknesses, its mistakes, its needs—means that Defense will continue to have an edge over State. In the light of the last eight years, I need not emphasize what this means in our foreign policies and diplomacy. There is little likelihood that a "massive, long-range, innovative effort" will tip the scales back to civilian initiative and control.

Both Mr. Rogers and Mr. Richardson may be expected to think that as lawyers and pragmatists they have much to offer American diplomacy. I wish this were so, but I fear that lawyers are poor managers and even slow to see the need for effective management. As a profession, they are given to the belief that all they need are the facts; by rigorous analysis, they can then deduce the answers. Furthermore, since they are trained to argue from briefs prepared by their staff, Mr. Rogers and Mr. Richardson will no doubt believe that they can satisfactorily counsel the President and Congress, as well as the public and officials of other governments, from the "briefs" provided by a State Department staff. If so, they are naive.

"Facts" are hard to come by in foreign affairs. Information is elusively concealed in the manner of its presentation. It is subtly permeated with the drafters' personal impressions, interpretations, hunches. A formidable husk of subjectivity surrounds every "fact." The greatest bulk of our dossiers on other peoples and their government leaders, their cultures and their needs, is comprised of what we think we know, and that is precisely what has bedeviled the government's handling of Vietnam. The "information" and calculations available in Washington have been treated by the Secretary of State and other Presidential advisers as reliable "facts"—and we have strayed deeper and deeper into a swamp of conjecture. Because of the man he has selected as Secretary of State and the deputy Mr. Rogers has picked for himself, this can happen to Mr. Nixon in countless situations.

As for pragmatism, we have about come to the end of that road. Within limits, it is a good approach, but relying on it almost exclusively, we have exhausted its possibilities, and our continuing faith in it is leading us into a performance of diminishing returns. Faced with the necessity to synthesize foreign and domestic resources and policies, we are required to make a more fundamental assessment of foreign affairs than we have so far attempted. For this, some philosophy is needed—something akin to the careful, systematic, basic thinking that went into the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution. And it requires, as those statements of policy and principle did not, a consideration of world responsibilities. Who is to lead in this "massive, long-range, innovative" effort?

Perhaps, someone may suggest, the number-three man in the Department, he being a career diplomat. But he also is a pragmatist. A smart operator, a man of keen insight into the reactions of foreigners, Alexis Johnson has never acquired any reputation as a thinker, a planner or a manager. And as he has shown throughout the Vietnam years—during much of which he served as a political adviser to the Secretary—he is a follower, not an innovator.

If none of these three men has what it takes to reform the Department, the situation is not yet entirely hopeless. Six other strategic positions remain to be filled: Deputy Under Secretary for Administration, Deputy Assistant Secretary for Organization and Management, Deputy Assistant Secretary for Personnel, Director General of the Foreign Service, Director of the Foreign Service Institute and Deputy Assistant Secretary of Operations.

If Mr. Rogers can be as smart as Mr. Laird, he can still bail himself out of his limitations and, by the men he selects for these positions, spare the President another major crisis. To do this he must clearly perceive three things: the necessity for superior management of the diplomatic establishment; the requirement that managers be familiar not only with management concepts but also with foreign policy and diplomacy; and the need to delegate adequate managerial powers to such men.

These six officers of the Department must create a program of management (which means, in effect, a program of reform, since the State Department now totally lacks management), and they must become a team to carry it out.

In view of Mr. Rogers' and his deputy's unfamiliarity with the State Department, the filling of this prescription is so difficult as to be unlikely. But there is a remote possibility that it will be done. Several studies of the State Department and Foreign Service of recent date are available for the launching of such a program. If the six are appointed from the career diplomatic service well in advance of vacancies, sent off to a suitable university to be trained in management concepts and techniques and to distill a program for the approval of Messrs. Nixon and Rogers, and if they are delegated adequate managerial powers, the job can be done. There is no other way to do it. If Mr. Nixon really sees the diplomatic establishment as threatening him with his seventh crisis—and whether he does or not, that, in my opinion, is the situation—he would do well to persuade his Secretary of State to take this course. It would be good politics—if Mr. Nixon gives any thought at all to 1972. And, of course, it would be a step toward insuring that there is still a nation to hold elections in 1972.

THE URGENT EAST

SHORT FUSE IN JAPAN

ALBERT AXELBANK

Mr. Axelbank has been reporting on Japan for the past ten years. He has written for the Associated Press, United Press, The New York Times, the London Economist and the Far Eastern Economic Review.

Tokyo

The handwriting, some of it in the form of graffiti, is now appearing on the walls in Japan and Okinawa. It is as if America, under the Nixon Administration, were being given a last chance to confront itself in the mirror, to arouse itself from years of sluggish and often blundering statesmanship toward the Orient. The ultimatum may be stated thus: if you cling to the stale policies of the past; if you choose to deal with Asians only from so-called positions of strength and refuse to heed mass movements; and if you advocate cracking the skulls of the growing body of dissenters, you will foster yet another tragedy in 20th-century Japan and, as a result, produce irreversible disaster for the American position in Asia.

It may happen in 1969; it becomes more probable for 1970. Japan's Kidotai (Riot Police) and Jieitai (Self-Defense Forces) are even now preparing for civil war next year. On Okinawa, the U.S. military is girding for insurrection this year. The Japanese Police Agency is being beefed up for 1970—when the controversial U.S.-Japan

Security Pact comes up for review—and is increasing the mobility of riot police in Tokyo, Osaka, Nagoya, Yokohama, Kyoto and Fukuoka. Experts were sent to Paris last May to observe riot control. The National Public Safety Commission says the use of "Molotov cocktails" and poisonous chemicals by anti-government demonstrators in 1970 is assumed in police counter tactics. The commission finds "indications" that radical Zengakuren students plan to employ the presumed disorders in 1970 as a "detonator for their designed revolution." The Home Affairs minister reports that Japan's legal system is currently under review and will be reinforced to meet emergency situations next year. The minister used an expression like, "Even if the worst comes. . . ." He mentioned the possibility that Self-Defense Forces (SDF) would be moved into the cities as a "support corps," in case the "social disorders" extend beyond police control. The Defense Agency says arrangements have already been made for the SDF to deal with civil disturbances. Various SDF units have been practicing riot control. Lieut. Gen. Ferdinand Unger, High Commissioner for the Ryukyu Islands (Okinawa), was recently named director of civil disturbance clearing and operations at U.S. Army headquarters in Washington.

It is said that Richard Nixon knows Nippon because he has visited Tokyo seven times, mostly on business. But keeping one's finger on the Japanese pulse and promoting Pepsi-Cola are not the same thing. What happened in 1960 can repeat itself next year with redoubled fury. President Eisenhower, all set to climax his Asian tour with a triumphal entry into Tokyo, was unceremoniously told to stay away from Japan: a tiny minority of leftists (so the story went) were rioting up and down Mount Fuji. They were angry about revision of the U.S.-Japan Security Pact and, reported the CIA, the rioters would settle for nothing less than blood.

Immediately upon his election, President Nixon forfeited one of his favorite pleasures: a trip to Japan. Under present tensions, no U.S. President may visit that country. Even Nixon's Secretary of State, when he visits Tokyo, will be as heavily guarded as a bullion shipment. Japan's own Prime Minister must perforce choose the back roads to the airport when he travels abroad.

What Nixon is being told, by such experts on Japan as Edwin Reischauer and John Emmerson, both former diplomats in Tokyo, is that chaos in Japan, produced by massive anti-pact, anti-bases and anti-U.S.-occupation-of-Okinawa demonstrations, would trigger swift and debilitating shock waves for the United States. Without a firm alliance with Japan, it needs to be emphasized, the effectiveness of U.S. military power in Asia is slashed at least in half. This dooms American supremacy in Asia. As Japan goes, so goes Okinawa, the only U.S. arsenal stacked with nuclear weapons west of Hawaii.

High tensions are already causing tremors in Okinawa where nearly a million inhabitants are fed up—a whole generation after the war ended—with being bossed by GIs whose idea of literature is the comic book; to whom culture means drinking on a bar stool; who equate morality with listening to a Sunday sermon. In recent months, two Socialists have been elected as the island's chief executive and as mayor of Naha, its capital. Their goal is immediate, unconditional and complete reversion of the Ryukyus to Japan. In December, an estimated 30,000 persons staged the biggest of four recent demonstrations against the presence of B-52 strategic bombers on Okinawa. On December 23, the Ryukyu legislature unanimously adopted a resolution demanding the immediate withdrawal of the B-52s. It was the third such resolution since 1965. Another resolution, similarly adopted, called for immediate suspension of port calls by nuclear submarines and asked for compensation for damage to fishing operations caused by visits already made.

City assemblies in Hirara and Koza have also adopted resolutions demanding immediate removal of the B-52s and opposing port calls by the nuclear subs. Anti-B-52 general strikes have been planned for this year to be supported by Kankoro (Government Employees Union), the Okinawa Teachers Association, Okijitsui (Executive Committee for Okinawa Return National Movement), and the Okinawa Christians Association for Peace. Japanese Prime Minister Eisaku Sato says "the postwar period for Japan won't end until Okinawa is returned to Japan." But this sentiment, while pleasing to all Japanese, does little to relieve the minds of the Okinawans. They are getting jumpy about nuclear warheads piled up just a few feet from their front gates. Reports are that more are on the way. On December 23, the Okinawa Times said that a big ammunition facility for the U.S. Navy, first of its kind in Okinawa, was under construction and would include underground silos as well as earthquake-proof, reinforced concrete warehouses. The site was presumed to be for Subroc missiles for nuclear submarines. Also, the paper stated, the ammunition yard in Chibana was being expanded, and more bases for the Seventh Fleet were being prepared. On November 19, a B-52 crashed with a full load of bombs on take-off from the Kadena U.S. Air Force Base on Okinawa. Five injuries to local residents were reported, and almost all windows of homes in nearby Kadena village were shattered. When, subsequently, another B-52 had a mishap on take-off, a U.S. military spokesman remarked callously: "It's just like a traffic accident." It wasn't related whether a cop was on hand to give the driver a ticket for recklessness.

It may be that the water around Okinawa is becoming contaminated. On November 16, 1968, a Japan Science Council symposium was told that abnormal levels of radioactivity in the mud of Naha Port had been caused by the repeated visits there of U.S. nuclear-powered submarines, and that fish caught in the port contained detectable amounts of cobalt 60. Prof. Tai Miyake of Tokyo University of Education told the session that it was too early to determine how harmful the radioactivity of the fish would be to human beings, but this was the first time that scientists had found cobalt 60 in edible fish taken from Okinawan waters.

A joint U.S.-Okinawa research team has said the amount of radioactivity found in Naha Port mud is harmless. For three days from September 15 last year, the U.S. Civil Administration on Okinawa carried out a radioactivity survey while the nuclear sub Guardfish was at Naha's naval base. The samples of mud were analyzed by the Southeastern Radioactivity Research Institute of the U.S. Government, but the subsequent report did not disclose the amount of cobalt 60 detected. Consequently, various organizations affiliated with the left-wing opposition parties, including the Okinawa Council Against Atomic and Hydrogen Bombs, were not taking soothing reports at face value. They believe that a higher radioactivity reading was recorded in the latest survey than in those made previously.

Such acts and findings, as well as the fears of housewives who buy fish, of school children who gather in playgrounds subject to dangers from the sky, and of their parents who cannot know when someone will push a button and engulf the island in another war, screw up the tension. Late in 1968, Otto Passman, chairman of the House Appropriations subcommittee on foreign aid, said that he didn't think Americans should permit Okinawans to dictate the policy of the United States. On November 29, ex-envoy to Japan Reischauer said, in a report distributed by the Brookings Institution, that unless Okinawa is returned to Japan—and returned clean of nuclear weapons—America could not have effective bases on the island. Reischauer believes that if the security pact with Japan fails, the nearly 1 million Japanese living in and around U.S. bases on Okinawa would soon make them ineffective, if not untenable.

The Okinawans want their island returned to Japan and the U.S. bases to be given the same non-nuclear status as those in Japan. But it is evident that the military wants to hang on to its nuclear weapons in Okinawa and to enjoy in future the present freedom of movement regarding U.S. bases there. Some experts say the United States needs nuclear weapons on Okinawa; other says it does not. Which voice is stronger? And will Okinawans have a say?

Prime Minister Sato will meet with Nixon in Washington, probably next fall, and their joint communiqué—perhaps the most important document of 1969—will fix a date or at least a timetable, for the return of Okinawa. Presumably, the latest date will be 1972, but what about the nuclear warheads? Depending on government estimates of the strength of the anti-nuclear movement, such warheads will either be kept on Okinawa, or some alternate arrangement will be worked out: for example, both sides will agree that U.S. bases in Okinawa will be made "nuclear emergency bases," meaning that the warheads will not be permanently on hand, but that in an emergency, subject to prior consultation with the Japanese Government, they could be brought into Okinawa. Probably, specific details of the nuclear issue will be omitted from the communiqué and left for further "joint talks."

There is also a "bases problem" in Japan proper. As of 1968 we had 148 military bases and facilities in Japan. At year's end, the U.S. Embassy announced that about fifty could be reduced, relocated or returned to Japan, perhaps in 1969. But it turns out that these fifty are installations which are already in moth balls or are only partly used, and not regarded as conspicuous sources of hazard to local citizens. Thus great dissatisfaction remains. What raised the pitch of the anti-base protest was the crash, last June 2, of a U.S. F-4 Phantom jet fighter-bomber, flying from Itazuke Air Base. It came down on the campus of Kyushu University, embedding itself in the new Electronic Computer Center, then under construction. Nobody was hurt but a movement for removal of the air base, located nearby, and for guarantees against future accidents of the sort, are continuing. Last year, while the U.S. nuclear sub Swordfish was docked in Sasebo, an unusual amount of radioactivity was detected in the harbor, and that created another wave of protest. A team of U.S. Government scientists, after visiting Sasebo, declared that the sub was in no way at fault, but many Japanese, including scientists, were not convinced.

A staggering 92.6 per cent of the population around U.S. naval bases opposes visits of nuclear submarines to Japan. Some 82 per cent of the people living around all the U.S. facilities in Japan are against the maintenance of such facilities. And 73.7 per cent of those living near U.S. air bases dislike having them in their neighborhood. These figures are given in a late December survey of 16,760 persons picked at random at U.S. base sites. The survey was conducted by Komeito (Clean Government Party), the political offspring of Soka Gakkai, an influential Buddhist religious institution in Japan. Of course, the opposition parties intend to make good use of these sentiments. For instance, the Socialist Party will stage a nation-wide anti-base rally and march on April 28 in concert with a nation-wide campaign calling for return of Okinawa. Other activities are planned.

Many people in Japan who are not opposed to the Security Pact itself object strongly to the hazards and nuisances arising from the presence of the bases. Thus unless remedies are found, it is likely that such persons will decide to oppose the pact as the most effective way to eliminate the bases. At present, the American and Japanese Governments are trying hard to persuade the Japanese public that the bases are necessary, at least until tensions ease in the Far East, or until the Self-Defense Forces are strong enough to provide for Japan's defense without heavy support from the United States. Washington is prodding Japan to rearm at a more rapid rate. Japan is to be built up as a counterweight to nuclear China. Herman Kahn, the futurologist, expects the SDF to possess nuclear arms by the mid-1970s. The Japanese are being pushed in this direction, their pacifism and "nuclear allergy" being held up to ridicule. Ironically, the men who bombed Pearl Harbor hold influential posts in contemporary Japan; they are the hawks. Most Americans do not remember; most Japanese do.

NOTICE TO SUBSCRIBERS

Because of postal regulations, The Nation's mailing list must be arranged according to Zip Codes. Therefore—with any correspondence about address changes, renewals, etc.—please enclose the address label from your Nation. If you don't have a label, be sure to include your Zip number, and be sure it is correct. Without it, we cannot find your name plate.

JET-AGE DIVERSIONS

WORLD LAW AND THE HIJACKERS

KARL M. RUPPENTHAL

An airline pilot for more than twenty-five years, Mr. Ruppenthal is director of the Transportation Management Program at Stanford University.

The inauguration of nonstop jet service between Nashville, Tenn., and Miami, Fla., was no earth-shaking event, but important enough locally to persuade the Mayor and a few lesser dignitaries to be on hand for ribbon-cutting ceremonies. Under the gaze of a TV camera, a miniskirted hostess bestowed a kiss on His Honor, some champagne was spilled, and the flight took off. The newsmen filed their perfunctory stories—and then the real news broke: that first nonstop jet from Nashville to Miami was hijacked, becoming instead nonstop to Havana.

The hijacking itself was hardly novel; like a score of similar happenings in recent months, it followed an all too familiar script. A gunman, forcing his way into the cockpit, ordered the pilot to change course and head for Cuba; the pilot prudently obeyed. Hijacking has become so common in recent months that at least one major airline has instructed its pilots not to resist, but simply to keep the company posted as to the plane's whereabouts. The pilots of a line that operated into Havana in pre-Castro days have quietly reinserted the Havana approach plates in their navigation kits. Another airline has provided its pilots with up-to-date navigation information.

For Airways Traffic Control, diversions to Havana present no more problem than would the switch to an alternate airport because of weather conditions. Although the United States and Cuba do not officially speak to each other, cooperative control of the navigational air space continues. (The situation has parallels in other parts of the world. The United States and Russia work together on traffic control for flights between the two countries; India and Pakistan exchange data relevant to flights overflying both countries; and various Southeast Asian countries provide traffic control for commercial flights in that area.) When the pilot of a U.S. plane informs Miami Airways Traffic Control that he is diverting to Havana, the controller routinely calls Havana ATC to inform it of the plane's altitude, destination and estimated time of arrival.

Once the flight is on the ground, passenger anxiety usually turns to guarded interest. For reasons best known to the Castro government, the flights are not simply refueled and sent to their original destination. Instead, the passengers are loaded into fairly comfortable buses and taken to Varadero Beach Airport, from where they are flown to Miami in propeller-driven planes, chartered and sent down for the purpose. In the intervening hours, passengers can observe some of the changes that have taken place at Varadero. Once one of the most exclusive watering places in the world, its beaches are now open to thousands of Castro's Cubans, apparently without restrictions of any kind.

The age of hijacking—aviation style—began almost a decade ago. On April 16, 1959, four Cubans who had served as policemen under the Batista regime seized a Cuban plane with twenty-two passengers aboard and forced it to fly to Miami. According to the Miami newspapers, their daring feat tweaked the dictator's nose while it enabled them to escape from his firing squads. In 1960 three Cuban planes were similarly diverted to Miami. Each of these events was duly celebrated in the American press, the editors taking occasion to sermonize on freedom from communism and Castro. Strictly speaking, not all the incidents were cases of hijacking; sometimes planes have been stolen by Cubans wishing to escape to the United States, and thus far, according to the State Department, no one who arrived so unceremoniously at Miami has asked to be sent home. The planes themselves are turned over to representatives from Cuba, who fly them back to Havana.

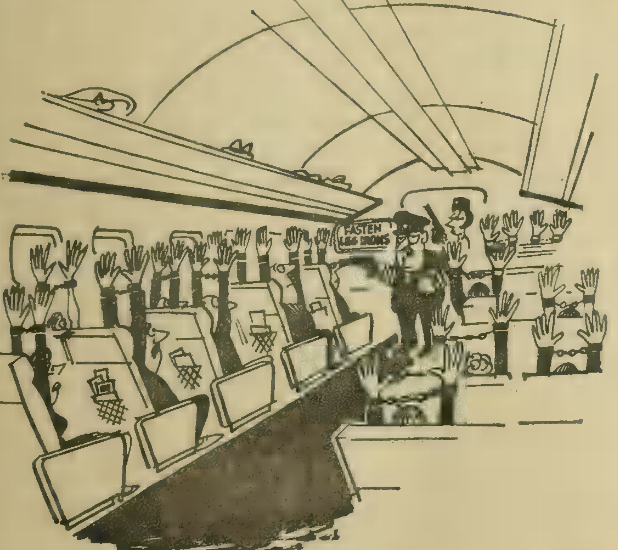
But hijacked or stolen, the eccentric flights did not maintain for long an exclusively northbound pattern. On May 1, 1961, an American of Puerto Rican birth seized a National Airlines plane over Florida and forced it to land at Havana. In 1961 two more Cuban planes were flown to Miami, while three more arrived unexpectedly in Cuba. Then for a time it appeared that the hijacking epidemic might die a natural death: only one plane was commandeered in each year of 1962, 1963 and 1964. But hijacking increased sharply in 1968, when twenty commercial airliners and four private aircraft were forced to fly to Cuba. There were also at least five other attempts. The vogue for navigation by armed passengers has now reached such a pitch that a Long Island housewife, planning a Florida holiday, placed a public notice in The New York Times assuring the airline that enjoys her patronage and the United States Government that she will sue them for $1 million each, if her plane strays into foreign territory.

While the Caribbean has been the area most plagued by hijacking, other parts of the world have not been entirely spared. A serious international incident was created in 1968 when an Arab nationalist hijacked an El Al Israeli jetliner and forced it to land at Algiers. Instead of quietly returning the plane, crew and passengers, as is the custom of the Cubans, the Algiers government stalled. Not until the International Air Line Pilots Association had threatened to boycott Algeria (and there was a great deal of diplomatic pressure behind the scenes) were the plane and its passengers returned. As part of the deal, also, Israel made restitution of certain military items that it had captured from other Arab countries.

In the first week of 1969, seven planes were hijacked: four Florida-bound American planes were redirected to Havana at gun point. An Athens-bound Olympic Airways plane made its way to Cairo after George Paravolidakis fired one shot through the cockpit window to prove that he meant business. And in the Caribbean, planes belonging to Avianca, the Colombian airline, and to APSA, the Peruvian airline, also changed course and flew to Cuba. In an interval of thirty-six hours there were also three attempts from the Cuban end—two of them successful. On January 19, hijacking scored its greatest "haul" to date, when an Eastern flight with 171 passengers aboard was redirected to Havana by a young man brandishing a hand grenade. On that same day, an Ecuadorian plane, carrying eighty-eight persons, including the general secretary to President Valasco, was forcefully diverted from a flight to Quito and Miami. For the second time in January, two planes were hijacked to Cuba in one day. No area in the world is completely safe from the hijacking menace, and there is no indication as yet that it has passed its peak. It is, in fact, unlikely to do so until realistic action is taken to stop the dangerous game.

Highly concerned about the potential dangers, the commercial airlines have been seeking vainly for some kind of solution to the problem. At best, the escapades are expensive for the companies and their passengers. Each time an airliner is diverted to Havana, its owners must stand the cost of the charter planes that are sent from Miami to Varadero to pick up the passengers. Other direct costs involve crew salaries, landing fees and additional fuel. But by far the most important expense for the airline is the loss to service of equipment and the attendant disruption of schedules. A fully booked jet can gross approximately $5,000 per hour, and a forced trip to Cuba may easily cost an airline $100,000. Productive time lost by passengers is difficult to assess, but must be substantial.

Direct costs and the loss of potential earnings are not the whole story. There is also a terror factor. The long Algerian internment of the El Al plane and passengers (together with the more recent attack on an El Al plane at Athens) is already having some effect. The more skittish travelers avoid traveling on an Israeli plane when reasonable alternatives are available—an effect no doubt anticipated by the Arab terrorists. That there is any reduction in U.S. airline travel because of the Cuban diversions is not known, but it is reasonable to believe that vacation travel in and around Florida and the Caribbean has not increased because of the possibility of an unexpected visit to Cuba.



Waite, The Sun (London)

"This Is Your Captain Speaking"

Of course the greatest potential cost in hijacking is the exposure to mortal risk. It takes little imagination to appreciate what could happen to a jet flying at 37,000 feet, if some overstimulated hijacker should open fire. A serious situation could result if a bullet pierced the pressurized skin of the aircraft; should a bullet sever a vital control cable, tragedy would almost certainly result. Meanwhile, the effects of panic could scarcely fail to be catastrophic.

More directly concerned than any other group, the airline pilots have sought means to bring the hijacking era to a close. Some of the more swashbuckling fliers have urged the Federal Aviation Administration to permit the arming of all airline pilots—a proposal raising images of gun duels in cockpit and cabin that would hardly increase safety in the air. Thoughtful airline executives recoil from the idea and have sided with the FAA in rejecting this simplistic approach to the problem.

Probably the most striking fact about air hijacking is that there is almost no parallel in other modes of transportation. True, holdups of trucks, trains and buses do occur, but these crimes are dealt with by local officials in prescribed fashion. Only at sea, because of the uncertainty of lines demarking international and domestic waters, can similar questions arise about legal jurisdiction.

But although thousands of ships ply the international waters of the world, hijacking at sea—that is, piracy—is relatively rare. This, no doubt, is because there is absolutely no question about the legal status of the crime. It has long been regarded internationally as an extremely serious matter, and no court in the world is inclined to regard it otherwise.

But although the penalties for piracy at sea have long been established and fairly well enforced, the same cannot be said for piracy in the air. Indeed, the legal status of this activity is so clouded that it is not at all certain that its perpetrators are always guilty of a crime or that their deed will invariably be punished. There is no clear-cut international law regarding hijacking in the air to parallel the laws regarding piracy at sea.

An initial attempt to establish such laws was made some years ago in Tokyo when twenty-nine nations signed a convention that would make it an international crime to hijack a plane. The convention provides, briefly, that crimes aboard an aircraft shall be dealt with by the nation under whose flag the aircraft flies. Once some of the important questions of legal jurisdiction are settled, it would then become a routine matter for the nation under whose jurisdiction the hijacking occurred to seek extradition of the criminal from the country to which he had forced the plane to fly.

Of course difficult questions concerning political asylum would still remain. By far the majority of the jet-age hijackers have wished not to steal the aircraft or its cargo but to reach some country for political reasons. George Paravolidakis (alias Flamorides) who hijacked the Athens-bound Olympic plane to Cairo, claimed that he did so for political reasons and that he would be murdered if the Egyptians permitted his extradition to Greece. All of the individuals who diverted Cuban planes to Miami professed to be escaping death or tyranny at Castro's hands. There is little doubt that if they were faced with the real possibility of extradition, some Cuba-bound hijackers would make the same claim as regards their potential fate in the United States.

This is not to say that there are no teeth in the Tokyo convention. Indeed, it is probably the best partial remedy to the hijacking menace that is fairly readily available. But—first step that it is—it leaves unsolved some important questions concerning extradition. Once the convention is ratified, there will still be disagreements regarding the nature of the crime committed. From the standpoint of the aggrieved nation, hijacking would be regarded as serious international robbery, calling for appropriate penalties. But the hijacker himself (and the country to which he flies) might regard his act as but a part of a political crime—for which political asylum is appropriate. Undoubtedly the best solution would be to regard hijacking, wherever committed and for whatever reason, as an international crime. Because of the high degree of peril and the innocent lives endangered, it should be banned by all nations as a route to political asylum.

Meanwhile little is being done about the clear and present danger. No study is under way to determine why so many planes are hijacked to Cuba (would the reinstitution of scheduled air service stop much of it?), and no significant move has been made by the United Nations to deal with the problem.

Although the Tokyo convention is the only significant international effort to date that seeks to combat a growing threat to public safety the world over, it has been signed by but twenty-nine nations, and of those only eight have ratified it (the Philippines, Formosa, Portugal, Italy, Norway, Sweden, Denmark and the United Kingdom). Notably absent from both lists is the United States—the nation with the largest fleet of commercial aircraft and presumably with the most to gain from some recognized international law in the air.

HAWAIIAN NATIONALISTS

TRAPPED IN A MYSTIQUE

WILLIAM L. ABBOTT

Mr. Abbott, who served on the Steering Committee of Volunteers for McCarthy, was Education Director of the United Rubber Workers from 1960 to April, 1968. He is currently a specialist in labor-management education at the University of Hawaii.

Honolulu

This year, a new statue will be unveiled in the nation's capital. It is the romanticized likeness of King Kamehameha "The Great," a pagan chief whom Hawaii has selected as the eminent personality it wishes to show off to the people of America.

The nearest comparison to the King is Adolf Hitler, although King Kam, who came to the throne of one of the then four kingdoms in 1782, was more debauched. He treacherously murdered his own relative, used his prisoners for human sacrifice, and conquered most of the Hawaiian Islands in a bald act of premeditated aggression. He won his wars with the aid of Western gunnery and his conquest opened up Hawaiian land and markets to European and American traders who quickly stole the Hawaiians blind, decimated their population with their diseases, and subjugated them into a servant race.

Kamehameha's weakness for rum, silk hats and trinkets moved him to send the men high into the mountains where they slaved to cut sandalwood for the China trade, while their families back home died of starvation. He literally sold his people out. Few, if any, reputable persons who knew him, white or brown, had a good thing to say of the King or his reign. "In the reign of King Kamehameha we were not taught to respect the rights of others," said Governor Kekuanaoa in 1841. "We abused the maimed and the aged, and the chiefs oppressed the poor without mercy."

But the passing of years has brought about in Hawaii a brown nationalism which changed this ugly image of the King into the benign lover of an adoring people. At the same time, he became the warrior symbol of virility, which identity the leadership of the brown race felt the people needed to gain self-respect. The King (a holiday named after him features nostalgic royal parades) is only one manifestation of this brown nationalism which began late in the 19th century when the Hawaiian leadership finally realized it was being duped and briefly attempted to assert itself. The whites responded sharply to the unexpected impudence of Hawaiians who presumed to think they had the right to rule their own country. They abolished the monarchy in 1893, took the vote away from all Orientals, and set up a republic.

The Hawaiian leaders then tacitly conspired with the white power structure. They wanted the identity of brown nationalism and in exchange they would not protest the reality of white power. The whites quickly saw that this kind of cultural nationalism could be a useful means of social control and they embraced it fully.

Hawaiian leaders dutifully supported the "Big Five" corporations which controlled the life of the islands for about 100 years. Despite the poverty of the average Hawaiian, there was no real protest when unionists were shot, deported, or jailed for trying to increase wages and improve working conditions. White society was Republican and the Hawaiians never objected that in some areas a man's job was in jeopardy if he had so much as a relative who was a Democrat. As late as 1938, Democrats on Hawaii's largest island met in secret and campaigned by moonlight. Employers marched their workers to the polls and watched them vote.

In return for supporting this restrictive society, Hawaiians were permitted to sit in the legislature. In 1907, the Senate had eight Hawaiians and seven whites; the House was made up of twenty-three Hawaiians, four whites and three Portuguese (who were not classed officially as Caucasian). The new worship of King Kamehameha was well under way with all the attendant festivities to attract tourist dollars for white pocketbooks. Today, brown nationalism is fairly rampaging: cars sport "Restore the Monarchy" bumper stickers, radio stations cater exclusively to Hawaiian music, the arts and crafts of ancient Hawaii delight the more than 1 million tourists who come to the islands each year.

More important, brown nationalism has become a style of life, not only for the Hawaiians but for persons of all races who call themselves "locals" and subscribe to the Hawaiian mystique. A Japanese-American youth told of how good the communication was among all the locals. "When we see another local we see a soul brother." It didn't bother him in the least that all these soul brothers are so jealous of one another's successes that they seek out mainland whites to direct them. The island labor movement, for example, has continually gone to the mainland to fill top posts, despite the fact that men of ability are available. A native Hawaiian unionist explained: "We don't like seeing any friends of ours getting ahead of us."

Questioned on this point, the youth defensively shot back: "Let the whites rule; all they get for it is ulcers. They don't know how to live."

That is a fairly standard answer. Certainly nobody gives a more swinging luau than a ghetto Hawaiian. For plunking out songs on the ukulele, for graceful hula dancing, for being warmhearted, generous, loving and hospitable, Hawaiians are superb. And the Hawaiians gave the aloha spirit to the world. It is the feeling of freedom to love anybody and everybody. Thirty-eight per cent of marriages in Hawaii are interracial. You dress the way you want, you take a little more time to be considerate of other people than you would elsewhere, and this Hawaiian contribution to human relationships is of no small value.

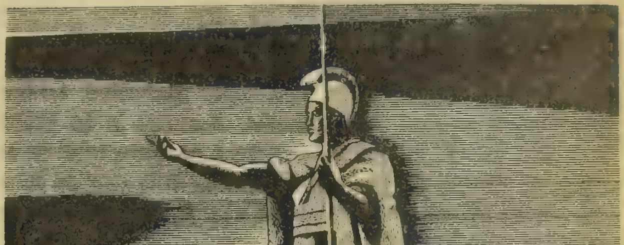
But Hawaiians have television sets and they are quite naturally resentful when they discover that others live better than they. The average income of the native Hawaiian is only half that of the average white. His unemployment rate is the highest of any group, and the poverty areas in which he lives have severe schooling, transportation and health facility problems. In one area there is a yearly teacher turnover of 40 per cent; no full-time doctor as yet serves this area, and one must travel miles for medical aid. The frustrated resentment leads to hate of the well-off whites and Orientals, and it occasionally explodes after school when Hawaiians beat up white children. Instead of rebelling as the Japanese in Hawaii rebel, by determining to achieve power and with it integration, Hawaiians have the highest dropout rate, and although they constitute only 17 per cent of the state's population, they accounted in 1966 for nearly half of all children arrested.

But the Hawaiian has been trained to be full to the brim with aloha for everyone. Hate is unworthy of him. Thus he turns his natural hatred of those more fortunate upon himself and his own kind. Self-hate leads to personal impotence, unwillingness to see friends get ahead leads to group impotence. The Hawaiian drops out and dreams of a monarchy of ribboned kings and hoop-skirted queens, who in their day of glory exploited him and betrayed him more cynically than the whites ever did.

In contrast the Japanese, acting as a united power group and with a much rougher row to hoe than the Hawaiians, now have an important say in the political life of the islands. They have risen from the lowest economic group in the early part of this century, until their incomes are now only slightly less than those of the whites and Chinese.

In 1947, the Hawaiian-white conservative coalition still dominated the legislature. Twenty years later there were more Japanese than all other ethnic groups combined in the House and a very large segment of Japanese in the Senate. Three out of Hawaii's four Congressional representatives to Washington are Americans of Japanese ancestry.

The Japanese in Hawaii learned the hard way that



Fortune

Kamehameha the Great (Honolulu)

nationalism and power are incompatible. Since 1900 they had tried their own form of nationalism with segregated labor unions and strikes and Japanese-language schools. All it brought them was distrust, hatred and defeat.

Japanese-American veterans came back to Hawaii after World War II determined to end the race hate against them. They decided that to advance as a group they had to end all prejudice and they ran on a program of integration. They took over the Democratic Party, promoted social reform, and swept to victory in the "Revolution of 1954" when the Democrats captured the legislature. Liberal Japanese won at the expense of conservative Hawaiians. "Japanese power" appealed to so many ethnic groups because of its policy of integration and social democracy that it readily won allies. It had to have them, for the Japanese constituted only one-third the population of the state.

The Hawaiians still seem determined to go the other way. At the heart of brown nationalism is a self-imposed segregation. (Oddly enough, it goes against the natural integrationist tendencies of the Hawaiian, for while the racial intermarriage rate is lowest among the Japanese, it is highest among the Hawaiians.) The seat of this segregation is the Kamehameha schools which are restricted to persons of Hawaiian blood who are prepared to be taught by Protestants. The schools were established in the last century to train Hawaiians to serve the whites and make certain that there would always be docile brown people around to dig the ditches and collect the garbage.

The schools are supported by the wealthy Bishop Estate, which pays its trustees $48,000 a year and which owns nearly 10 per cent of Hawaii's land. To keep the Bishop Estate intact, most articulate Hawaiian leaders oppose much needed land reforms. Acreage is so scarce that it sells for $1.68 per square foot, as compared to an average of 52c on the mainland. Seventy-two private landowners hold 47 per cent of Hawaii's land, and the military has title to another 14 per cent.

White paternalism has helped to guide this nationalism. By 1848, two missionaries were making most of the monarchy's decisions. This was the year when the lands which had once been the exclusive possession of the King and his chiefs were broken up. The whites began immediately to buy. Government holdings went for as little as 12c an acre. In 1880, Princess Ruth sold the crown lands to Claus Spreckles for $10,000. The legislature bought them back by giving Spreckles 24,000 acres on the island of Maui. By the year 1914, one-third of the land was in white hands and a third more in the process of transfer.

In 1920, Congress created the Hawaiian Homes Commission for the "further rehabilitation of the Hawaiian race," but only 10 per cent of the land is being used by native Hawaiians. One-third of Hawaiian homelands are rented by the huge Parker cattle ranch; another ranch occupies 20 per cent of the land. Hawaiian homesteaders are assigned isolated lots, thereby further separating them from the rest of the community.

Hawaiians speak pidgin which originated in the old trading language, half Hawaiian, half English, and it too bars the Hawaiians from mainstream society. More than a racial language, it has become a class language, the speech of the poor. Class is a greater problem than race in Hawaii. Hawaiians did not hesitate to elect a Negro to the Honolulu City Council, although Negroes constitute less than 0.5 per cent of the population. He spoke good English and this made him almost a haole. This was originally the Hawaiian term for a Caucasian; then as Portuguese were imported to cultivate the sugar plantations it came to mean an upper-class white, for working-class Portuguese did not qualify. Today, it is applied to any middle-class individual who uses impeccable English. Not long ago, Hawaiians rejected "haole leadership" in a group that was trying to organize for social change. The leader was a pretty Japanese-American girl. A Volunteers for McCarthy group told one another: "The trouble with us is that we are all haoles; we aren't attracting the locals." Several locally born Chinese and Japanese faces gravely nodded assent. If haole is coming to mean an articulate member of the middle class, "local" has lower-class connotations.

One can see this distinction at work in Honolulu's Model Cities Program which, despite its emphasis on broad citizen participation, is dominated by the middle class. The city's two programs are in poverty areas, but the poor do not know the parliamentary procedures and language of the middle class. They decide that this kind of participation is not for them and leave in disgust. Haoles, be they white or Oriental, rule even in areas where the overwhelming majority of people are poor. Brown nationalism has helped keep the poor impotent by its insistence on separatism.

Brown power, now beginning to make itself felt, is something totally different, as realistic as brown nationalism is fundamentally unreal. It is the concept that to advance as a group you must organize, find allies, and confront the power structure with your own power, either through the ballot or by direct action. Both Hawaiian labor unions and the Japanese have done this successfully. The unions won only after they ceased their practices of self-imposed racial segregation and insisted upon integration. Today, Hawaiian sugar and pineapple workers are the highest paid agricultural workers in the world.

But the unions have forgotten about those who remain unorganized and poor. Organizing efforts among the poor are being made mostly by young middle-class idealists working with poverty programs, with churches, or who are connected either as students or teachers with the university. Since they cannot organize on a traditional craft or industry basis they are trying to organize geographically.

The community organizers see themselves only as trainers and catalysts, to get things going and remove themselves as soon as the groups they have organized begin to function. If the poor are to help themselves they will have to run their own power bloc. When this happens there may be hell to pay. The hypocrisy in the public worship of King Kamehameha, the warrior, is that the middle class can't really conceive of a warlike Hawaiian. Hawaiians were created to be lovable and to be stepped on; whenever a Hawaiian stands up for his rights there is shocked anger among the middle class.

In 1938, Hawaiians briefly shattered the image of the docile, happy native by marching with fellow union sympathizers of other races to the government pier in Hilo to protest a strike-breaking move. They were unarmed; they sat down on the pier. The police advanced with bayonets, backed by gun-bearing men "prominent in the city's business circles," according to a newsman.

"I was lying on the ground," said Kai Urutani, "when a police officer came up to me and bayoneted me in the back." Strike leader Harry Kamoku said that the police "just kept pumping buckshot and bullets into our bodies. They shot men in the back as they ran." When the Hilo massacre ended, thirty-six victims were carted off to the hospital.

No power structure will give up its power without a fight, although the Democratic Party-Business-Labor establishment which runs the state will probably not resort to another Hilo massacre. The liberalism of the 1950s, which brought the Japanese to power, along with many white liberals, has become the entrenched bureaucracy of today.

The haole community organizers are either Eugene McCarthy liberals or SDS radicals. They have several severe problems in working with the poor. The Hawaiians soon told them to drop their anti-military talk, for to the average poor Hawaiian the army is the only hope for an advance in status. The organizers will have to find substitute status goals, probably something akin to a union business agent or international representative.

The radicals start at a disadvantage, for they reject the very values the poor are trying to achieve. However, the Peace and Freedom Party, whose Senatorial candidate polled only 250 votes in a state-wide primary, has a storefront referral and counseling service for teen-agers in the ghetto, and high school students are coming there for advice and help which they feel they can't get elsewhere. The radicals are working in several ghetto areas because nobody else is doing the job. As community organizers, however, their problem is to attract allies from among middle-class liberals, for if only 20 per cent are poor and 80 per cent are at least middle class, the poor can't win without the help of segments of the economic majority.

In training sessions on the islands of Oahu and Hawaii, leaders of the poor have come together with middle-class representatives to try to work out their differences. The haoles learned that the poor could conduct efficient meetings, even without parliamentary procedure, because they weren't in love with the sound of their own voices, as were their middle-class allies. They wanted action instead of talk, and got things accomplished faster their way than by using middle-class procedures. The lesson for every poverty program is evident: if resident participation is really wanted, anti-poverty organizations must adapt to the life style of the poor. Currently, the poor are being asked to conform to middle-class ways.

As to who does the training, things are very loose. It is all pioneer work, for there are no textbooks. A church group may conduct a training conference. Recently, the Labor-Management Education Program of the University of Hawaii got Chicago community organizer Saul Alinsky to instruct its trainees. The Model Cities and Community Action Programs attract idealists who, although they find fault with government programs, are better able to discern what went wrong with the War on Poverty and what is needed to help the poor help themselves. They find soul brothers—or sisters for many are girls—and thus a group is formed.

"Brown power" also embraces the growing Samoan population and the Filipinos. But being a minority, it cannot win alone. Once the poor get organized they will have to confront the power structure with a program that will appeal also to a large segment of the middle class. Until then, the ghettos will remain.

LETTERS (Continued from page 130)

small areas) when the UN-authorized independent Arab state was slow in establishing itself?

Did the nations of the world—separately or acting through the UN—in any way object to the massing of troops around the borders of Israel in May, 1967, with the proclaimed purpose of destroying the country and its inhabitants? . . .

So many supposedly humanitarian and liberal individuals and publications share with the great imperialist powers of all times the feeling that world conditions would be simplified if smaller nations were made parts of other blocs—denying on the international scene the individuality they so cherish on a personal level. Aside from that idealistic respect for individualism, one must be practical minded enough to have been able to learn that until some arrangement makes the lambs secure (they being, among others, Czechoslovakia, Yemen, Israel, the Dominican Republic, Estonia, Vietnam), not even the lion or the bear or the eagle can be secure—nor can any individual.

There are indeed many myths in international politics, but they serve as substitutes for the unrealized dreams, and when the dream will have been realized, the paranoid myths, great and small, will fade away.

Rabbi Samuel M. Burstein
Beth Emeth Synagogue

Bath, N. Y.

DEAR SIRS: Your statement that Russian and American interests are not incompatible in this area is another "myth" with which some Americans delude themselves. The military dependency of Arabs on Russia potentially can open the entire African continent to Russian influence and control. Failure to acknowledge this obvious factor in geopolitics is naive. United States interests are linked to Israel not by the political influence of Jewish voters but by the simple fact that its mere existence automatically blocks the development of the Arab-Russian dream of total hegemony in that area. The dispatch of U. S. Marines to Lebanon by President Eisenhower was adequate witness to that fact. It is indeed unfortunate that the need to protect Europe's oil supplies from Arabia has watered down our commitment to Israel. That, unfortunately, is not a myth but a fact. . . .

More candor and less hypocrisy is needed to face the plain fact that Israeli conditions are eminently fair, and it is not likely to yield significantly. . . . Difficult as it may be for old-fashioned liberals to understand, the West is going to have to stand beside its only outpost of democracy in the Middle East, or go down with it. This is one time the big powers are not going to be able to sell out a small nation for their own convenience. S. Drucker

BOOKS & THE ARTS

In His Own Image

THE COLLECTED ESSAYS, JOURNALISM AND LETTERS OF GEORGE ORWELL. Edited by Sonia Orwell and Ian Angus. With an Introduction by Sonia Orwell. Harcourt, Brace & World. 4 Vols. 2041 pp. $34.80.

PETER CLECAK

Mr. Clecak teaches English at the University of California (Irvine), and is at work on a book on contemporary American social criticism.

"At 50," George Orwell observed, "everyone has the face he deserves." Dying of tuberculosis at 46, he narrowly missed the chance to test his harsh prophecy. Perhaps the face of this elusive figure would have become clearer had he lived beyond mid-century. Or perhaps the anti-utopian fantasy of 1984 (which appeared shortly before his death) is the furthest point of Orwell's personal and historical navigation, the culmination of his experience (to paraphrase Joseph Conrad's Marlow). Whether the dark and pessimistic vision of 1984 marks the borders of silence and madness, or represents the prelude to a reintegrated conception of self and history must remain a speculative question. For those who cannot give up the idea of combining the roles of radical intellectual and political activist, however, it is probably the most important question worth asking about Orwell. Is the constant struggle to define rational, moral and imaginative perspectives for one's own time doomed by the narrow historical and political means of embodying them? Orwell's tentative answers may not be our own, but his questions and his modes of exploring them remain central in the late 1960s.

This massive collection edited by Sonia Orwell and Ian Angus spans nearly three decades of Orwell's journalistic, literary and political career (1920-50). It simultaneously covers three decades of world history. While exploring nearly every major historical and literary phenomenon of his time, Orwell always managed to include himself as witness and participant. His work is at once autobiographical and historical: fact and value, private and public issues form parts of a unified, continuous, and incredibly rich intellectual odyssey. These four volumes alone—with their more than 200 letters, 100 substantial essays and reviews, and an assortment of occasional pieces—would guarantee Orwell's position as one of the leading political journalists and literary critics of this century. The collection is even more impressive when one notes that the work included in the volumes is an addition to Orwell's major books—Down and Out in Paris and London, The Road to Wigan Pier, Homage to Catalonia, Animal Farm and 1984.

Orwell once remarked that he would "never reprint in book form anything of less than 2,000 words." Had the editors followed this advice, they would surely have produced a more flattering portrait. But Orwell is easily good enough to withstand a full edition of his prose. The intriguing problem is whether the editors could have produced a more lucid image of him. By arranging the diverse materials chronologically, they take only the first (and obvious) step in working a complex puzzle. When the pieces are sorted into chronological piles, Orwell still remains obscure. And yet, considering the semi-autobiographical character of his work, I cannot imagine another principle of organization which would not distort the reader's perspective—or rather, further distort it. For the primary obstacle to understanding and evaluating Orwell's life and work lies in the tendency of postwar critics to remake him in their own images.

In its broad outlines, Orwell's life conforms to a dominant pattern of expectation and disillusionment embodied in such figures as Koestler, Silone and Malraux, and reconstructed by a wave of postwar liberal and Left intellectuals who regarded Orwell's central dilemma as their own. The son of a British civil servant, Orwell was born in Burma and attended English public schools (St. Cyprian's and Eton) on scholarships. He spent his young manhood wandering about the Empire and parts of Europe, serving with the Indian Imperial Police in Burma, and later living in the working-class districts of London and Paris. During the 1930s, most of his energies went into writing and politics. He was wounded in Spain while fighting with a small group (POUM) composed mainly of Trotskyists and anarchists. He also sustained a psychic wound which was to shape all of his later work: a few years before his death he observed that "The Spanish War and other events of 1936-37 turned the scale and thereafter I knew where I stood. Every line of serious work that I have written since 1936 has been written, directly or indirectly, against totalitarianism and for democratic socialism. . . ." He spent the remainder of his life working out the terms of his disillusionment with the revolutionary forces—as a commentator for the B.B.C. during the war, as a journalist for various publications (including the London Tribune and Partisan Review), and through the major works of his political imagination, Animal Farm and 1984.

It was after the publication of 1984 that Orwell became, as Isaac Deutscher put it, an ideological "superweapon of the cold war." Stalinist critics attacked the book as a worthless anti-Soviet tract which, as Samuel Sillen bluntly declared in Masses & Mainstream, "coincides perfectly with the propaganda of the National Association of Manufacturers." The author was characterized as a moral monster, an enemy of mankind, and as if that weren't enough, a former Trotskyist sympathizer. Those who admired Orwell as a brave cold warrior treated him with a similar artlessness. His fable, they declared, exposed the dangers of totalitarian (in those days, Russian and Eastern European) regimes. Between these two views, Orwell's face was hardened into a crude mask, and he was turned into a servant of political forces he sought, in varying degrees, to reject.

Critics who had adjusted to the shattered hopes of the 1930s by withdrawing from politics after the Second World War, concentrated almost exclusively on Orwell's personal virtues and stylistic merits. He was characterized as a model of the honest, virtuous man, "fronting the world," as Lionel Trilling observes, "with nothing more than one's simple, direct, undeceived intelligence, and a respect for the powers one does have, and the work one undertakes to do." This touching, if rather patronizing eulogy celebrated the postwar liberals' model of individual salvation: a common acceptance of the failure of radical politics, and a somewhat weary acquiescence to a tragic view of history (a myth with obvious appeal to tragic heroes with tenure). But it substituted Trilling's relatively calm adjustment for Orwell's turbulent and agonizing experience.

Those in Orwell's own tradition of democratic socialism were most sensitive to the tensions between biography and history which lie at the core of all his writing. Critics such as Irving Howe and Philip Rahv interpreted Orwell's dilemma essentially in terms of his efforts to find a radical politics whose means and ends were roughly consistent with the individual values of decency, fairness and modesty. They also defined Orwell's chief personal and stylistic merits—his capacity to say what he saw as clearly as possible, and to assess his experience candidly in terms of his moral criteria. At his best, Orwell is a lucid, forceful and vivid writer, often brilliantly self-conscious of his limited angle of vision, a master at exposing the intellectual confusions and moral hypocrisies of his many opponents—the Fascists, the English ruling class, and those on the Left with whom he disagreed. "Particularly on the Left," he observed, "political thought is a sort of masturbation fantasy in which the world of facts hardly matters."

Critics in Orwell's tradition also understood the dominant mood and probable long-range significance of 1984. Howe predicted that "In later generations 1984 may have little more than 'historic interest.' If the world of 1984 does come to pass, no one will read it except perhaps the rulers who will reflect upon its extraordinary prescience. If the world of 1984 does not come to pass, people may well feel that the book was merely a symptom of private disturbance, a nightmare. But we know better: we know that the nightmare is ours." But is 1984 merely a "symptom of private disturbance," or is it the prophetic and inescapable extension of Orwell's dominant attitudes toward self, politics and history? We may grant, as Orwell does of Swift, that "his world view is felt to be not altogether false—or it would probably be more accurate to say, not false all the time." It evokes a bleak mood which Western intellectuals cannot—indeed, should not—fully repress. But must we submit to the judgment that history is nightmare?

Rather than attempt a definitive answer, I shall sketch a tentative line of investigation. I think that Orwell was finally a victim of the imperialist system which defined the conflicts between his personal vision and his public (i.e., political) life. He spent most of his adult years exploring historical alternatives to imperialism, but in the end the unresolvable tensions drove him from politics to metapolitics, from critical analyses and action to his literary works.

In Orwell's brilliant autobiographical sketch, "Such, Such Were the Joys," a retrospective account of his school days written in 1946, he simultaneously dramatizes, interprets, and evaluates his early experiences, capturing the essence of his ordeal in the opening paragraph: "Soon after I arrived at St. Cyprian's (not immediately, but after a week or two, just when I seemed to be settling into the routine of school life) I began wetting my bed. I was now aged eight, so that this was a reversion to a habit which I must have grown out of at least four years earlier." He dwells on this episode, recounting the ways in which Flip and Sambo, the unforgettable Big Brothers of his youth, simultaneously condemned and deepened his sense of guilt, isolation and loneliness. "Some nights," he recalls, "the thing happened, others not. There was no volition about it, no consciousness. You did not properly speaking do the deed: you merely woke up in the morning and found that the sheets were wringing wet."

Thus short, threatening lectures which predictably failed in their purpose were followed by beatings: before Orwell could theoretically define the relationships between the schools and the other elements of British Empire, he felt the contradictory institutional demands of St. Cyprian's:

> Fright and shame seemed to have anesthetised me. I was crying partly because I felt that this was expected of me, partly from genuine repentance, but partly also because of a deeper grief which is peculiar to childhood and not easy to convey: a sense of desolate loneliness and helplessness, of being locked up not only in a hostile world but in a world of good and evil where

Louis A. Ferman, Joyce L. Kornbluh, and Alan Haber, Editors
POVERTY IN AMERICA: A Book of Readings Just published
Revised and Enlarged. New Introduction by Michael Harrington
The completely up-to-date edition of this basic primer, described when it first appeared as "the most valuable work yet published since this latest rediscovery of poverty in the land of plenty" (The New Leader). hardbound $9.75 paperbound $5.75

Louis A. Ferman, Joyce L. Kornbluh, and J. A. Miller, Editors
NEGROES AND JOBS: A Book of Readings
Foreword by A. Philip Randolph hardbound $9.00 paperbound $5.25

Kenneth E. Boulding
BEYOND ECONOMICS: Essays on Society, Religion, and Ethics
A brilliant collection of interrelated essays, revealing paths of Boulding's intellectual development during the last two decades. Included are sections on "Economics," "General Systems and Society," "Religion and Ethics," and "Towards Politics." $9.50

Joyce L. Kornbluh
REBEL VOICES: An I.W.W. Anthology
". . . an indispensable collection of documents for the history of the American labor movement." The Times (London) Literary Supplement hardbound $12.50 paperbound $ 4.95

COUNTRIES OF DECISION — The first four volumes of the distinguished and widely acclaimed series, The University of Michigan History of The Modern World, now available in revised, enlarged, and updated editions.

J. Fred Rippy Just published
LATIN AMERICA A Modern History $10.00

Warren B. Walsh
RUSSIA AND THE SOVIET UNION A Modern History $10.00

William Yale
The Near East A Modern History $8.50

Nathaniel Peffer
Revised by Claude A. Buss
The Far East A Modern History $8.50

The UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN PRESS
ANN ARBOR

> the rules were such that it was actually not possible for me to keep them.

And this experience seems to have crystallized "the great, abiding lesson" of his boyhood: "that I was in a world where it was not possible for me to be good." In a sense, this was the abiding lesson of his life. The "hostile world" of St. Cyprian's, which both demanded and precluded moral behavior, became a type of all institutions: they corrupt, frustrate, and eventually destroy individuals.

St. Cyprian's not only influenced Orwell's moral vision; it also shaped his epistemology and, to a considerable extent, his literary style. A confusing prison maintained by an elaborate combination of ideological and physical repression, the school took on a bleak unity for him—a unity of opposities: official values were inculcated but not practiced by the authorities, or rather, were practiced against him. As a defense against the double talk used to manipulate him, Orwell cultivated what was to become a lifelong suspicion of all abstract and dialectical modes of reasoning inconsistent with his own feelings and perceptions of the immediate environment. The years at St. Cyprian's taught him to trust only his inner sensations, the sensory world of nature, and his imagination. While at school, he was forced to rely on his feelings and to seek partial escape in imaginative literature. The rare moments of complete freedom from institutional control were spent in the countryside nearby, where he developed a love for nature: "Most of the good memories" of his childhood were "in some way connected with animals." In another context, he remarked: "I am not able, and I do not want, completely to abandon the world view that I acquired in childhood. So long as I remain alive and well I shall continue to feel strongly about prose style, to love the surface of the earth, and to take pleasure in solid objects and scraps of useless information. It is no use trying to suppress this side of myself. The job is to reconcile my ingrained likes and dislikes with the essentially public, non-individual activities that this age forces on all of us." (My italics.)

Throughout his life, Orwell retained, in varying degrees, the belief that personal freedom—indeed, individual identity—consisted in the rejection of institutional necessity. But he did not retreat from society into nature, into literature, or into self (though after leaving Eton he spent several years on the fringes of society, mainly in Paris and London). The historical system which made him an outcast and framed the essential temper of his moral, intellectual and emotional outlook also involved him in political conflict. The modes of perception and evaluation developed at St. Cyprian's helped him to grasp the ruthless aspects of British class system—its snobbery, injustice, fierce competitiveness. pettiness—and prepared him to reject the darker aspects of British imperialism as well: poverty at home and the even greater misery in the colonies. In Coming Up For Air (1939), Orwell observes that:

> . . . we always forget . . . that the overwhelming bulk of the British proletariat does not live in Britain, but in Asia and Africa. One gets some idea of the real relationship of England and India when one reflects that the per capita income in England is something over £80, and in India about £7. It is quite common for an Indian coolie's leg to be thinner than the average Englishman's arm. And there is nothing racial in this, for well-fed members of the same races are of normal physique; it is due to simple starvation. This is the system which we all live on and which we denounce when there seems to be no danger of its being altered.

For most of his life after Spain he attempted to resolve the inconsistencies between his "ingrained likes and dislikes" and the costs of political action. Finding both Stalinism and Western capitalism too repressive and hypocritical to support, Orwell tried to arrange a compromise, a politics which sought Socialist ends through democratic means. But he could not finally maintain a stable balance between personal integrity and public action. Even in the no man's land of democratic socialism, the personal price of involvement was too high (Orwell always detested the role of political propagandist), and the politics of change appeared impotent. The conflict defied resolution. To support either power bloc seemed thoroughly immoral, perhaps impossible, given his background. To steer an independent political course was futile. Finally, in 1984 the tensions were released in this bleak, monolithic vision of the absolute triumph of institutions over individuals. The world of his childhood became a prophetic metaphor of the final stages of history. It returns as total nightmare because Orwell's imaginative resolution annihilates the individual, whereas in the intermittent nightmare of his childhood, he could imagine the liberation of the individual.

In this simplified sketch, Orwell's career has a depressing symmetry: it begins and ends in St. Cyprian's, "in a world where it was not possible for . . . [him] to be good." The major part of it, however, turns on the struggle to understand and reconcile the demands of personal and public existence. He was honest enough to explore the implications of his moral code and to see that the institutional application of these values resulted in their perversion. And that, I believe, is the characteristic paralysis between thought and action which afflicts the Western intellectual who understands the injustices of imperialism without being able to embrace modes of thought and action necessary to destroy it. Orwell pursued his own salvation through a politics whose means and ends subverted each other—and failed at both. The victim of a series of tragic paradoxes, he ended his life supporting—albeit with reservations—the network of imperialist institutions which had shaped his deepest responses to himself and his world. In spite of himself, then, he became a "superweapon" in the cold war. His personal moral vision helped to preserve a system whose moral claims had been canceled by its actions throughout the underdeveloped world. As Sartre puts it in his introduction to The Wretched of the Earth: "Let us look at ourselves, if we can bear to, and see what is becoming of us. . . . We must face that unexpected revelation, the strip-tease of our humanism. There you can see it, quite naked, and it's not a pretty sight. It was nothing but an ideology of lies, a perfect justification for pillage; its honeyed words, its affectation of sensibility were only alibis for our aggressions." Sartre's personalized indictment of imperialism and the ideology of humanism may be simplistic. In social terms, of course, it was (and is) an "ideology of lies." But in personal terms, as the case of Orwell illustrates, it was the fundamental, internalized mainspring of individual thought and action.

Perhaps Orwell would have been able to survive had he been able to see more—or less. As Isaac Deutscher remarked, "The Stalinist justifications and sophisms were both beneath and above Orwell's level of reasoning." He understood that "To see what is in front of one's nose requires a constant struggle." To see beyond one's nose is equally demanding, and to unify the two perspectives—the personal and the political, the concrete and the theoretical—may be impossible. Although Orwell's distrust of abstractions protected him from what he termed "the smelly little orthodoxies" which destroy individual integrity, it also prevented him from attaining a theoretical grasp of the rational and irrational historical forces of his time, and from realizing that, in the baldest terms, the destruction of imperialism constitutes the essential precondition to human survival.

This perspective may be instinctive to the direct victims of imperialism. It is not so easily acquired by the more subtle victims. Whether stated boldly or argued subtly, however, the position requires an almost New Testament faith (the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things unseen). And it demands a logic whose propositions frequently conflict with the direct data of one's senses. Both were unavailable to Orwell. This may seem a curious observation, for the anti-historical framework of 1984 also appears to violate Orwell's epistemology. But Orwell's symbolic world of total repression and total administration was the imaginative equivalent of the deepest ranges of his interior experiences. Those of us with roughly similar backgrounds—the children of an inhuman social order—may claim to possess more comprehensive theoretical frameworks which partially attenuate the basic intellectual and moral dilemmas Orwell consistently tried to resolve. Perhaps we do. But Orwell still remains a powerful 20th-century figure who commands our attention and admiration. For in his struggle and in his defeat he embodies the chilling feeling of a dying world order. And that, at least, is a sign of life which contemporary radicals—the theoretically able as well as the theoretically inert—must somehow preserve.

Path to Total Destruction

NORMAN L. PARKS
Mr. Parks is chairman of the Department of Political Science at Middle Tennessee State University.

The reissuance of five titles in six volumes and the publication of two new books, all within the space of a few months and within his own lifetime, constitute for D. F. Fleming a remarkable if belated vindication.

These Fleming works include, in addition to those listed in the box on this page, still another new book to be issued in the spring by Funk & Wagnalls, entitled America's Role in Viet Nam and Asia. Taken together, these works testify to the remarkable vitality of what may be called the Fleming thesis of collective security against the criticism of the revisionists and the Realists, on the one hand, and the internecine conflicts between the behaviorists and traditionalists, on the other.

Nor is this the complete picture. The election of Alan Cranston to the United States Senate from California, Fleming's currently adopted home, places a Fleming-oriented political leader within the very body he so scathingly excoriated in most of his works. As a young teacher of World War II soldiers, Cranston developed a series of lectures based on The United States and the League of Nations. With Fleming's encouragement, he went on to write a forceful small volume called Killing of the Peace, which filled in many of the details of that monstrous political act of 1919 not covered in Fleming's definitive book.

The republication of the latter work thirty-six years after its original appearance attests to the durability of its scholarship and the relevance of its theme to the current world crisis. In a fresh chapter entitled "After Fifty Years," the author reassesses his original findings in the light of later research, particularly by Bailey (Woodrow Wilson and the Lost Peace and The Great Betrayal), Link (Wilson the Diplomatist), Garraty (Henry Cabot Lodge), and Mayer (Politics and Diplomacy of Peacemaking), and finds little to alter.

Books by D. F. Fleming

THE ORIGINS AND LEGACIES OF WORLD WAR I. Doubleday & Co. 352 pp. $6.95.

THE TREATY VETO OF THE AMERICAN SENATE. AMS Press. 325 pp. $12.50.

THE UNITED STATES AND THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS, 1918-1920. Russell & Russell. 593 pp. $22.50.

THE UNITED STATES AND WORLD ORGANIZATION, 1920-1933. AMS Press. 569 pp. $15.

THE UNITED STATES AND THE WORLD COURT, 1920-1966. Russell & Russell. 233 pp. $8.50.

THE COLD WAR AND ITS ORIGINS, 1917-1960. Doubleday & Co. 2 Vols. 1158 pp. $15.

Wilson comes off with flying colors with Fleming, even in the retrospect of fifty years. The author's concern is not with the criteria of efficiency but of morality. Wilson was reasonable, patient, and courteous in his dealings with the Senate. He had the overwhelming support of the people. His stakes were the peace and security of nations. Against these were the petty vanity of Lodge, the resentment of the Republican establishment toward the President as an interloper, and the blind convictions of a few sincere isolationists unshakable by any measure. Wilson made some mistakes, not the least of which was gambling his health against a successful swing around the country. But no mistake was decisive, and the burden of the consequences lies on other shoulders.

Mr. Fleming makes no reference to the Realist school of Kennan, Marshall, Thompson and Morgenthau, and their attack on Wilson and the "legalist-moralist" approach to international politics. But he reaffirms his conviction that the refusal of the vindictive Lodge partisans and the irreconcilables to accept a Wilsonian peace and a Wilsonian league doomed collective security, the only means of preventing a repetition of the First World War on an even more terrible scale, "precisely as Woodrow Wilson had prophesied."

If the "blind, suicidal mentality" of the Lodge Senate had been touched by the second plunge of the world into the abyss, it still survived in the Connally amendment which hamstrung an effective participation in the second World Court. But Fleming was unable to foresee in any of his earlier works that it would be chiefly the Executive, and not the Senate, which would push collective security aside and try to institute a Pax Americana. This tragic course is now approaching "the final catastrophe." Since the 1968 Presidential campaign

(Continued on page 155)

Posters That Feature A New Concept Of "Social Awareness"

Thought-provoking posters in brilliant colors and a variety of shapes quote from such diverse sources as Whitman, Camus, and e. e. cummings. Special appeal for students.

INDIVIDUAL "LOVE" POSTERS
ALL YOU NEED IS LOVE
22" x 34" $1.50
BE OF LOVE A LITTLE MORE CAREFUL
22" x 34" $1.50
FOR ALL THAT HAS BEEN, THANKS
11" x 34" $1.00
THE GREATEST GOOD WE CAN DO FOR OTHERS
22" x 34" $1.50
...A PIECE OF GOOD NEWS
11" x 34" $1.00

THE "CREATIVITY" POSTERS
16 8" x 8" posters, the backs of which, put together, form a large 32" x 32" poster $2.25

THE "RELATIONSHIP" POSTERS
16 circular posters, 11" in diameter, printed on both sides, can be used as mobiles $2.98

Co-published with Full Circle Associates and Liturgical Press

Now at your favorite poster store association press

Yiddish Poets in Translation

NATHAN HALPER

These translations by Mr. Halper will appear in a volume tentatively entitled A Treasury of Yiddish Poetry, edited by Irving Howe and Elieser Greenberg, and scheduled for publication by Holt, Rinehart & Winston this year. Yiddish poetry, which is only beginning to be made available in English translation, started in the late 19th century as the work of self-conscious artists, both in the United States and Europe. In some seventy-five years it has produced several major figures and has experienced all of the "movements" of modern literature. Poetry in Yiddish continues to be written and published; two of the main literary journals which publish Yiddish poetry are Die Goldene Kait (Tel Aviv) and The Zukunft (New York City).

SABBATH IS GONE

Sabbath is gone.
On the far-off snow,
A big someone
Pours grey ash.
In the little store,
Already waiting—
A sallow girl
With a black flask.

The whip is rested.
Beside the oven,
Idle — leaning
Into the dark.
On the ledge,
A half-seen napkin—
Softly hiding
The Sabbath-bread.

The meal is eaten.
In the dimness,
My father melts
Into the board.
Between my sisters,
In tired shadow,
A thread of voices
Whispers, weaves.

My mother, by the window,
Searches for a distant star.
Does not find it.
Sits in thought.
I shrink into sadness,
Trying not to think
That the cow is waiting
For me, hay and night.

DAVID HOFSTEIN

David Hofstein was born near Kiev in 1889. He worked on his father's small farm, but managed to go on with his schooling. After a hitch in the Czar's army, he became a teacher, then an editor, translator and writer in Yiddish, Ukrainian and Russian. In 1923, he went to Berlin, then to Israel in 1925, but returned to Russia a year later. On his 50th birthday, he was given a medal by the government, and in 1946 he was honored again for his efforts in the war. But in 1948, when Stalin began to liquidate the Jewish cultural figures, he was arrested, together with a large group of Yiddish writers. He died in 1952, in the insane ward of the prison.

A MURDER

Night is brown
Like Pushkin's face.
The moon, a red ace.
Two robbers, walking,
Are talking of murder.

Waves are silvery.
The scene is saintly —
Like Leo Tolstoy's beard.
Two robbers, walking,
Are talking of murder.

One says: Let it sink
All the way into the heart.
The other smells of drink
And keeps asking questions.
They slink into the village.

A peasant sleeps in the barn,
His little bag around his neck.
They strike a fire,
Throwing a light upon his face.

The peasant's breath is low.
He does not foresee his death.
Two blades go into his throat.
Blood flares like fire.

His two small coins
Disappear into their hands.
They run. Moon smiles,
Pale — like Yesenin's hair.

LAZER WOLF

Lazer Wolf was born in Vilna in 1910, the son of a house painter. After a few years of school, he left to work with his father, and subsequently became a handkerchief maker. Largely self-taught, he wrote thousands of poems, few of which were published. During the Second World War, he was evacuated to Uzbekistan. In 1945, he died of hunger and exhaustion while working in a kolkhoz near Samarkand.

CHRISTMAS

The night awakes the copper of the bells.
The town is full of incense, torch and frost.
Their god arises peacefully from death
And, on high poles, the crowd is carrying
His image; and the blind and heavy tread
Bears hate; as, in hushed and crowded quarters,
Israel's children fearfully rely —
O, compassionate God — upon Thy grace.
Beyond door and shutter sings the snow.
Frostily, the wide blue heavens glitter.
From its crown unto its loins, the night
Is hung with stars and rest. Only a cry
Beats against the wall of quiet —
The blood clamors in anguish at their knife.

MANI LEIB

TO A GENTILE POET

Heir of Shakespeare, knights and shepherds,
Gentile poet, you are fortunate.
Yours is the earth the fat pig walks on,
Giving pasture to him and to your muse.
If you but pause on a branch, your twitter
Will gain replies from all the far places.
From the field, riches; the city, comfort.
Equanimity from sated spirits.
I — unneeded, a poet among Jews,
Growing, like wild grass, from a soil not ours,
My sires, wanderers with dusty beards,
Who feed on the grit of fairs and old tomes.
In an alien world, I sing of the cares
Of men in a desert, beneath alien stars.

MANI LEIB

Mani Leib (Brahinsky) was born near Chernigov, northeast of Kiev, in 1883. In his teens he joined the revolutionary movement, and spent several months in jail in 1904. Fearing rearrest, he fled first to England and, in 1905, to New York City where he became a member of the literary crowd that met in the restaurants of East Broadway. In the daytime, he worked in a shoe factory: "Among cobblers a good cobbler, among poets a good poet," to quote one of his own poems. In his 50s, he was given a job in the bakers' union. He died in the Liberty, N.Y., sanatorium for tuberculars in 1953.

produced no national dialogue on basic foreign policy issues, there is no reason to believe that Fleming would see in the election of Nixon any hope for a halt in the downward slide. Yet he still sees one way of escape, "the same wide-open avenue to which Woodrow Wilson pointed until his dying day—a world organization strong enough to keep the peace, and now to cope with the swiftly emerging problems of population explosion and world development which cannot be dealt with successfully otherwise."

Fleming may be viewed as a "legalist-moralist," blind to the hard realities of power, mistaken in his measure of the nature of man, and a visionary in his emphasis on a world court settling disputes under world law and a world organization with power enough to whip into line any would-be transgressor. But if painstaking mastery of the "what is" of world politics, stretching from the Franco-Prussian to the Vietnamese Wars, and set down with scholarly objectivity in the thousands of pages of his newly published works, is a measure of realism then he is a realist (if not a Realist) in the best sense of that word. It is true that he finds no reassurance in Morgenthau's ever-precarious balance of power (though the two are in close agreement on America's misadventure in Vietnam) or Kissinger's calculated deterrence policy, or Kennan's containment, even though it was misapplied in practice. Fleming's voice was raised effectively in the thirties on the necessity to meet Axis power with power, through the League if possible, but otherwise if necessary. Yet he insists that the record of the modern state system proves beyond doubt that imperial ventures, balances and alliances slide inevitably into progressively more destructive wars, with total destruction promised by the next. The only solution—and our very last opportunity—is collective power for collective security.

It is a question whether men and governments can be rational enough to profit from the lessons which the power conflicts of the past century teach with such clarity. Perhaps they are foredoomed by man's corrupted nature, as Morgenthau states, to an "everlasting and ever undecided struggle," arising from "the tragic sense of life, the awareness of unresolvable discord, contradictions, and conflicts which are inherent in the nature of things and which human reason is powerless to solve."

Fleming's answer is that the world cannot survive another world holocaust, that the nations cannot resign themselves to "everlasting and ever undecided struggle." If he finds too little virtue in governments to escape destruction, he places his hope on the common people who have no stakes in power or prestige, but who do want to survive and to live in peace and security. It was the glacial pressure of public opinion which forced the Senate to accept the United Nations after it had rejected the League. Hope lies in the ability of the people of the United States and the Soviet Union to push their governments into giving up their mania of globalism; to withdraw from pressuring little states into their way of life; to come to terms on their own disagreements, and make the United Nations a haven for big and little states alike.

The Fleming book shelf, including his latest works on the cold war and Vietnam, focuses on the crucial importance of the lessons which World War I taught and the necessity for people everywhere to learn these lessons. Consequently, his newly produced volume on The Origins and Legacies of World War I constitutes a key to his entire set of works.

It is the distillation of forty years of teaching on this subject. This is not merely a descriptive work but passionately prescriptive. World War I is the pivotal event of the century. Its parallels for World War II and the present state of affairs are frighteningly clear. If we pursue the old road, it will take us, as Fleming affirms, to moral oblivion and probably to national death. For a time we can continue to abort local revolutions, as in Guatemala and Santo Domingo, and contain others. But the pay-off costs are rising and, however unlimited our military power to destroy, our political power over the mounting revolutions of our time is declining.

The first of these revolutions was Wilson's major concern—the resolution of the colonial people of the world to close the gap between them and the West. The second, the multi-faceted racial revolution, now confronts the Western world with the determination for equality. Logically, the revolutionary peoples have adopted as their own the very evils which the West originated and failed to abandon after 1918.

The final escalation is at hand, at the behest of realists and hard liners and mere Presidential decision, Fleming feels. But there is still another road open, pointed out long ago through functional international organizations, but requiring cementing the world community through the United Nations.

The fifth printing of the massive The Cold War and Its Origins, 1917-1960 in New York, Milan and Tokyo, and the forthcoming America's Role in Viet Nam and Asia round out an impressive study of the failures of Western policies covering the past 100 years. America, because of its unparalleled wealth, its moral claims, and its military power is the chief culprit. The cold war has failed and Asia is beyond control. For both Russia and America the lessons of the century are capsuled in Czechoslovakia and Vietnam. It's time for school.

A final word should be said on the Fleming style. The survival power of his books lies in part in the simplicity, directness and force of his composition. Few contemporary works combine scholarship with readability so successfully.

THE RETURN

I awake to find it's True, my children are gone. They've Vanished into the undersides of my eyelids.

They were waving
Goodbye as I drifted off, almost as if I'd left for the evening.

They return only with the deep and massive Return of sleep, waving once more
From the swings. My wife's

Pushing them toward me.
They're falling back, losing their balance.
They fall to the grass—softly.

At once
She gathers them up like loaves.
My hunger's immense,

I can hardly control myself. Evening
Dew fogs my glasses, the swings
Tremble like leaves

At their hinges.

STEPHEN PARKER

ART

LAWRENCE ALLOWAY

Thomas Hoving writes, in the book of the show: "To me 'Harlem on My Mind' is a discussion. It is a confrontation. It is education. It is a dialogue." *

As a matter of fact, it is an exhibition and we might as well try to determine what kind. According to Allon Schoener, who organized the show, it "was conceived as a communications environment —one that parallels our daily lives in which we are deluged with information stimuli." One of the Metropolitan Museum's press releases does not shrink from using the word that Hoving and Schoener prudently skirt, but which was obviously on their minds—multimedia.

Believing that only a multimedia display can grasp the complexity of 20th-century life, Schoener asserts that "we don't respond, as we once did, to an orderly progression of facts thrust at us in a fixed order." (Schoener relies a good deal, when he writes, on the 20th-century we.) But the truth is that his exhibition is nothing but a case of "fixed order." It occupies a traditional suite of rooms, the sequence of which is not at all dissolved by changes in lighting. And the material is arranged chronologically, decade by decade, each one sloganized —"Depression and Hard Times," "Militancy and Identity," etc. On the way through we (as Schoener would say) go from past to present, from big to little, from quiet to noisy areas, but it is strictly a pilgrim's progress.

En route, there are solid old photographs of grandmothers, brownstones, beauty parlors, veterans and "Jim Europe's Hell-Fighters Band"; sharp, gritty new photographs of Malcolm X, street fights, protest placards and the "National Memorial African Bookstore." In addition to the blown-up images, changing images are slide-projected by clicking carousels overhead. There are aural assists for the images: muffled tapes of interviews and speeches and of period music (the mooch, the twist). The general effect is of a Voice of America broadcast added to "The Family of Man," an exhibition of photographs selected by Edward Steichen to show that, when it comes to birth, love and death, we are all one big family under the skin. That bland show achieved postwar celebrity by its apolitical benevolence, which is about the level of argument possible with unaided visual material. Schoener promises a sensory bombardment with many messages, different for each visitor ("participation" instead of a "passive" intake, he calls it). In fact, "Harlem's" point of view is not multiple at all but unmistakably single and white. The documentary photographs don't communicate much more than evidence that "they're just like us," sharing bad housing, group photographs, World War I, show business and everything else. "Harlem on My Mind" is just another footnote to Steichen's classic collection of blown-up photographs.

If we agree that the correspondence between the complex world and complex display is untenable or, at least, that it does not work at the Met, what is there to see in the show? An exhibition of blown-up photographs, and these are always handsome, getting grainier, more porous, and less lifelike as they reach life size. The only messages that such images can carry are platitudes like "time marches on" and "we're all human." The first theme plays on nostalgia (Duke Ellington, old fashions), and the second on our most automatic reflexes of good will. On the other hand, though Schoener's photographic material is simple in content, its display has an unwholesome ingenuity. In a show which protests so hard that it is being straight and daring, the display is fancy and contrived. Columns with pasted photographs, a corridor lined with giant blow-ups, staggered building blocks, a photograph repeated to symbolize the hopelessness of the bread line (a group made into a crowd), and so on. "Communications environment" is just a pretentious term for an exhibition of the kind developed for use at trade shows and in the pavilions of world fairs. There is more sensory bombardment in a taxi ride (noisy driver, his cigar, his radio, your companion, the street).

---

* Harlem on My Mind. Edited by Allon Schoener. Preface by Thomas P. Hoving. Introduction by Candice Van Ellison. Random House. 255 pp. $12.95. As catalogue (paper), $1.95.

In the January Bulletin of the Met, Hoving calls the "Harlem" show "the first major step towards rethinking and expanding our concepts of what exhibitions should do." Does he really not know that the show is simply a routine photographic exhibit in educational-commercial format, or is he talking to cover up the fact, from himself or from others? Either way, one is disturbed by the disparity between the facts and his public statements. The sole novelty of the exhibition is its location in an art museum. During the past ten years, art museums in New York have competed with some frequency for the privilege of putting on the same shows: the Museum of Modern Art and the Guggenheim Museum both wanted to exhibit Francis Bacon and it went to the Guggenheim in 1963; Robert Motherwell was scheduled for the Guggenheim, but went to the Modern in 1965; and the Guggenheim's forthcoming Brancusi show is one coveted by the Modern. In line with this cultural overlap, Hoving put on at the Met a show which belongs to, would have been at home in, the Museum of the City of New York.

Harlem was on Hoving's mind the way Appalachia was on President Johnson's when he wanted a good cause. It is apparently not enough for Hoving to run an art museum: he thinks that the museum must also be at the service of other causes. In the name of education, he seems, in fact, to be anti-art. He is wrong and in ways that already show. I refer less to his reduction of the museum's exhibition schedule to the level of a small-town art center in pursuit of "activity," than to his politicizing of the Metropolitan Museum.

The catalogue of his show has been censured by the Special Committee on Racial and Religious Prejudice, by the Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith, the American Jewish Congress, and by the director's friend and fellow politician, the Mayor of New York. The cause was the anti-Jewish, anti-Irish and anti-Puerto Rican comments in the term paper of a 15-year-old high school girl which was used in the catalogue and called "introduction." The Met is now putting a disclaimer in the catalogue. The absurdity of a museum having to say, in effect, "We're sorry, we're not really racist." can be lost on nobody who has the Metropolitan's future at heart.

The "cultural capital of Black America," as Harlem is gushingly called in the exhibition subtitle, is not very grateful. Militants have taken the opportunity to lobby for their racial interests. A picket at the press preview complained: "There are artists in the black community . . . and they're not represented at all." The word is that the Met is going to give an exhibition of work by black artists in the near future. If this is true, it means that Hoving's way of running the museum is making it vulnerable to any special interests that decide to apply pressure. A hastily scheduled show of Negro artists could only be the result of lobbying and would represent a partial loss of control by its director of the affairs of the institution. Other groups in the country might like to plan shows at the Met. How about: "Salon de Backlash," an annual poor whites' art show; "Swing with the Tongs," a new look at old Chinatown; "The Mafia as Art Collectors;" "Ten Abstract Expressionist Teamsters;" and "Cop Art," arranged for the museum by the Police Athletic League.

(Advertisement)

Why Do You Read So Slowly?

A noted publisher in Chicago reports there is a simple technique of rapid reading which should enable you to increase your reading speed and yet retain much more. Most people do not realize how much they could increase their pleasure, success and income by reading faster and more accurately.

According to this publisher, most people, regardless of their present reading skill, can use this simple technique to improve their reading ability to a remarkable degree. Whether reading stories, books, technical matter, it becomes possible to read sentences at a glance and entire pages in seconds with this method.

To acquaint the readers of this publication with the easy-to-follow rules for developing rapid reading skill, the company has printed full details of its interesting self-training method in a new booklet, "How to Read Faster and Retain More" mailed free to anyone who requests it. No obligation. Send your name, address, and zip code to: Reading, 835 Diversey Parkway, Dept. 533-512. Chicago, Ill. 60614. A postcard will do.

THEATRE

HAROLD CLURMAN

In his Theatre-Notebook, the Polish critic Jan Kott describes the social climate which produced Slawomir Mrozek's Tango. Kott finds the play, written in 1964, a comedic graph of Polish and European moral history since 1919. International in its artistic roots and meaning, it has been more or less successfully produced everywhere in Europe (except the Soviet Union), as well as in Israel. It is now playing at the Pocket Theatre at 100 Third Avenue. Its applicability to the American scene is not as direct, but it is nevertheless a play whose relevance will be recognized by our more aware audiences.

What Kott, for all his evident enthusiasm, does not say about Tango is whether he believes it to be a "good" play in anything like an absolute sense. Withholding a decision on this point is, at the moment, justified. Regardless of its ultimate status as drama, the play has an immediate importance. Kott calls its ending "ambiguous" for reasons I can surmise and shall later explain. That it is not wholly conclusive need not be stressed for the present. More intellectually conceived than Feiffer's Little Murders, Tango belongs in somewhat the same category.

It is the "story" of a family. Grandpa Eugene is a gentleman of the "old school," the well-bred bourgeois of the late 19th century, with its predominantly aristocratic leanings. Papa Stomil belongs to the iconoclastic generation which followed shortly after the First World War. He fancies himself an artist, a man given to boundless experiment, an anarchist for whom anything goes. Eleanor, his wife, and Grandma Eugenia have been liberated from all standards of decorous conduct. The household is a shambles of total neglect without regret. Eleanor sleeps with Eddie, a boarder of roughneck proletarian mind and manners. This causes little concern in her husband. "God" is long since dead and everything is permissible.

The situation has become intolerable to Arthur, their 25-year-old son. There is nothing left for anyone to rebel against, since conventions have ceased to exist. Arthur insists on a return to tradition. A medical student, he is fed up with meaningless art and a mode of living without a coherent ideology (except for its doctrinaire negativism), and with a father who goes about all day long with his pajama fly unbuttoned. The young man hopes to reverse all this, first of

EDUCATIONAL

QUAKER STUDY CENTER—Suburban Philadelphia. Special program for study in social change, non-violence and radical living. Also year's seminar on man's search for meaning, confirmation and dialogue. Write: L. W. Lewis, Pendle Hill, Wallingford, Pa. 19086.

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, ALgonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

PERSONALS

GENE LIVES—Memorabilia of McCarthy Campaign. $4.97 package includes: 3 flower decals (rickee tickee stickees); 5 assorted buttons; 2 bumper stickers; 2 posters ("He Stood Up Alone . . ."; "Give the Presidency Back to the People"); "Keynote" Speech. $2.93 package includes: 2 decals; 3 buttons; 1 poster; 1 bumper sticker. Order from: Memorabilia & Co., Box 3769-N Georgetown Station, Washington, D. C. 20007.

MEET YOUR IDEAL MATE. Computerized Dating Service (All Ages). "Let TEAM Make You a Team". For FREE questionnaire write: TEAM Project, 245 E 30th St., New York, N.Y. 10016

WRITERS IN DESPAIR? Publishers reader-editor analyses, revises fiction, non-fiction. Including French. Box #621, c/o The Nation.

SOCK IT TO ME—over 225 other underground buttons. 1/25c, 5/$1, 50/$5, 125/$10 and 1,000/$75. Bumperstickers, beads and peace jewelry, too. Free catalogue to all! Free sample to stores. A BIG-LITTLE STORE, 1077 Mission, San Francisco, Calif. 94103.

KENNEDY '72—buttons 4/$1.00—bumperstickers 3/$1.00. Drum, Box 609-N, Fairfield, Conn. 06430.

MAN CANNOT LIVE BY BREAD ALONE. He also needs love. Support free birth control everywhere. Box 4069, Grand Central Sta., New York City 10017.

DISCOVER an intriguing, fun way of meeting literate Jewish singles. FREE literature: OPERATION MAZEL TOV, 663 Fifth Avenue, N. Y. C. 10022.

The Best Way
To Get
THE NATION

THE NATION 2-3-69
[illegible] Sixth Ave., New York 10014

☐ One Year, $10
☐ Two Years, [illegible]
☐ 6 Months, $6

☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed

(Add $1 per year postage for Canada; $2 foreign)

Name ....
Address ....
City ....
State .... Zip No. ......

all by marrying his even younger cousin, Ala, a product of an environment without any rule but that of her appetites. By brandishing a gun, he gains control over the family and sets about restoring the ancient tenets of "respectability."

Satisfaction with his victory is short-lived. He realizes that a new life cannot be built on the foundations of an obsolete culture. Since a renaissance of the past is impossible, the only remaining course which will assure the future is the exercise of power. But he is, after all, only an ideologist, and power is most efficiently wielded by people for whom it is an end in itself. Eddie the thug, who has slept with Ala as well as with Eleanor, savages Arthur and will henceforth rule the roost. Though everyone despises Eddie, all capitulate to him. At the final curtain, Grandpa Eugene (always a reactionary at heart) dances a complaisant tango in tune with the new regime.

It was easy in Poland to interpret the play as an undoubted indictment of fascism and, somewhat covertly, of Stalinism. Still, it was not safe to acknowledge the play's message in any literal sense. (It has recently been banned in Poland, and Mrozek has for some time been in exile.) As an erstwhile Marxist, Kott, now resident in the United States, could not and cannot altogether accept the play's desperate irony, its quasi nihilism.

Its weakness is a defect of its virtue; it is a thoroughly absurdist allegory. Sharp but friable, it synthesizes a condition of life in the abstract. It lacks concrete reality, specific truth. Still it reveals an unerring sense of the theatre, and it is funny. The first act may be viewed as a lampoon of contemporary avant-garde adventures; the last act as a warning, if not a prophecy.

I saw the play in London, in a Royal Shakespeare Company staging, which had little guts or bite. At the Pocket Theatre, the production is properly pointed but uncomfortably crude and tense, like the work of an intelligent but woefully inadequate college group. This is not altogether the fault of the actors, though some of them are thoroughly inept.

The damage is largely owing to the direction of Heinz Engels. This may astonish the play's producers, since Engels, who was assistant to Erwin Axer, the excellent director of the original Warsaw production, has faithfully tried to duplicate his master's staging and has himself directed the play in two German cities. That is just the trouble. One cannot imitate direction; it must be re-created. The animating force of a play's life on the stage is the actor. We have an example of this in Feiffer's Little Murders, a washout on Broadway because of dull direction and casting, and now a success at the Circle in the Square with the right cast under Alan Arkin's direction.

The actors of the Pocket Theatre have been forced to toe a strict line laid down by a director for an entirely different company under very different circumstances. The American troupe should have been allowed the freedom to act according to its own means rather than to reproduce the pattern of another company. The various rebellions depicted in Tango should have given rise to still another: an actors' revolt against the imposition of a directorial discipline alien to them. It is to be hoped that without the pressure on the actors of the director's presence, future performances will have relaxed sufficiently to achieve some of the ease needed for a satisfactory projection of the interesting comedy which Tango is.

I cannot speak with assurance of Adrienne Kennedy's Cities in Bezique at the Public Theatre. That Miss Kennedy is an inspired writer is evident from her previous play, Funny House of a Negro. The present two one-act plays—essentially dramatic poems—are so cluttered in the details of elaborate production that I could neither hear nor see them with accurate perception.

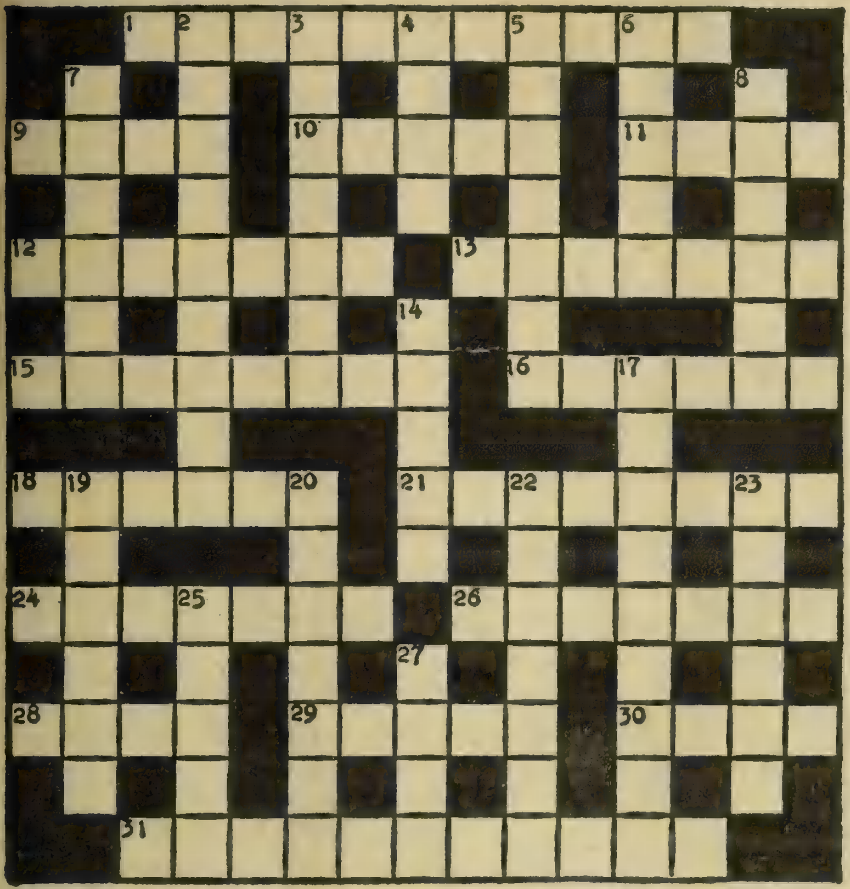
The plays (dating from 1965 and previously produced less formally) repeat a theme and a scenic vocabulary introduced in the earlier play. The author, a woman of mixed black-and-white lineage, writes with complete honesty of the laceration of soul caused by the tensions of her dual origin: American Negro on the one hand, but with a strange atavistic yearning for the graces of putative white forebears out of old England!

In Funny House she fancies a black girl's connection with Lumumba as father figure, and with the elegant postures of Queen Victoria's court. In the more memorable portion of Cities in Bezique, she is the illegitimate offspring of a wealthy white man and his black cook, with a Negro minister as foster father. Once again she finds herself related in her dreams with England's great men: Chaucer, Shakespeare and others. Tormented, she pines for an identity; a symbolic owl hoots "Who? Who? Who?"

The combination of psychological quest and visual imagery might have proved effective and affecting, if the director, Gerald Freedman, had found a simple method to bring both into harmonious concordance, but he has submerged the text in a display of fancy stagecraft so complex that we are left with no firm impression of the whole. We must await another occasion to judge Miss Kennedy's progress.

Crossword Puzzle No. 1283

FRANK W. LEWIS



ACROSS

1 Flycatcher, with a cutter behind. (11)
9 and 27 down No charge for delivery, if a best-seller? (4.4)
10 and 12 Exemplified by 29? One might have to be careful with it. (5.7)
11 Firm difficult to deal with? (4)
12 See 10 across
13 See 30 across
15 Is little brother engrained as intellectual?
16 Make less 11 in loss of tension. (6)
18 Do you have to pamper lettuce placed in it? (6)
21 Orthodox version of what Burns' beastie was. (8)
24 and 26 Dentist's office—where one asks for gas? (7.7)
28 We might not want such a burden to be so placed. (4)
29 Good for a Buck? (4)
30 and 13 across A mother in her fifties is probably rather haughty! (11)
31 How the courtroom bible might be used? You might deny doing it! (11)

DOWN

2 Tricky types? (9)
3 One should study the head of the church in sunny environment. (7)
4 Not likely to be a test of quietness. (4)
5 Holds the rest after a fashion. (7)
6 Moved by the 10 of the gods? (5)
7 You're off this if you lose more than one 13. (6)
8 Bell any one of the writers? This for real! (6)
14 and 22 It's about time one should be concerned! (5-7)
17 Younger brother? Never! (5-4)
19 "No! No!" is what the knowing knew as being his, they used to say! (6)
20 Presents of little ships? (7)
22 See 14 down
23 They're typified by a 25. (6)
25 What the cowboy might have is naught to a girl! (5)
27 See 9 across

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1282

ACROSS: 1 Raconteur; 6 and 23 Severally; 9 Copland; 10 Loiters; 11 and 13 Ski lift; 12 Moated; 15 Aversion; 16 Bengal; 18 Ambler; 20 Disposed; 24 Dampen; 28 Troilus; 29 Spelled; 30 Run-in; 31 Denatured. DOWN: 1 and 25 across Rickshaw; 2 Captive; 3 Near misses; 4 Endeavor; 5 Relief; 7 Veering; 8 Resettled; 14 Respondent; 15 Alabaster; 17 Diapason; 19 Balloon; 21 and 6 down Scholarship; 22 Passed; 26 Waded; 27 Plan.

Readers are invited to send for a free copy of Mr. Lewis' "ground rules." Address Puzzle Department, The Nation, 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014.

PUBLICATIONS

WORLD DEMOCRACY: By Bin Dir Woor. Self-Designated Symbolical World President. Unique. Entrancing. $2. Greenwich Book Publishers, [illegible] 7th Avenue, New York City. Bin Dir Woor calls on President Nixon to immortalize and transfigure his administration by calling for a permanent WORLD CONGRESS of the elected heads of all nations for one purpose only, to seek to prevent or to arbitrate all present and future wars.

PAPERBACK CATALOGUE, 270 pages, 15,000 titles, indexed. $2.00 credited toward your order. New York Book, 4B W. 43 Street, N.Y.C. 10036.

OVER 2,000,000 Back Date Magazines! Reasonable prices. Fast service. Send needs. MIDTOWN, Box 917-N, Maywood, N.J. 07607.

PAPERBACK PICK-NIC! You're invited! Free lists used bargains. Hard backs too. Harco, Box 52-NA, Carmel, Indiana 46032.

CENSORED BOOK: on "UNIVERSITIES", published privately. Send $4.00. "College Racket", Box 1107, Edinburg, Texas.

KNOW CANADA BETTER!

See world affairs from a different perspective!

Read CANADIAN DIMENSION

Independent, lively, and original. Canada's leading forum for radical thought.

$4.00 for eight large issues

Write to:
CANADIAN DIMENSION
P.O. Box 1413
Winnipeg 1, Manitoba, Canada

RECORDS

FREE 40 PAGE CATALOG offers hundreds of recordings of rare Renaissance, Baroque and Classical music. Some records priced as low as $1.00 each! All late recordings in stereo only. MHS RECORDS, Box 932 NA, New York, N. Y. 10023.

FOLK, JAZZ, BLUES. We specialize in hard-to-get LPs. Send us your wants. MONON RECORD SERVICE, Box 18221 BH, San Francisco, Calif. 94118.

HISTORY OF THE BLACK MAN. LP Album. Educational. Authoritative. $4.00. Postage included. Lovett Records, Suite 1800, 230 Peachtree NW, Atlanta, 30303.

The Nation

BOOK SERVICE

Offers the following at a discount:

☐ VIETNAM FOLLY by Sen. Ernest Gruening and Herbert W. Beaser (National Press, $8.95) $7.16
☐ FRIENDSHIP AND FRATRICIDE by Meyer A. Zeligs (Viking, $8.95) $7.16
☐ THE GOODBYE LAND by Jose Yglesias (Pantheon, $4.95) $3.96

Remittance accompanying orders should be made payable to THE NATION, 333 6th Ave., N.Y. 10014

Readers can avail themselves of our regular offer to send them any book (except paperbacks), published in the U.S. at the retail price post-free. When ordering, please give title, author and publisher.
2-3-69

Reconstruction

–What's that?

Silly question? History courses often gloss over this most hopeful and exciting time in the American past—and with reason. Whatever happened to the great promise to give some real meaning to the emancipation of black people in this country?

John Richard Dennett, an assistant editor of The NATION from 1866-69, traveled throughout the South in 1865 and 1866. He sought out and interviewed people of both races and of various occupations and social classes, and reported his findings in a series of thirty-six articles in The NATION.

Collected now in book form, entitled THE SOUTH AS IT IS, 1865-1866, this account of the fateful beginnings of Reconstruction will be a free gift to each new subscriber to The NATION.

THE NATION 333 Sixth Avenue New York, N.Y. 10014

☐ I'll join you for 1 year (48 issues). I enclose $10 and understand you'll send me free John Dennett's [illegible] SOUTH AS IT IS, 1865-1866.

☐ I'll try you for [illegible] months (24 issues). I enclose $6.

(Add $1 per year postage for Canada and Mexico; [illegible] other foreign)

Name ....

Street ....

City .... State .... Zip ....

N 2-3

The good fight

is now in

THE NATION

—Why not

join now?

DANGER ON THE JOB RALPH NADER

THE NATION

FEBRUARY 10, 1969 35 cents

J-69N PL-5337
BURLINGAME PUBLIC
LIBRARY
BURLINGAME CA 94010

BURLINGAME
-8 1969
LIBRARY

The Drift Toward Doomsday

BLIND STRATEGY of MISSILE DEFENSE

MILTON J. ROSENBERG

'Little Groups of Neighbors' DRAFT BOARDS IN ACTION L. BREWSTER JACKSON

Casanova PAUL ZWEIG Kazantzakis JOHN ARTHOS

The Heady Past of Futurism SIMON KARLINSKY

LETTERS

UAW in Africa

Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIRS: Writing of the financing of the Africa-based Peace with Freedom organization ["New Mission to Africa," The Nation, Jan. 13] Stanley Meisler asserts that this organization, reportedly the recipient of CIA funds, was also the beneficiary of contributions by individual American labor unions. "One of these, ironically," Meisler writes, "was the United Auto Workers, which for years has been criticizing George Meany and the AFL-CIO for their CIA entanglements abroad."

The UAW never contributed funds of any kind to Peace with Freedom. The presumption that it may have done so is apparently based on a transaction in December, 1963, in which the UAW, wishing to furnish a jeep to the headquarters of a bona fide Rhodesian union, did so with the assistance of Peace with Freedom, whose facilities for physically importing the vehicle and processing it through Northern Rhodesian customs were far more efficient than our own. The sum of $3,000 was specifically earmarked for this purpose, and it represents the sole transaction of any kind which the UAW entered into involving Peace with Freedom in any way. . . .

It should also be noted that any relationship between UAW and Peace with Freedom was concluded before any revelations were made concerning CIA subsidizing of this organization. We are the more interested in this clarification for being in complete agreement with the article's substantive argument. Victor G. Reuther, Director
International Affairs Department, UAW

Mr. Crude

Houston, Tex.

DEAR SIRS: It is irresponsibility bordering on hysteria to end an article ["The Dormant Bomb" by Chris Welles; The Nation, Dec. 23] with the impression that oil men regard Nixon as more favorable to them than Johnson. Any check on their records in Congress . . . as well as obvious common sense would show that this is not true. Nixon is favorable to the oil industry; Johnson is the oil industry. Howard Fallis

Maybe so, but compare Mr. Udall with Mr. Hickel.
The Editors

desperate void

Chicago, Ill.

DEAR SIRS: To Catharine Hughes's documented slaughter ["Where Are the Playwrights?" The Nation, Jan. 20] I add my own even more devastating conclusions about recent playwriting:

The most charitable evaluation of the experimenters is that in their desperate void of opportunities to train, act and find pertinent new plays, they attempt to become their own combined actors-directors-producers-and-writers. At the heart is the total collapse of contemporary playwriting and the professional theatre.

Even the best of the absurdists like Pinter and Albee and the off-off-ers grab at some myopic detail and beat it to death. The creative mainstreams flow back from Sartre, Camus, Giraudoux, Ghelderode, Dürrenmatt, Frisch, Hochhuth and even Anouilh, who barely tapped the fabulous stories of postwar events, biographies and depth psychologies that would be the envy of Shakespeare.

Until playwrights appear, capable of integrating and expanding (even their monomanias) with the zooming complexities of the space age, they'll continue to regress into the infantilism and oblivion of the American theatre.
Sidney Blackstone

EDITORIALS

Nixon, Mitchell and Leonard

For his effect on domestic policy, there is no more important official in Washington today than the director of the Civil Rights Division of the Department of Justice. The post calls for integrity, courage, political independence and a strong commitment to civil rights. It requires skill in the specialized field of civil rights litigation; above all, it should be held by a person who commands the respect and confidence of minority groups. Against this background, Attorney General John Mitchell's selection of Jerris Leonard of Wisconsin to head the Civil Rights Division is dismaying.

Leonard is a young lawyer-politician, a graduate of Marquette University, who at 25 was elected to the state Assembly in 1956. He was re-elected in 1958 and was then elected to the state Senate in 1960 and re-elected in 1964. Running against the Democratic U.S. Senator, Gaylord Nelson, last year, he was defeated by 387,000 votes, although the state went for Nixon and all Republican nominees for state office were elected. His was the worst defeat suffered by a Republican Senatorial candidate in Wisconsin since 1928.

In announcing Leonard's appointment, the Attorney General referred to his "outstanding record on civil rights." It is meager and it is not outstanding. Mr. Leonard was one of the founders of the Catholic Inter-Racial Council in Milwaukee and he has been an advocate of open housing legislation, despite the fact that he comes from Bayside, a north shore suburb. But his appointment is vigorously opposed by the Youth Council of the NAACP and by the Madison chapter of that organization, as well as by Father Groppi. The Attorney General says that he knew of Mr. Leonard's membership in the all-white Eagles Club, but by way of reassurance adds that his appointee will resign. Most public officials, including the Mayor of Milwaukee, withdrew from the club some time ago, when its restrictive policies first came under attack.

In the legislature, Mr. Leonard sponsored an amendment to the anti-lobbying law that would have imposed drastic penalties on newspapers exposing reports of illegal lobbying; the amendment, which failed to pass, was clearly aimed at the Madison Capital Times. He once denounced the editor of the student daily at the University of Wisconsin because he allegedly lived in a house with Communists. The attack was promptly repudiated by the Young Republicans at the university. He has been quoted as saying of student activists: "What those kids need is the strap across the seat of their pants once in a while and a little good rough treatment from the cop on the beat."

But there is a more specific objection to the Leonard appointment. Wisconsin's constitution bans direct state indebtedness in excess of $100,000. To get around this provision, the legislature has created several "dummy" corporations which can issue construction bonds that are not state obligations. Mr. Leonard was chairman of the State Building Commission and served as president and chief executive officer of the Wisconsin State Agencies Building

Corp., the largest of the four "dummy" corporations. John Mitchell served as bond counsel for these corporations and is said to have received more than $200,000 in fees. In view of this relationship, the Madison Capital Times predicted, before the appointment was announced, that Mr. Mitchell would find a top post for Leonard. The disturbing aspect of the appointment is that it represents not the usual form of political patronage but a reward for past financial favors.

When President Nixon announced his Cabinet, the Mitchell appointment struck us as being among the least promising. Mitchell's selection, in turn, of Jerris Leonard to head the critically important Civil Rights Division; his naming of Richard Kleindienst, Goldwater's aide in the 1964 campaign, as his top lieutenant; and his choice of William H. Rehnquist, who has been sharply critical of "the left wing" of the Supreme Court, as Assistant Attorney General, confirm our initial impression.

The Plan That Was

During the summer of 1967, Admiral Lewis L. Strauss proposed an audacious, technologically based peace plan for the Middle East. He suggested large nuclear-power plants in Israel and the Arab countries to produce electricity in sufficient quantities to desalinate sea water economically and to be a reserve source of power for future needs. The plan was supported by former President Eisenhower, and so became known as the Eisenhower Plan. It garnered considerable newspaper publicity and was endorsed editorially by many publications, including The Nation (October 9, 1967), which had described the process at length in the issues of December 28, 1963, and March 23, 1964.

The plan had been conceived by Dr. R. Philip Hammond, a chemical engineer at the Los Alamos nuclear weapons center, who disclosed it to Dr. Alvin W. Weinberg, director of the Oak Ridge National Laboratory. Dr. Weinberg borrowed Dr. Hammond and set him up at Oak Ridge. Thus the plan came to the attention of Admiral Strauss, at that time chairman of the Atomic Energy Commission. All this genealogy is to show that it is no fly-by-night vision but a respectably engendered idea.

Instead of making a grab for these nuclear plants, which could reclaim the deserts of the region and solve the problems of the displaced Palestinian Arabs, the belligerents have continued to fight at the guerrilla level and now threaten to drag the Soviet Union and the United States into a confrontation that neither wants. Another reason for neglect of the Hammond-Weinberg-Strauss-Eisenhower plan has been the myopia of the U.S. State Department. Mr. Eisenhower called the plan to the attention of President Johnson, who termed it "constructive"; but to the State Department it was "premature" until the belligerents could reach a political settlement.

Last November, with a new administration approaching Washington, the State Department became somewhat more receptive to the idea, though still of the view that it should await a political settlement. But as one of the most pressing reasons for building the plants is that they

NOV 25

IN THIS ISSUE

February 10, 1969

EDITORIALS

162

ARTICLES

166 Danger on the Job:
The Violence of Omission
Ralph Nader

168 The Drift Toward Doomsday:
Blind Strategy of Missile Defense
Milton J. Rosenberg

174 "Little Groups of Neighbors":
Draft Boards in Action
L. Brewster Jackson

176 Which Memo? The Odor of Fraud
Claudia Dreifus

178 Brazilian Storm Warning
Francis B. Kent

179 White Labor, Black Labor:
The Fomented Conflict
Lloyd L. Brown

181 Harry Golden

BOOKS & THE ARTS

182 The Heady Past of Futurism Simon Karlinsky
183 The Adventurous Life Paul Zweig
183 Communion (poem) David Ignatow
184 A Sorcerer's Apprentice Theodore Roszak
185 A Picture in the News (poem) Michael Goldman
186 Toward the Abyss John Arthos
187 Films Robert Hatch
187 Theatre Harold Clurman
188 Ghazals: Homage to Ghalib (poem) Adrienne Rich
189 Records David Hamilton
191 Crossword Puzzle Frank W. Lewis

Publisher
JAMES J. STORROW JR.

Associate Publisher
GIFFORD PHILLIPS

Editor
CAREY McWILLIAMS

Associate Editor
PHIL KERBY

Executive Editor
ROBERT HATCH

Literary Editor
HELEN YGLESIAS

Copy Editor, MARION HESS; Poetry Editor, JOHN LOGAN; Theatre, HAROLD CLURMAN; Art, MAX KOZLOFF; Music, BENJAMIN BORETZ; Science, CARL DREHER; Advertising Manager MARY SIMON.

Editorial Associate, ERNEST GRUENING

Washington, ROBERT G. SHERRILL; Paris, ALEXANDER WERTH; London, RAYMOND WILLIAMS; Bonn, C. AMERY; Canberra, C. P. FITZGERALD; United Nations, ANNE TUCKERMAN.

The Nation is published weekly (except for omission of four summer issues) by the Nation Magazine Company and copyright 1969 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014, Tel: CH 2-8400 West Coast office (for editorial correspondence only); 825 South Barrington Avenue Los Angeles, Calif. 90049. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. and at additional mailing office.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Add $1 per year postage for Canada and Mexico; $2 other foreign.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Book Review Index and the Public Affairs Information Service.

THE NATION
Volume 208
No. 6

would facilitate a political settlement, the State Department attitude merely gives spin to a vicious circle.

Now another obstacle has been thrown in the way of a Middle East accommodation based on plentiful water. Premier Levi Eshkol has announced that President Johnson, during his last hours in office, asked the Congress to provide a $40 million grant and an $18 million loan for the construction of a desalination plant in Israel alone. This proposal changes the entire picture. The plant might be powered by nuclear energy or oil, and it would have an output of only 40 million gallons daily, whereas the three plants that Admiral Strauss envisioned were to produce about a billion gallons daily, with the sites divided between Israel and the Arab states. If the Israeli plant is nuclear-powered, the Arabs will suspect that it will somehow produce plutonium for nuclear bombs. If it is oil-fueled, the cost of operation will be excessive, nor is nuclear power necessarily economical at this level.

No one contends that water and electricity alone will solve the problems of the Middle East; but what is now proposed is a travesty of the original idea. It would drive Jews and Arabs further apart, unstabilize the Middle East still more, and make the danger of an East-West confrontation even greater.

The Draft

General Hershey is probably the only person in government who consistently champions the Selective Service Act, and even he may have some midnight doubts about its fairness and wisdom. The case against the draft is, as Dr. W. Allen Wallis, president of the University of Rochester, has said, "about as lopsided as one ever meets in questions of public policy." Even so, some aspects of the act's unfairness are little noticed.

The New York Civil Liberties Union, for example, has charged that the United States Attorney in New York has displayed "unparalleled harshness and vindictiveness" in prosecuting alleged violators of the draft laws. In this issue (p. 176) we present a case, not mentioned in the New York press, in which records were tampered with, the better to assure the conviction of an alleged violator.

Dissatisfaction with the act is virtually universal. The platforms of both parties in 1968 promised to reduce discrimination and to shorten the period of draft vulnerability and uncertainty. Both expressed hope for an eventual change to a wholly volunteer service. The Democratic platform endorsed a random method of selection. Nine Senators, seven Republican and two Democratic, have asked the new Congress to abolish the draft. Our colleague, Ernest Gruening, offers an interesting proposal in an editorial on p. 165. The idea of "national service" has been widely debated (see National Service: A Report of a Conference, 1968, edited by Donald J. Eberly). Yet for all the dissatisfaction that has been expressed, the old road blocks are still in place: General Hershey and the chairmen of the Armed Services Committees of the Senate and House.

There can hardly be dissent from the finding that the present act is discriminatory and inequitable (see article by L. Brewster Jackson, p. 174 this issue). Part of the difficulty is that many opponents of the draft hesitate to draw the conclusion made obvious by that finding—the draft should be abolished. We agree with Dr. Wallis that the inequities are inevitable and are as likely to be aggravated as alleviated by formula selection or lottery selection. As he puts it, "the draft is immoral in principle, inequitable in practice, and detrimental to national security." And we agree with his further conclusion: "The first thing the new Administration should do is to start to stop it."

Udall's Last Stand

The conflict in the final days of the Johnson administration over proposed additions to the National Park System, though not devoid of personal bitterness, should be construed as more than a private matter between the President and his Secretary of the Interior, Stewart L. Udall. It involved the respective prerogatives of the Executive and legislative branches, and in particular the prerogatives of Rep. Wayne N. Aspinall (D., Colo.), chairman of the House Interior Committee. Udall lost. The outcome highlighted once more the awesome power of members of Congress who have ascended the seniority ladder to important committee chairmanships.

With an eye on the incoming Secretary of the Interior —Walter J. Hickel, Governor of Alaska and scarcely an ardent conservationist—Mr. Udall premeditated a coup which would set aside 7.5 million federally owned acres as national monuments. He got 384,500. He left office a disappointed man but with his reputation as a conservationist intact, even enhanced. Good intentions are not enough in such situations, however, and the fact is that Mr. Udall made a number of tactical errors. He underestimated Mr. Aspinall's power and also underestimated Mr. Johnson's desire to effect a smooth transition between administrations. And he tried to force Mr. Johnson's hand, never a prudent maneuver.

The dispute revolved about the proper use of the Antiquities Act of 1906, which authorizes both the President and the Congress to establish national monuments on lands already in public ownership. The purpose of such transactions is to give areas so designated the protection of National Park Service management, thus barring hunting, grazing, logging, new mineral claims, oil exploration and commercial development generally. Moreover, a national monument is in line to be converted into a national park, although only Congress can make that final transition. Beginning with Theodore Roosevelt, Presidents have used the Antiquities Act to protect federally owned lands in this fashion. The custom was to do so only on a small scale. Mr. Johnson took advantage of the act only once during his five years in the Presidency: he added Ellis Island to the Statue of Liberty National Monument.

Mr. Aspinall has never been enthusiastic about the Antiquities Act. His view is that it should be used only in emergencies, and he had an understanding with Mr. Udall to that effect. That he was not to be trifled with is indicated by the fact that a 5,000-acre tract of Chesapeake and Ohio Canal land, which was set aside by President Eisenhower has still received no appropriation for development as a national monument. When Mr. Aspinall heard of Mr. Udall's plans—embracing not 5,000 acres but 7.5 million—he telephoned the President's office to say that the President could do what he liked, but there would be no appropriations. Hence the reduction from millions of acres to a few hundred thousand. If precedent is a guide, Mr. Aspinall's committee will not approve funds even for this limited allocation.

Some conservationists hope that Mr. Aspinall can be persuaded to approve the original Udall plan, but now they also have Mr. Hickel to reckon with. Possibly Mr. Hickel will wish to brighten up his public image by asking President Nixon to add all this acreage to the existing national monuments. He will still have Mr. Udall on his back, though not in an official capacity. Udall will be chairman of the board of a newly formed international consulting firm, The Overview Group, which will work for governments and industries "to create a better environment for man." Before their disagreement, Mr. Johnson praised his Secretary of the Interior as the symbol of the New Conservation. It was not an exaggeration. All who wish to see as much as possible of America the Beautiful remain in the public domain will wish Mr. Udall better luck henceforth. And they will also keep a watch on Mr. Hickel's operations.

Thailand Cash Register

If, after months of diplomatic wrangling and years of killing, torture and demoralization, the United States should settle its accounts in Vietnam, the activities which paid off so poorly there may be transferred to nearby Thailand. There we can get ourselves bogged down even more thoroughly, thus giving well-paying jobs to more Americans, both civilian and military. Thailand borders on Cambodia, Laos, China, Burma and Malaysia; it is within easy sailing distance of South Vietnam, and of course even closer by air to both Vietnams. This last circumstance explains why we have been in Thailand for several years with our military airports and, at present, 60,000 of our nationals, of whom 47,000 are military personnel.

The Thais are a proud people with a long history of independence, but they could not resist the lure of American money, which is spread all the way from the earnings of Thai bar girls to the sumptuous rewards of the Thai business and political elite. Being proud, the Thais resent the crop of Amerasian babies and, even more, the insults of such U.S. commentators as Jack Anderson, who inquired in a recent article: "Are they robbing us blind in Thailand?" (Both the Thais and the resident Americans are doing precisely that, but the Thais feel it should not be stated so bluntly.)

Still, it must be said that we are trying to improve our relations with the Thais. In The Washington Post (January 20) Stanley Arnow reports from Bangkok that we are studying the Thais with all available means, including computers. A dozen or so research firms, employing nearly 200 American specialists, spend some $11 million a year in Defense Department subsidies on various projects in Thailand. Since it was deemed necessary to conduct such studies to parallel the U.S. military build-up in Thailand, and since the State Department lacked funds for the purpose, Defense took over. Among the results is a book titled The Blue Book of Coastal Vessels; it consists mostly of pictures of Thai fishing boats and cost $100,000. In another project, a former Oakland policeman who now works for the Stanford Research Institute (no connection with Stanford University) undertook a $280,000 project to test infrared photography in the detection of Communist guerrillas in southern Thailand. (The guerrillas are in the north.) This researcher became a buddy of the exiled Gen. Phoumi Nosavan, who will be remembered as the CIA's protégé in Laos. Phoumi aspires to recapture Laos—naturally with American help.

Volunteers for Vietnam

One of the most urgent pieces of legislation for the 91st Congress to enact is a drastic reform of the Draft Act. Such action is essential to lessen the unrest that afflicts our nation.

Despite the hopes engendered by the Paris talks, the war goes on. Our casualties continue to mount. They now exceed 30,000 killed in combat, several thousand more from causes incidental to their presence in Southeast Asia, and more than a quarter of a million wounded, some of them horribly crippled for life. The draft calls continue undiminished. Considering the widely divergent settlement proposals of our adversaries and of our own government, to say nothing of those of the present South Vietnamese government, it is by no means improbable that the fighting will continue, perhaps for a long time. The fact must be faced that the war is far from over. And it is infinitely tragic that while the peace talks are under way men continue to die, the destruction of war continues in Southeast Asia, and we postpone any real coming to grips with our vital domestic problems.

In the course of my Senate service I twice sponsored amendments to the Draft Act to provide that no draftee should be sent to Southeast Asia without his consent. These efforts failed, receiving only two votes—those of Sen. Wayne Morse and myself. Yet the logic of such an amendment seems to me compelling. The draftees are the only Americans in our armed forces compelled to serve in a war which many of them consider totally unjustified and immoral—a view which I and an ever increasing number of Americans share. It is infamous that draftees are obliged to choose between killing people against whom they feel no grievance—and perhaps being killed or maimed in turn—or refusing to go and incurring imprisonment for years and the ruin of their civilian lives. No one should be subjected to such a dilemma. Their comrades who enlisted may also detest this war, but they committed themselves to go wherever they were ordered. The draftees made no such decision.

It is my view that enactment of such an amendment would not impair our military strength. I believe that perhaps half of the draftees would choose to serve in Vietnam. But the effect on nation-wide unrest would be calming and beneficial and in line with Sen. Edward Kennedy's statement in connection with his bill to amend the Selective Service Act that "the hallmark of a free society is a pervasive spirit of individual freedom and choice," and that "in contrast, the hallmark of a closed society is compulsion." I was deeply disappointed that not more of my "dove" colleagues supported my amendment, particularly in view of their emphatic criticisms of the inequities of the existing draft. Senator Hatfield, for example, declared in the Saturday Evening Post (July 1, 1967), that it is "inherently unfair, monstrously inefficient and pernicious in its invasion of the individual liberty that eight generations of Americans have fought to preserve"; and further that "we are long overdue in ending this invasion of the liberties of our young men."

Sen. Edward Kennedy on March 28, 1967, introduced a bill to revamp the Selective Service System which was co-sponsored by Sens. Case, Hart, Kennedy of New York, Mondale, Nelson, Tydings and Yarborough. After extensive hearings, Congress took no action and the inequities which he and his colleagues deplored continued.

The remedies they proposed through revised methods of selecting draftees seemed, and still seem, to me beside the point. The draft for this war is itself the monstrosity and inequity. While there is in Congressional circles and elsewhere much talk now about "no more Vietnams" and about a volunteer army for the future, it is the immediate and continued slaughter in Southeast Asia, with all the other deplorable concomitant effects, which calls for prompt remedial action. Talk about future reforms is escapism from the urgent current need. Either of two reforms of the Draft Act would meet the situation for the duration of this war—the one I have proposed or one that would allow conscientious objection to a particular war. The latter seems to me the less practical. Since there may be a time when our country is really attacked and when our security and vital interests are threatened—as they were at Pearl Harbor but are not in the present Southeast Asian involvement—conscientious objection to a particular war appears to me less desirable. But enactment of the other proposal would go far to diminish the spreading bitterness and unrest among our young men, and would bring comfort and relief to the hearts and minds of millions of Americans. ERNEST GRUENING

DANGER ON THE JOB

THE VIOLENCE OF OMISSION

RALPH NADER

Mr. Nader has made a national reputation as a champion of consumer interests. His first published pieces on auto safety—"The Safe Car You Can't Buy" (April 11, 1959), "Fashion or Safety" (October 12, 1963), and "The Corvair Story" (November 1, 1965)—appeared in this publication.

The chief forms of domestic violence that afflict American working men and women are motor vehicle crashes and occupational accidents and diseases. The toll in death and injury from either of these utterly dwarfs the violence committed in street crimes. But while the nation is properly concerned about such crime, it ignores almost completely the far greater death, injury and wage losses on farms, in mines, factories and open-work areas such as construction sites. Consider one comparison out of many that could be cited: all the urban riots in this country during the past three years have led to about 260 dead; each working day brings death to fifty-five workers, disabling injury to 8,500 and lesser injury to 27,200. Every year, 14,000 to 15,000 workers die, more than half a million are disabled by occupational diseases, more than 2 million are disabled by occupational accidents, and more than 7 million are injured. And even these figures understate the situation, because death from prolonged exposure to toxic chemicals or particulate matter—asbestos, beryllium, carbon monoxide, coal dust, cotton dust, cancer-causing chemicals, dyes, pesticides, radiation, etc.—is rarely recorded. There are six reasons why the death and injury figures fall short of the facts—reasons which must be recognized publicly before significant progress can be made to reduce worker injury and disease:

I

Industrial firms have long made it a practice to play down the injuries and diseases experienced by workers. In the first place, the definition of what constitutes an injury is decided by an industry-dominated body called the United States of America Standards Institute. Second, companies go to considerable length to avoid reporting a lost-time injury—not only to keep their insurance rates down but to hold their standings in safety competitions. For example, a worker in a Jones & Laughlin steel plant received a groin injury; he was taken off his usual job and placed in a chair where he sat doing nothing for two weeks. Most blue-collar men can tell similar stories.

II

Plant physicians surrender to or are constrained by corporate dictates as to the exercise of their medical judgment and right to publish in the professional literature. A case in point involved the late Dr. John Zalinsky, a physician at the Brush Beryllium plant outside Cleveland, who wanted to publish in a medical journal his cases of beryllium poisoning (without mentioning their names). He was told that if he did so, he would have to look for another job.

Dr. Lorin E. Kerr of the United Mine Workers Welfare Retirement Fund, an authority on coal workers' pneumoconiosis (popularly called "black lung"), has spoken sharply on the subject, denouncing > the attitude and influence of employer-oriented physicians who avoid facing known facts about the ravages of coal dust in human lungs because to do otherwise would cost money. The impact of physician knowledge and attitudes is apparent in inaccurate or incomplete death certificates. These documents are essential for determining the existence of a dangerous dust requiring governmental action for control or eradication. Too often no records mean no action. Physician denial or avoidance of known facts can also determine the publication of information. In 1956 the concern of some physicians about management attitudes effectively blocked the publication of a paper of mine on coal workers' pneumoconiosis in the most widely circulated medical journal in the United States. One can only wonder how many times other medical information vital for the protection of the health of workers has not been published for the same reason. Physician attitudes also influence other groups such as company lawyers, state legislators and officials who, all told, are remarkably resistant to the elimination or control of coal dust because it would cost money.

"Black lung" affects at least 150,000 active and retired miners; 2,000 men die of it in Pennsylvania every year.

III

State safety laws and regulations are weak, inspection is poor, and penalties are rarely imposed. The states spend an average of 40c per worker per year on health and safety; Texas and Oklahoma spend 2c per worker per year. According to the Bureau of Labor Statistics, of the 1,524 state inspectors in the whole country, 697 inspect boilers, elevators and mines, leaving only 827 for general safety inspection, construction, safety promotion and education, health and industrial hygiene. (Almost twice as many fish and game wardens—about 3,000—are employed by the states to look out for wildlife.) Four states employ no safety inspection staff in any area, and seventeen other states have ten or less men on their safety inspection staffs. More shocking is the fact that only three states employ specialists in the area of occupational health and industrial hygiene.

IV

By and large, union leaders have been far too pliable when confronted by management's indifference to worker health and safety. Too often, health and safety conditions are used as trade-offs at the bargaining table for more tangible wage gains. This has been the case, for example, with the United Mine Workers' leadership; it has finally become verbally aroused over the plight of their workers, but is still less than determined to reform working conditions in an industry that treats coal miners as less valuable than coal. Union leaders simply do not give high priority to health and safety; their failure to lobby aggressively for the proposed Occupational Safety and Health Act of 1968 cannot be covered up by resolutions and resonant statements for the record—after which they resume their industry-indentured past.

V

The federal government has not met its responsibilities by assigning adequate funds for research and training programs in occupational health and safety. The Department of Health, Education and Welfare (HEW) has not grasped the importance of this problem, of the need to develop preventive systems and competent medical and engineering personnel. HEW's advocacy has been weak from the start and recently the occupational health activity in the Department has, if anything, been downgraded. The one area where HEW has received some consistent funding ($5 million since 1953) has been for research on the causes and prevention of coal workers' pneumoconiosis, but there has been little to show for it, apart from a prevalence study completed three years ago. Western Europe spends twenty times as much on research into the coal-dust disease area, and its control measures are years ahead of legislation in this country, which does not even have uniform coal-dust standards to enforce.

VI

The Workmen's Compensation system in this country—its coverage, benefits and deterrence—is creaking with obsolescence. A thorough inquiry is needed and serious thought should be given to national uniformity. For example, "black lung" is not considered "work related" by the compensation laws of any states, except Pennsylvania (1965), Virginia (1968) and Alabama. Its shattered victims, spitting up coal dust, struggling for breath, afflicted with emphysema, massive fibrosis or enlarged heart, are denied workmen's compensation in the mining states of West Virginia, Kentucky, Ohio and Illinois. And in Kentucky, according to the state's Department of Labor, about 1,400 of the 2,000 mines licensed to do business fail to comply with the Workmen's Compensation Law for mine injuries other than "black lung." Yet the present Governor and his predecessor have not considered "law and order" to be applicable to coal operators.

Where does the National Safety Council fit into this picture of suffering and indifference? It does no service to hide the fact that the council's industrial members and constituency take a strong interest in how far it presses its aims in the occupational health and safety area. That interest, to use a mild word, placed the council in a difficult position in 1968, when the Occupational Safety and Health bill was defeated. Some observers believed that the council retreated from a relatively positive position on the bill in February to a statement a few months later more in consonance with industry preferences and the U.S. Chamber of Commerce. The council's independence has been similarly compromised in other safety areas. If it is to be true to its aims and principles in the area of occupational health and safety, the council cannot continue to ignore at least some of the above noted problems that obstruct progress toward more humane working conditions.

THE DRIFT TOWARD DOOMSDAY

Blind Strategy of Missile Defense

MILTON J. ROSENBERG

Mr. Rosenberg, professor of social psychology at the University of Chicago, is a member of the board of directors of SANE. He is a contributor to two recent volumes: International Behavior: A Social-Psychological Analysis (Holt, Rinehart & Winston) and Domestic Sources of Foreign Policy (The Free Press, Macmillan).

Here is a little experiment worth a few minutes' amusement. If you have access to a lecture audience, a classroom full of students or even a packed cocktail party, put the following question: "Did you know that anti-ballistic missiles intended to destroy incoming nuclear missiles all have nuclear warheads? They are, in effect, atomic bombs, some of which are designed to be exploded by us above our own territory. Now, truthfully, did you know that?"

I have been asking this question of various audiences composed of college-educated adults or of bright young undergraduates, and always find that more than half of them had been unaware of this basic fact. Nothing bespeaks more devastatingly the absence of that informed public opinion which, according to the theory of democracy, can best exert a reasonable check upon the excesses of poorly conceived policies. Arms strategy remains an arcane preserve which most Americans are willing to leave to the military, to the games-theory analysts and defense intellectuals, and to hawkish Congressmen busy building their quick careers.

It is against this background that, on the suburban outskirts of Chicago, Detroit, Seattle, New York and many other cities, the ABMs are about to be installed. Thus begins the first phase in the "deployment" of the "thin" anti-ballistic-missile defense system. During the next few years we shall be able to watch that system thicken—unless the whole process is checked by reason and an outraged citizenry.

To date, only two basic arguments against ABM have become clear even to those few among the attentive public who have tried to keep informed. (They are largely members of peace organizations or academics or both.) The first is that the system is doomed to technical inadequacy: anti-missile missiles may destroy some incoming bombs; but, with the masking made possible by "dummies" and with the inevitable development of multiple warheads, they cannot greatly reduce the scope of nuclear devastation. The second and even simpler argument against ABM heard these days, particularly from small groups of anguished suburbanites living near the proposed ABM sites, is: "How can we be sure the damn things won't go off accidentally?"

The question of locations has grown a little sticky, particularly around Chicago, where an active group of anti-ABM nuclear scientists in the suburban Argonne National Laboratory has been able to put its concern across to some of the neighbors. But the mills of defense establishment public relations grind exceeding heavy, and the apparatus of public briefings, endorsements elicited from local notables, etc., may succeed in calming the tempest in this suburban teapot.

Whether ABMs can go off accidentally—or whether, as the defense establishment insists, they embody perfect fail-safe systems—is an urgent question. But the very urgency confines both sides of the debate to a superficiality which ignores further consequences of ABM that are as calculable as they are disheartening.

These deserve to be examined not only because of the immediate importance of the issue but also because such an analysis demonstrates yet again one of the most depressing open secrets of our time: our conceptual and military cold warriors, despite their elegant applications of systems theory, have attained to a level of intellectual incompetence matched only by their hubristic excess. In no way is this more evident than in their characteristic unwillingness to think about the social and political consequences of innovations in weaponry.

What any competent graduate student in any of the social sciences could tell them is that actions which alter previously stabilized arrangements have secondary as well as primary effects, that they "make waves"; and that the waves now about to spread out from the mounting of the Sentinel ABM system will lap upon many shores. Not only will they alter the arms policies and aspirations of other nations; they will also influence the political relations among those nations and the very quality of the lives lived by their citizens and ours. There is good reason to conjecture that in its ultimate influence ABM may move us a few giant steps backward from those once millennial, but now essential, goals—the lasting pacification of international relations and the humanization of modern existence.

In both first- and second-strike capabilities, the United States has had a considerable edge (sometimes estimated as high as 4 to 1) over the Soviet Union and, of course, a far vaster edge over China. Any attempt to widen that advantage still further "destabilizes" the already delicate balance of terror by which mutual deterrence is supposedly achieved. That is the basic reason why the Soviet and the Chinese Governments, which probably rely as heavily as ours does on the advice of military intellectuals, are quite likely to answer the erection of our ABM system with a considerable increase in their assault capability. They will do so not only by improving the technology whereby dummy missiles and multiple warheads can confound our PAR (perimeter acquisition radar, the detection subsystem of the Sentinel network) but also by ordering a sizable increase in the number of armed missiles they can direct at us.

This will strain their resources, but they will be running on an inside track, because it is a basic fact long since acknowledged by our own strategic planners that the price for any degree of ABM protection exceeds what the opponent must pay to offset that protection with increased assault power.

Former Secretary of Defense McNamara (who was surely not usually a critic of the defense intellectuals but rather their creature and patron) testified in February, 1965, to this very effect before the House Armed Services Committee:

> At each successively higher level of U.S. expenditures, the ratio of our costs for Damage Limitation to the potential aggressor's costs for Assured Destruction becomes less and less favorable for us. Indeed, at the level of spending required to limit fatalities to about 40 million in a large first strike against our cities, we would have to spend on Damage Limiting programs about four times what the potential aggressor would have to spend on Damage creating forces, i.e., his Assured Destruction forces.

Toward the end of his incumbency McNamara finally yielded and made a notably lukewarm recommendation that the $5 billion "thin" ABM system be deployed. The game had been won by a team composed of the Joint Chiefs, some of their "intellectual" courtiers, the hawkish Congressional contingent and the defense industry complex. And somewhat in the Soviet style, the leading opponent of the chosen policy, despite his late recantation, was soon sent packing—though surely also for a few other "sins," incurred by his occasional penchant for worrying in public about where the defense establishment that he headed, but never truly controlled, was really taking us.

If one is less entrapped in the closed system of defense theory than were McNamara and his band of whiz-kids, one quickly gets beyond the single problem they were able to discern. That it won't work and commits us to a competition in which we spend much more than our opponents is the least of the difficulties posed by ABM. More chilling by far are the probable effects on the actions of elites and the opinions of publics both here and abroad. The arms policies and strategic theories of the three great powers and their allied states are reared upon an essentially paranoid axiom: one must conceive the worst the opposing power could do and then operate on the assumption that, if unchecked, it will do it. This assumption forces certain "prudential conclusions" (the term is borrowed from the lexicon of modern strategic analysis) upon the policy planners of Moscow and Peking.

The first, as already suggested, is that they must counterbalance the possible limited effectiveness of ABM by increasing their first- and second-strike capabilities. This expansion, according to some informed opinions, has already been set in motion, though it probably could still be canceled if, even at this late date, we were to abandon our ABM plans. But there is no present prospect that we will do so, and the attempt of the Communists to counterbalance by increasing their offensive capability will no doubt be vigorously pushed forward.

Unfortunately, both for the managers of the Communist world and for those people everywhere who hope for universal, gradual disarmament, a counter-escalation by the United States and its more dependent client states may be expected to follow in short order. From the empowered hawks and hard liners who have managed in the past to override the claims of reason that have sometimes weakly issued from the Arms Control and Disarmament agency, we must expect a two-pronged advocacy. They will certainly demand (indeed the rumblings have already been heard) an expansion of ABM to the full $40 billion package for which plans have already been drawn; they will also call for further increase in the number of our ICBM assault missiles, further hardening of their emplacements, further development of sophisticated penetration aids and multiple warheads and also, perhaps, for increased reliance upon the non-nuclear weapons of biological warfare.

The Nixon Administration may yield rather easily to such claims, for during his successful campaign the new President made much of his intention to reverse what he saw as a disturbing lag in our military readiness. Whether his perception is truly that clouded—or whether he was adopting a variant of John Kennedy's rather cynical "missile-gap" campaign ploy of 1960—remains obscure. Much less in doubt are the President's earlier history as a favored and favoring friend of the military establishment, and his appointments (crucial in themselves and symbolic of the new Administration's general orientation) of a leading Congressional hawk and a baron of aerospace industry to command the Department of Defense.

Thus with the coming erection of the Sentinel ABM system, the United States will probably incite a new arms race that will rapidly spiral upward and outward, drawing in not just the three great powers but many other states that must also seek what passes for security within the rules of the mad game forced upon them by the giants.

Perhaps Churchill spoke the true intent of Western leaders when he asserted during the early phase of the cold war, that "we arm to parley." But the more likely consequences of the new nuclear arms race heralded and provoked by ABM will be in the opposite direction. The sometimes halting, but often productive, U.S.-USSR negotiations at Geneva, from which came the nonproliferation treaty, cannot continue to prosper against a background of mutually distrustful escalation. Instead, with the mounting of ABM and the ensuing escalation race, those military and strategic specialists of both nations who have long opposed arms limitation agreements will have effectively achieved their purpose.

Almost every conceivable immediate and long-range effect of their victory must be entered on the debit side of the ledger of hope and despair. And those potential debits are almost as easy to demonstrate, to any but the proudly blind strategists and the policy makers they have bewitched, as is the inner logic of a simple syllogism. Among the many such effects is the psychological—or, one might say, perceptual—changes that will be induced in Soviet and Chinese policy makers as they ask themselves what ABM really means and what their American opposite numbers are up to. Since they are just as committed as the American theorists to the search for prudential (that is, pessimistic) conclusions, Soviet analysts will be aware of this possible meaning: Our military and intellectual hard liners have succeeded in getting a "pre-emptive," first-strike nuclear assault listed as an option that the United States will elect under certain crisis conditions.

What would lead them to this interpretation? Their most compelling consideration would be the apparent belief of our military planners that an ABM system (particularly one as vast as the $40 billion one that is already being advocated) could possibly limit damage to some degree. Of particular importance would be the strategically obvious fact that the American ABM, if thought capable of working at all, would be counted on by our military experts to achieve more against a retaliatory second strike than against a pre-emptive first strike. Soviet strategists would have to attribute this conclusion to the American planners because they know, as we do, that the main targets of an American pre-emptive assault would necessarily include Soviet hard, as well as softer, ICBM sites. The indestructibility of hard missile installations is, of course, assumed rather than convincingly demonstrated—and a pre-emptive attack would probably destroy a number of them and also hamper the communications and computer networks by which they are guided to target. Soviet analysts will conjecture that our analysts have reasoned that an impaired Soviet second strike could be limited still further at the receiving end by our anti-missile defenses. From this, their reconstruction of our thinking would suggest that we have estimated the price we would have to pay for destroying the Soviet Union as high but acceptable.

The Soviet analysts may think their American counterparts wrong in this estimate (almost all independent American technical experts think them wrong), but the suspicion that such an estimate lies behind the erection and expansion of the Sentinel system is enough to alter Soviet arms and diplomatic policy for the worse. Indeed, it could very well be enough to force them into considering a pre-emptive first strike at some future time when the two nations stand "eyeball to eyeball" at some coming Mideastern or European crisis. Thus our move toward a probably unworkable and wasteful defense system will not only foster an increase in Soviet assault capability but also will increase the lure of a Soviet first strike against us.

It is even more probable that an ABM defense will encourage the more apocalyptic members of our own military establishment to think about—and ultimately to advocate—a first strike against Russia. For, whether or not it provides any real protection, the expanded Sentinel system, once in place, will infect some of the hard heads under brass hats with the fantasy that exchange of nuclear attacks might end in an American "win," rather than in mutual obliteration.

Of course it can be argued that even under these conditions neither the United States nor the Soviet Union would lightly court the risk of doomsday—and thus the "delicate balance of terror" will continue. One may hope so, may even think it probable. But the probability has nonetheless been weakened by ABM and will be weakened still more by the immediate effects of ABM upon American and Soviet planning. And, since balance of terror has always been extremely delicate at best, it is a weakening that true prudence cannot allow.

Many other calculable consequences will flow from the ABM-initiated drift toward escalation of arms and of international distrust. And most of these will increase the probability that the unthinkable (about which the strategists of powers, great and small, are thinking all the time) will nevertheless prove doable. Still other consequences of ABM and of the escalation to follow will promote dehumanization and social injustice in a world which already has its full share of such burdens.

In the first category, here are just a few additional possibilities that the strategists should be brooding about, but which they have put aside with the special sang froid that is the hallmark of their style:

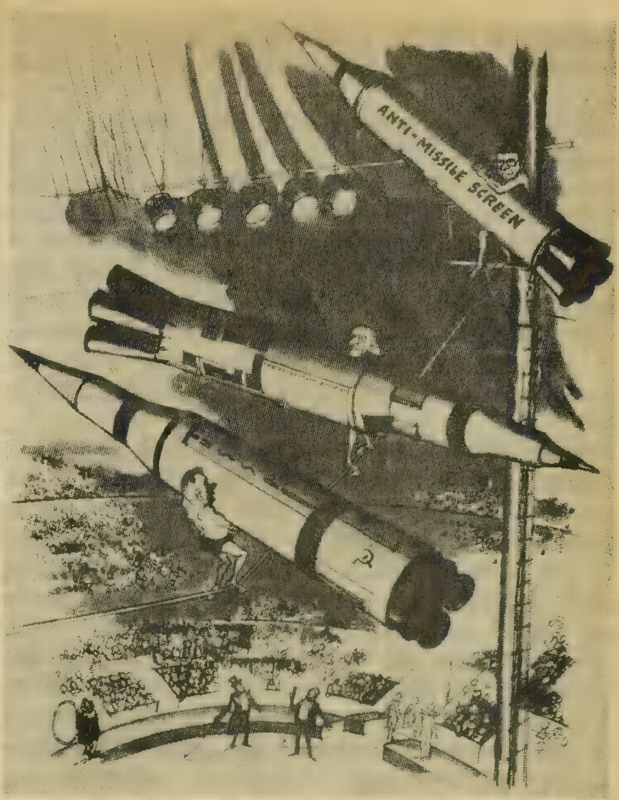
¶The explanation of Sentinel offered by Pentagon spokesmen is that it is designed to defend us against the small ICBM assault that will be within Chinese capability by the mid-seventies. In Peking this explanation is bound to stimulate the hypothesis that in certain situations we would be prepared to obliterate China, and thus are readying ourselves to deflect the small, but still potentially serious, retributive damage it could inflict on us. Also, it may suggest that we have entered into, or are considering, a collusive anti-Chinese agreement with the Soviet Union. If China entertains these theories (and, again, the "prudential" standard will so require) it could hardly attempt to placate us by becoming less provocative. Despite effusive anti-American rhetoric, China has challenged us nowhere in recent years, except by its logistic and propaganda support of North Vietnam and the Vietcong. A more likely Chinese response would be to reduce our intimidating power over them (and thus resist whatever claims we may make upon their national purposes) by placing Southeast Asia and even India in jeopardy. They should be able to do this soon and rather easily. It requires only that medium-range thermonuclear missiles (which China already possesses and is continuing to build) be poised on the Chinese borders and pointed toward Laos, Cambodia, Thailand, Malaysia and India. The consequences in further Southeast Asian instability and in the possible ignition of planet-wide immolation are as obvious as they are dismaying.

¶For a while in the acting out of the deterrence-based cold war there seemed to exist this tentative understanding between the United States and Russia: If the game of thermonuclear chicken did lead into a hot war, they would, at least in the first exchange of assaults, try to destroy each other's missiles rather than the cities and their populations. ABM pushes the Soviets away from that option and toward the counter-city strategy—or at least toward a mixed strategy which programs both kinds of targets. It does so because Sentinel places both the intercept missiles and some major components of the radar detection network on the peripheries of a number of our major cities. Two targets for the price of one is a lure that few military planners, shortsighted and aggressive enough to have earned their red or gold stars, would be able to resist. ABM, then, makes the destruction of our cities more tempting to the potential enemy than it would otherwise be.

¶Advocates of ABM have sometimes argued that it would discourage proliferation of nuclear arms among the many nations who now are technically capable of joining the club. It is likely to have the opposite effect, for it is bound to suggest to NATO states and other restive allies of the United States that we plan to take better care of ourselves than of our friends. They need not be convinced that ABM is certain to work; their military will persuade them that it might work. And that, combined with enthusiastic support and pressure upon Washington from the American defense industry, should be enough to generate public enthusiasm for providing our client states with ABM systems of their own. But the scenario would not end with an unarmed Norway, West Germany or Australia lurking behind its own small and easily penetrable Sentinel system. As Robert Rothstein has argued, in one of the few truly clear-eyed analyses of the damage that ABM will do:

> The costs [of setting up ABM systems for allied states] would be very high, not least in the sense that promising or providing a nation with an ABM system may be the first step toward its acquiring offensive nuclear weapons—on the uncertain but not implausible presumption that an ABM system without a complementary offensive capability is as unsatisfactory as entering a battle with a shield but without a sword. Moreover, the problem of defending against an MRBM (medium-range ballistic missile) is almost insuperable, given their limited flight time, and especially if they are delivered in number. Hence, the pressure for offensive weapons as a deterrent will be heavy. (Foreign Affairs, April, 1968.)

Thus ABM is the latest instance of America's impressive talent for setting the left hand against the right, for allowing the military to undermine virtually any arms-limiting opportunities that our few and harassed peace planners may have been able to initiate with other nations. Rapid expansion of the list of signatories to the non-proliferation treaty was one of the best lingering hopes for an international resort to restraint. That hope will now be significantly weakened, if not shattered, as the cranes begin to gouge out the suburban holes into which the ABM missiles and radar and computer facilities are to be implanted.



Norman Mansbridge, Punch

Meanwhile, what will be happening back home—in families, schools, cities, the economy and our minds? The domestic effects of the full ABM system now loom darkly as new potential injuries to human sensibility and fulfillment. And, to thrust the knife of pessimistic social realism still deeper, many of these consequences will also tend to feed back into the strategic problems I have already discussed—that is, apart from their debasing influence upon the quality of American life, they will also further heighten the risk that we and our antagonists will lose control of the deterrence game and slip into devastating local wars or into full thermonuclear annhilation.

The following are a few of the more obvious dangers—and, again, they appear to have been neglected both by the strategic-military theorists when they conceived the ABM caper, and by the governing hierarchs of Congress and the White House when they consented to it:

¶Even the strategic analysts can now perceive the Vietnamese-American war to have been a mistaken investment. (Its immorality concerns them not at all; their approach, as they see it, is "scientific," and they must remain "value free.") Gradually the war will be closed out. If possible, there will be some saving of American face and perhaps some temporary lease on dwindling power for the Saigon regime; but "counterinsurgency warfare"—a strategic innovation as ethically degrading as it was militarily unfeasible—will have been discredited. The money spent on it in Vietnam (more than $30 billion last year) would, in a rational system, be put to other, nonmilitary uses.

However, by the inner dynamic which governs the lives of institutions grown too vast, too powerful and overstaffed, the American military establishment is now seeking new ways to expand, rather than reduce, its hoggish slice of the budget. The thin Sentinel system is the immediate answer; the thickened system is already advocated as the great promise of the near future. An overall return to flirtation with thermonuclear Götterdämmerung will pass for strategic inventiveness and adaptability when new appropriations are being rammed through Congress.

Already the premonitory signal has been sounded by spokesmen for the Pentagon and the large cabal of hard liners in Congress, and has even been hinted by the Bureau of the Budget itself: the coming Vietnam cutback must not be counted on to reduce military funding needs —arms development and modernization will, on the contrary, require an increase in military spending.

Thus our cities will remain as neglected as they have been during the great fiasco of the overcelebrated and underfinanced War on Poverty. And as they continue to sink into disorder and despair, the polluted air ringing with the anguish and anger of blacks and others who lack the homes, the schools, the jobs necessary for their hope and for the nation's redemption, the distant policy elite will be serving the citizenry by pouring even more of its wealth into re-energizing the great game of international paranoia. It seems truly doubtful that the escalation of human misery and bitterness that will be caused by the coming arms escalation can long be sustained. Thus ABM will not only exact vast human cost from the socially neglected; it will move us still closer to the detonation of full domestic conflict, which threatens us far more meaningfully and deeply than an imagined Chinese nuclear assault.

¶Almost no members of the general public seem yet to have realized that the full Sentinel system will require a vast new program of shelter construction, directed toward the ostensible goal of being able to put the country temporarily underground whenever necesssary.

As early as 1964-65, when they were beyond the research and development phase with the Nike system (the far less ambitious and partially installed precursor of Sentinel), the military were already insisting that both "active" and "passive" defense were required. "Active defense" means ABM missiles; "passive defense" means shelters.

It is more than likely that the military will soon be openly advocating a multibillion-dollar allocation for the fitting out of natural shelters (deep basements of public buildings, subways, etc.) whose locations and capacities have already been surveyed, for the construction of thousands of new public shelters and, probably, for stimulating further construction of private ones.

In part, this will be a response to the continuing anguish of some of the older Manhattan Project physicists, and to the plans and recommendations drawn by research groups that they dominate. Eugene Wigner and Edward Teller, among others, have urged shelter building on the ground that we must do whatever we can to reduce the fatalities of a nuclear assault. That shelters will not adequately protect the sheltered, particularly when they emerge into a poisoned devastation, is a consideration to which these advocates turn a deaf ear.

But for the military and the cool civilian strategists who advise them, humane concern is somewhat beside the point. They have another set of reasons for building shelters into the overall ABM plan: passive defense will put off and deflect future public protest against the Sentinel system, and it will enhance the "credibility" of our resolution to go beyond the brink and into full thermonuclear war, if necessary.

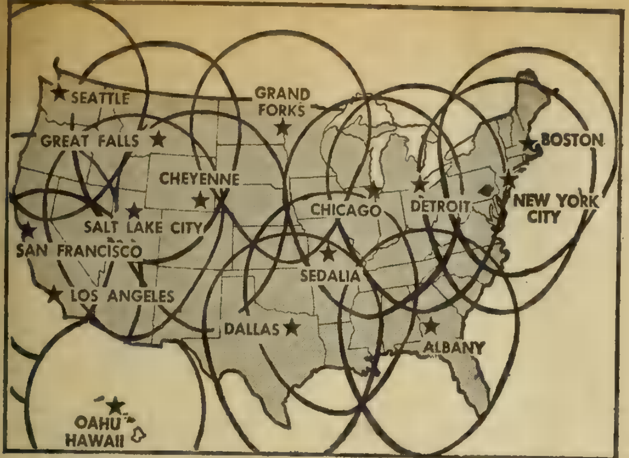
Supporting this position are certain technical data as to the damage that ABM, if used, will do to the population and plant it supposedly protects. Spartan and Sprint are the two missiles to be employed in the Sentinel system. Spartan is a long-distance device whose explosive power is in the megaton range (at least fifty times as powerful as the Hiroshima bomb). However, according to Defense Department publicists, Spartan missiles cannot hurt us. What makes them so benign is that they will intercept incoming ICBMs high above the atmosphere and thousands of miles away from the urban ABM sites. Thus neither blast nor radioactive fallout will reach the earth. Of course it is not beyond conception that a Spartan might detonate prematurely, perhaps only 1 or 2 miles above the earth and only a few miles upwind from a major city.

In any case, Spartans sent aloft to destroy an incoming wave of ICBMs will not destroy all, or even most, of the assault missiles. Even our military spokesmen acknowledge this. Therefore, the next phase of our defense requires the short-range Sprint missiles. They will wait till the last possible second before firing—for the longer one tracks an incoming ICBM the greater the chance of knocking it down. Thus the Sprints will detonate in the lower atmosphere, directly above the cities on whose suburban peripheries they are based.

The Pentagon assures us that Sprints are merely in the kiloton range, most of them being less powerful than the Hiroshima bomb; and since they will be detonated at a height of 5,000 feet or more their fireballs should not return to the ground. What is not mentioned is that blast waves sufficient to destroy some buildings and most people who stand in the way will reach the ground; that rather deadly radioactive fallout will certainly descend upon our cities; and, most mortal in its consequences, that even if the fireball does not descend, enough heat can result to set whole cities ablaze and kill instantly all persons exposed.

The military will thus have drawn the conclusion that a vast shelter program could do a good deal to pacify domestic protest; at the same time, they will see it as reducing the doubts of Moscow and Peking that we would ever really use the Sentinel system. And this gain in "credibility" would also suggest that we are capable of committing a pre-emptive assault, thus improving our powers of intimidation as we pursued advantage in the international geopolitical contest.

That the reasoning is cockeyed—that sheltering is of



The National Observer

Areas To Be Protected by the U.S. Anti-Ballistic-Missile System

extremely limited protective value, that the strategists of other nations are likely to know this—will not stop the military from playing the game through. Commitment to a mad scheme reinforces itself and when the expansion of the military budget is also in sight, the faith can be maintained.

The sheltering of society presents a few problems that must be directly confronted. It can lead to a domestic war of "all against all" unless "protection" is distributed equally. The 1961 shelter craze, fostered by the Civil Defense Agency, rapidly regressed into an anguished national debate on when it was permissible to shoot the neighbor who tries to break into one's cave. Partly because of this, current planning stresses large public shelters—though they could never be vast or accessible enough to house the total population of a city under attack. Resentments bred of the inevitable discrimination against ghetto residents, suburbanites, people who work in the open, would probably escalate to a pattern of discord that would further disrupt our already conflict-wracked urban existence.

Once the shelters are built, drills in their use will become a ritualized aspect of school life. Children will then need to know why sheltering is required, why the "bad men" want to attack and destroy them. The answers given by their teachers and parents, by their comic books and TV programs, will all provide justification by caricaturing the potential enemy as unalterably hostile. A generation so propagandized will grow up to be a mass barely able to question the war-risking adventurism of its government or to resist the shaping of a garrison state.

Also, for both children and adults, no matter how inadequate shelters actually are, the fact that they exist will encourage much of the population to believe that it is protected against nuclear destruction, and this, like inflamed estimates of the enemy's hostility, will also increase general willingness to allow the wilder military and the more grandiose strategists to have their way with the nation and our lives.

How could such a monstrosity as Sentinel be conceived by the military-strategic establishment, and accepted by our government? What can be done, even now, to stop it? And how in the future can we prevent similar injuries to our national sanity and our fragile hopes?

The full story of the original advocacy of Sentinel is not available, but much of its promotion occurred in public view, and from that recent history one may draw some cautionary lessons.

Ever since the Dulles doctrine of "massive retaliation" was first proclaimed, the doomsday men (those who hold that peace can be maintained only by readiness to fight and "win" a full thermonuclear war) have occupied nearly all the top command and planning posts in the Pentagon. Some civilian officials within the Department of Defense have tried at times to temper the prevailing doomsday spirit, but their own investment in the elegant delusions of strategic analysis has inhibited them.

The main opposition to the forced march toward Armageddon has come from Congress, particularly from the Senate, where a few liberals have been willing to take on the military-industrial complex and cast doubt on its web of self-serving assumptions. But their efforts have usually been only delaying actions because they have not mustered legislative majorities. Resistance to military expansion—especially when the Joint Chiefs are urgently calling for new weapons systems—requires a bravery and intellectual effort that exceeds the grasp of most members of Congress.

The typical Congressman never yields more easily than when military experts offer "evidence" that a new system requested is a necessary answer to an initiative already taken by the potential enemy. In the case of Sentinel, the experts were able to wave two enemy initiatives before Congress—the beginning of a Chinese push to develop some ICBMs, and the fact that the Soviets had mounted an ABM system around Moscow and in their far northwest, and were expected to do the same at many other urban centers. That both these developments came after the United States had begun its own ABM research and development program was, for the moment, beside the point. Yet the balance of terror of which our strategists speak so proudly has never been balanced. Our considerable advantage over the Soviets in deliverable thermonuclear missiles, and our almost infinite advantage over the Chinese, have given them sufficient strategic reason to doubt our official assurances that we would never commit a first assault.

Any Soviet or Chinese strategist who failed to see a possible threat in the American ABM plan (which was already under development in the early sixties) and in the accompanying expansion of our ICBM stockpile, would have been derelict in his duty to brood as well and as long and as pessimistically as possible.

If the game is madly played on both sides, there is still some special madness in our insistence on staying far ahead of the Communist nations in destructive and "defensive" capability. And there is a special duplicity in the fact that our military manage to find unbearable threats in every attempt by the Soviets or Chinese to narrow the gap between our capabilities and theirs.

Indeed, the military and strategic publicists, as they ready themselves for this year's campaign for further Sentinel funds have already, by certain significant silences, added a few more achievements in disingenuousness to their rather impressive record. The fact is that over the last year and a half the Soviets have not gone one step toward thickening their very thin Galosh system; the ABM sites near Moscow have not been expanded and no others have been established any place else in the Soviet Union. And it is even more fascinating that the Tallinn system, originally described by our military as an ABM network across the Soviets' northwestern approaches, is now understood (according to Secretary McNamara's final report) to lack "any significant ABM capability." It is not, and never was, an ABM system.

Another relevant fact not often mentioned in Pentagon pronouncements is that last year the Soviets invited us to negotiate the mutual dismantling of ABM systems. We have yet to accept that invitation, though there are indications now of some ambivalent interest from the restaffed White House. That interest, if it exists at all, has not affected the high military. They and their Congressional allies know that one more giant step toward ABM will knock such negotiations out of consideration. The ensuing escalation race will not only destroy the prospects for an effective nonproliferation treaty; it will set the giant states on a collision course.

The urgent question, then, is what can be done to stop the Sentinel plan dead in its tracks, to freeze it as the Soviet ABM has apparently been frozen, and thus make possible international negotiations to dismantle and prohibit ABM systems? Happily, the tide just may be beginning to turn. Mounting suburban protests have energized and strengthened a number of Congressmen. And both in Congress and in aroused citizens' groups, attention is beginning to move beyond the issue of accidental detonation and toward the far more basic questions posed by the strategic-military nightmare through which we have been stumbling for so many years.

The occasion for a strong challenge on these matters is provided by the new national budget that will be processed by Congress in the coming months. Many opponents of ABM do not understand that Congress has thus far given only its tacit approval of the $5 billion thin Sentinel system. It did so last year by voting a total first installment of $927 million. In the budget request now before Congress the total Sentinel appropriation is $1,788 billion. The items for procurement, operations and manpower are all boosted, while research and development holds at the previous expenditure level, thus suggesting that the military are now eager to move as quickly as they can toward implementing the present plan.

But the full ABM budget for the next fiscal year must clear four different legislative hurdles, namely the authorization and appropriations bills for military construction, and the separate authorization and appropriations bills for the Department of Defense. Before these are acted upon there will probably be vigorous examination and debate in the Armed Services Committees of both House and Senate.

Last year some forty-six Senators voted against one or more of the four legislative tests of Sentinel. Senators Hart, Cooper, McCarthy, McGovern and even Symington are among those now hoping for a public mobilization of massive, overtly expressed, opposition to ABM. If they get it, there is a fair chance that Sentinel can be stopped. And if that happens it may yet be possible that disenchantment with the strategists and their military masters can be turned toward a long overdue and essential task—a fully public and critical examination of the paranoid ideational system that has corrupted the world's international relations between states during the first two decades of the nuclear era.

The obligation upon the thoughtful and more courageous members of Congress is great; the obligation upon the peace organizations, the relevant academics capable of analyzing the delusions of strategic lore—and upon all concerned citizens—is greater still.

'LITTLE GROUPS OF NEIGHBORS'

DRAFT BOARDS IN ACTION

L. BREWSTER JACKSON

Mr. Jackson is a staff reporter for the St. Louis Post-Dispatch.

Ever since August of 1862, when President Lincoln sought by Executive order to raise 300,000 troops for nine months' service, the Selective Service System has survived in comfortable immurement, relatively untouched by any substantial opposition. But with Vietnam came a growing disenchantment over the draft, first by reason of its association with the war, then because the service itself seemed beset by more than its share of inequities and injustices.

Of late, numerous reports on the Selective Service System have pointed out that, though the need for a system of conscription may exist in principle, parts of the present draft machinery need substantial overhauling from the system that grew out of the Civil War and found its formal structure during World War I under Secretary of War Newton D. Baker. That the service tends to be biased and unfair is borne out in a recent study undertaken by two former consultants to the National Advisory Commission on Selective Service.

The report, considered to be the first comprehensive analysis of the Selective Service System, is called *Little Groups of Neighbors after a phrase used by General Lewis B. Hershey, to describe local draft boards in his speeches around the country. The basic finding of the three-year study, compiled by James W. Davis, Jr., of Washington University and Kenneth M. Dolbeare of the University of Wisconsin, is that substantial inequities in induction criteria exist among draft boards from state to state, and even from one town to the next. Policy guidelines sent out by the system's headquarters in Washington are generally marked "advisory only," rather than being specific and obligatory. Little attempt is made to supervise or inspect the actions of local boards, and these boards could not easily conform to standards of either procedure or performance. "Men with similar relevant characteristics are thus treated in widely different ways by various local boards across the nation," notes the report. "Nor is this result compensated for by other returns produced by the decentralization and local autonomy which have made nonuniformity the hallmark of the system."

---

* Markham Publishing Co., Chicago. $5.95; in paper $3.50.

Noting that the service has stubbornly resisted collecting any data on board members and registrants, the authors assert that the system is mired in outdated policies that rigidly defend its decentralized, locally autonomous form of organization. Unwittingly or not, the service's national headquarters has employed the rhetoric of a manpower shortage when, in fact, what has existed since the Korean War has been a manpower glut. "The most conscientious of local board members," they point out, "frequently have no basis for action other than their own understanding of the nation's or the community's interests in a particular situation, and their judgments are bound to differ in various contexts across the country."

Nonetheless, in spite of the autonomous nature of local boards, certain induction and deferment patterns do emerge, and indeed shape the character of the organization. Davis and Dolbeare contend that the surplus of American men who are draft-eligible is the cause of all the military manpower procurement problems of the late 1960s and 1970s. Simply stated, the problem is who shall serve and who shall not. By the early 1970s, almost twice as many 18-year-olds will be eligible as were during the Korean War. Yet military requirements—even during most of the war in Vietnam—have remained below the force levels of the Korean War period. "The key question under such conditions," notes the report, "is the combined ethical and practical issue of what standards should be employed in selecting the relatively few men who are to be inducted."

Thus the original intention of deferments—to maximize the efficient use of manpower resources—has been altered to reduce the pool of available men to manageable proportions. This change has been to the advantage of young men with relatively high incomes. Data from the Selective Service System itself shows that 40 per cent of all college graduates of age 26 have seen military service, compared to 53 per cent for those of lower educational levels.

Walter Y. Oi, a former manpower consultant to the Pentagon, has told the Senate Armed Services Committee that most college men in the past have fulfilled their military obligation by enlisting in the Reserves, while more than 75 per cent of qualified high school graduates served in active duty forces. Little Groups of Neighbors supports this statement with data showing that for periods of time only 2.1 per cent of all army inductees had a college degree.

And there are other advantages to a college education. University graduates have been able to obtain occupational deferments by a ratio of better than 10 to 1 over their counterparts with high school education or less. Until February of 1968, college graduates could easily continue their deferments by either going to graduate school or getting married and having children. Moreover, notes the study, "even if they [college graduates] do not suceed in avoiding service altogether, they are assured at least the opportunity to control the time of their service—an advantage not open to the non-college registrant—which may enable them to avoid service at times of greatest risk."

Though the national headquarters of the Selective Service System would hardly like to admit it, board members throughout the country agreed 47 to 40 per cent that registrants from poorer families are more likely to be inducted than registrants from the upper-income levels. "The margin of opinion is not great," as Davis and Dolbeare note, "but it comes in a context of a systematic argument to the contrary. In the light of our findings that deferment policies have indeed produced severe economic discrimination, perhaps we should wonder at the forty per cent who accept the official view."

Since World War II, another stated intention of the Selective Service has been to make its manpower demands without reference to religion or race. Recent reports from newsmen in Vietnam and from Negro leaders who have visited the fighting in that country, confirm that Negro and white soldiers eat, sleep, travel and fight side by side, existing in a relationship that may contrast markedly with what they have been accustomed to at home. As Stephen Ambrose commented recently in the Baltimore Evening Sun, they even exchange off-color jokes with one another.

Yet, it has been pointed out that the operation of the draft and the relative racial mix of each of the armed services produce a more indirect form of discrimination. Ulysses Lee, a cultural and military historian at the University of Pennsylvania, estimates that the proportion of Negroes in combat forces, especially in Vietnam, is higher by far than their proportion in the army, and that the disproportion of Negro fatalities is higher still. Citing current estimates from the Department of Defense, Lee says that Negroes make up nearly 20 per cent of the combat forces in Vietnam, about 25 per cent of the front-line noncommissioned officers, and more than 14 per cent of those killed in action (which is a drop of almost 10 per cent from the figure released by the National Advisory Commission on Selective Service in 1967).

NOTICE TO SUBSCRIBERS

Because of postal regulations, The Nation's mailing list must be arranged according to Zip Codes. Therefore—with any correspondence about address changes, renewals, etc.—please enclose the address label from your Nation. If you don't have a label, be sure to include your Zip number, and be sure it is correct. Without it we cannot find your name plate.

Although Negroes do not appear to be drafted any more frequently than whites of the same economic level, Davis and Dolbeare find, Negroes as a group are far more draft-vulnerable because they generally come from the lowest income levels. Moreover, they qualify for specialized training less frequently than whites and therefore end up far more regularly in front-line duty. And though the enlistment rate is lower for Negroes than for whites, the Negro re-enlistment rate far surpasses that for whites. In 1965, for example, Morris Janowitz, a sociologist at the University of Chicago, states that first-term re-enlistments of white soldiers was 17.1 per cent, while for Negroes it was 45.1 per cent.

In several states, particularly those in the South, "there may be evidence," according to Davis and Dolbeare, "to support charges of deliberate inductions of Negroes, particularly in the case of civil rights activists." Perhaps in an effort to respond to such criticism and to broaden the ethnic and racial base of local board membership, the Selective Service System announced in November, 1968, that minority groups have been acquiring seats on local draft boards at the rate of about one out of every five new openings in the last year. From September 1 to November 15, a period of seventy-five days, ninety-nine Negroes were added, for a total of 921 Negroes on local boards. Before

Which Memo? The Odor of Fraud

CLAUDIA DREIFUS

Miss Dreifus is a free-lance writer who has worked as a union organizer and labor editor.

A case that came recently before the Federal Court in New York should have been routine: a young man had refused to step forward for induction because he considered himself to be a conscientious objector. These days "draft dodgers" are common, but this case is noteworthy for the fact that the prosecution appeared to be relying on fraudulent documents.

In 1966, Antonio Fargas was sent a notice to report for induction into the U.S. Army. Upon receipt of his "greetings," he immediately applied for conscientious objector status. After a hearing, New York Local Board #5 decided to refuse Fargas' request. Recording the rejection in an official memorandum on June 9, 1966, Local Board member W. A. Tucker wrote:

> Said he had been C. O. all his life. Although did not mention this in Questionnaire dated 8/24/64. Form #150 received, interviewed at length. No consideration given to C. O. Registrant to report for induction as scheduled.

Antonio Fargas refused induction and in December, 1968, his case came up for trial.

"The backbone of our case," according to civil liberties lawyer Victor Rabinowitz, "was the question of the maturing of Antonio's beliefs. Courts had ruled in several previous cases that a draft board must determine whether or not a registrant actually had a change of conscience since the receipt of his draft notice. We built our whole case on the fact that Fargas' board said nothing on the matter."

Rabinowitz was therefore shocked when he received the D.A.'s trial brief and found quoted there a memo—dated June 9, 1966, and signed by W. A. Tucker, but utterly different from the memo in Fargas' S. S. file. (The local board had provided the defense with Fargas' complete Selective Service file.) The D.A.'s version of the memo said, in part, that "there has been no change in registrant's status resulting from circumstances over which registrant had no control since issuance of induction order."

It struck Rabinowitz that this wording in the D.A.'s memo conformed to the requirements of the Gerry case, a landmark in draft law, which was handed down some four months after the June 9 date on the memo. Furthermore, the original memo contained an official stamp; the D.A.'s document did not. And a close examination revealed that the two versions of the memorandum were typed on different machines. "I was just flabbergasted," said Rabinowitz. "It looked to me as though someone had either switched or altered important evidence."

Rabinowitz wasn't the only amazed man in court that day. A flustered D.A. asked for an immediate postponement of the trial. The presiding judge, Justice Frederick van Pelt Bryan, ordered the D.A. to return in two days with a good explanation as to what was going on. When the trial resumed, the federal prosecutor moved to dismiss the entire case. And as a kind of bonus to Rabinowitz, the prosecution offered to dismiss a second of his draft cases, also involving a registrant at Draft Board #5.

"Nothing doing," said Rabinowitz. He objected to dismissal on the ground that the odor of fraud should be tracked down. Judge Bryan's initial impulse was to say that the U.S. District Attorney's office was clearly not responsible for the irregularity.

"Not so clear," snapped Rabinowitz. "We do not have any idea who is responsible."

To unravel the mystery, the judge ordered Asst. Dist. Atty. Andrew Lawler to make a complete investigation of the situation and to return promptly with an explanation. Several weeks have passed, but he has not yet returned to court.

Says Attorney Rabinowitz: "No one knows how many young men are sentenced and convicted every day on the basis of tampered evidence. We were just lucky to find this little 'discrepancy' and we hope that the Fargas experience will alert draft-age men to look at their legal papers very carefully."

As for Antonio Fargas, neither Uncle Sam's Army nor the penitentiary has as yet been able to fit him for a uniform. He can be seen every night in The Great White Hope, a Broadway play in which he has a featured part.

October 20, 1967, only 481 local board members were Negro. However, the number of Negroes on boards in Southern states remains relatively low, with Alabama, Florida and South Carolina having acquired their first Negro members this year. There are still no Negroes on Mississippi draft boards.

The total membership of the 4,100 local boards throughout the country rose from 17,232 in October, 1967, to 18,004 in November of last year, an increase of 772, which the Service says was made to deal with the growing population. The 1967 Draft Law removed the statutory ban on women board members, and since then 101 have been appointed. Also, Spanish-American representation increased from 456 to 530, American Indian from twenty-three to forty-four and Oriental from forty-one to sixty-three.

The absence of clear standards and of relevant information frequently prevents local boards from identifying deferment areas with greater precision. For example, it has been found that in some areas board members, for want of better guidelines from headquarters, have fallen back on evaluations of a registrant's personal appearance or choice of words in a letter. The Department of Labor has issued a Critical Skills List, but it is said that until last February, local boards did not bother to refer to the list and most did not consider themselves bound by it. "Most clerks had heard of the list, but neither they nor their boards had found reason to make use of it. Instead, [deferment] decisions were based on board members' newspaper reading, individual assumptions or private prejudices."

Thus the National Advisory Commission on Selective Service found that half the registrants given occupational deferments by local boards were in neither a critical occupation nor an essential industry, as defined by the Department of Labor. Not that a consistent deferment policy would by itself produce draft equality. "No matter how consistently the draft is administered across the country," concludes the report, "as long as there is a student deferment followed by occupational deferments, under conditions of a manpower surplus, there will be lower rates of service from the upper income levels of the society."

Although there is, of course, no official indication of this, it is also suggested that deferments for students, fathers and those with particular skills—in essence, all those that might potentially challenge the system—may be intended to maintain public support for Selective Service. Davis and Dolbeare say: "To put it bluntly, deferments may have protected the draft and the Selective Service more than they have protected the nation's manpower."

Further, because the service seeks to retain the allegiance of local board members and state political structures, it has avoided any significant attempt to control local board policy, the belief being that conscription will be condoned where local management is assured. This theory, it is said, stems from past experience when rural populations dominated urban populations. Today, however, urban dwellers outnumber their rural counterparts by almost 3 to 1, some local boards have more than 50,000 registrants, and there is less weight in such "grass-roots" reasoning.

Statistics compiled by Davis and Dolbeare in 1966 show that nearly half of the men who serve without pay on local boards are more than 60 years old, about 22 per cent are more than 70 and almost two-thirds are war veterans. On typical local boards there are three veterans (one a veteran of World War I), one member more than 70, and only one less than 50. Most of them are proprietors, managers, officials or professional men. Though only 12 per cent of the male population older than 25 has been through at least four years of college, according to the 1960 census, more than 30 per cent of local board members have that amount of education. However, less than half of the almost 10,000 board members in rural areas have been to college at all, and less than 25 per cent of these hold degrees.

It has become difficult to recruit new board members and the system therefore encourages long service. Thus draft boards, particularly those in more rural areas, become so much a part of the community that members may find themselves granting deferments as personal favors or inducting persons as a matter of community punishment. "What board members share with the controlling elements within their jurisdictions is the same occupational and class status and values; they participate in similar activities and may be personally known to key employers and major activists within the community." To indicate their special status within the community the report notes that approximately two-thirds of all local board members hold some form of public office during their lives.

General Hershey has repeatedly resisted the suggestion that a set of national standards be established for the guidance of local boards, but Little Groups of Neighbors reports that many local board members believe they should follow some rules. Of the local board members who were asked if they would prefer more specific state and national directives, 46 per cent said they would favor more orders in regard to occupational deferments, 40 per cent said they would in regard to student deferments, and 29 per cent said they would in regard to hardship deferments. The authors rarely found a member who would prefer fewer directives. Yet board members appear to want it both ways; 78 per cent agreed that the local discretion granted them by national headquarters is invaluable in dealing with individual cases.

The draft is one of the most hotly contested subjects on high school and college campuses today, but Americans in general are not inclined to find its machinery unfair unless they or their children are personally threatened, and then only when they have made a substantial investment in education or a career. In addition, the National Opinion Research Center found in a 1964 study for the Department of Defense that the threat of the draft was of little concern to more than 80 per cent of those interviewed who had limited if any plans for study beyond high school.

Davis and Dolbeare found in Wisconsin, for example, that despite the information available on the Selective Service System, few have more than a superficial knowledge of the system's fairness; or, indeed, how the system works at all. Generally, the older the person interviewed, the more he supports the draft and the less he actually knows about it. And one of the report's most revealing findings in Wisconsin is that most of the persons who thought the draft fair also thought that local boards were acting on strict orders from national headquarters in Washington.

BRAZILIAN STORM WARNING

FRANCIS B. KENT

Mr. Kent, a Latin American correspondent for the Los Angeles Times, has just transferred from Rio de Janeiro to Mexico City.

Rio de Janeiro

Baffled and hurt by increasing signs of opposition, Brazil's military government has overreacted in a manner typical of military regimes in this part of the world. It has swept away summarily what remained of the democratic process in this largest and most populous of Latin American nations. [See "Brazil: The Tanks Roll" by Warren Dean, The Nation, January 6.]

Whether the generals will be able with unlimited power to achieve the elusive goals of stability and progress remains to be seen. What seems to be more likely is another round of experimental groping, with unpredictable results. Civil rights have been suspended, Congress was ordered into an indefinite period of recess, the press has been placed under censorship, student spokesmen have been arrested, and political leaders antagonistic to the regime are in exile, in jail, under close surveillance, or placed in a Brazilian form of limbo which removes them from every political activity (including voting) for ten years.

In the weeks ahead, however, the generals will be faced with decisions far more distressing than whether to move against this or that individual, group or institution. There is the sorry state of the economy; there is the rising resentment of the Roman Catholic Church because the regime has failed to effect social reforms, and there is the still unresolved student revolt.

The four and a half years since the military take-over have produced a measure of economic progress. Most of this improvement, however, was achieved under Marshal Humberto Castelo Branco, who was installed immediately after the 1964 revolt, and Roberto Campos, who was given extraordinary latitude in running the Ministry of Planning. Prices and wages were controlled. The cost of living increase was slowed from more than 100 per cent per year to less than 25 per cent. Imports were limited and exports were expanded. U.S. aid poured in at the rate of more than $300 million a year.

Since Costa e Silva's inauguration in March, 1967, the government has been subject to drift and indecision. Grandiose plans have been advanced, but little has been accomplished. Tax collections have not met expectations. The balance of payments deficit has increased, and a whopping budget deficit is forecast for the year ahead. After the generals' December power grab, the United States announced that the entire aid program was being subjected to review.

Washington voiced concern, too, at the treatment accorded two American priests as part of the military's awkward effort to silence an increasing growl of clerical discontent. Fathers Darrell Dean Rupiter and Peter Albert Grams, members of the Oblate order with headquarters in St. Paul, Minn., were arrested and held for more than a week in Recife, then expelled from the country.

Three French priests remain under arrest at Belo Horizonte. Three others were held briefly at Santos, where Bishop David Picao was detained for interrogation before seeking refuge in the home of the papal nuncio here in Rio.

The military view is that the liberal wing of the Catholic Church has exceeded its role by speaking out for accelerated efforts to redress Brazil's glaring social injustices. Among the most uninhibited church spokesmen has been Dom Helder Camara, archbishop of Olinda and Recife, who has compared the lot of the northeastern campesino to that of a cactus. He has been joined frequently by his fellow bishops in the publication of manifestoes calling for armed insurrection, if necessary, to bring about sweeping changes in Brazil's social structure.

Much of the church has aligned itself with the university students who came within an ace of provoking a popular revolution last year. Until August, when many of the student leaders were arrested near Sao Paulo for attending a convention of the outlawed National Students Union, the students had rioted in the streets of Brazil's major cities, paralyzing commerce and bringing on violent clashes with the authorities. More than once, the army was called out to restore order with tanks and machine guns. The students were led for the most part by professional leftist agitators, some of whom had been trained in Cuba. That, however, does not make their grievances any less real.

A professor at Rio's Catholic University recently described the university machinery as "rotten, old, indolent and in many cases contaminated by corruption and incompetence." Professors are paid as little as $100 a month for a full class load. In a nation of 90 million people there is room for scarcely 200,000 in the universities; thousands are turned away each year. Student disorders, a phenomenon by no means restricted to Brazil, seemed particularly justified here.

In the weeks immediately after President Costa e Silva's suppression of the opposition, Brazilians showed little inclination to protest. The beaches of Rio were crowded and conversation in bars and coffeehouses was mainly of soccer. This, though, was the holiday season, which here is accompanied traditionally by a general slowdown in all but social activities. It will continue, if custom is observed, until after the pre-Lenten carnival of mid-February.

It is much too early to judge whether a spate of Finance Ministry decrees will help to strengthen the long-ailing economy. Already, though, some segments of the business community are beginning to bridle at new regulations. There is no evidence that the Church will move to silence its more outspoken opponents of the military, and there is nothing to indicate that the students will settle down quietly behind their books.

Moreover, there is no way to measure the extent of opposition to the government within the military itself. But it is incontestable that such opposition exists, based on the conviction that the role of the army is to protect the constitution, to intervene when necessary, but to return to the barracks at the earliest possible opportunity. Officers of this persuasion, up to and including the rank of colonel, are known to have been in touch with former President Juscelino Kubitschek and Carlos Lacerda, former governor of Guanabara (Rio), prior to their arrest. The number and depth of conviction of these officers could be the factors that shape Brazil's future.

WHITE LABOR, BLACK LABOR

THE FOMENTED CONFLICT

LLOYD L. BROWN

Mr. Brown, who was a CIO organizer in the 1930s and a founding member of the Negro American Labor Council, belongs to the Typographical Union. He is writing a book on social trends in the black community.

Is America faced with another "irrepressible conflict," this time between the black community and organized labor? Many voices say yes, and many hands seem to be working to bring about the collision. As a Negro American and a trade unionist, I am alarmed by this development; it threatens not only the equal rights movement and the unions but all prospects for social progress.

There are today, as there always have been, grounds for Negro antagonism toward the labor movement. The union button has never been a charm to shield its wearer from the virus of white supremacist ideas incubated in the culture of the upper class. The American labor movement, for the most part, has never accepted the old radical insight that white labor cannot be free while black labor is chained.

Despite its sins against racial equality, however, the union movement has been more hospitable to black Americans than other institutions in our racist society. Labor has a larger interracial membership than any other group, uniting in common interest, if not in brotherhood, some 2 million black workers with 16 million other workers.

Moreover, the continuing and inexcusable failure of the AFL-CIO executive council to put its professed policies of racial justice into practice, and the snail's pace of labor's self-reform are not the main factors behind the present sharp rise of anti-union sentiment in the black community. The main cause is to be found in the propagation of a new social doctrine—that organized labor is now the main barrier to black liberation, and the propagators of this new faith belong to four distinct orders. They are the big business missionaries to the ghetto, the black separatists, the liberal friends of the deserving poor, and the left-wing white advocates of black segregation. I shall deal here only with the first and most important group, merely describing the others in passing.

The black separatists, like their white racist counterparts, are anti-union on principle, opposing all interracial association as the worst of evils. The branch of liberalism that embraces the new creed is composed of middle-class people of good will who believe that labor is now big business, that white workers are rich, and that the only deserving poor are black. The white left-wing supporters of the new doctrine, having despaired of the working-class revolution, update Marx to read: Labor in a black skin can get its rights only by taking away the rights of labor in a white skin.

The big business missionaries, to return to the group which is the main sponsor of the doctrine, are the "thousands of businessmen across the nation [who are] getting involved in the struggle to restore social cohesion," as Fortune magazine noted in a special issue (January, 1968) devoted to "Business and the Urban Crisis."

"The struggle to preserve property" might have been a more accurate way to put it, since it has been noted often, and correctly, that the violence of ghetto outbursts has been primarily directed against property. "The term 'Negro revolution' must be taken seriously," one of Fortune's writers warns, "because its present battleground is at the level of the city."

This writer, Max Ways, outlines for big business the trail-breaking role of advancing the Negro revolution through a "national triple alliance" of the corporation, the city and the Negro (in that order). Noting that "the more congealed liberals . . . continue to doubt that business can be the agent of the kind of social advance that is needed," Mr. Ways assures his readers that "the leaders of the government of the U.S. believe it. Negroes believe it. Business is the one important segment of society Negroes today do not regard with bitter disillusionment." (One can imagine a "Triple Alliance" demonstration marching under the slogan: "No Corporation Chairman Ever Called Me A Nigger!"

The corporate missionaries to the ghetto have been plastering whole cities with their motto: "Give a damn." They will give that—but no more than that. The real giving, it is made plain, must come from another source. Here's how one of these agents of social advance puts it:

"Union concepts of security and seniority were formulated in the period of struggle between company and union. Now the struggle is between the Negroes and the unions. It is our position that a basic conflict exists between labor-union concepts and civil-rights concepts. Something has to give."

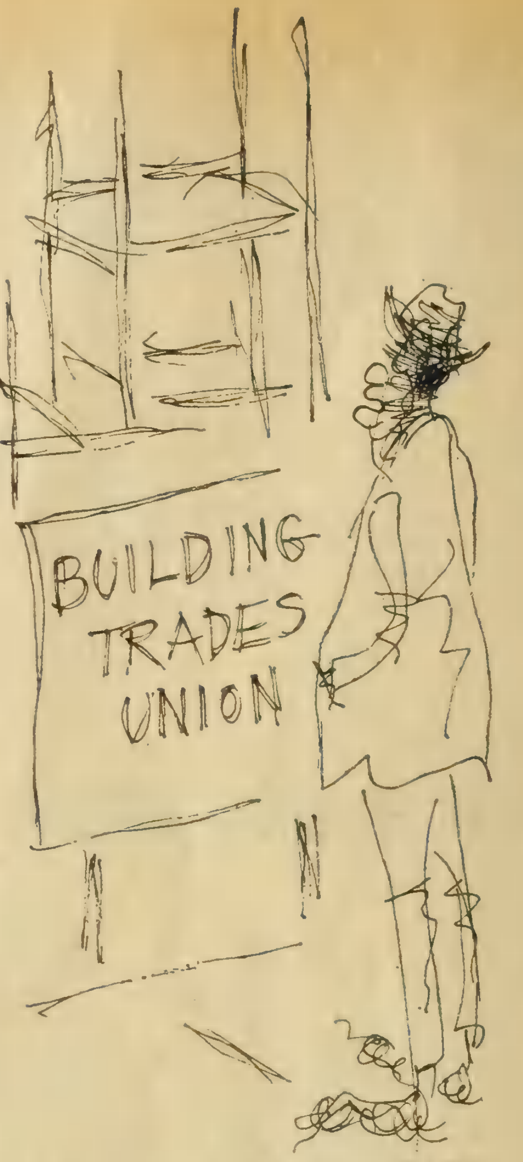
This clear statement of the new "basic-conflict" doctrine, also quoted in the special issue of Fortune, comes from John Doar, president of the Bedford-Stuyvesant Development and Service Corporation, which aims to cure the ills of one of America's most impoverished slums by building black capitalism there. Mr. Doar is also president of the New York City Board of Education, to which he was recently appointed.

His remarks appeared in an article, "The Case Against the Unions" by Thomas O'Hanlon, which offers various recommendations to insure equal rights for Negro workers. The primary proposal is this: "The union hiring hall must be eliminated. Unions still control an estimated two million jobs through such arrangements. Employers should be free to hire any qualified worker."

Mr. Doar's notion that "the period of struggle between company and union" is a thing of the past can only amuse the two sides. But his statement that labor-union concepts and civil rights concepts cannot coexist is more than a total misstatement; it is an invitation to total disaster.

There is nothing complex about labor-union concepts, the basic elements of which can be stated in a single sentence: A union, comprising the workers in a given industry or craft, bargains with the employers and by negotiation, backed up by an implied or direct threat of strike, obtains a contract for a designated period of time that establishes wages, hours, working conditions and various fringe benefits; specifies the prerogatives of both parties, and provides grievance procedures to guarantee compliance.

All other labor-union concepts are details flowing from that basic concept. For example, none of the contract benefits would profit an individual worker if he were not protected from arbitrary dismissal—the job security rules mentioned by Mr. Doar. A seniority system is likewise indispensable; without it, arbitrary dismissal could be effected simply by reducing the work force by one man or by not rehiring a man after a seasonal layoff.



Pat Fink

"Always 'The House that Jack Built'— Jack Senior, Jack Junior, Jack III"

Since the abolition of job security and seniority would make union membership worthless, no union could continue to exist without these safeguards for its members. The protection of trade unionism, achieved by many generations of working people of all races and nationalities, is not "something" that "has to give." It is something that can be taken away by no force short of a Fascist dictatorship.

Labor-union concepts not only are not opposed to civil rights concepts, they are civil rights concepts applied to industry. When workers are excluded from union membership because of race or color, labor-union concepts are violated, just as the concept of democracy is violated by racist practices.

No one would destroy good housing that bars Negro tenancy or ownership. The obvious corrective action is to remove the barriers and let the Negro family move in. More unionization, not dismantled unions, is what the black worker needs. The job security and seniority rules are even more necessary for the Negroes now in unions than they are for other members. Last to be hired and first to be fired was the established rule for Negro industrial employment under the old, open-shop system; to the extent that the rule has been weakened, credit belongs to the unions. Indeed, the very term "due process" that unions stress in cases of dismissal comes from the Fourteenth Amendment, enacted to protect the rights of former slaves.

As for the recommendation that hiring halls be abolished, it happens that there are large numbers of Negroes in those industries where the hiring hall is established—maritime, longshore, hotel and restaurant, for example. Any attempt to abolish this system, under which everyone can see who is hired and for what job and whether fair-practice rules are followed, would elicit the bitterest opposition from the Negro members.

Advocacy of so-called right to work laws that ban the union shop comes from the most reactionary sections of the society—the same sections that are the most racist. The black worker knows better than anyone else the great difference that exists between a "right to work" state like Alabama and a largely unionized state like New York when it comes to job opportunity and pay.

The big business missionaries to the ghetto need not rely on church dinners and "mission Sunday" collections to keep them going. They have access to the tax-exempt billions of the great foundations with which to promote various programs among the desperate poor of the slums. To the most affluent "haves" it must seem very canny to promote the idea that the "have nots" can get what they need only from the "have a little bit mores." But the program sponsors would do well to realize that vandalizing the House of Labor would definitely not advance social cohesion. On the contrary, a fratricidal conflict between white labor and black labor would turn the urban crisis, which now threatens only property, into an urban civil war that would destroy everything.

HARRY GOLDEN

I have met Harold Howe two or three times. He is a tall, handsome man in his early 40s, born and bred in North Carolina. For several years he has worked out of Washington as the Director of Education for the Department of Health, Education and Welfare. Recently he resigned this post. He resigned because the South was raising so much hell about his insistence upon enforcing the law. Mr. Howe was not consigning federal funds to schools that refused to integrate.

The joy that greeted his resignation bordered on the obscene. Newspaper editorials thrilled to his departure as they would thrill to an armistice. In a letter to the Charlotte Observer one correspondent went into ecstasies over the revelation that Howe was really a Yankee (he is not).

When he became an administrator, Howe swore to uphold the law. That he found it impossible to do so indicates again the intransigence of the South, its blindness, its predilection for living wholly within the terms of its self-created myth. Southerners still believe that somehow they can turn back the May 17, 1954 decision of the Warren Court that school segregation is unconstitutional. William Faulkner has said there are still Southerners who live as though the whistle hadn't blown that sent Pickett's men charging against the Yankees.

When the Southerners Pinckney, Gadsden and the Reverend Tennent came to the Constitutional Convention, they insisted on the constitutional proviso that guaranteed religious freedom. Gouverneur Morris questioned their concern. He pointed out to these men that Jefferson and Franklin were wholly in accord with the right of a man to worship according to his conscience. The Reverend Tennent replied that if the accord was unanimous what harm could it do to put the law on the books. And on the books it went.

The Southern Methodists no longer had to disguise their churches nor did they have to include within them a fireplace in which to secrete their prayer books if an Anglican sheriff appeared on the scene. The Presbyterians no longer had to conduct their seminary classes below ground.

The South exercised a great influence on the framing of the Constitution. Now the South conveniently chooses to forget this history. Morals follow the law. Negroes are working in the cotton mills of North Carolina today in jobs formerly held by white men. They work there not because of a new blossoming of Christian charity, nor because of gradualism, but because of the law: in this instance the Kennedy Equal Opportunity Directive which threatened to withhold federal contracts from mills that practiced discrimination.

Perhaps the intransigence of the South is due to the fact that, because they helped write the law, these people feel they can unwrite it or disobey it, when the occasion so moves them.

Presumably the successor to Harold Howe will also take an oath to uphold the Constitution and all its laws and then the Southerners will wait for him to resign when their elected Representatives begin to bring pressure. It is too bad about Harold Howe, a public servant in whom the South should take great pride.

BOOKS & THE ARTS

The Heady Past of Futurism

RUSSIAN FUTURISM. By Vladimir Markov. University of California Press. 467 pp. $12.

SIMON KARLINSKY

Mr. Karlinsky is professor of Slavic languages and literature at the University of California. He is the author of Marina Cvetaeva: Her Life and Art (University of California Press).

Futurism in Russian literature was a plethora of jaunty, irreverent, youthfully boastful experimental groups whose presence manifested itself around 1910. Experimentation in the arts, new departures, radical revisions of aesthetics were very much in the Russian air at the time. Almost anything seemed possible. The sweeping renaissance in poetry, brought about by the Symbolists some fifteen years earlier, was still maintaining its momentum. Andrei Belyi and Remizov were bringing wondrous new dimensions to the Russian novel. Stravinsky had produced Petrushka, and a schoolboy named Sergei Prokofiev had appeared as a soloist in his own hammering and dissonant First Piano Concerto. Cubist and Italian Futurist paintings were bought and imported by wealthy merchant barons, works on avant-garde art theories avidly translated and studied. Malevich, Larionov, Natalia Goncharova, Kandinsky, Marc Chagall and numerous others were doing the freshest and most independent painting ever done in Russia.

Many of the young Futurist poets had training in the graphic arts and were eager to devise the literary equivalents of Cubist and Suprematist discoveries. Many of these poets had police records for participating in illegal demonstrations and other subversive activities against the Czarist regime. The radical and liberating trends in the arts of the early 20th century seemed to these painters and poets the harbingers, or perhaps the embodiment, of that sweeping social, political and moral revolution for which most of the Russian intelligentsia yearned, the premonitions of which were expressed poignantly in Chekhov's Three Sisters and, with unprecedented power, in Aleksandr Blok's poetry of the preceding decade.

The Moscow Cubo-Futurist group, led by David Burliuk (later known as an American painter), set out to shock and scandalize the bourgeoisie, the press and the literary establishment. They drew pictures of animals on their faces, dressed outlandishly (Mayakovsky's famous blouse of yellow necktie silk), and issued publications with titles like A Slap in the Face of Public Taste and Candied Rat, in which they demanded that Pushkin and Dostoevsky be "jettisoned from the ship of modernity" and attacked such successful, but to them conventional, writers as Gorky, Bunin and Leonid Andreyev. Their turbulent public readings, their stormy tours of the provinces made good copy, and the sensationalist press of the day made them nationally famous before they had created anything of artistic value. Very soon, however, the sudden celebrity proved very much justified as such enormously gifted Cubo-Futurists as Velimir Khlebnikov, Vladimir Mayakovsky, Benedikt Livshitz and the originator of the "trans-sense" language, poet-theoretician Aleksei Kruchonykh, developed into poets of undoubted power and originality.

If some of the Cubo-Futurist behavior of that period seems reminiscent of the American cultural scene of today, the parallel activities of the St. Petersburg-based group of Ego-Futurists, led by Igor-Severyanin, are even more recognizable. Severyanin combined sentimentality, bathos, ultra-modernity and misuse of foreign words in ways that would easily qualify as high camp had it been done today. He was the master of the pseudo-elegant literary put-on, but the general public as well as some distinguished poets and critics of the time were taken in. Severyanin became the greatest matinee idol in the history of Russian poetry; not until Yevtushenko, his direct descendant who took Severyanin's campy attitudes at face value and solemnly revived some of them, did a Russian poet match him in popularity.

There were other Futurist groupings that deserve to be known: the Mezzanine of Poetry, for instance, or the Centrifuge among whose founders were such important poets of the Soviet period as Nikolai Aseyev and Boris Pasternak. In the years immediately preceding the revolution, Futurist poets, both major and minor, generated such creative momentum, introduced so many fresh themes and approaches, experimented so successfully with form and with language that they not only mapped out just about every discovery and innovation introduced into Russian poetry since their time but they drastically altered the very course of that poetry.

Established poets, such as Andrei Belyi, Marina Cvetaeva and Osip Mandelstam, evolved new styles under the impact of Futurist techniques and imagery. From the 1920s to the 1960s, whenever distinctly original young Russian poets appear, they invariably turn to the Futurist tradition for inspiration. The underground mimeographed journals which flourished in Moscow a few years ago (but which have since been exterminated and their editors imprisoned) featured poetry derived from Khlebnikov's verbal flair, surrealistic imagery and anarchic inner freedom; Severyanin's presence is felt in the more "with-it" Soviet poetry of today, e.g., Voznesensky's "Striptease," while Pasternak and the Futurist-influenced period of Cvetaeva are the models for many of the more serious and worth-while younger Soviet poets. And yet the Futurist movement, one of the most significant and momentous phenomena in Russian literature of our century, is today little studied, understood or even mentioned outside of footnotes to scholarly studies.

While most of the Futurists were eager to serve the revolution once it came about, they were eventually allowed to do so only at the cost of reverting to themes and techniques they had revolted against in the first place. Some committed suicide, some perished in the purges of the thirties and some became drab and simplistic party-lining hacks. All serious study of Futurism was doomed after 1935, when Stalin, in a wildly out-of-character reversal (comparable to Nicholas I authorizing performances of The Inspector General or Khrushchev's permitting Solzhenitsyn to be published) decreed that Mayakovsky was the finest poet of the Soviet epoch and made the study of this poet compulsory. Since by then Futurism, along with all other 20th-century trends and techniques, was declared "formalist," "bourgeois" and "decadent," a vast body of Soviet scholarship and popular biography arose, dedicated to denigrating and minimizing the achievement of the freest and most revolutionary of Russian literary movements and proving that Mayakovsky, one of the founders and leaders of Futurism, was in reality alien and hostile to it.

"Futurist" is a term of opprobrium to recent Soviet generations. The young poet Vadim Delone (Delaunay is probably a more correct spelling of his French name), who was given one of the stiffest sentences for the Red Square demonstration against the invasion of Czechoslovakia, must have prejudiced his case incalculably when he attempted, some months earlier, to publish a letter complaining of harassment by the authorities for belonging to a neo-Futurist literary group. The official reaction can be imagined if one thinks of an American colonial poet in Cotton Mather's New England admitting his membership in a neo-Satanist club.

Thus the first thorough and detailed history of Russian Futurism was published in the United States. Vladimir Markov, a Russian-born scholar who teaches at UCLA, has for two decades asserted the paramount importance of Futurism for modern Russian poetry in his articles, his anthologies and in his monograph on Khlebnikov. He has now amassed the documentation to venture a full-scale investigation of what precisely Futurism was. His book is an eye opener. Whole vibrant, fascinating buried layers of Russian cultural history are revealed for our inspection. Pasternak, Mayakovsky, Aseyev and other much studied poets are seen in their true historical perspective for the first time. The biographies and discussion of the work of neglected or forgotten Futurists (Elena Guro, Khrisanf, who later became the French abstract painter Léon Zack, the ill-starred Benedikt Livshitz, et al.) make exciting reading and several of them are sure to be rescued from oblivion as a result of Markov's book.

The book is handicapped by occasional sloppy editing, careless translations of Russian texts and a somewhat impenetrable first chapter, with its downpour of unfamiliar names and facts. But the reader who gets beyond that and into this beautifully printed and illustrated volume (the chapter heading designs are fantastically apt and clever) will be rewarded by pages that will tell him more informative, absorbing and entertaining things about Russian poetry and culture than anything published within recent memory. The book should open a new era in our understanding of modern Russian poetry.

COMMUNION

To say what has to be said here
one must literally take off one's clothes.
That I will do. Now that I am naked, you have seen these nipples this navel and these thighs and black beard of my manhood.
All this you will admit is not unexpected. I am of my own kind and my heart beats.
I have brothers.

DAVID IGNATOW

The Adventurous Life

HISTORY OF MY LIFE. By Giacomo Casanova. First translated into English in accordance with the original French manuscript by Willard R. Trask. Harcourt, Brace & World. Vols. 1 and 2 combined; Vols. 3 and 4 combined; Vols. 5 and 6 combined. $7.50 each.

PAUL ZWEIG

Mr. Zweig teaches at Columbia University. He is the author of The Heresy of Self Love: A Study of Subversive Individualism, recently published by Basic Books.

What is known about Giacomo Casanova, Venetian adventurer, maybe bastard son of the patrician Grimani and the gifted actress Zanetta Casanova? There survive a file of police records scattered across sixty years and all the European countries; a voluminous correspondence; a sympathetic description written by his friend in late life, the Prince de Ligne. Like fingerprints, these prove the man's existence, little more. But then, toward the end of his life, humiliated by old age and suicidally unhappy as librarian at the chateau of Dux in Bohemia, Casanova decided to write his memoirs. By living his life again, as he wrote it, he would avoid having to live it out to its feeble end. "Remembering the pleasures I enjoyed, I renew them and I laugh at the pains which I have endured and which I no longer feel." For Casanova, his memoirs became a second lifetime and he lived it with the same flourish and elegance that marked the first.

He wrote thousands of pages; the history of more than half a century, drawing on his remarkable memory, as well as on personal notes, letters, biographical fragments, jealously preserved through a lifetime of sudden exits. The result is what Edmund Wilson has rightly called the most interesting memoirs ever written. Indeed, Rousseau, Stendhal, even Augustine, must take their proper place, a half step behind this greatest of storytellers, Giacomo Casanova, the Chevalier de Seingalt, as he took to calling himself at some mid-point in his wandering existence.

Casanova was not a man of ideas. Of the Enlightenment, with its confidence in reason, and its passion for social justice, he had only a dilettante's notion and an aristocrat's disdain. He saw the falsehoods, the corruption, the cruelty of his society as clearly as did Rousseau, yet he chose to celebrate that world—and himself as its most versatile character. With the eye of a man who needed to be shrewd in order to survive, he describes the flamboyant politics and the charlatanism of Venice, Paris, Madrid, St. Petersburg, London and places in between. Above all, he celebrates people; the memoirs are studded with lively portraits. He describes dozens of love affairs with barmaids, countesses, actresses. For the only democracy Casanova acknowledged was the democracy of love, and in pursuit of love he moved comfortably between worlds, solving all social distinctions in the adventure of sentiment and erotic pleasure. Casanova was never bored by his love affairs. Each one was a fresh beginning, a kind of innocence, and he remembered each woman well enough to make her memorable also for us.

The fate of Casanova's manuscript has been as adventurous as the story it tells. The History of My Life surfaced for the first time in Germany, around 1820; it was part of the historical flotsam of a past which had already become dreamlike to the post-revolutionary 19th century. Rarely have so few years opened so wide a gulf in the imaginations of people. To have lived through the French Revolution was to have emerged into a harsh new dimension of space and society. For Chateaubriand, for example, it was like peering beyond the tomb into a remnant of what once had been life. In this atmosphere, Casanova's memoirs must have seemed to the proposed publisher a crumbling parchment out of Egypt. Brockhaus of Leipzig bought the manuscript for a small sum from a descendant of Casanova and published a modified version in German translation. This became so popular that Brockhaus soon decided on an edition in the original French. Made nervous by Casanova's frankness, however, he invited a certain Jean Laforgue, French professor in Dresden, to go over the manuscript, partly to correct imperfections of style, but also to cloak the erotic scenes. Laforgue went at his task with a vengeance. His version appeared in various cities over a number of years, as it fled the censor from Germany to France to Belgium. Casanova's fame for more than 100 years has been based on Laforgue's text, and it was not until 1960, when the Brockhaus firm, with the French publisher, Plon, decided at last to publish the original text, that one could appreciate what liberties the editor had taken.

In addition to correcting errors in grammar, Laforgue had devised a flowery veil of euphemisms for the direct language Casanova uses to describe his love affairs. The result was more prurient than the original descriptions, which have about them an almost chaste clarity. What is more, Laforgue inserted into the memoirs numerous passages which subvert Casanova's character and intentions. The most flagrant are those which attribute to him revolutionary sentiments when, in fact, he abominated the revolution and strongly yearned for a return of the elaborate decadence it had destroyed.

After having lain for 120 years in the Brockhaus vaults, surviving along the way Allied bombardment during the war and an odyssey on bicycles after the war, the original manuscript has at last been made public. Willard Trask has earned thanks for the excellent English translation, and Harcourt, Brace & World for these handsome volumes, complete with an excellent apparatus of historical and biographical notes.

Until recently, the truthfulness of the memoirs was considered on the whole to be doubtful. Some readers went so far as to accuse Stendhal of having written them in his spare time—a kind of fictional appendix to the Souvenirs d'égotisme. The reason for these suspicions is that the memoirs have always seemed too good to be true. No life could be so interesting, we inevitably suppose; no man could experience so much that is worth telling and then be able to tell it so well. So we accuse a novelist of joking with us: if not Stendhal, then some other literary adventurer, with a gift for words.

But the archives have at last emerged. The "Casanovists," a persistent band of literary detectives, have gathered evidence for more than half a century, and their faith has been rewarded. Almost all the characters Casanova mentions have been identified; the events he describes have been verified from other sources; the places he visits have yielded evidence of his sojourns. On every occasion that can be checked, he has told the truth. As for the other, more private, occasions, we are left to assume what we like.

But the History of My Life describes more than people, events and places. The man himself dominates every page, just as, I suspect, he dominated every situation he was ever in. His temper is everywhere unmistakable: incredibly sensitive to the possibilities of a situation, vain and a great talker—maybe the greatest, in a century when interesting talk was valued more than money, rank and a good deal more than honesty (generally considered a boring virtue). For years Casanova employed as a passport into the best homes of Europe the description of his escape from The Leads, a famous Venetian prison. It is a hair-raising tale as it appears in the memoirs, showing Casanova at his extraordinary best, combining physical courage with the skills of a great confidence man. Before it is over he has convinced his cell mate that an angel is about to descend through the ceiling (it does); bamboozled the warden into carrying a steel spike, under a Bible and a plate of spaghetti, to an accomplice; dangled by a roof edge over the Piazza San Marco, found an hour or two in mid-escape for a refreshing sleep, and at the end took refuge in a police chief's house, in the guise of a strayed hunter. The yarn took two hours to tell and Casanova, good performer that he was, refused to begin unless the full two hours were granted.

He discovered early that "reputation" was the crowning quality of experience. The only wasted minutes were those that could not be converted into a story, whether the audience be a seduced maiden, the beau monde of Paris, or eventually the "dear reader" for whom Casanova is so solicitous. He admits to having been fascinated by the effect he created. When he spent huge sums of money to clothe some abandoned beauty, he was repaid not only with love-making but with the shock of surprise in the eyes of his momentary beloved. Few men have been able to spend money as well as Casanova, who consumed several large fortunes in his lifetime.

Since Rousseau, we have become inordinately curious of the man behind the man, whoever he may be. It is as if the authentic imprint of a character were left only in the interstices of his life. According to this "psychologie à secret," as Malraux calls it, a man is not what he does but what he hides. And all the better if he hides it unbeknownst to himself, for then what is concealed bears the unmistakable imprint of the unconscious, the "true" self, the natural man.

With this in mind, one can see why Casanova's reputation should have been marginal down to our day. He knew so well the value of a story that he devoted all of his considerable gifts to the project of making his life worth the telling. He knew so well the art of converting energy into action, and character into events, that his memoirs, for all the private revelations they contain, are far too public for modern taste. If the History of My Life had been presented to us as a novel, it would be acknowledged as one of the 18th century's greatest achievements. As a life, however, it could not be believed, and if believed could not yield to our passion for psychological secrets. Casanova was so essentially a man of action that he had no time for such secrets. All the psychology he needed lay in the ability to size up a situation. There is no residue of meditation, no groping for self-knowledge. The story is all, and it is so continuously interesting that we must, at last, vindicate the author.

A Sorcerer's Apprentice

THE TEACHINGS OF DON JUAN: A Yaqui Way of Knowledge. By Carlos Castaneda. University of California Press. 196 pp. $5.95.

THEODORE ROSZAK

Mr. Roszak is chairman of the History of Western Culture program at California State College at Hayward. He is the editor of and a contributor to The Dissenting Academy (Pantheon Books and Vintage paperback).

For six years, while he was a graduate student in anthropology at the University of California at Los Angeles, Carlos Castaneda served as apprentice to a Yaqui Indian brujo (sorcerer) named don Juan. At the outset of their association, Castaneda approached the old shaman simply to draw upon him as an authority on the use of medicinal herbs among the Indians of Southwest America and Mexico. But if that is the limited professional use the young anthropologist intended to make of don Juan, the latter had much more ambitious plans in mind for Castaneda. For reasons Castaneda still cannot make clear—either to the reader or to himself—don Juan discerned in him the possibility of a disciple and proceeded to introduce him, by way of a rigorous curriculum, into realms of esoteric experience which clash disconcertingly with our prevailing scientific conception of reality.

The "non-ordinary reality" through which don Juan guides his pupil in this unusual little book is mainly the world of hallucinogenic drugs which has by now become a home away from home for thousands of hip youngsters. But in venturing beyond the doors of perception, Castaneda is able to claim one great advantage which previous explorers have lacked—and it is this which makes his book a uniquely important contribution to our burgeoning psychedelic literature; indeed, perhaps one that deserves to replace the comparatively amateurish efforts of Huxley, Watts, Burroughs and Leary. He enjoys the services of a hierophant for whom the psychedelic experience functions as part of a deeply studied professional calling and a fully elaborated world view. Castaneda tells us very little about don Juan's personal background or the ethnic context of his teachings: about all this the man seems to have been extremely reticent. Like most shamans, he is very much the lone wolf, the enigmatic and self-reliant outsider, living by his wits on the social margin. But it is obvious enough that his lore derives from an oral tradition of immense age and complexity. The ritualistic precision and pedagogical discipline surrounding don Juan's teachings resound with generations of experiment, meditation and philosophical systematization.

It is with such a heritage that the brujo is able to envelop Castaneda's experiences, thus making of them so many steps in a demanding spiritual excursion. All aspects of the hallucinogenic agents, their preparation and use, are swaddled in an exotic erudition that contributes to the sense of their sacredness. The agents themselves are conceived of animistically as deities of definite character: they are "allies" or "protectors," the bestowers of insight and power. One of the great moments of Castaneda's investigation is his hallucinatory confrontation with "Mescalito," the god of the peyote, whose image and behavior remain strikingly uniform throughout the run of experiments. It is an awesome presence from which there emanates a compelling aura of holy terror. As Castaneda records the dread encounter, one cannot avoid feeling that something of the hidden origins of our religious consciousness is being laid bare. But for Castaneda, unlike so many psychedelic explorers, such experiences are not simply so much perceptual fireworks or isolated psychic astonishments. Under don Juan's shrewd tutelage, they unfold within an autonomous and coherent metaphysical system. They comprise a body of knowledge replete with its own principles of validation and interpretation.

It is, indeed, as a "man of knowledge" that don Juan conceives of himself. And, as with most Amerindian shamans, his quest for knowledge is a relentless testing of personal courage in the face of ever more harrowing dangers. The brujo becomes a warrior, challenging supernatural forces under whose sway he may, for lack of cunning or stamina, be utterly destroyed. "A man goes to knowledge," don Juan remarks, "as he goes to war, wide-awake, with fear, with respect, and with absolute assurance. Going to knowledge or going to war in any other manner is a mistake, and whoever makes it will live to regret his steps." And what don Juan expects of himself, he expects of his apprentice. More than once he leads Castaneda into experiments that are nearly fatal. After one encounter with the jimson weed, Castaneda spends better than two days in a deathly swoon. Nevertheless, under the brujo's prompting, he makes his way over the years through a number of hallucinatory experiences in which one recognizes much that has become the stock in trade of our traditions of witchcraft and occult superstition: experiences of flight, of lycanthropy, of incorporeality and of divination.

A PICTURE IN THE NEWS

The cop clutches
a growth near his heart

black, tiny,
killing us.

MICHAEL GOLDMAN

At last, however, Castaneda fails in his apprenticeship. In an attempt to test his disciple's courage in the face of a supreme horror, don Juan stages a situation in which hallucinogenic agents play no part, but only the power of suggestion. At least such is the explanation Castaneda now imposes on the event as he reflects upon it. It is impossible to tell from the record precisely what happened on that final night. The closing pages of the account read like something out of Lord Dunsany or Sheridan Le Fanu. It may be that Castaneda's very life was at stake before forces, either psychic or material, which he still cannot fully explain.

I have had the opportunity to talk with the author and he now believes this great test was an effort by don Juan to pit him against the fear of death itself, in the presence of which he was expected to perform a set of ritual gestures representing the shaman's ultimate assertion of personal identity and defiance before the prospect of annihilation. While Castaneda survived the ordeal, he did so by coming close to total psychic collapse. Now, while he continues to visit with don Juan, he has refused to press his training any further into the occult terrors. I doubt that anyone would blame him, for apparently there was a long way still to go:

> It was obvious to me then that my apprenticeship had been only the beginning of a very long road. And the strenuous experiences I had undergone, which were so overwhelming to me, were but a very small fragment of a system of logical thought from which don Juan drew meaningful inferences for his day-to-day life, a vastly complex system of beliefs in which inquiry was an experience leading to exultation.

This is high praise by the pupil for his master. But surely don Juan would regard the final section of Castaneda's book as a discouraging sign of backsliding. Here, Castaneda offers what he calls a "structural analysis" of don Juan's world view, an attempt to demonstrate its coherence by way of imposing formal anthropological categories upon this "reality of special consensus." Whatever its professional respectability—and I am unconvinced that it makes any real sense to subject the thought and behavior of a single individual to structural analysis rather than to handle them in the form of a simple critical essay—it is a stilted and cold-blooded job of work that seems to add little to the lively record of Castaneda's experiences. Perhaps it is the incense Castaneda's colleagues and the university press expect him to sprinkle on the altar of methodology—which is our own home-grown species of mumbo jumbo.

But if the object of the book is to demonstrate the cogency of a world view that diverges radically from our scientific conception of reality—and this amounts to asking "what is truth?"—then I think Castaneda has no better way of pressing

THE CENTENNIAL REVIEW
Vol. XIII, No. 1 WINTER 1969

ERICH AUERBACH
Philology and Weltliteratur
Maire and Edward Said, trans.

JOSEPH H. SUMMERS
Reading Marvel's "Garden"

HARRY BERGER, JR.
Pico and Neoplatonist Idealism:
Philosophy as Escape

HAROLD H. WATTS
The Tragic Hero in Eliot and Yeats

FREDERICK W. TURNER, III
Melville and Thomas Berger: The Novelist as Cultural Anthropologist

. . .

Subscription Rates:
$1.00 for single copies
$3.00 a year (4 issues)
$5.00 for two years
Available at bookstores or from

110 Morrill Hall
Michigan State University
East Lansing, Michigan 48823

the point home than by drawing as vividly as possible the charismatic figure of don Juan himself—which is perhaps more of a literary than an ethnographic project. Even in Castaneda's abbreviated notes, there is an authority about this old man, a searing conviction and a commanding eloquence, that cannot help but jar the most determined skeptic. Here is a life that has been wholly commited to what the "non-ordinary reality" has to teach—and under the spell of that teaching don Juan projects a quality of experience beside which scientific exactitude stands in peril of paling into irrelevance.

Toward the Abyss

NIKOS KAZANTZAKIS: A Biography Based on His Letters. By Helen N. Kazantzakis. Translated by Amy Mims. Simon & Schuster. 589 pp. $12.

JOHN ARTHOS

Mr. Arthos teaches English at the University of Michigan. He is the author of Dante, Michaelangelo and Milton (Hillary) and Language of Natural Description in Eighteenth Century Poetry (Octagon), and is at present preparing a book on Greek life.

"I loved this man because he never asserted his superiority, never insisted on transforming me into a 'lady philosopher.' I was a simple person. He left me as I was, respecting my nature. . . . He offered me the love, confidence, affection, the fields and forests, the mountain and the sea, undreamed-of travels, Cretan and African tales, his own example of perfect nudity before God."

Mme. Kazantzakis has returned her husband's implied compliment. Her "biography" is less a work of her own than a collection of his letters in which he writes about what he is and what he can make of himself. Nevertheless, Mme. Kazantzakis has put her own stamp upon the selection, in the brief commentaries and, above all, in the emphases she allows her husband's writing to provide. It is notable that what she has done bears out the conclusions of that other friend, Pandelis Prevalakis, whose critical study is an equally noble achievement.

It will be a long time before there is a bibliography of Kazantzakis' works—there are so many plays, scenarios, even novels that have not been printed. There are textbooks for schools, children's books, dictionaries. His first long prose fiction, The Serpent and the Lily, and the first play, Daybreak, were written in 1905 and 1906, and thereafter he produced novels and plays in almost equal profusion. From the beginning his disposition was continuously lyrical, so that the Buddha, at first several thousand lines of verse, was rewritten in lyrical prose. The subjectivity, the lyricism controlled the form also of the travel books—Toda Raba he called "a confession in the form of a novel about the USSR." One of the most famous of his novels, The Greek Passion, was, as it were naturally, made into an opera. He worked unceasingly over his Spiritual Exercises, which he thought of as his credo, but even the very impressive interpretation of Japanese life, The Rock Garden, is as much a portrait of the author as of the declared subject. The Odyssey is, of course, an epic, whose protagonist represents the impulsions of the poet himself, and the epic ambitions took a multitude of forms—in the scenarios Lenin, Buddha, Don Quixote; in tragedies on the great subjects of the past, The Minotaur, Sodom and Gomorrah; in the book on Saint Francis. He himself hoped for a complete edition of his works, and indeed in 1955 he brought out the first two volumes. I do not know if steps are being taken to continue what would be an enormous undertaking.

Kazantzakis' prodigious energy led to what at first glance would appear to be a life work of the magnitude of Tolstoy's or Balzac's. And each individual work in itself reveals the same apparently gigantic force. But there is a vast difference between the substance of his achievement and of those others. He was truly imaginative, and so he has a magnificent power of creating the particulars of life—the detail in the interior of a room, the color of the sea, the differentiations in the contours of a face—he can make us see these very marvels as in actuality. Yet it is not quite this particularity and sense of reality he means chiefly to celebrate; his work is always subservient to his higher purpose, if one may call it that, and as he sometimes thought of it:

> My aim is not Art for Art's sake, but to find and express a new sense of life [remember Nietzsche and Tolstoy]. In order for me to attain this aim, there are three paths: 1) the path of Christ—inaccessible; 2) the path of St. Paul—the combination of Art (the Epistle) and Action, but a Christ is needed; 3) the path of Art or Philosophy [Tolstoy or Nietzsche].
>
> I am following the third, and that is why whatever I write will never be perfect from the point of view of Art. Because my intention transcends the limits of Art.

In this sense he knew himself well: "It is not human beings that interest me, but the flame that consumes human beings." Whatever the likeness with Tolstoy, no such obsession controlled the characterizations of the Russian's writing, however much a similar obsession took over the last years of his life. The urgency of the Greek is more consistently Nietzschean.

It is significant that Kazantzakis came very late to regarding himself primarily as a writer. At times he gave himself to the work of revolution; he accepted many government posts; he aspired to a multitude of patriotic and humanitarian roles. As it turned out, writing dominated his life but, as he said, it was not the art itself that chiefly engaged him. He thought of his purpose as primarily Messianic, and for such a role the means were not easily sketched out. The difficulty was the greater from the nature of his message, and especially difficult for one who would make fictional representation the medium. How can you give actuality the respect it requires of a novelist and an epic poet when your message is praise of an encompassing void? "We come from a black abyss, and we end in a black abyss." "My friends believe me happy, because they do not know that my happiness is the supreme flowering of my own despair, and my scorn for all things 'terrestrial.' "

Kazantzakis' submission to Nietzsche and to the Nietzschean cult of enthusiasm is responsible in part for his popularity, and that is one more testimony of the authority of what may turn out to be the single most important direction of contemporary thought. His wife, calling attention to a very early play, No Exit, speaks of his anticipation of Sartre's play with just that point in mind. If this is the mainstream, Kazantzakis is in it. But he adds something to it as a Greek. Modern Greek Christians have a curious affinity for Germanic abstractions. The Johannine element in Greek Orthodoxy rather indiscriminately entertains almost any idea of the transcendental, and, most tragically, even that of the nihilists. Greek intellectuals who do not free themselves as much as they would like from their molding as Christians attach what they cannot get rid of, the idea of the sacred, to any current philosophy—provided only that it excludes the idea of incarnation. So Kazantzakis brings into his modern viewpoint a variety of Christian emphases—upon asceticism, resurrection, redemption, even in some meaningless way, immortality—all to urge the encompassing Messianic despair.

I cannot say whether, in overlaying everything with assertions about the "holiness" of existence, he owes more to Nietzsche or to modern Greece. No one uses the word God more frequently, or apparently more affirmatively, but in his scheme it can only be a word for the one true divinity, nothingness. He even combines respect for asceticism—an early visit to Mt. Athos was profoundly meaningful to him—with the idea of the sacredness of the void: "to give all of yourself and to rot; not to give any of yourself and to become holy." On occasion, he turns the paradox into a consistent enough political attitude: "no one will realize that if I wound up an ascetic, it is only because I preferred nakedness to the cheap, humiliating livery of the bourgeoisie."

Jane Addams was, I believe, to reject in the end Tolstoy's doctrine of nonviolence as rooted in the deepest of dispositions for self-destruction, but until the final surrender Tolstoy was able to celebrate life in its finiteness as Nietzsche and Kazantzakis were not. The Greek writer might pay all honor to the sacredness of the flame consuming and wasting humanity; he might on many lovely occasions exult with Zorba in fireworks, for he was more artist than ultimately he wanted to be. Mere actuality he could not celebrate any more than he could celebrate heaven or hell. Here I think Mme. Kazantzakis draws the right conclusion: ". . . perhaps this was the hidden cause of his powerlessness. He was hesitant to lead his race to its own death, in the hope of some future resurrection." For the future was not a resurrection but an abyss that in his heart he abhorred.

FILMS

ROBERT HATCH

Evelyn Waugh has always had a formidable gift for putting titles on his novels. The elaboration of that splendid example, Decline and Fall, into Decline and Fall of a Bird Watcher, so weakens the impact—for the sake, presumably, of an anachronistic pun—that I approached the screen manipulation of his text reluctantly. And having seen the film, I went back to the book to discover what had happened.

Decline and Fall is not as brilliant as I had remembered. Waugh's satire was shallow; it was more cosmetic than surgical, a preoccupation with humorous tics rather than morbid disabilities, closer to Wodehouse than to Swift. But what it had, and what makes it still a joy, was style, pace, an unfailing sense of what was sufficient for the purpose. The essence of the book's wit is that the characters are hardly odd at all—just enough to tip them into the mad quadrant of bowler-hatted society. The book had restraint and style.

The picture has neither. Falling into the heresy of not trusting the text—a lapse of faith that so often befalls the sponsors of Shakespeare—Ivan Foxwell, the script writer, and John Krish, the director, have attempted to inject some vigor into the story. Vigor, of course, is what it conspicuously, and quite deliberately, lacks; and the transfusion is the worse because it is not contemporary with the book but derived from post-Sellers, British camp slapstick. Everyone mugs and howls, and Waugh's epigrams, when they can be heard, sound wan in the fluorescence. At the same time, there is a tendency to rib Waugh's era with Art Moderne atrocities, to be humorous not with him, but at him.

The result is witless—part musical comedy without drive, part replay of St. Trinian. The main problem, I suspect, is that the film's proprietors were haunted by that hole in the composition named Paul Pennyfeather. He is indeed a nonentity (here played by Robin Phillips as a rather coy nonentity), and was so designated by his author. Waugh spun the story around a vacuum, which on the screen tends to give the central figure nothing to do. The difficulty is not overcome, however, by making the other characters into comic-strip hysterics. From lack of discipline and an appreciation of what Waugh was about, they all fall into the hole together.

It is too bad, for the cast includes a number of actors who could have worn Waugh's characters with some distinction—principally Colin Blakely as Philbrick, Donald Wolfit as Dr. Fagan, Leo McKern as Grimes. But they could not do so with the make-up and business that were given them. Genevieve Page could probably not have accomplished Margot Beste-Chetwynde under any circumstances. Perhaps no actress could; she was a houri of Pennyfeather's rather dim romanticism.

THEATRE / Harold Clurman

How does one keep one's balance on Broadway? The atmosphere there is polluted with unseemly hallelujahs or damns of outrage. The hallelujahs are ejaculations of relief, hopeful cries in the darkness of something worse than mediocrity; the imprecations are roars of disappointment over the frustration of pleasure. The theatre is a passionate place where it is hazardous to speak with moderation.

This preamble is to notify my readers that I should like to praise the APA production of O'Casey's Cock-a-Doodle Dandy (Lyceum Theatre) a little more than I find myself able, and to modify somewhat the general ecstasy over Dames at Sea at the cute Bouwerie Lane Theatre (330 Bowery). Though my reports are not chiefly concerned with blessings or warnings—stop-go signals in the theatre market place—one is virtually forced to pronounce "verdicts" (publicity is our prime industry), because the customers feel bilked if they are not supplied with a peremptory yea or nay. Therefore, I must begin by stating that the two mid-January entries are, for the habitual theatregoer, certainly worth seeing.

Cock-a-Doodle Dandy is a song. "Enough, no more," one is impelled to add, "'Tis not so sweet now as it was before." Still, an excess of melody is much better than too little, or none at all. The spirit and language of O'Casey's comedy are lovely. They voice a celebration of life, a lilting and laughing hymn, as well as its converse crow of mockery, rich curses at O'Casey's two bêtes noires, bigotry and money meanness. He harps to the point of shrillness against the enemy, but poetry, laughter and love finally triumph.

The weakness of the play is an insufficiency of dramatic content; there is almost no "story." O'Casey wrote it after he had left Ireland, injured and insulted by its hermetic religiosity, its unfrangible myth making. (My impression of Ireland, when I visited the country, was that the Irish were living there,

'THE PRESS
AND THE BAY OF PIGS'

A detailed study by
Victor Bernstein and Jesse Gordon
The role played by The Nation in breaking the Bay of Pigs story to the American public, reprinted from the Columbia University Forum.

Single copies—15c; [illegible] copies at 10c each
Orders over 25 at 7c per copy

THE NATION
[illegible] Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014

dreaming of Ireland!) As a result plays of that period, though never without moments of beauty and scenes of both power and hilarity, are more or less veiled preachments, with rumblings of rancor in the shadows. Therefore, the best work of O'Casey's last years is to be found in his multi-volumed autobiography, where his life struggle supplies a structure firm enough to sustain the rest.

What Cock-a-Doodle Dandy does have, and what saves it, is a striking image and captivating speech. The image is that of the indomitably rebellious Cock, symbol of nature in its gloriously telluric force and in its capacity to demolish the constrictions of reason. Nature is not all divine harmony; it is also demonic anarchy. O'Casey understands that this is part of its grandeur, to be embraced with a mighty whoop of brave affirmation.

When the crippled girl in the play is on her way to Lourdes, praying for a cure, her sister Lorna says: "I'm afraid the chance is a poor one, but we won't talk about it." To which another woman piously replies: "Well, it was a good send-off, an' God is good." Lorna then rejoins with, "An' the devil's not a bad fella either."

Still the mana of the play is not its "message," though that is what O'Casey has most in mind, but its language. It is ripe with all the juices of creation. It leaps, dances, soars, pirouettes, turns somersaults, nudges, winks and, above all, chants. What a feast for the ear and the heart; it tickles the soul! But because the language has to carry all the play's weight, it sometimes lapses into tricky verbal doodling.

The compulsive alliterativeness of the dialogue, while usually grand fun, is occasionally wearisome. For an example of both the positive and negative in this regard read this:

> Are you goin' to tell me that th' skipper aloft an' his hierarchilogical crew are concerned about th' Mayor, the Messenger, Marion, me, an' you as much as they are about them who've been promoted to th' quarter-deck o' th' world's fame? Are you goin' to pit our palthry penances an' haltin' hummin' o' hymns against th' piercin' pipin' of th' rosary be Bing Bang Crosby an' other great film stars, who side-stepped from published greatness for a holy minute or two to send a blessed blast over th' wireless, callin' all Catholics to perpetuatin' prayer!

The production, under the direction of Jack O'Brien and Donald Moffat, follows O'Casey scrupulously, and thereby renders the play less than best service. The staging is too literal. The little "miracles" of stagecraft which O'Casey

GHAZALS: HOMAGE TO GHALIB

(Six sections from a longer cycle)

7/12/68

The clouds are electric in this university.
The lovers astride the tractor burn fissures through the hay.

When I look at that wall I shall think of you and of what you did not paint there.

Only the truth makes the pain of lifting a hand worthwhile:
the prism staggering under the blows of the raga.

The vanishing-point is the point where he appears.
Two parallel tracks converge, yet there has been no wreck.

To mutilate privacy with a single foolish syllable is to throw away the search for the one necessary word.

When you read these lines, think of me and of what I have not written here.

7/16/68

When they mow the fields, I see the world reformed as if by snow, or fire, or physical desire.

First snow. Death of the city. Ghosts in the air.
Your shade among the shadows, interviewing the mist.

The mail came every day, but letters were missing;
by this I knew things were not what they ought to be.

The trees in the long park blurring back into Olmsted's original dream-work.

The impartial scholar writes me from under house arrest.
I hope you are rotting in hell, Montaigne you bastard.

7/23/68

When your sperm enters me, it is altered;
when my thought absorbs yours, a world begins.

If the mind of the teacher is not in love with the mind of the student he is simply practising rape, and deserves at best our pity.

To live outside the law! Or, barely within it, a twig on boiling waters, enclosed inside a bubble.

Our words are jammed in an electronic jungle;
sometimes, though, they rise and wheel croaking over the treetops.

An open window; thick summer night; electric fences trilling.
What are you doing here at the edge of the death-camps, Vivaldi?

7/26/68

A dead mosquito, flattened against a door;
his image could survive our comings and our goings.

LeRoi! Eldridge! listen to us, we are ghosts condemned to haunt the cities where you want to be at home.

The white children turn black on the negative.
The summer clouds blacken inside the camera skull.

Every mistake that can be made, we are prepared to make;
anything less would fall short of the reality we're dreaming.

Someone has always been desperate, now it's our turn—we who were free to weep for Othello and laugh at Caliban.

I have learned to smell a conservateur a mile away:
they carry illustrated catalogues of all that there is to lose.

8/1/68

The order of the small town on the riverbank, forever at war with the order of the dark and starlit soul.

Were you free then all along, Jim, free at last of everything but the white boy's fantasies?

We pleaded guilty till we saw what rectitude was like:
its washed hands, and dead nerve, and sclerotic eye.

I long ago stopped dreaming of pure justice, your honor—my crime was to believe we could make cruelty obsolete.

The body has been exhumed from the burnt-out bunker;
the teeth counted, the contents of the stomach told over.

And you, Custer the Squaw-killer, hero of primitive schoolrooms—where are you buried, what is the condition of your bones?

8/4/68

If these are letters, they will have to be misread.
If scribblings on a wall, they tangle with all the others.

Fuck Reds Black Power Angel loves Rosita
—and a transistor radio answers in Spanish: Night must fall.

Prisoners, soldiers, crouching as always, writing, explaining the unforgivable to a wife, a mother, a lover.

Those faces are blurred and some have turned away to which I used to address myself so hotly.

How is it, Ghalib, that your grief, resurrected in pieces, has found its way to this room from your dark house in Delhi?

When they read this poem of mine, they are translators.
Every existence speaks a language of its own.

ADRIENNE RICH

(This poem began to be written after I had read Aijaz Ahmad's literal English versions of the work of the Urdu poet Mirza Ghalib, 1797-1869.)

calls for are all neatly done and consequently amusing, but much more could have been accomplished with lighting and setting to give the play a more glowing enchantment, a greater lift of wonder.

This is perhaps a minor complaint, considering the stock quality of most of the acting, which is altogether deficient in freshness and invention. Worse still —I am in honesty constrained to mention it—O'Casey insists on "the temptation from good lookin' women," emblems of the sensuous delight in living, and who dares maintain that the actresses of the APA production are adequate representatives of such temptation or delight?

Dames at Sea, a spoof on the movie musicals of the thirties, book and lyrics by George Haimsohn and Robin Miller with music by Jim Wise, is a lollipop. I am not averse to such sweets; they serve to alleviate the strain of daily dullness for those who find themselves daily dull.

I do not clearly remember Anchors Away! or the peppermint and marshmallow mechanics of Busby Berkley's choreography, but I take it for granted that the parody in Dames at Sea is sufficiently close to the delicious absurdities of the originals.

The plot—ostensibly about the travails of show folk—makes almost no sense at all, nor is sense intended. The numbers invented for the entertainment are nutty enough to afford good-humored pastime. I would recommend it more heartily if the management, upon reading the ecstasies of the daily press, had not immediately raised the price of tickets to $10, but I shall join the chorus by saying that I prefer Dames at Sea to George M!

What contributes to the fun, besides such ditties as Raining in My Heart, is the overall excellence of the presentation, directed and choreographed by Neal Kenyon; the proper use of the tiny stage by Peter Harvey, and the modest but right costuming. Best of all are the three ladies: Tamara Long, the toothsomely copious and ever engaging "heavy"; Sally Stark, a rough and ready soubrette with a heart of gold and a nice show-biz sense of humor, and Bernadette Peters whose darling face, with its slightly protruding kiss-me-please mouth and ineffable winsomeness, is the very cream of the show's jest. Joseph Sicari exudes the infectiously simple enthusiasm of an actor with a happy assignment, adding a masculine spark to the festivity.

RECORDS

DAVID HAMILTON

MOZART: Così fan tutte. Leontyne Price, Judith Raskin, Tatiana Troyanos, George Shirley, Sherill Milnes, Ezio Flagello; Ambrosian Opera Chorus, New Philharmonia Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf, conductor. RCA LSC-6416, $23.16.

Le Nozze di Figaro. Gundula Janowitz, Edith Mathis, Tatiana Troyanos, Hermann Prey, Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau, et al.; Chorus & Orchestra of the German Opera, Berlin, Karl Böhm, conductor. Deutsche Grammophon 139276/9, $23.16.

Despite one's initial qualms that the cast might be more suitable for, say, Verdi's Luisa Miller, Leinsdorf's Cosi turns out to be an impressive example of his structural grasp. Particularly striking is the careful attention to transitions between recitatives and arias or ensembles and to the pacing of recitatives, so that the opera really "plays," with a long-range sense of dramatic and musical progression, even though only two of the singers (Raskin and Flagello) offer particularly vivid characterizations. The minimal tempo inflection (within individual numbers) that aids this continuity also permits less local detail, but this is partially offset by the mellifluous and rhythmically poised orchestral playing (notably from the winds). On the vocal side, Price's Fiordiligi is rather deficient in range, intonation and agility; the others are quite satisfactory. For the first time on records, the opera is performed absolutely complete.

Böhm's Figaro, despite a similar indifference (save for one or two puzzling instances) to modification of tempo and a palpable neatness of execution, attempts no such integration of the recitatives, which come off soggy, perhaps because some of the cast sounds uncomfortable in Italian. The juxtaposition of Janowitz's almost instrumental Countess and Fischer-Dieskau's vehement Count—he sounds as if he were playing Scarpia—is certainly curious, but the other singers are acceptable. However, since it lacks both a compelling long-range conception, such as Leinsdorf's, and a compensating attention to detail, the performance offers little reward for repeated listening. The score is complete, but so is Kleiber's recording on London, which has many other virtues (including a translation of the libretto, which is here printed, reprehensibly, only in Italian).

MAHLER: Des Knaben Wunderhorn. Elisabeth Schwarzkopf, Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau; London Symphony Orchestra, George Szell, conductor. Angel S-36547, $5.79.

One of the less remarked upon consequences of the record industry's devotion to the "star system" is the practice of fitting music to the performers, rather than vice versa. These songs, written during the period of the first four symphonies (three of which themselves contain songs to texts from Des Knaben Wunderhorn), do not form a narrative cycle and could easily be performed by any number of singers, depending on considerations of range, vocal quality and sex. However, every recording to date has used only two singers, transposed many of the songs, and thereby distorted Mahler's finely balanced orchestration, in terms both of individual instrumental registers and of absolute range.

Since the two other versions currently available manage to get only three songs each in the right keys, this one, which presents seven of the twelve in Mahler's original orchestration, may be considered a step forward. (In addition to these seven, Rehfuss' "Der Tambourg'sell" on Vanguard SRV-285, and Ludwig's "Wo die schönen Trompeten" on Angel S-3704 are sung in the correct keys—which leaves three songs, including the magnificent "Revelge," as yet "unrecorded," in a significant sense). And because Szell's direction achieves a precision and clarity of orchestral detail not found in any previous performance, this should stand as the preferable version until someone decides to hire singers who fit all the songs. Unfortunately, the wear and tear on Schwarzkopf's voice is beginning to show rather badly, and is ill-concealed by her numerous coynesses, both technical and verbal; still more distracting is the practice of turning some songs into duets, although Mahler's title page clearly opposes it.

GRIEG: Piano Concerto. LISZT: Piano Concerto in E-flat major. Van Cliburn; Philadelphia Orchestra, Eugene Ormandy, conductor. RCA LSC-3065, $5.79.

The six Philadelphia Orchestra recordings in the current RCA release are a typical non-event, whereby a transfer of recording contract from Columbia to RCA is promulgated as a major musical happening. Aside from the change of label color, there is little to distinguish this release from previous Philadelphia records—except perhaps the recorded sound, which in the Tchaikovsky Pathétique (LSC-3058) is exceptionally raucous and dry, and elsewhere lacks the focus of the best Columbia recordings. Typical is a Bruckner Seventh Symphony (LSC-3059) innocent of all but the most obvious structural articulations, and not very well played either. And a collection of Telemann concertos (LSC-3057) sounds as if it were based on the assumption that, since Ormandy always sells well and Telemann is selling well these days, the combination will naturally sell even better. It may do so, but these performers are not only stylistically innocent—they don't even know a good Telemann piece from a dull one, and pound away at the drearier sequential passages in a manner calculated to make the poor pieces sound even worse than they are.

The Grieg collaboration with Cliburn listed above is of some interest, for the pianist has a valid approach to the piece, sensitively phrased and conceived within a tonal framework that, by excluding an explosive reading of the more rhetorical passages, goes a long way toward pulling the piece together at a level its somewhat restricted invention can sustain. But the orchestra's contribution is designed for exactly the obvious sort of reading that Cliburn isn't giving, and the lapses of continuity are glaring; only in the slow movement are piano and orchestra successfully integrated. In the Liszt concerto, where pianistic rhetoric is integral to the work's progress, Cliburn's approach is rather less successful.

Other recordings of special interest:

WEILL: Die sieben Todsünden der Kleinbürger (text by Bertolt Brecht). Gisela May, male quartet: Leipzig Radio Symphony Orchestra, Herbert Kegel, conductor. Deutsche Grammophon 139-308, $5.79.

DVORAK: Quartet in F major ("American"). SMETANA: Quartet in E minor ("From my life"). Juilliard Quartet. Columbia MS-7144, $5.79.

RECITAL: Songs of Free Men; Spirituals. Paul Robeson, bass-baritone; Lawrence Brown, pianist. Odyssey 32 16 0268, $2.49 (reissue, in electronic stereo).

BEETHOVEN: Symphony No. 5; Grosse Fuge. Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, Wilhelm Furtwängler, conductor. Heliodor HS-25078, $2.49 (reissue, in electronic stereo).

MOZART: Symphony No. 39; Eine kleine Nachtmusik; Overtures to Le Nozze di Figaro and Die Entführung aus dem Serail. Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, Wilhelm Furtwängler, conductor. Heliodor HS-25079, $2.49 (reissue, in electronic stereo).

RACHMANINOFF: Piano Concerto No. 3. Vladimir Horowitz; London Symphony Orchestra, Albert Coates, conductor. Seraphim 60063, $2.49 (reissue).

RECORDS

FOLK, JAZZ, BLUES. We specialize in hard-to-get LPs. Send us your wants. MONON RECORD SERVICE, Box 18221 BH, San Francisco, Calif. 94118.

HISTORY OF THE BLACK MAN. LP Album. Educational. Authoritative. $4.00, Postage included. Lovett Records, Suite 1800, 230 Peachtree NW, Atlanta, 30303.

FREE 40 PAGE CATALOG offers hundreds of recordings of rare Renaissance, Baroque and Classical music. Some records priced as low as $1.00 each! All late recordings in stereo only. MHS RECORDS, Box 932 NA, New York, N. Y. 10023.

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, ALgonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

The Best Way
To Get
THE NATION

THE NATION 2-10-69
333 Sixth Ave., New York 10014

☐ One Year, $10
☐ Two Years, $18
☐ 6 Months, $6

☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed

(Add $1 per year postage for Canada; $2 foreign)

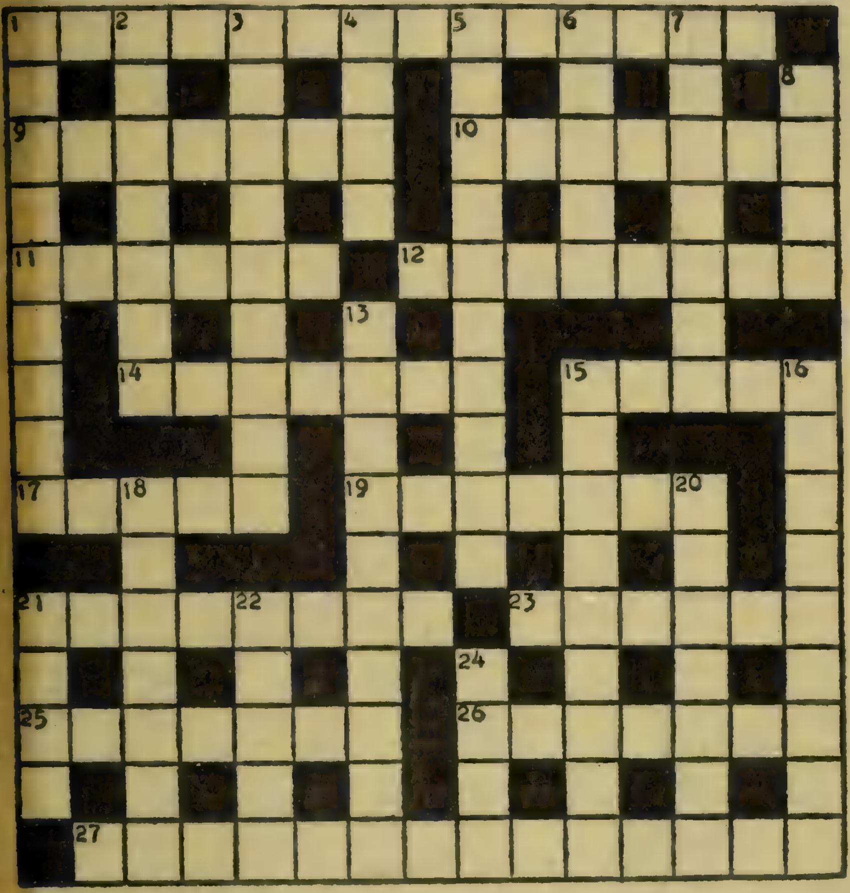
Name ....
Address ....
City ....
State .... Zip No. ......

Crossword Puzzle No. 1284

FRANK W. LEWIS



ACROSS

1 One might review the play rather critically. (6,8)
9 The cumulative earnings of a person, probably associated with savings? (4,3)
10 Does it take the morning to drive around the boat? (7)
11 See 21 down
12 Some parts of the feet are so emphasized.
14 Likely to need more people with pull than 10 does. (7)
15 See 1 down
17 Yellows, hopefully not with age. (5)
19 Did they make the forecast so clear? Not quite! (7)
21 Is one who savvies the border? You can't get word in, as they say! (8)
23 A spinner plunges in again the wrong way. (6)
25 Fly this by 23 in part of his house, as any child knows. (7)
26 How phrases are coined—especially if untrue? (7)
27 Ill-tempered recommendation? A different sort might show it. (5,9)

DOWN

1 and 15 across Would the British consider it a plain cut of meat? (9,5,)
2 It's time a policeman gets a break! (The convention might not be popular with such!) (3-4)
3 A queen attempts to get around and hides here to be well-treated. (9)
4 Pity Boaz' wife! (4)
5 Tell did without a bow! (We might do it for cause.) (4,3,3)
6 This officer was a real bird! (5)
7 Mother's seen in disarray about to be seen in the altogether! (2,5)
8 Raised loaf, by the sound of it. (4)
13 One might give a little more thought to having an unusual corner around the lateral surface. (10)
15 Old sailor flag? It might help in the blow-up. (9)
16 Educator-philologist has Mr. Carson get confused about the color. (9)
18 Being less in the heavyweight class, the match might not be called for with it. (7)
20 Involving raids on the power of the press, possibly. (7)
21 and 11 across Still repeated a little way inside, but equally divided. (4-6)
22 They're bound to get shorter in an 18, for example, if put to use. (5)
24 Polish fan? (4)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1283

ACROSS: 1 Scissortail; 9 and 27 Born Free; 10 and 12 Heart trouble; 11 Hard; 15 Cerebral; 16 Soften; 18 Cosset; 21 Cowering; 24 and 26 Filling station; 28 Onus; 29 Earth; 30 and 13 Overbearing; 31 Forswearing. DOWN: 2 Conjurers; 3 Scholar; 4 Oral; 5 Tethers; 6 Ichor; 7 Course; 8 Bronte; 14 and 22 Clock-watcher; 17 First-born; 19 Onions; 20 Tenders; 23 Nooses; 25 Lasso.

PUBLICATIONS

ISRAELI, CONTROVERSIAL CRITICISM and Dialogue on the Left, Non Establishment. Subscribe to the Progressive English Speaking Association NEWSLETTER Four issues . . $3.00. (Sample copy $1.00). Postpaid. Write to: P. O. Box 173, Natanya, Israel.

KNOW CANADA BETTER!

See world affairs from a different perspective!

Read CANADIAN DIMENSION

Independent, lively, and original. Canada's leading forum for radical thought.

$4.00 for eight large issues

Write to:

CANADIAN DIMENSION
P.O. Box 1413
Winnipeg 1, Manitoba, Canada

PERSONALS

NUMBERS RULE THE WORLD: Numerology is one of the oldest psychic sciences. Know what numbers have power over your life. Know how to use them for more success and harmony. Send name, birth date, and $5 to Marguerite Mann, 6600 N. Oracle, Tucson, AZ 85704 for your personal numerology chart. Satisfaction Guaranteed.

DISCOVER an intriguing, fun way of meeting literate Jewish singles. FREE literature: OPERATION MAZEL TOV, 663 Fifth Avenue, N. Y. C. 10022.

WRITERS IN DESPAIR? Publishers reader-editor analyses, revises fiction, non-fiction. Including French. Box #621, c/o The Nation.

SOCK IT TO ME—over 225 other underground buttons. 1/25c, 5/$1, 50/$5, 125/$10 and 1,000/$75. Bumperstickers, beads and peace jewelry, too. Free catalogue to all! Free sample to stores. A BIG-LITTLE STORE, 1077 Mission, San Francisco, Calif. 94103.

GENE LIVES—Memorabilia of McCarthy Campaign. $4.97 package includes: 3 flower decals (rickee tickee stickees); 5 assorted buttons; 2 bumper stickers; 2 posters ("He Stood Up Alone . . ."; "Give the Presidency Back to the People"); "Keynote" Speech. $2.93 package includes: 2 decals; 3 buttons; 1 poster; 1 bumper sticker. Order from: Memorabilia & Co., Box 3769-N Georgetown Station, Washington, D. C. 20007.

The Nation

BOOK SERVICE

Offers the following at a discount:

☐ VIETNAM FOLLY by Sen. Ernest Gruening and Herbert W. Beaser (National Press, $8.95) $7.16

☐ FRIENDSHIP AND FRATRICIDE by Meyer A. Zeligs (Viking, $8.95) $7.16

☐ THE GOODBYE LAND by Jose Yglesias (Pantheon, $4.95) $3.96

Remittance accompanying orders should be made payable to THE NATION, 333 6th Ave., N.Y. 10014

Readers can avail themselves of our regular offer to send them any book (except paperbacks), published in the U.S. at the retail price post-free. When ordering, please give title, author and publisher.
2-10-69

Printed by Milford Publishing Inc., Milford, Conn.

FREE OFFER:

A while back we advertised the book you wanted as a free gift with your new subscription to The NATION. You meant to subscribe then BUT you left the magazine at a friend's house, or perhaps you clipped the ad and were just too busy—or too involved with political events—to follow up.

Here's a second chance. If you subscribe now, you will receive FREE any one of the following books. Pick one:

GRUENING OF ALASKA, ☐
by Sherwood Ross

THE DESTRUCTION OF CALIFORNIA, ☐
by NATION contributor Raymond F. Dasmann

UNLESS PEACE COMES, ☐
by Nigel Calder

SCIENCE AND HUMAN VALUES, ☐
by NATION contributor J. Bronowski

RUSSIA AT WAR, ☐
by NATION contributor Alexander Werth

AIR WAR: VIETNAM, ☐
by Frank Harvey

BETWEEN THE LINES, ☐
by NATION contributor Dan Wakefield

AMERICA'S VIETNAM POLICY: ☐
The Strategy of Deception
by Richard S. Herman and Richard B. Du Boff

HOW AMERICA VOTES IN PRESIDENTIAL ELECTIONS, ☐
by NATION contributor Louis H. Bean

Send this coupon to:
THE NATION 333 Sixth Ave. New York, N.Y. 10114

☐ I'll join you for 1 year (48 issues). Enclosed is $10. I've checked the book I want.

☐ I'll try you for 6 months (24 issues). Enclosed is $6.

(Add $1 postage for Canada & Mexico; $2 other foreign)

Name ....

Street ....

City .... State .... Zip ....

N 2-10

The good fight

is now in

THE NATION

—Why not

join now?

UN: THE FOUR POWERS ANNE TUCKERMAN

THE NATION

FEBRUARY 17, 1969 35 cents

UNIVERSITY OF COL
FEB
LIBRARIES
PERIODICALS RM

Watershed of Politics

A DEMOCRAT SPEAKS TO THE QUESTION
JESSE UNRUH

Ripon: Left Spur to the GOP
HAROLD L. REITER

The 'Kaffeeklatsch' Constituency
FLOYD McKAY

Blacks on Campus
ANGRY and ALONE TOGETHER
KENNETH G. GROSS

Tropbanana Country EMILE CAPOUYA

'Thinking About Women' GEORGE STADE

LETTERS

market fallacy

New York City

Dear Sirs: In dissecting his "Five Myths of Consumership" [The Nation, Jan. 20], Dallas Smythe has unwittingly propagated a sixth. "Without the marketing services of the communications media," he says, "the consumer goods industries . . . could not dispose of their mass-produced products." This rests on the unstated assumption that people consume chiefly because they are told to.

Suppose the detergent industry ceased to advertise—would American housewives cease washing clothes? . . . At my own rough estimate, three-quarters of national consumer advertising, (i.e., excluding the special case of local store ads) is altogether irrelevant to the operations of any consumer industry. Its aim is not to market goods as such but to sell the goods of Company A rather than the substantially identical products of Companies B, C or D. Without it, the industry as a whole would continue to operate, though the sales ratios of individual firms might change.

The remainder of the national advertising budget does, in a sense, perform a necessary marketing function in that it deals with new products. . . . But even here we do well to remind ourselves of the many cases in which the "newness" is substantially fictitious, being a matter of packaging, the addition of some spurious "miracle ingredient" and the like. . . . Mass marketing—i.e., advertising through the mass media—is in no sense a necessary concomitant of mass production. . . . Robert Claiborne decades and centuries

Philadelphia, Pa.

Dear Sirs: Thirty years may not be too far in advance to straighten out a matter that took quite an irrational beating, according to commentators and pundits of the time, in A.D. 1900:

Despite crackpot reasoning, the year 1900 was the last year of the 19th century and the year 1901 was the first year of the 20th century. A century just ain't a century until you've stashed away a full 100 years. . . .

Your editorial, "The Moon Will Wait" [Jan. 13], discussing a prevailing itch to achieve a moon landing "before the end of the decade," interprets this as getting the job done by January 1, 1970. The year 1970, good sirs, is the last year of the seventh decade of the 20th century; the next decade begins on January 1, 1971.

And it follows that midnight on December 31, 2000, will be the moment for kissing off the 20th century with horns, rockets and fireworks. Can't we have a ruling on this, once and for all? Maybe the U.S. Supreme Court should tackle it. . . . Howard Cushman no cure

San Jose, Calif.

Dear Sirs: President Nixon's advocacy of "black capitalism" reminds me of a certain religious testimonial meeting in rural Alabama many years ago. After several of the brothers and sisters had risen and told what the Lord had done for them, a young paraplegic pulled and pushed himself up and said: "Brothers and sisters, everybody can see what the Lord has done for me."

Likewise, all the black brothers and sisters can see what "white capitalism" has done for the many millions of whites still trapped in the poverty pit—as well as for the bulk of the blacks. Assuming the establishment of black capitalism in the ghettos, there is no reason to believe that it would be any more responsive to black poverty than white capitalism is to white poverty. . . . Bryan Fulks

EDITORIALS

Which Way the Parties?

No sooner was the new Congress in session than speculation began: will Nixon be a one-term President or, perhaps, a trend-setter? Was 1968 just another election, or a "watershed" election, a breakthrough of the kind that ushers in a new political cycle? It is too early to draw conclusions but many analysts agree that the 1968 election may well belong in the latter category.

Some Democrats seem to think so. The party, as Jesse Unruh, one of its most experienced and knowledgeable tacticians points out in this issue (p. 199), is in more trouble than most of its partisans acknowledge. True, elements of the New Deal coalition finally rallied to Humphrey in larger numbers than might have been anticipated, but the coalition is in serious trouble and the prospects for reviving it are not bright. Substantial Democratic losses in the South will not be readily regained. Lawrence O'Brien, the party's ablest technician, just before his departure as chairman of the Democratic National Committee, called attention to the fact that "the old Cadillac Square syndrome" had almost disappeared, despite labor's last-minute efforts; Jesse Unruh makes the same point.

The existence of a large and growing constituency outside both parties will compel a rethinking of strategies for Democrats and Republicans alike. While writing off the Deep South, at least for the time being, the Democrats must form a new coalition that will include the young, the blacks, Mexican Americans, the intellectuals and substantial elements from the blue-collar and upper-middle-class suburbs. This involves some "new approaches" on issues and programs; in addition a new style of politics, as well as new methods of enlisting active participation, must be fashioned. The Democratic majorities in Congress, as David Broder has noted, are largely illusory—"the diminished legacy of pre-Johnson victories." Among the freshmen, sophomores and juniors in the House and Senate, Republicans enjoy a 2-to-1 majority. In three elections, the Democratic Senate majority has dropped from eighteen to seven, and it will be vulnerable in 1970 when the Democrats must defend twenty-five seats and the Republicans only eight. The Democrats now have governors in only twenty of the fifty states, and Democrats and Republicans control state legislatures in the same proportion. Even assuming that the Democrats might expect to make some gains in an off-year election, it is clear that they have their work cut out for them. The possible emergence of a dissident movement, within or to the left of the party, could also cause the Democrats considerable distress.

On the Republican side, President Nixon will have trouble building the Grand New Coalition he has projected unless he adopts a new strategy. The course he followed in 1960 and again in 1968 of relying on the electoral votes of the West, the South and the border states, along with some Midwestern states, works fairly well for a Republican nominee in Presidential elections because the Western states—California is in a special class —have more electoral votes in proportion to population than do the more densely populated states. But to build support in the Congress the GOP must pick up strength in the industrial Midwest, in such states as New York, New Jersey and Pennsylvania, and in New England. The elements of the electorate which the Republicans must win over in increasing numbers have been described by Richard M. Scammon as "more and more metropolitan, better and better educated, more and more white collar in status; a middle-aged electorate substantially white in race and mixed in religious affiliation, and an electorate marked not by the rejection of middle-class values but by the triumph of those values." If this analysis is sound, then the Republicans may find it easier to build a new coalition than will the Democrats.

The Republican chances depend, to a large extent, on whether the Nixon Administration is prepared to place increasing reliance on the liberal-moderate wing of the party in its attempt to win a larger share of the vote in the heavily populated states. Even a solid South vote would not be of much help in building the Grand New Coalition; that can be achieved only if Nixon fixes his sights on the big states. The Wallace movement took a larger percentage of the national vote from Humphrey than from Nixon. If the movement re-emerges in 1972, it could well cause more trouble for the Democrats than for the Republicans. Surveying the first speculations on the new political season suggests that 1968 may, indeed, have been a "watershed" election, a last hurrah for the old alignments and coalitions.

Arms Chill

Even after General Eisenhower (or one of his speech writers) gave it a name, level-headed Americans have despaired of materially curbing the military-industrial complex. But it now looks as though there might be a chance. As Joseph Kraft says in his syndicated column, the defense monster hasn't suddenly been tamed, but "for the first time since Korea, the climate of opinion is right for a careful, discriminating effort to achieve a defensive program that is responsive to national needs. . . ."

Vietnam is the chief reason. Nobody loves a loser, and in Vietnam we have lost, not militarily but politically. (We didn't win in Korea, but Vietnam is worse.) The negotiations will drag on and on, more Americans being added to the toll of 30,000 already killed and uncounted thousands maimed and crippled. Some sort of bedraggled, probably impermanent, settlement will be made, and everybody will remember that again and again we were assured by highest authority that we were on the verge of winning. The fact is that the admirals and generals who did the talking have discredited the military; no one believes them any more, just as no one gave any credence to the bankers after the 1929 debacle.

And the services are under a cloud of suspicion that they were, and still are, in alliance with industrialists to spend billions on weapons that may satisfy the egos of high commanders but actually undermine national defense, and make the whole world insecure. This extravagance is aggravated by the rivalry among the services, and

IN THIS ISSUE

February 17, 1969

EDITORIALS

194

ARTICLES

198 UN: Defusing the Powder Keg Anne Tuckerman

Watershed of Politics:

199 A Democrat Speaks to the Question Jesse Unruh
202 Ripon: Left Spur to the GOP Harold L. Reiter
205 The 'Kaffeeklatsch' Constituency Floyd McKay
207 Blacks on Campus: Angry and Alone Together Kenneth G. Gross
210 The Rigors of Play Mihaly Csikszentmihalyi

BOOKS & THE ARTS

213 The Epic of Tropbanana Emile Capouya
214 New Look at Abolitionists Edward Magdol
215 Commonplaces About Women George Stade
216 Poetry:
Learning Patricia Goedicke
Geometry Jerzy Harasymowicz
Three Poems John Tagliabue
Two Winter Pieces Saul Touster
217 Book Marks Charles Stein
218 Music David Hamilton
220 Theatre and Films Harold Clurman
221 Art Lawrence Alloway
223 Crossword Puzzle Frank W. Lewis

Publisher
JAMES J. STORROW JR.

Associate Publisher
GIFFORD PHILLIPS

Editor
CAREY McWILLIAMS

Associate Editor
PHIL KERBY

Executive Editor
ROBERT HATCH

Literary Editor
HELEN YGLESIAS

Copy Editor, MARION HESS; Poetry Editor, JOHN LOGAN; Theatre, HAROLD CLURMAN; Art, MAX KOZLOFF; Music, BENJAMIN BORETZ; Science, CARL DREHER; Advertising Manager MARY SIMON.

Editorial Associate, ERNEST GRUENING

Washington, ROBERT G. SHERRILL; Paris, ALEXANDER WERTH; London, RAYMOND WILLIAMS; Bonn, C. AMERY; Canberra, C. P. FITZGERALD; United Nations, ANNE TUCKERMAN.

The Nation is published weekly (except for omission of four summer issues) by the Nation Magazine Company and copyright 1969 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014, Tel: CH 2-8400 West Coast office (for editorial correspondence only); 825 South Barrington Avenue Los Angeles, Calif. 90049. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. and at additional mailing office.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Add $1 per year postage for Canada and Mexico; $2 other foreign.

Change of Address: It is essential that subscribers ordering a change of address give five weeks' notice and provide their old as well as their new address. Please give Zip Code numbers for both addresses.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Book Review Index and the Public Affairs Information Service.

THE NATION Volume 208
No. 7

within each service. By way of current example, the Air Force generals, who have never overcome an infatuation with big bombers (as some admirals still yearn for battleships), have come up with a scheme which they call SCAD for Subsonic Cruise Armed Decoy. Big bombers will carry small, pilotless nuclear-armed bombers—twenty or thirty on a B-52, more on the still larger bombers that the fly-generals are now sure they will get—which will be launched toward enemy cities and installations while the big planes remain safely out of antiaircraft range. SCAD, a descendant of the German V-1, is the bomber enthusiasts' equivalent of the multiple-warhead missile—as if the latter weren't, in Henry Kissinger's term, a sufficiency.

If a ponderous machine like the military-industrial complex is to be slowed down, however, there must be a prominent issue on which it has made itself look foolish and which annoys or frightens the mass of citizens. The "thin" ABM ("Sentinel") fills the bill. This is the anti-missile system which many weapon engineers think will never work but which was put over originally on the ground that the Chinese had a hydrogen bomb and sooner or later would toss it our way. What the radioactive fallout would be when the bad and good missiles collided, the ABM inventors did not say. (See "Blind Strategy of Missile Defense" by Milton J. Rosenberg, The Nation, February 10.)

In 1967, less than ten Senators were openly opposed to the Sentinel. In 1968, the number of opponents had increased to thirty-seven, and this year a head count shows forty-eight, with a good chance to get a majority. Last year the chief burden of organizing the opposition fell to Sen. John Sherman Cooper; his role is still important but he has been joined by Sen. Stuart Symington, whose opinion earns special respect because he is a former Secretary of the Air Force, and by Senators Percy and Kennedy. Senator Kennedy has written a letter to Secretary of Defense Melvin Laird, declaring that it would be "folly" to deploy the proposed system, that there is no convincing evidence that it would ever work, and that it would obstruct an opportunity to lessen world tensions.

One reason for the Senate's growing distaste for Sentinel is that the citizens want no part of it. Senator Percy is receiving 750 to 1,000 letters a week from constituents who oppose an installation in the Chicago area. That Sen. Henry M. Jackson, who must stand for re-election next year, will want to defy the opposition in Seattle is doubtful. The resistance to Sentinel is nation-wide. In Reading, Mass., a meeting of 1,600 persons angrily questioned a brigadier general who had been sent to explain the necessity for ABM defense. Richard N. Goodwin, formerly special assisant to Presidents Kennedy and Johnson; Jerome B. Wiesner, former science adviser to President Kennedy, and other prominent people have signed a letter urging President Nixon to halt construction on Sentinel, at least until the entire project can be reviewed. Perhaps in response to such pressure, Mr. Laird has ordered a one-month suspension of ABM activity.

It all adds up to a new atmosphere, in which the military-industrial complex will not get everything it wants merely for the asking. The President's message to the Senate, urging ratification of the nonproliferation treaty, probably represents his shrewd and timely recognition that a new atmosphere is emerging on matters relating to the military.

The President, incidentally, is performing admirably. In one day last week, he recommended an increase in funds for basic science research, took patronage out of the postal system, urged ratification of the nonproliferation treaty, and endorsed four-power talks at the UN on the Middle East.

It Couldn't Have Been Worse

If some enemy, in all his wickedness, had wished to make the U.S. Navy look bad, he could hardly have written a more devastating scenario than the one the Navy followed in the Pueblo affair. It matches the performance of the CIA in the Bay of Pigs fiasco. Nor should we be astonished. While it is impossible to exculpate the Navy, it should be remembered that the Pueblo mission was almost certainly undertaken on behalf of the CIA and that the thirty "research" personnel on the ship were probably under CIA or similar direction.

The Navy was in charge of the logistic, communications and navigational phases of the mission, and it seems to have miscalculated in all of them. Coordination within the Navy, and between the Navy and the State Department, was almost totally lacking. One admiral, or set of admirals, gave instructions to the commanding officer of the ship. Another admiral, or more than one, was in charge of protective measures in the event of "trouble"—and gave no help whatsoever.

All senior officers seem to have been unable to make up their minds whether the Pueblo should be armed or not; in the end they compromised on token armament—two machine guns which the crew did not know how to use. The "destruct" preparations were similarly inadequate. Communication with headquarters in Japan was unreliable. The destroyer which was supposed to be steaming just over the horizon was actually sixteen hours away. Help could not be given by air; though there were eight American fighter aircraft in South Korea, all were equipped with nuclear weapons. (An interesting sidelight on the ever-present danger that a major East-West nuclear confrontation may be triggered by a "small" nuclear clash somewhere in the world.)

To round out the lugubrious picture, the North Koreans, who were in a state of high excitement at the time, had given warning of their intentions. Three days before the seizure, at a meeting at Panmunjon, Maj. Gen. Pak Chung Kook had protested to Rear Adm. John V. Smith, the senior United Nations delegate (the United States still insists that the UN is in charge), against infiltrations by "armed spy boats, together with a group of South Korean fishing boats," had denounced "such criminal acts," and had declared: "We have the due right to make a due response to your thoughtless play with fire. We will fully exercise our rights." The State and Defense Departments were not informed of this warning until after the ship was seized; they said later that such warnings were so frequent as to be routine and that they would have felt justified in ignoring this one and sending the ship within a mile or so of the 12-mile limit.

But after the Pueblo was lost, the admirals flew into a frenzy of activity. They wanted to fight, to move in and seize the ship, to retaliate in some fashion. They were prepared to resume the Korean War, even while they had their hands full in Vietnam. One of the few acts to the credit of the Johnson administration is that it quashed that nonsense.

FCC: Policy by Whimsy

By two decisions which it handed down within forty-eight hours, the Federal Communications Commission proved—if such proof is still necessary—that it has no rational policy. It operates by dangerous whimsy.

On January 23 it ruled, in a split decision, that the Boston Herald-Traveler Corp. must surrender its television and radio license to a local, independent company. The Herald-Traveler Corp., which also publishes two Boston newspapers, was not judged to have failed in its duties as a broadcaster (although, oddly, the FCC did quibble over its lack of "agricultural programming"); the commission took back its license primarily to encourage "diversification" of ownership.

If it pointed to the establishment of a national program of forced diversification, the Boston decision would surely be a matter of rejoicing. As Commissioner Nicholas Johnson pointed out: "In America's eleven largest cities there is not a single network-affiliated VHF television station that is independently and locally owned. They are all owned by networks, multiple station owners, or major newspapers."

But it is evident from another decision which the FCC made public on the previous day that no such purpose is intended. In an order released January 22, the commission refused to reconsider its renewal of the television-radio license (KSL-TV-AM-FM) held by the Mormon Church in Salt Lake City, despite the fact that the concentration of communications outlets in this case is overwhelming.

The history of the FCC's favoritism for the Mormon Church goes back to 1965 when the KSL-TV application came up for its regular three-year renewal. It was approved, even though the application failed to disclose who owned the station or what its other commercial relationships were. The 1968 renewal was similarly whisked through, by a vote of 3 to 1, at a time when Commissioner Johnson—who says he would have voted against it and would have protested its renewal without a public hearing—was out of the country.

Then two non-Mormon residents of Salt Lake City petitioned the FCC to reopen the case and to hold a public hearing. This was the plea that the FCC ruled against January 22 with an evenly divided 3-to-3 vote (ties go to the "defendant").

Of the three commissioners who ruled in favor of the Mormon license, one was FCC Chairman Rosel H. Hyde, who is a Mormon. There was nothing illegal in his taking part, but one may fairly note that Chairman Hyde participated in the Salt Lake City case (if he had not, it would have been reopened for examination) but abstained from voting in the Boston case, saying "my vote is not essential to the resolution of the matter."

The Mormon Church owns the Deseret Management Co., publishers of Salt Lake's afternoon newspaper, The Deseret News, which in turn is in partnership (in possible violation of federal and state antitrust laws) with the Salt Lake Tribune.

The Deseret Management Co. owns KSL Inc., whose television and radio outlets blanket Utah and extend well into Wyoming, Nevada and Idaho. And KSL Inc. owns 23 per cent of KID Broadcasting Corp., which holds television and radio licenses in Idaho Falls, Ida., and owns 6 per cent of Boise Valley Broadcasting, Inc., which holds television and radio licenses in Boise, Ida.

Deseret Management Co. also owns 100 per cent of the stock of Bonneville International Corp., which owns Radio New York Worldwide, Inc., holder of licenses for shortwave station WNYW and stereo station WAFM, both in New York City; it owns KIRO, KIRO-FM and KIRO-TV in Seattle; and stations KMBZ and KMBR in Kansas City, Mo.

The Mormon Church's newspaper partner in Salt Lake City is the Kearns Tribune Corp., which also owns 35 per cent of the stock of KUTV-TV in Salt Lake. The rest of KUTV's stock is owned by the Glassman family, thereby making this clan a partner, once removed, of the Mormon Church. The Glassman-Hatch interests control newspapers and radio and television outlets in Ogden, Idaho Falls, Salt Lake City, Twin Falls, Billings, Honolulu, Wailulai, Hilo, Laramie and a couple of dozen other towns.

The Mormon Church is in a three-way ownership of Salt Lake City's CATV system. It also owns more than 5 per cent of the stock (about $20 million worth) in the Los Angeles Times, whose domination of the communications industry in Southern California is so potent that it spills over into Arizona.

The Mormon Church's spectacular concentration of communications ownership, partnership and cronyship is no secret. All of this information has been on the record since Senator Hart held his Failing Newspaper Act hearings in 1967. The FCC simply uses the information that it finds convenient and ignores the rest.

Stalling Tactics

With recent draft calls rising substantially—the February quota is 33,700, compared with only 12,000 last September—educators are concerned about the possible effect on enrollments in graduate school. The 1968 draft law, which did away with graduate exemptions, became effective last September, but had relatively little effect on students during the fall semester. Manpower needs were low, and many draft boards were slow to reclassify students. But now the situation may change considerably.

With the spring semester about to begin, educators are advising current and prospective students to continue to enroll for classes. They note that once the semester is under way, most draft boards will postpone induction. Further, there are important implications to a recent court decision in which a law student at the University of Texas won a suit to obtain a 1-S classification from his local draft board, permitting him to remain in school until the end of the school year. According to a spokesman for the Council of Graduate Schools, it may mean that many second-year graduate students who are ordered to appear for induction in the period between semesters or quarters can now file for a pre-induction judicial review, a process that will effectively delay their induction until the end of the school year.

For advice on this and other legal procedures available to them, graduate students may write to the Council of Graduate Schools, 1785 Massachusetts Ave., N.W., Washington, D.C. 20036. Delaying tactics can win a semester, perhaps a school year, for many students. By then military needs may drop, the draft law itself may be changed, or some accommodation may be found in Vietnam.

Ralph McGill

Ralph McGill's death closed a cycle in Southern journalism which he had helped to initiate. When he began his career—on the Nashville Banner in 1922 and later on the Atlanta Constitution—social pressures in the South were so intense as to make any examples of good journalism shine forth like beacons in the night. And there was a lot of news, often dramatic, to report: lynchings, riots, bizarre politics, colorful demagogues, tobacco-road detours and a special kind of poverty. Race was then a Southern, not an ongoing national story. In such a setting, the good Southern newspaper received national recognition and the good Southern journalist was a likely prizewinner. Some Southern communities, eager for national recognition, were prepared to tolerate a degree of journalistic excellence, the more so since it did not have too much local impact. In brief it was a time of opportunity for Southern journalists, and Ralph McGill was one of the best. In a journalistic sense his voice became "the conscience of the South," and his example encouraged others. Young reporters wanted to work on the Constitution because of Ralph McGill.

The high point of his career—and of Southern journalism (at least for the time being)—was reached in 1959 when he won the Pulitzer Prize. That year marked the upsurge of the movement to which we owe the first significant civil rights legislation. This in turn marked the first step toward that liberation of the South from the tyranny of racial myths and political demagogy which McGill had long sought to achieve. But the atmosphere soon changed. New forces emerged, the segregationists became more sophisticated, the battle lines shifted, talk about Black Power began to disturb Southern power structures. Those who had tolerated advocacy of civil rights as merely eccen-

(Continued on page 212)

UN: DEFUSING THE POWDER KEG

ANNE TUCKERMAN

United Nations

Diplomatic efforts to break the perilous deadlock in the Middle East have entered a new phase. Following a timely proposal by the French Government, the representatives of the four major powers at the United Nations have started private consultations to try to define and put in operation concerted moves to implement the resolution adopted by the Security Council on November 22, 1967. These preliminaries will in all likelihood be followed soon by a meeting of the four powers in New York.

The French proposal recognized the need, also felt acutely in Moscow and Washington, to explore new avenues out of an increasingly infected situation in the Middle East. The priority which President Nixon has given the problems of this area shows the extreme concern felt by the new Administration for the Middle East "powder keg," to which the abhorrent hangings in Baghdad have added yet another fuse. At the same time, Mr. Nixon implied that negotiations with the Soviets on an issue about which both powers have a vital interest, but in which they are not directly concerned, would provide a useful opening, and perhaps even a key, for a dialogue that is certain to encompass many other complex and difficult problems.

A new attempt at a settlement of the Arab-Israeli conflict appears the more urgent because of the increasing militancy of Arab extremists in and out of Arab governments. An ominous symptom of this development is that a Soviet memorandum of last December, drafted with the approval of Cairo and listing steps for implementing the Security Council resolution, was rejected not only by Israel but also by Iraq and by the Palestine Liberation Organization. There is a feeling in diplomatic circles that the time may be approaching when Nasser, who is still the leading Arab statesman, will be unable to "deliver" a settlement.

Moscow is concerned by this possibility, because Arab extremist organizations seem to be infiltrated with revolutionary cadres trained in China, Cuba or Algeria. For practical purposes, Jordan is at present in the hands of the Palestinian terrorist organization. Nasser's loss of stature would also have anti-American implications, and is therefore feared in Washington. Paris has warned the other powers that the Palestine Liberation Organization has assumed many of the features of the Algerian Liberation movement, in its early stages, and that young and dedicated intellectuals have taken over from the inefficient mass of Arab malcontents.

Israel reacted in advance with an emphatic "no" to whatever formula might be devised by the Big Four, characterizing it as an attempt to impose a solution which, in the opinion of the Jerusalem government, can come only from direct talks between it and the Arab governments. President de Gaulle's sponsorship of the big-power concertation, as the French prefer to call it, has not helped matters, since he could hardly be called a mollifying influence after the French embargo on arms to Israel.

In these circumstances, the French proposal has been carefully drafted to conform to the framework of the Security Council resolution. Secretary-General U Thant, who supports the French initiative, has insisted on a UN background for the four-power action, and has defined the objective as "moral pressure" on the parties, but without any Diktat. Washington agrees. The agenda submitted by the French Government for the talks suggests an evaluation of the mission of Ambassador Jarring, named by the proposal as an intermediary working with all parties for the application of principles listed in the Security Council resolution. The agenda provides further for a study of means to make the resolution effective, and of measures to prevent further deterioration of international relations in the area. (Two of these measures could be big-power guarantees and limitation of arms shipments to the area.)

Because the agenda is drawn on very general lines, the talks may go on for months. The intention is to provide a careful re-examination of all aspects of the problem in the context of the Security Council resolution. The role of Ambassador Jarring during this time would be mostly to stand by and possibly to elicit reactions from both sides. That will also be done, one would suspect, by Washington and Moscow, which have privileged links with Jerusalem and Cairo. If and when agreement begins to develop on the basic issues, the good offices of Dr. Jarring would be reactivated, and he might then wish a formal statement from the Security Council as a whole to strengthen his mandate.

For the moment, nobody will predict where the four-power concertation will lead, or whether it will lead anywhere. The answer to that question lies primarily in Jerusalem.

WATERSHED OF POLITICS

A Democrat Speaks to the Question

JESSE UNRUH

Mr. Unruh, elected to the Assembly in 1954, has served as Speaker from 1961 to 1969, and is currently leader of the Democratic minority in that body. He headed the California delegation to the 1968 convention and has given the Chubb Fellowship lectures at Yale.

> The Democratic Party is never so good as when it's broke, when respectable people speak of it in whispers, and when it has no leaders and only one principle—to go in and take it away from the other fellows. . . .
> —Finley Peter Dunne ("Mr. Dooley")

Sacramento

Once again, the sagacious Chicago saloonkeeper comes to the aid of the party with a concise description of the state into which it has fallen, indeed into which it has fallen frequently since his time. It would be hard to improve today upon the statement of purpose Mr. Dooley framed for his Democratic Party. The difference now is that the old way of going in and taking it away from the other fellows just may not work any more.

The old dependable power blocs are deteriorating, and they are not being replaced. Organized labor is becoming politically and socially irrelevant. Farmers are solidly entrenched in the middle class or better; their needs are expressed in arcane economic formulas understood only by federal bureaucrats. The solid South has finally found out what the Democratic Party meant by racial equality and has left it in a huff.

This process of deterioration has been going on for many years and has been ignored by Democrats. Now we have reached the point where Richard Daley cannot deliver Illinois, and Texas is the only Southern state to vote Democratic. Presumably, Democrats are sufficiently shocked to look for the reasons why.

It is not so much that the New Deal coalition has left the Democratic Party as that the goals of the Democratic Party have changed in response—if in sluggish response—to the changing needs of society, and the blocs in the old coalition do not share these new goals. The South resents federally imposed integration; farmers do not share the new overriding concern with the cities. Most disturbing of all is the failure of organized labor to rally enthusiastically behind our social programs.

The failure of labor may really be that of the liberal politicians, who idealized the working man throughout this century into some kind of noble savage who would push the Democratic Party into whatever progressive direction it ought to take at a given time. It turns out that working people share most of the weaknesses of the rest of mankind, and the surprise of this discovery has still not worn off for many political leaders.

The United Auto Workers has made a significant effort in the ghettos, but in this it is exceptional. Minority unemployment is almost universally recognized as the principal canker in our central cities. The labor movement could be expected to lead the attack on this problem, but it does not. Most labor unions are not even very effective at policing their own discrimination. Racism in the building trades unions is a national scandal.

In California, the Division of Apprenticeship Standards reported in 1964 that 2.4 per cent of apprentices were black. After four years of concentration upon minority employment, the Division reported that only 2 per cent of apprentices were black. That was not progress, but organized labor in California vigorously opposed legislation designed to correct the situation. It can be most convincingly argued that the policies of the National Association of Manufacturers regarding minority employment are often more progressive than those of the AFL-CIO.

The area of foreign policy has produced a most interesting reversal of roles: the AFL-CIO went on record in full support of President Johnson's conduct of the war in Vietnam, while the stock market responded most favorably to rumors of peace. Old-fashioned liberals are finding it increasingly difficult to distinguish the villains from the heroes.

In parallel with its decline of liberalism, organized labor has suffered a decline of political influence. During the California legislative campaigns of 1968, many districts were polled on the question, "Do you believe labor unions generally endorse the best candidate?" Republicans, not surprisingly, responded negatively 3 to 1; but in none of the districts polled did a majority of Democrats respond affirmatively, and in only one district did a plurality of Democrats feel that a labor endorsement signified political worth. This opinion may be especially marked in California, with its highly mobile population, but it is increasingly evident nationally.

It is significant, too, that labor brought about the defeat of some of the Democratic U.S. Senatorial candidates who were for peace in Vietnam. It did so not by withholding an endorsement but by withdrawing campaign funds. The illiberalism of old-guard labor leaders will not have its effect so much in forcing a change of Democratic Party policies as in making it tougher for many Democratic candidates to get elected.

If the New Deal coalition is no longer committed to the Democratic Party, it must also be admitted that the leaders of the Democratic Party have done little to bring those blocs or any other segments of the society back into the fold. Long incumbencies in many Statehouses and in Washington, and the complacency produced by an erroneous belief that, come what may, certain large groups of citizens will support Democrats, have led to a breakdown of communication with the voters.

It is true that lingering loyalties among individuals who comprised the old blocs still account for many Democratic votes, but it is neither likely nor desirable that they determine the central thrust of the party. As a practical matter, it is probably not necessary to cater to them; most of them will continue to vote Democratic for a few more years despite their disagreements with the new direction the party must take. But American voters in the mass have demonstrated a growing ability to split their tickets with great sophistication, especially when the offices at stake have high visibility. Party loyalty cannot sustain the Democrats over the long haul; we shall have to start explaining what we advocate and why.

Indeed, the dissemination of information may become the most important use of the party apparatus. "Big Government" really is as large and complex as the new American nihilists of the Left and Right say it is. Modern government demands all the time and expert effort that officeholders can devote to it, leaving little time for public relations. As the need for communication between government and the citizenry increases, the ability to communicate decreases. This tendency, however, can be reversed by political parties.

The day of the precinct worker going door to door with a bag of groceries or a bucket of coal is well gone. We may be reaching the time when the precinct worker going door to door prodding people to the polling place will be equally anachronistic. A political party does not derive much long-range benefit from people who do not want to vote in the first place, and do not know what they are voting on once they are in the booth. It is better by far to produce some kind of self-motivation. The excitement of Robert Kennedy's candidacy turned out many more votes than did the job offers and other blandishments of Richard Daley.

Along with communication must come candor. Democratic candidates at all levels are especially handicapped today because of the party's long dominance at the federal level. We must begin to understand that it is not disloyal to admit the mistakes of other Democrats. In fact, the party fundamentalists who insist that candidates support programs which have not lived up to expectations are guilty of the great political sin of impracticality. The U.S. Senate and the Democratic Party are clearly better off for candidates like McGovern, Ribicoff, Bayh, Church and Cranston who consistently differed with the policies of President Johnson's administration throughout their campaigns.

The War on Poverty has not been a smashing success; we should be learning from its failures and telling the people what we are learning. That also is what we should have done much earlier with respect to the war in Vietnam.

Viewed from the state level, the great failing of the Johnson administration was its approach to the solution of social problems. Apparently in continuing fascination with the New Deal, the administration insisted upon the central government's superior ability to formulate and administer programs. In fact, there has been a growing disenchantment with the programs and those who control them. The beneficiaries of this disenchantment have been the political conservatives.

If this trend was recognized by the administration, the response was far from adequate. We were offered a slogan, "Creative Federalism"; but when Democratic officeholders like Robert Kennedy and Edmund Muskie tried to give the slogan meaning, they got little sympathy from the White House. The President's Advisory Commission on Intergovernmental Relations, originally a very promising organization, has declined under the lackluster, foot-dragging dominance of former Southern governors.

The failure to allocate control for maximum effect will loom large in the next few years. The Johnson administration was far better suited to involve other levels of government and private business in social programs than the Nixon Administration will be. If President Nixon calls for local control and home rule, and embarks upon a program of incentives and awards to business, he cannot avoid the accusation that he is rewarding those who have long supported the Republican Party. A Democratic administration would not have been similarly suspect.

We Democrats can free ourselves of old prejudices—and free the electorate of prejudices about us—if we can develop a more open political approach. The Democratic Party must commit itself to complete honesty, both in the formulation and execution of policy and in its day-to-day functioning as a political apparatus. (Emphasis of this point is not intended to impute greater honesty to any other political party, living or dead.)

We must start by telling the truth during election periods. If people do not believe us then, we can hardly expect their confidence later. Campaigns waged in terms of personal invective, outright misrepresentation and contrived distortion may produce victories, but they make the task of governing all but impossible for the winners. An opponent who has been maligned and mistreated during a campaign can hardly be expected to cooperate with the victor who has used such tactics, and the supporters of the losing candidate can be expected to be even more resentful.

A more visible and potent Fair Campaign Practices Committee would be helpful in identifying those candidates whose concern for the truth has been suspended for the campaign duration, but the best answer is self-restraint. To the discredit of our party, the outstanding example of such restraint under pressure is that of Sen. Barry Goldwater during the 1964 Presidential campaign.

As far as intraparty policy is concerned, there must be a great reduction in the messianic insistence on party solidarity. The obvious insincerity this produces destroys the prestige of politicians and underestimates the intelligence of the voters. Not every Democratic candidate is endowed with superior virtue, and the electorate knows we know it. Blind insistence upon party brotherhood makes politics in general about as credible as a television wrestling match.

The press is probably at least as culpable on this matter as are most politicians. The immutable principle of party unity provides an extremely simple way to explain election results: no one questions an editorial dismissal of the hapless politician who fails to endorse one or another local candidate of his party.

Beyond the criticism of existing programs lies the proposal of new ones. Here Democrats must understand that programs themselves become instruments of communication. The tendency to concentrate upon the very pressing problems of our minorities can lead to greater alienation of the majority. Each new program has the inherent danger of producing a new reason for resentment.

For example, providing summer job opportunities for black youngsters in the ghettos may seem an unexceptionable program. But if it is done at the expense of summer job programs for white youngsters in the suburbs, it may eventually create a much more volatile situation than the summertime idleness of young black people produces. Democrats must take a disproportionate share of the blame for sponsoring such socially alienating if well-intentioned programs.

Government's principal task remains that of dealing with the problems affecting the majority. The attack upon minority problems should ideally be made by other institutions in the society, and the political task is to encourage those other institutions to spend their energies in that area. If businessmen can be convinced that there is a profit in meeting ghetto needs, there is no doubt that they will do so; and they will be able to act without fear of majority opinion.

If Democrats are to participate in this transfer of function, a lot of them must come to understand that the important issue is not who is making a profit or how much it is but what is being accomplished. The residents of the ghetto are not squeamish about the profit motive, and they certainly will not forgive us if we use it as an excuse for denying them hope.

All of this leads, of course, to greater honesty in the conduct of government itself. It would seem that the only really responsible recourse, in this period of grave doubt, is to open up the processes of politics and government to the people who are affected by them. In the area of domestic policy, this might mean a step as simple as a commitment to the full disclosure of all reports of Presidential Advisory Commissions.

It is obviously in the area of foreign policy that this need is critical. If we really mean, "No more Vietnams," our action must be drastic. The government should make public some kind of catalogue of our degree of commitment throughout the world. It should state what we are spending, where, through what groups, and for what purposes. We should be told which governments are now controlled by ours and to what degree.

It is likely that Americans would rebel at many aspects of our foreign policy if it were revealed to them in such open fashion, but as we have seen, a little voter rebellion over such issues is healthy. It leads to a more successful foreign policy.

There is often no reason, other than habit or tradition, for clandestine political activities. No legitimate political activities are damaged by opening them up to the people. The California delegation to the Democratic National Convention in 1968 never held a closed caucus. No one has criticized that delegation for making its decisions in public, nor has anyone suggested that the delegation was therefore less effective.

A political party, however, is not necessarily effective simply because it is open and honest. It must be an apparatus with a direction. If the Democratic Party can abandon the debilitating commitment to the past that has brought it to defeat, it can become a most effective majority-forming mechanism.

Some of the elements of a new majority are already apparent. They include the poor, the black and the young. To these may be added those from the upper economic levels who are secure enough not to feel threatened by the demands of those at the lower end of the spectrum, and those so recently up from poverty as not to feel estranged from their former milieu. Finally, there are the idealists and intellectuals who see in the activist groups the motive force for bringing about the changes they advocate.

At present, two or more such blocs will ally themselves occasionally in pursuit of some common goal. The pacts are usually temporary and fragile, and that may lead to the conclusion that no really permanent coalition can be put together with these blocs. If, however, the Democratic Party can command their trust, it will become the accepted political mechanism of this emerging majority.

And the Democratic Party can merit the trust of these people. The lesson of the 1968 Chicago convention was widely misread. The fact that the old professionals ran the convention with an iron hand was not nearly as important as the revolt of large numbers of delegates. Forty per cent of the delegates opposed the party leadership and the incumbent Administration, and that is an extremely high percentage when one considers the methods of delegate selection. These were conscience votes cast by grass-roots party leaders and workers, and they have changed the character of the Democratic Party.

But whether or not any such new majority emerges, it should be evident that we cannot return to the bland politics of consensus. First of all, the isolated nature of life in our affluent society is not likely to change soon. We shall continue to live among our peers, work with them and educate our children with theirs. The problems of other groups will be perceived dimly, if at all. Second, the problems with which we must deal today arise so suddenly and are of such consequence that it is downright dangerous to spend precious time in developing a consensus of support for a course of action.

What is needed is political leadership that is inspirational as well as intelligent, concerned as well as competent. For the effective governance of this nation our leaders must have the sustained confidence of enough people to permit them to act, with no fear of political collapse if they are wrong. The ability to inspire such confidence enabled John Kennedy to survive the Bay of Pigs. Lack of it prevented Lyndon Johnson from surviving the Tet offensive.

The ability to inspire confidence, and to justify it by dealing openly and honestly, free of commitments and traditional doctrine, is at the heart of that amorphous body of theory, the New Politics. The New Politics is still too much of an abstraction to yield to thorough discussion, but it seems clear that none of the 1968 Presidential candidates could be described as a "New Politician."

George Wallace was no more than a hyper-demagogic Senator Bilbo. The new Nixon was more mature and relaxed, but not really all that new. Vice President Humphrey's image remained dimmed by the shadow of Lyndon Johnson. Robert Kennedy would almost certainly have won, had he lived to become the nominee; Senator McCarthy could probably also have won.

The narrowness of the Nixon victory is likely to keep him shackled to the policies of the past, but the pressure for change is urgent. His Administration will be the last in the New Deal tradition. Some kind of change, for good or ill, will characterize the administration that follows.

Ripon: Left Spur to the GOP

HOWARD L. REITER

Mr. Reiter, a doctoral candidate in political science at Harvard, is on the executive board of the Cambridge chapter of the Ripon Society, a national organization of liberal Republicans.

Cambridge

A khaki-colored wooden building amid the exotic restaurants and psychedelic shops that surround Harvard Square is the headquarters of the Ripon Society, which may become a combination of brain trust and gadfly for the Nixon Administration. It is an organization of several hundred young academic, business and professional men and women who are in the sometimes awkward position of being both liberal and Republican. Founded in Cambridge just over six years ago and named for one of the Midwestern towns that claim to be the birthplace of the GOP, the Society has become virtually the only ongoing group which lobbies within the party for progressive policies. Its ultimate goal is to reunite the party with the intellectual community that in 1912 followed Teddy Roosevelt out of the party—and never returned. In a sense it is the ADA of the GOP.

Until this year, Ripon's role within the party was fairly clear: it was one voice in the Republican wilderness, providing intellectual resources for moderate candidates and officeholders and a forum for such fresh ideas as the negative income tax and draft reform. Now that the party is in power, Ripon must undergo a transformation, and just what it is to be is a matter of some concern to the membership. For unlike the ADA, which could actively support the last five Democratic Presidential nominees, the Ripon Society in 1968 never found itself squarely in the Nixon camp. A poll of more than 500 readers of the Society's magazine, The Ripon Forum, in August, disclosed that more than four out of five had supported Nelson Rockefeller before the convention, and that only a third of those Rockefeller partisans had made up their minds to vote for Nixon in November. Stating its position in September, the Society began with the assertion, "Frankly, Nixon-Agnew was not our dream ticket." The statement went on in an ambiguous vein, ending up as either a reluctant endorsement or a plague on all the houses.

Yet Nixon, ever eager to broaden his base within the party, has long been interested in Ripon personnel. In 1964 he drafted Lee Huebner, a graduate student in history at Harvard, as research assistant. Huebner, who later became president of the Ripon Society, was also hired by the Nixon speech-writing staff after the 1968 convention and is now on the White House staff. John Price, a New York attorney and former chairman of Ripon's national governing board, and Christopher DeMuth, a recent Harvard College graduate with ties in the black community, are now working with Daniel Patrick Moynihan. These appointments are obviously not the result of a pervasive liberalism in the Administration but rather of Nixon's attempt to achieve an ideological Balkanization of the government—conservatives to Justice and Defense, liberals to urban affairs. However, it gives some Riponites access to the highest levels of government.

Huebner, Price and DeMuth personify one approach to the Ripon Society's problem of how to relate to the Nixon Administration. Having taken jobs in the government, they have resigned their Ripon posts to preserve the Society's freedom of action. Others in the Society genuinely fear that it may be co-opted by the Administration, losing its independence by striving to maintain warm relations with the Nixon team. The first problem of this sort arose soon after the election, when the Society issued a statement lamenting the fact that Nixon had not used the campaign to take bold initiatives which would attract Democrats and independents to the Republican Party. The press seized upon a part of the statement that dealt with Nixon's failure to attract the pro-civil rights "frontlash" bloc. A typical headline appeared in The New York Times: "GOP Group Chides Nixon on Backlash." Some members of the Ripon Society suggested that the whole thing might have been better timed; Ripon had the distinction of producing the first post-election statement in the country to criticize the President-elect.

The leadership of the Society generally supports cooperation with the Administration. Josiah Lee Auspitz, doctoral candidate in political science at Harvard and Ripon's new president, says bluntly: "The question is whether we want to be effective, or exhibit our virtue." Effectiveness is the criterion, too, for Bruce Chapman of the Seattle chapter. Author of a proposal for draft reform (The Wrong Man in Uniform) and co-author of a study of the Republicans in 1964 (The Party That Lost Its Head), Chapman says: "At last we have a chance to have our people in government, actually making some of the decisions we've been advocating, or at least advising the decision makers. Our presence in the Administration actually enhances their receptivity to our ideas. And under these circumstances, I think it's folly to suggest that we'll lose our purity; Nixon has already shown his sympathy with some of our ideas. Now they can be implemented."

But one Riponite who is wary of this new coziness is John Saloma, an assistant professor of political science at M.I.T. and the first president of the Society. He warns:

> If the Nixon Administration absorbs the best Ripon talent and the Society becomes in effect an arm of the Administration, we've lost our most important function —independent thought and criticism. Anybody who goes to work for the Administration owes his primary commitment and political loyalty to Nixon, and members of the Administration may try to use their Ripon contacts to get the Society to tone down its criticism.
>
> But Nixon ought to realize that it is in his interest to keep us criticizing him from the left; a party looks more honest and believable if criticism comes from within. The Democrats, after all, came through 1968 remarkably well. We have got to appeal to young people, and young people today are more interested in candor than political loyalty.

Chapman notes, on the other hand, that most of Ripon's chapters are not in academic communities: "In Seattle, or Los Angeles, or Dallas, or Chicago, our function is to bring bright young professional and business people into the Republican Party. Although we can do this while appealing simultaneously to young people outside the party who are not interested in the GOP, it is more important to draw in the others. And these people are more interested in being effective than in simply criticizing." To which Saloma replies: "Many people tell us that it is precisely because of the role we play that they remain Republican. What will they do if we lose our independent voice?"

No one feels that this philosophical difference has been deleterious to the Society. "The most remarkable thing about Ripon," says Lee Huebner, "is the absence of factionalism." And Lee Auspitz adds: "This whole discussion is on a more or less theological level and never reaches the operational stage." Thomas Petri, a Harvard Law graduate and Peace Corps veteran who has just completed his tenure as executive director of the Society, agrees: "In a real sense there is no conflict between someone's role in Ripon and his decision to work for the government. The first consideration for any individual in this case will be citizenship—whatever their views about the President, most people will serve if called. Kennedy found this out in 1961, when some Republicans were drafted into his administration. After all, if you look at your hierarchy of priorities, membership in Ripon will probably fall below other values such as citizenship."

But the question for some is whether the principles for which they joined the Society can be maintained by cooperating with an Administration in which they are only one of many influences. "I don't think we've lost anything," Petri claims. "In fact, I think we've turned a net political profit. We're in the Administration, and I don't think that those who continue to run the Society will soften their criticism. Of course, there is a tension between the desire to be accurate—to criticize accurately—and the desire to have entree, but it's a question of tactics more than anything else. On some issues we may take a different tack than on others, but only for strategic reasons. No basic compromise is involved." Bruce Chapman adds, "With our contacts within the Administration, our criticism can be better informed."

Asked if Ripon's image could suffer from its close association with the Administration, Petri replied: "A person's prestige goes up if his experience in government was successful, and vice versa. I think this is true of groups, too. If we are associated with some of the successes and new initiatives of the Nixon Administration, this will help us."

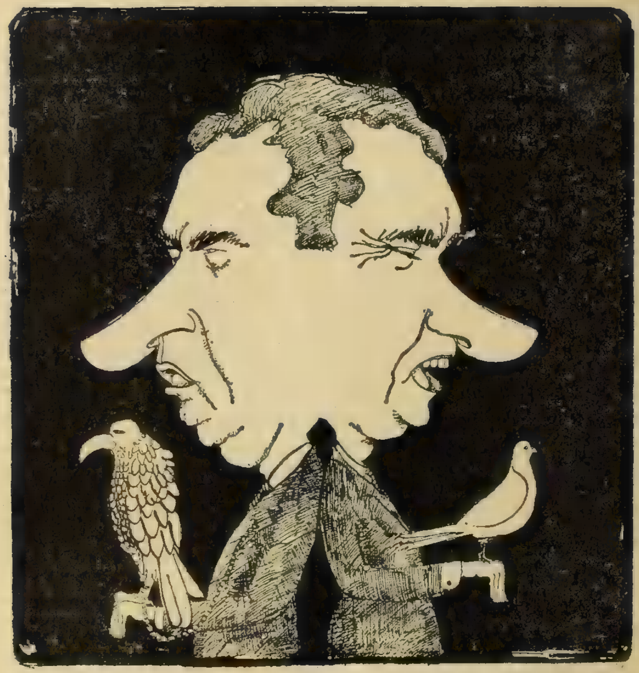
The root of the problem lies, as Huebner sees it, with the "dual constituency" of the Society: "We have to appeal to Republicans, and at the same time maintain our contacts with young people, the black community and academicians. But this dual constituency is one of the great strengths of the Ripon Society. We can serve as a bridge between the party and these other groups; without us, there might never be any contact. Of course, when these two groups diverge, as they did in 1968, there is a tension within the Society and within each of us as individuals. But as long as this tension exists, we fulfill a vital function—spokesmen from each group to the other." Petri concurs: "Many party leaders are suspicious of our Republicanism. By participating in the Administration, we can establish our credentials as Republicans once and for all, without compromising our principles." This should help to quiet the criticism from Republican stalwarts like National Chairman Ray Bliss, who has on occasion labeled the Society a divisive force within the party.

What role is Ripon likely to play in the next four years? Given the fact that the Society will have no dogmatic "line" to dictate what relationship individual members may have with the Administration, four types of activity can be expected:

First, the Society will continue to speak for the progressive, urban-oriented wing of the Republican Party. Since there is no other ongoing liberal Republican organization, Ripon's comments are regarded as an index of the thinking of that wing of the party. It is the most visible part of that faction—"the tip of the iceberg," as the American Conservative Union once described the Society.

Ripon's claim to be a spokesman is well founded. Hosts at its recent sixth anniversary dinner in New York were such pillars of the Eastern liberal faction as Henry Kissinger, David Rockefeller, William Scranton, Walter Thayer and John Hay Whitney; the principal speaker of the evening was John Lindsay. The Ripon Forum has published the writings of Senators Cooper, Goodell, Hatfield and Morton; George Romney and Elliot Richardson; Melvin Laird, and even Richard Nixon. When Mark Hatfield decided last year to criticize the Presidential candidates for not speaking out boldly on Vietnam, he used a Forum article to voice his feelings. When Rep. John Anderson of Illinois ran for chairman of the House Republican Conference, he cited a Ripon endorsement of him as proof that he had liberal as well as conservative support. And when National Review complained that Ripon publications "are treated by the Liberal press like the deliberations of the Constitutional Convention," it was in effect recognizing that the Society has become an important vehicle of opinion in American politics.

The second major activity will be research, which has consumed most of Ripon's energies since 1962. Huebner does not look forward to a research explosion in the next four years, warning that "we shouldn't curl up and become another Brookings Institution"; but research remains Ripon's most constructive role. From major research projects of the past have come proposals for federal-state revenue sharing, the negative income tax, a volunteer army, de-escalation in Vietnam, and the Massachusetts Republican state platform, one of the most liberal of either party in the nation. More recently, the New York chapter issued a series of urban position papers, Cambridge members aided Massachusetts Gov. Francis Sargent in his recent transition to the Statehouse, and the Seattle chapter has lobbied for a lower voting age.



H. Zinder, Toronto Star

Today, Ripon has a full-time research director, Robert Behn, who contracts his services to interested public figures. The Society has published several books, including a study of the 1964 elections, described by Theodore H. White as "far and away the best study of the elections made by anyone"; a report on the state of the GOP after 1966; an investigation of Southern Republicanism, soon to be updated by Michael Lottman, former editor of the Southern Courier; proposals for ending the war in Vietnam, and a collection of essays by members of the Society, The Ripon Papers. Soon to be published is The Lessons of Victory, an analysis of the events of 1968 and where the party is headed. And of course there is the Forum, with a circulation in the thousands.

Research and publications produce about a third of the Society's revenues, the rest coming from more than 200 contributors. Petri takes pains to note that these individuals are scattered throughout the nation, and that none of them contributes anywhere near a major share of Ripon's expenses. The Society's budget was about $12,000 in 1964 and about $115,000 last year. If that seems a paltry amount, considering the millions spent each year by conservative Republican groups, it makes Ripon's influence in Republican affairs even more striking.

A third role, of course, will be Ripon's influence within and upon the Administration. As Huebner puts it: "We lost the struggle with the conservatives over the tone and content of Nixon's campaign. Now we've got to win the struggle over his Presidential policies, and judging from his early appointments and actions, I think we're doing all right." Auspitz is even more optimistic: "We're better equipped for this struggle than we were for the other, because we are policy-oriented. And Nixon is flexible; there will always be a struggle, so to speak, for his soul." Petri sees this role as crucial: "The members of his Administration will be receiving a lot of pressure from the Right. If we exert pressure from the Left, we can make it easier for them to move in a moderate direction." And Douglas Matthews, a free-lance writer who now edits the Forum, notes: "As Republicans, our criticism will be taken more seriously by Nixon than criticism from the Democrats. After all, we're 'on his side.' "

And finally, the Ripon Society can be expected to increase its direct political activities in the years to come. Last year, Ripon members participated in the campaigns of Nixon, William Saxbe, Richard Ogilvie, Thomas Curtis, James Farmer and others. At least two active Riponites—Martin Linsky in Massachusetts and John McClaughry in Vermont—hold seats in state legislatures, and the number is likely to increase. And with the added interest focused upon Ripon in these Republican years, new chapters are planned in more cities and on more campuses. (In the past, purely campus-based chapters were discouraged by the leaders, in order to prevent the Society's base from becoming too narrow.)

One Ripon leader who would like to see this activism flourish in new ways is Professor Saloma, who bluntly advocates building a "political cadre" within the Society:

> I think we've put too little emphasis on party affairs. If we familiarize ourselves with party matters—and it would be a full-time job—we can more effectively criticize the party and produce changes. In other words, we need organization—the McCarthy people saw the importance of that. Until we do it, we will have to rely upon our members in the Administration to get things done. But if we can organize ourselves and become versed in party affairs, then our criticism of the party leadership will be more than mere broadsides; instead, we can promote a forward, constructive program. Maybe the leaders won't like it, but at least we are more likely to get results.

However, Saloma's views have not yet taken hold in the Society at large.

And what course will the Ripon Society finally take? Perhaps there is really no dilemma. By rejecting both the ivory tower and the politics of confrontation, the members of the Society have come out on the side of political effectiveness, of reform rather than revolution. They are willing to risk contact with the political world, and they are idealistic enough to believe that they can do so without endangering their basic principles. They are the radicals of the GOP and the conservatives of the New Left, and so far they have performed both functions with a minimum of stress. Only time and Richard Nixon's Presidency will tell how long they can maintain the balance.

The 'Kaffeeklatsch' Constituency

FLOYD McKAY
Mr. McKay, a recent Nieman fellow, is a political reporter and columnist for The Oregon Statesman in Salem.

Salem, Ore.

Sen. Robert W. Packwood of Oregon, who at 36 took the seat if not the place of Wayne L. Morse, will spend the weekend of March 1-2 presiding over an annual political gathering which he first organized in 1965 and which is beginning to draw the attention of national Republican leaders. Packwood's fifth Dorchester Conference on the wintry Oregon coast just might provide eager GOP generals with the clues they seek to Congressional control in 1970.

When it started, in the dark post-Goldwater days, Dorchester was only the name of a drafty resort hotel in the neon strip of Lincoln City. And Packwood was only an aggressive young state legislator with a lot of big ideas about politics.

By 1968, Dorchester had become the place to be seen, a proud campaign ribbon for the suburban Kaffeeklatsch army. It had attained status in a status-conscious class. Its devotees were already beginning to call themselves People for Packwood; at the end of the year, they elected a new United States Senator. Dorchester may lack the psychedelic brilliance of McCarthy's Impossible Dream, but it is a calculated, perfectly executed black-and-white message, and it may have serious consequences for those who fail to heed it. It, too, is the New Politics.

Packwood discovered as early as his first legislative campaign in 1962 that for great masses of middle-class Americans, political participation can be an end in itself. In the spring of 1965, he was ready to move on that premise. Invitations went out, "to bring together constructive Republicans from throughout Oregon . . . to attempt, through critical thought and frank discussion, to assess the problems and future of the Republican Party of Oregon." Only 300 select invitations were issued that first year.

Most responded, but the politically cautious held back. Packwood had intentionally snubbed the state party chairman, a conservative who viewed Packwood as a whippersnapper likely to make trouble. No matter. The party unity boys would show up at later Dorchester conferences, larger and broader of base.

People came to Dorchester to participate in politics: young men with the tangy after-shave smell of junior executive success; housewives escaping wax build-up and Art Linkletter; square teen-agers in pressed ducks and moderate minis who cranked endless reports from the mimeograph. Packwood the leader, his driving ambition harnessed in properly casual sweat shirt and jeans, greeted the troops, setting them to work on the great issues.

Dorchester's format was elastic. People talked about what was on their minds, guided only by general subject areas. The politically conscious husband or wife brought the uninitiated mate, and new interests were kindled to replace family finance as an after-dinner topic. Everyone took part. The debate and discourse flowed from workshop to dinner table, from the crowded bar to a closing session at which Packwood and his lieutenants tried to pull together a Dorchester view of the world.

Would anyone remember, a year later, what resolutions had been passed, what issues searched, what answers trumpeted to a perplexed world? The cries of the ever-circling gulls would drown the words before they left the conference hall.

Not so easily lost, however, would be the vibrance of participation, the warm glow of earnest talk and new friendships, the laughter shared at an amateur-hour musical comedy. It mattered little if Dorchester urged withdrawal from Vietnam, or the negative income tax, or whatever. It mattered little, even, if Packwood later took opposing views in his Senatorial campaign. But it mattered a great deal to be there, to take part, to be involved. Dorchester was a "be-in" for the suburban middle class.

If the intense, issue-oriented forces of the New Democratic Coalition are a threat to the old politics, so Dorchester is a Republican counter to the Coalition. Even in these troubled times, there are more who have than have not, more who belong than are alienated, more who ask "why?" than ask "why not?" They are the people Packwood found, and they put him in the Senate. They will gather again at Dorchester in March.

And they are a mass in every state of the Union, waiting for their own Dorchester on the shore of the Atlantic, or the banks of the Missouri. They are educated suburban housewives, unchallenged by the PTA and Great Books; young executives who can't converse with a computer; whole groups of people turned off by the endless turgidity of professional associations and service clubs.

Product of an education-conscious society, this literate but unchallenged middle-class, middle-age electorate is a majority in many Congressional districts, and even in some states. It is an electorate that wants to be consulted. It grew up with "feedback" and "brainstorming" and it wonders why the techniques are applied everywhere but in politics.

The trick, for a political leader, is to turn its energies and needs into a useful channel. Packwood did so with his Dorchester conferences, realizing that by and large the desire was not for revolutionary change but for participation and dialogue.

For most who came to Lincoln City, the process itself is sufficient: to test the rusty intellect in new surroundings, among new friends; to be caught up in a flurry of respectable excitement; to dream Possible Dreams.

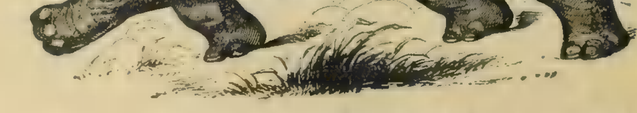
Once launched, the movement is potent, for the new convert carries a contagion. The Dorchester spirit was powerful enough in Oregon to capture the broad middle ground in 1968 and retire the state's best-known political figure, a man who had become a symbol of Oregon's political independence. Wayne Morse was one of the last of the great Prairie Progressives, in the mold of Robert La Follette of his native Wisconsin. His was the voice of righteous indignation, the plea for political morality in a jaded world.

The voice was heard by the old moralists who remembered the crusades of La Follette, of George Norris and Hiram Johnson. And by the new moralists on the campuses, rebelling against the CIA and napalm incineration. But the great, quiet middle ground was harking to a different trumpet. "Join me so that we might accomplish together what none of us will accomplish alone," was the conclusion of each Packwood speech.

Accomplish what? Few asked, for what was really important was the joining together, the common search for reason and consensus, the interaction of men of good will. There had already been too much shouting, too much passion. Packwood sensed this feeling, and provided it with a central personality around which to form. Like Eugene McCarthy, he saw that pent-up frustration must find a rallying point.

By 1968, his Dorchester gatherings had attracted more than 1,000 participants, and the more zealous were ready to fill key spots in Packwood's well-planned campaign. They spread across the state like a chain letter, each hand reaching for another, pulling it into the circle. In November the circle closed.

And in December, Packwood sent his friends a Christmas card bearing quotations from Emerson and Markham: "I awoke this morning with devout thanksgiving for my friends, the old and the new. . . . There is a destiny that makes us brothers; none goes his way alone."



BLACKS ON CAMPUS

ANGRY AND ALONE TOGETHER

KENNETH G. GROSS

Mr. Gross has covered the New York City school strike for the New York Post since last May. He is the author, with Bernard Lefkowitz, of The Victims (to be published by Putnam's).

> All those white kids are gonna make it. They can flunk out and they'll still make it. But I ain't got a chance in hell. I'm just here to decorate their campus, like some piece of African sculpture. Not a chance in hell!
>
> —Student at Queens College

From Logan Airport, it is a short drive through the Callahan Tunnel and out the Fitzgerald Expressway to Waltham, where wood-frame houses meant for some lonely country setting are jammed together like hunched subway riders, and the sullen occupants straggle down the bleak Massachusetts hills as the factory day begins. They are frugal with their smiles as they pass their neighbors on the road, and only an extra puff of steamy breath gives away a greeting.

It is different on the hill. There, appearing always to look down on Waltham, is the castle. It was built during the 1920s by a doctor who wanted to start a medical school and was driven to bankruptcy because of his unorthodoxy. It is a real castle and was once once used in a movie. Now it is part of Brandeis University, where some of Waltham's townfolk serve in the coffee shop. There are dozens of other buildings where Waltham people serve or clean and absorb tidbits for dinner conversation. Late on Saturday nights, after an evening in the bars, it is not uncommon for a pack of booted young Walthamites to wait for a lone Brandeis boy and beat him up. Their furies spent, they return to the hunched houses and know that the pretty girls still prefer the strange bearded boys of Brandeis who will not fight back.

On January 8, sixty-five black students at Brandeis marched into Ford Hall and told the switchboard operators that they were sorry, but the building had to be evacuated. Sorry, they told a professor, but he would have to dismiss his class and leave; the building was being seized. (The professor later charged that he was "dragged" from his classroom by fierce blacks, but others who were there say he was tugging at the black guy's sleeve.)

At that moment in New York City, the new president of Brandeis, Morris B. Abram, was polishing up a speech he was to make before a group of educators. The speech would have said that no school was a sanctuary in today's world and that black anger might be directed anywhere. Abram would remember the irony in the coming weeks.

At Queens College, meanwhile, a black youth named George was trying to explain to a white reporter why he felt such rage:

"I come here every day and it's as if they look right through me," he said. "No one knows me or talks to me." George is 22 and has served time for stealing a car. He was accepted by Queens College as part of SEEK (Search for Education, Evaluation and Knowledge), a new program to help ghetto youths. Of the 26,000 students at Queen's College, about 1,000 are black and 700 of those are enrolled in SEEK.

On that same Wednesday, January 8, Queens College was being closed down. The SEEK students had staged quiet raids in the faculty dining hall, first asking everyone to leave, then spilling tables and dishes; and in the library, where some records and shelves were emptied on the floor. They were trying to dramatize their demands for control of the SEEK program and of an Afro-American studies program. A 19-year-old white boy said that he had read the demands and agreed with them, but could never support the vandalism.

"When did you read them?" he was asked.

"After the library raid."

"You weren't aware that they had been making the demands for some time?"

"No. It was only after the raids."

At Brandeis, the 100 blacks registered in the TYP (Transitional Year Program, an equivalent of SEEK), had first presented their demands for some autonomy after the assassination of Rev. Martin Luther King, Jr., in April of 1968. Specifically, they asked for majority representation on the committee that would select a head for the new Afro-American Studies Department. Morris Abram, then practicing law, sat in on the series of conferences with black students that began in July.

• • •

The stings come quietly; without appearance of mischief; but poisonous. Things that won't register on the ethnic seismograph:

¶It can be the precise fawning of a girl who would love to date a black man but whose eyes are always counting the house.

¶"If one more white boy asks me on a library date to show his friends how liberal he is . . ." smoldered one black coed, unable to dream up the consequent reaction.

¶One day last year, a group of Harlem kids came to visit for the day. They had dinner in the student cafeteria and as the hall began to fill up with untamed blacks, a mood of terror built up under the quiet. The white students finished their meals with deliberation and left, and the black students knew how alone they really were at this Jewish-sponsored, nonsectarian institution.

¶"I put a sign on my door," said one girl. "It said, 'Jewish Power.' The girl next door, a Negro, put up a sign, 'White Pig.' I don't know why. I don't understand. It was a joke."

• • •

The blacks took Ford Hall, a three-story communications center holding a $200,000 computer, across a campus road from the Bernstein-Marcus Administration Complex. Of the 2,600 students at Brandeis, 300 are considered radical, or at least leftist. They sport beards and mustaches and white affectations of "naturals" as proof of their social reliability, and their peace beads tinkle in the halls. Their most recent act of defiance was to stage a "sanctuary" for an AWOL soldier. But the Brandeis Left has a tendency to talk. Its members will discuss in splendid parliamentary style all the possibilities facing them; then someone will offer a motion to end debate and it will be hooted down, so impressed are the "lefties" with their own acoustical dazzle. It is rumored that the AWOL soldier endured as much of it as he could, then turned himself in.

Morris Abram is in his 50s, and his unseamed face breaks into a soft smile at the introduction of a New York journalist. He asks about his good friend, the reporter's publisher. His floor is padded with a gray carpet, and African objets d'art are scattered about the large room. He is at least 6 feet tall and plays touch football with his sons.

He says that he cannot understand why the blacks took Ford Hall. "I'm not going to force them out. I'm trying to entice them out. I will do everything that I can to entice them out. There are no circumstances which would cause me to initiate the use of force."

A tape recorder is going and Abram says nothing that could cause a blush. He will not close off the heat or electricity to Ford Hall; that would be a mean and petty act. But he does cut off the blacks from any help. He tells the press that he is moving to meet several of the demands and is presenting a compromise offer to the blacks. The Boston reporters hover and take it down, then rush to the telephones. The Boston papers have been full of shrill headlines about militant blacks ready to burst out from Ford Hall and descend on Waltham. The university press office is stocked with liquor and sandwiches; there is a portable TV. The reporters sit and listen to the TV and seldom budge to hear the dull debates of the "Left." Several of the men with graying crew cuts have come almost to blows with the long-haired "Left."

The compromise version that Abram was offering the holdouts in Ford Hall was dead before he sent it over. He knew that. Dean of Students Peter Diamandopoulis, chief architect of Abram's public image and the only top Brandeis administrator to be retained by the new regime, said that he knew it would not be accepted. Yet the press printed it and when the inevitable rejection came, Abram was able to say: "They are being inflexible; their position has not changed and in fact they have escalated their demands so that there are now really thirty-two instead of the original ten."

There were still ten demands, but in response to Abram's repeated insistence that they elaborate on them, the blacks had issued a clarification containing thirty-two points.

On a bulletin board outside President Abram's office are a few of his speeches, and pictures of him with Mrs. Martin Luther King, Jr., and with Massachusetts Sen. Edward Brooke. He was asked how he first learned of the seizure and if he had any advance warning.

"As God is my witness, I had no knowledge of any pent-up grievance with any urgency to it. As God is my witness.

"As God is my witness, I thought that the establishment, which I had pushed through, of a concentration in African and Afro-American studies—I thought when I got that through in October, I guess it was, that that issue was no longer on the front burner."

When did he first learn of the crisis?

"I hadn't been here for two weeks when the blacks said they wanted to see me. They wouldn't see my assistant—boy by the name of Roy deBerry of Holly Springs, Miss.

"Believe me, that was the only issue on which I, even with an early warning system, had had any knowledge. Lathan Johnson is on the payroll to inform me about these things. Whether he knew about it or not I do not know, but he never told me that we were about to have trouble or that people were up tight about something. . . ."

Of course, it would have been hard for Abram to check it out, since by then Johnson was inside Ford Hall with his black brothers. At Queens College, when the SEEK students held strategy sessions, black administrators were barred. "No false prophets," they were told.

• • •

The SEEK kids were very tight. One day they marched across the Queens campus in military fashion, a leader at the front with a walkie-talkie and a file closer at the rear with another. There were flankers to keep away strangers and they did not smile. The white students stood awe-struck, watching the blacks moving across the courtyards. One boy called it "chilling," but a black girl who worked in the cafeteria said the sight was "thrilling."

"Are they together?" one black youth was asked of the SEEK students. "Yes," he replied. "We're together."

• • •

Allen Grossman of the Brandeis English Department is a poet. He once was offered Peter Diamandopoulis' job at Brandeis, but he preferred obscurity. He is a Charles Laughton type, who rubs his wrists to help the circulation and manages to pull a woolen cap over his ears in the cold, without looking idiotic.

"The administration and the faculty have joined to protect their corporate privilege," he said one day in his cramped office after the "radical" Sociology Department had again decided to postpone any action. "That's quite strange, you see, since the faculty at one time was united to protect itself against the administration. But now the administration has grown and the faculty no longer feels threatened by that aspect, but rather by the students."

Grossman compared what was happening at Brandeis to what was going on in Ocean Hill-Brownsville, where the United Federation of Teachers chose to join forces with its traditional antagonist, the bureaucratic Board of Education in the fight against school decentralization, or student representation, or community control, depending on one's definition.

"The thing that so many of my colleagues fail to understand is that the students represent a legitimate constituency; that they have, and ought to have, a reasonable amount to say about the education they receive," Grossman said. "Of course, one should know the history of this thing before one goes off about it. At one time, the students came from a better class of people than the faculty. The faculty were essentially passive in life, and it was the students who were activists. Universities had to become relevant then, or they would have been disbanded. Now, however. . . . Blacks represent the only pluralistic element in the universities. Until the blacks arrived, everyone was agreed and doing the same things. The blacks are now struggling for that . . . pluralism."

A young, agonized sociology professor wanted to seize a building to show the blacks that they were not alone. But Grossman advised against it. "I don't trust anyone who isn't doing . . . their own thing," he said. "It is not the role of the faculty to act the student radical. Those who try that are merely 'copping out' on their true role, which is to deal with the faculty."

They had been in Ford Hall for ten days and the strain was becoming unbearable. The students argued and talked and about a score were on a hunger strike, but they were told again and again that they would alienate those of the faculty who were sympathetic if they did anything drastic. The most drastic thing anyone ever suggested was seizing another building in a parallel move. No one except the Boston papers talked of burning anything down.

"The trouble with these sorts of things," said Grossman, "is that they are deficient in resolvability. It is relatively easy to seize a building, but how does one unseize it?"

On the eleventh day, the blacks came out. They were silent about the terms of their surrender, but it was clear that they had surrendered. Abram was silent over his victory.

At Brandeis, the issues were clear. Not so at Queens College, where the director of the SEEK program was Joseph Mulholland, a 40-year-old social scientist whom the blacks had always counted as an ally. The charges against him were vague and the blacks even refused to talk about it. Mulholland, who had a poster of Malcolm X on his office wall, was simply not black. The issues at Queens were foggy, but the anger was not.

"I'm black." said Ralph, 19. "I can't take any lotion or pill and be white. I can't go home at night and play some other role. I'm black and I'm angry. I'm black and I want to hit somebody. I'm black and I'm alone at this damned place. All us blacks are alone here. We walk out the gates and we are under suspicion. The white home owners in Queens hold their breath until we pass their houses. They think we're all going to break in and steal something. The cops watch us until we're gone. I tell you that can piss a man off."

• • •

It is a few miles from Queens College to Franklin K. Lane High School, a huge Georgian, red-brick building that sits astride the Brooklyn-Queens border. The school is a small enclave surrounded by a decaying neighborhood of Irish and Germans and Italians where the German-American Bund was strong a few decades ago. There are few coffee shops or candy stores to cater to students, and there is an atmosphere of nervous apprehension that remains until the last black has boarded the BMT back to the ghetto. Junior High School 271—the focal point of the Ocean Hill-Brownsville school battle—feeds Lane. There are 5.100 students at Lane; 66 per cent nonwhite. The 262 teachers are 90 per cent white. One day in January, a chemistry teacher named Frank Siracusa, age 30, heard a rock crash through his window. He ran into the vestibule where three black youths were waiting. They shot him with kerosene from a water pistol, then set his clothes on fire. They punched and kicked him; he went to the hospital.

There had been fourteen recent attacks on teachers at Lane. Siracusa, head of security patrols for the school, had been active in the neighborhood, urging stronger protective measures. Some members of the faculty believe that he was the target of a retaliatory attack. Police patrols were stationed inside the school.

One day in January, after the teacher had been burned, a black man stood silently before the teachers' mailboxes outside the principal's office. He was well over 6 feet and broad-shouldered. He had a part in his natural hair style. "What's he doing?" whispered a small gray-haired teacher to a male colleague.

Soon a crowd of other teachers stood just outside his earshot speculating about his presence. One brave soul was dispatched to ask, "Are you being helped?" The black man smiled and said, "Thank you, I'm just waiting."

The whispers grew and a nervous flock of men and women watched and waited and kept asking one another what the man was up to. Finally, a policeman was asked what could be done. Just then a grade adviser came out and said that the man was waiting for his transcripts, needed to enter college.

There was a moment of silence. Then one of the matronly women chirped: "But why is he studying the names on the mailboxes?" A male teacher thought for a moment. "Maybe," he said, "he wants to see which of his old teachers are still here."

A friend of Siracusa sat at a lunch table late in the afternoon of the attack. "Well, we're not going to live with fear," he said. "I think if the black people don't get into line, we'll either have to annihilate them or neutralize them. That's not as harsh as it sounds. It has happened in other societies. It may be the only way to deal with this."

The day after that quote appeared in a newspaper, the teachers attacked the reporter for printing it. They did not say how awful it was for someone to say such a thing. They were angry that it had been printed.

Circulars were passed around attacking "white Jewish racist pigs." One day a Confederate flag flew from the school mast and "Nigger" was chalked on the walls. It was only their own side that each saw threatened. Some white teachers snarled at black students in whom they saw only a threat. And some black students cursed white teachers, in whom they saw only a racist.

"It is easy to start these things," Allen Grossman had said. "But they are deficient in resolvability."

THE RIGORS OF PLAY

MIHALY CSIKSZENTMIHALYI

Mr. Csikszentmihalyi is chairman of the Department of Sociology and Anthropology at Lake Forest College, Lake Forest, Ill.

Statistics about play in America—more impressive every year—give one the optimistic impression that a nation boasting 22 million table-tennis players, 30 million ice skaters and 42 million boaters, among others, and at the latest count, must indeed be a paradise on earth. From the beginnings of civilization, philosophers have been repeating that play is the supreme manifestation of human freedom. Plato argued that life must be lived as play; Friedrich Schiller felt that man is completely a man only when he plays, and in our days Sartre has added that "as soon as man apprehends himself as free and wishes to use his freedom . . . then his activity is play." Therefore it would seem that the staggering increase in the number of participatory sportsmen and players on the American scene portends an unprecedented freedom pervading our society.

This conclusion, however, would be premature. The statistics, as is so often true of statistics, tend to be deceptive. In the first place, the figures relating to play suffer from the same kind of distortion that afflicts the uniform FBI crime reports, which also show phenomenal annual increases. The fact is that when the collection of data becomes more thorough, the number of cases reported increases. And those who gather statistics for players—or criminals—have often a vested interest in gradually inflating their figures.

More crucial is the question as to what these figures actually mean. The underlying assumption is that anybody engaged in a playful activity is in fact playing; that a game of chess, for instance, is a game of chess wherever it is played and however it is played—as long as the players follow the rules. This notion is akin to the deduction made by cheerful social commentators that the ubiquitous stereo sets and classical record albums are signs that the population is absorbing culture as rapidly as it ingests vitamins. Nobody bothers to ask if anyone is listening to those records; or if he is, whether he gets from them the same enjoyment that people used to get from live performances. It is possible that people do take advantage of the opportunities for listening to good music in their homes, but the point is that statistics about music shop sales are not at all a reliable indicator.

And numerical data aside, play has undergone some sharp qualitative changes in the past decades. Play is not what it used to be, and it is quite meaningless to quote figures on the number of participants when the player of today is not the same as the player of yesterday. Most of the changes can be summarized under the headings of increased specialization, quantification and reliance on equipment. Taken together, these changes have turned play into an activity which produces pay-offs, offers satisfactions, quite different from those provided by the games of our fathers. "Fun," which is the all-inclusive label we use to explain why we play, has become a much more limited and sterile experience.

Modern bowling, for instance, is the standardized, stereotyped descendant of its rustic ancestors, lawn bowling and the Mediterranean boccie. The older forms of the game allowed an individual flexibility of rules, of format, of play that is not possible now. The open-air alleys had a way of integrating the player with his natural environment and with the shifting group of spectators that the cavelike bowling alley actively discourages. Each alley was slightly different in size and composition, and the players could modify their playing field or learn to adapt to its idiosyncrasies. These differences in the character of the game have repercussions on the attitudes, and in the long run, on the personality of the player. Automated bowling encourages the player to concentrate on his score, since that is the only variable in an otherwise uniform environment. Hence the overblown emphasis on keeping scores, averages, records—the whole paraphernalia of quantification that reduces an otherwise multifaceted experience into a one-dimensional activity. It is true that the modern bowler is not altogether the creature of his stereotyped environment. An interesting sociological study has shown that bowlers develop individual grips, personal rituals and quirks, little touches that tend to break down the uniformity imposed by mass-produced rules, equipment, environment and standards of performance. Such results prove that grass can grow even in the cracks of a concrete pavement—but an open field is still something else.

Chess used to be a game that brought together two people in an exhilarating, abstract battle of wits. All one needed to enjoy it was any beaten-up set, two people, and perhaps some cups of coffee or shots of brandy. Today a chess player feels hopelessly amateur if he does not possess such necessities as tournament chess clocks, diagram pads (with stamping pads), spiral-bound or loose-leaf score books, perhaps a portable roll-up demonstration board with tripod base and, of course, a quantity of specialized chess books, including Chess Secrets, Winning Chess Traps and Chess Traps, Pitfalls, Swindles. It is just possible that all these playing aids and equipment have helped to raise the technical level of the average game. On the other hand, it is certain that the enjoyment one draws from the average chess session has decreased. The old game pitted two individual men against each other; they might never exchange a word, but while they faced each other they adapted to a common rhythm, they participated. Now with the clocks dictating the pace, the buzzers, the scores to chalk up, the various tactics to remember, each player is in the position of playing against an interchangeable dummy in whom he could hardly become interested as a human being. Incidentally, the only equipment that hasn't been improved over the years are the chessmen themselves, the only really necessary items for the game. They used to be personalized, imaginative, and handling them gave a half-sensuous, half-aesthetic pleasure. Now they are usually made of "practically unbreakable tenite" or some other such sterile feeling and looking gunk, and they are usually played on "exceptional rubberlike boards with plastic coating."

Perhaps the best example of the kind of changes that play has undergone in recent years is rock climbing. Rock climbing as an independent sport developed in the twenties and thirties, mostly at the hand of Bavarian, Austrian and Sud-Tyrolian Italian climbers who began to devote themselves to this form of specialized activity in preference to all-around mountain climbing. But rock climbing really came into its own only when it was transplanted to the United States. The layman who sees the line of stalwarts inching their way up sheer Yosemite crags might think of them as mountain climbers, but they are not and they are proud that they are not. The mountain climber, usually surrounded by friends whose company he enjoyed, approached the hills with something akin to reverence. When he climbed, he tended to appreciate the mountain in all its geological, aesthetic, historical and even spiritual, dimensions. Therefore he experienced pleasure at many levels. When he found rock, he climbed it; if he came on ice, he crossed it. He wasn't affronted by long approach marches or by bushwhacking.

The modern rock climber doesn't think in terms of mountains; his frame of reference, at most, is the rock face; more usually, it is a particular "pitch" or a specific "move." He cares not at all about history, aesthetics or the spirit. He gets no enjoyment from walking, from crossing ice. When he reaches the summit—if he reaches it; the summit is often irrelevant to a rock climb—he rarely spares a glance for the view. Check the gear, eat a bite, and down we go. Perhaps most important, companionship among the climbers often becomes reduced to the technical level only. Climbers stay together not because they enjoy one another's company but because their skills are well matched and complement one another. The new breed of technical rock climbers has quantified each hold on every rock face of the earth, assigning to it a grade from 1 (very easy) to 6.9 (the limit of human possibilities). They have developed fantastically complex equipment for climbing, and this gear has to be cared for constantly and replaced as soon as possible. They have developed the "ultimate reality piton" made of chrome-molybdenum to hammer into hairline cracks.

The technical rock climber looks down on the traditional mountaineer, whom he suspects of hypocrisy and phoniness. How can the mountaineer pretend to enjoy climbing, when he takes no advantage of all the specialized skill and quantified knowledge, all the equipment that the rock climber uses? After all, the rock climber is infinitely better at scaling difficult peaks than the traditional mountaineer can ever hope to be. This proves that the latter is nothing but a bumbling amateur. And that is just the point—rock climbing, like most other forms of play from bridge to skiing, from swimming to walking (or jogging), has become a highly technical activity based on specialized skill, quantification, stereotyped rules and uniform equipment.

The significance of this change is the fact that if man is indeed most human when he plays, then his humanity is being steadily narrowed—even in those activities by which he should be able to develop his personality most freely. A man who climbs mountains can develop his personality around a variety of stimuli—interpersonal, aesthetic, etc. —but a man who climbs rock is interested only in the stimuli relevant to his technical competence. And there seems to be no question that a personality, a self-concept, developed almost exclusively through technical feedback is less interesting and flexible than a self which is shaped by a complex variety of stimuli. Its owner can relate to fewer people, its content can be relevant to fewer situations, its strength can be applied in fewer emergencies. A person whose self is built around technical competence—or exclusively around any one area of experience—contributes to that fragmented, anomic society of which everyone is always complaining. From the example of rock climbing, one can also see clearly the future of this general trend toward specialization. On the one hand, the technician becomes more and more proficient in his job, at the cost of being able to relate his expertise less and less to the rest of his or anybody else's life. On the other hand, the traditional mountain climber becomes more and more anachronistic, a slightly ridiculous personage who tries very hard, but inevitably falls short in quantifiable, objective achievement.

So play is changing everywhere from a complex, multidimensional activity which helped man to relate to his social and cultural environment, to a simple but extremely specialized activity which affords him greater and greater control over a small, and in itself insignificant, area of experience. The drift toward fragmented activities and experiences is hardly news: for centuries we have complained of the increasing sterility and meaninglessness produced by occupational specialization and technology. It is at least understandable that necessity forces modern man to become narrowly specialized in his work. But why can't he be free when he plays?

RALPH McGILL (Continued from page 198)

tric idealism began to draw back in consternation from developments which enactment of the program had set in motion.

In his last column McGill warned the new Secretary of HEW what to expect if he finally yields to Southern pressure to "relax" desegregation guidelines. With patience and clarity he explained once again that "freedom of choice" is neither freedom nor a choice, but discrimination by another name. And he warned the Secretary that, in the end, it would not be "good politics" to appease the segregationists. "It will be," he wrote, "the greatest tragedy with the most foreboding consequences if public school officials are allowed to perpetuate dual systems."

The column, to be sure, appeared in the Constitution, but somehow one sensed that while Ralph McGill had responded to the new times the paper had not. (Although he held the title of editor and publisher, McGill never in fact controlled the paper. See "Atlanta in Suspense" by Arlie Schardt, The Nation, December 23, 1968.) The best reporting on the South today—by Jack Nelson, who once worked on the Constitution—now appears in a newspaper published on the other side of the continent, the Los Angeles Times. But to the last, Ralph McGill's voice lent distinction to the Constitution. He was a journalist of talent and skill; of courage, understanding and compassion.

BOOKS & THE ARTS

The Epic of Tropbanana

STRONG WIND. By Miguel Angel Asturias. Translated by Gregory Rabassa. Delacorte Press. 242 pp. $6.95.

EMILE CAPOUYA
Mr. Capouya is a writer, and executive editor at Funk & Wagnalls.

Originally published in Spanish in 1962, this novel is the first of a projected trilogy set in an unnamed but representative Central American country. For the population of the region, Negro, Creole and Indian, the conditions of life are fixed by a primitive native agriculture and by the imperial fortunes of Tropical Banana, Inc., a composite for enterprises like United Fruit and the Grace Line. The brief, intense narrative begins at a time when North Americans are undertaking to clear great tracts of coastal land and plant the banana groves. To their successors, the corporate officials, those first engineers and managers will seem visionaries, pursuing their grandiose project out of some demanding ideal inflicted upon them by their puritan creed of justification by works. Almost at once, the generation of ascetic pioneers is replaced by expatriate clerks whose business it is to administer the new, industrialized agriculture and, indirectly, the country's economy and politics. As the home office in Chicago may direct, they also advance seed and credit to independent growers, and they buy or refuse to buy the crop.

During this period the people of the coast have undergone a reciprocal evolution, from depressed peasantry to agricultural proletariat. A few have prospered to the extent of owning their own plot of ground. These are the independent growers, but their lives are as subject to the vagaries of a distant market as are those of the laborers who work directly for Tropbanana.

Under what sign have these great changes taken place—migration of capital, migration of men, the transformation of a landscape, a revolution in the mode of life? Well, the region was originally selected as the scene for an enormous experiment in industrialized agriculture because it was thought not to be subject to the viento fuerte, the great wind that periodically ravages that part of the world; but the wind arises, and destroys the plantations, the small holdings, and two of the central figures of the story.

The novel's inspiration is baroque. Its scenes generally have surreal elements, whether because of explicit symbolism, heightened language, hallucinatory episodes, or a deliberately disjointed and fragmentary quality. That is true whether Mr. Asturias is dealing with the impoverished rustic gentry of the highlands, the laborers and overseers of the banana groves, or the company officials, Yankee and Latin, whose work and recreation are a kind of routinized violence. The effect is one of brilliant impressionism. The country steams and shimmers by day, and is seen at night as if in flashes of lightning. The style of the novel is greatly varied. It offers the colloquial speech of the workers, and the speech of the company executives that is sometimes mannered as in drawing-room comedy, and sometimes philosophic or poetic as in eclogue. Finally, there is the perfervid tone and luxuriant vocabulary of the narrative proper, recalling some French writer of the fin de siècle, and has exotic preoccupations—say, Pierre Loti or Maurice Barrès. That varied utterance and the novel's hectic, episodic scenes convey the sense of time passing swiftly, of a land made over but presenting a shape that cannot endure.

The chief actors in the story are Leland and Lester Mead, and the family of Adelaido Lucero. Lucero appears first as a laborer in the heroic period of the planting of the banana groves; later he becomes a company foreman who has managed to buy land for his sons, hoping to make them self-sufficient farmers. Leland has divorced her first husband, Tropbanana's regional director, to marry Lester Mead, a beachcomber and remittance man who appeals to her romanticism. They too become fruit growers on a small scale, and when Tropbanana refuses to buy the crop produced by the independents, they organize a farmers' cooperative. The association buys a truck and makes deliveries to the capital, selling the fruit at retail. But on one of his trips, Mead finds that Tropbanana has been there ahead of him, giving away fruit so that there should be no market for the association's produce.

Local merchants refuse to sell necessary supplies to Mead, an accident is arranged for the truck at a railroad crossing, two of the farmers in the cooperative are jailed on invented charges. After attempts to bargain and to appeal to Tropbanana's better nature, Mead journeys to New York. It is now revealed that he is a principal stockholder in Tropbanana. He presents a report to the board of directors in which he argues that there is more profit in running the plantations on Socialist principles. The report is accepted, and Mead returns triumphant to the subtropics. But meanwhile there has been a strike against the company, and other portents—including a case of possession, the victim being one of Lucero's sons. At last nature itself revolts. The great wind levels the plantations, and kills Leland and Lester Mead.

The novel is best understood as myth. Asturias gives every indication that he is certainly not trying to write a "realistic" novel. Instead, he invents a tale that is meant to lead the reader toward another reality than the conventions of the realistic novel envisage—that is, to an intuitive understanding of the significance of historical forces. In this way, for example, the beachcomber's transformation into a middle-class entrepreneur, and his further mutation into a tycoon with Populist and Socialist impulses, might be understood as suggesting the disintegrative tendencies within a ruling class and the varying strategies it adopts, consciously and unconsciously, as the moment of its dominion passes. And indeed such tendencies are now appearing in our country, as well as in its imperial outposts. Nevertheless, any such attempt at literal interpretation is intrinsically foreign to the spirit of the book, whose ambitions look toward epic rather than toward "the novel of social significance." We must read the other volumes of the trilogy before judging what success attends the author's larger aims. There is no doubt, meanwhile, that Mr. Asturias is unusually talented, with a gift for comedy that illuminates his somewhat Gothic constructions. Most important, he has a full measure of the indefinable stage presence that gives authority to a writer.

Gregory Rabassa, the able translator, has, on internal evidence, met and solved many problems in his English version. Some may be insoluble. The English title of the novel, literally faithful to the Spanish original, strikes my ear as impossible; it is of that class of difficulties which arise from the fact that languages are not mutually corresponding sets of signs. In the same way, it is perhaps inevitable that Rabassa's rendering of the speech of the workers is the least satisfactory part of his translation. The cultural preconceptions expressed in their language are truly foreign to us, and not masked by a learned vocabulary that is more or less international. This is one of those cases in which a first-rate translator—and Rabassa's English version of Julio Cortázar's Rayuelas testifies to his virtuosity—must willingly incur obloquy for the sake of his fellow countrymen, attempting the impossible so that we may have some access to a good book conceived in another tongue.

New Look at Abolitionists

MEANS AND ENDS IN AMERICAN ABOLITIONISM: Garrison and His Critics on Strategy and Tactics, 1834-1850. By Aileen S. Kraditor. Pantheon Books. 296 pp. $7.95.

EDWARD MAGDOL

Mr. Magdol is the author of Owen Lovejoy, Abolitionist in Congress (Rutgers University Press).

A more misunderstood and misinterpreted band of radicals and reformers than America's abolitionists is hard to find. After five generations we are just getting around to discovering who they were and what they really thought and said. At last a trickle of biographies have begun to come forward, and now, happily, this work on the conflicting "how to do it" theories of the anti-slavery movement by Aileen S. Kraditor, who is also the author of two books on the woman suffrage movement and American feminism.

Once the reader jumps the hurdle of the book's full formidable title, its contents are engaging and absorbing. This sober study of Garrisonian abolitionism, and of its opponents within the broader anti-slavery movement, is tough-minded and humane, very much the qualities of William Lloyd Garrison himself, the editor of The Liberator from 1831 to 1865.

Garrison agitated and educated his fellow Americans to recognize the sin of slavery, their complicity in it, and finally the need for immediate and unconditional abolition of the system. Such a stand was a sharp break with the benevolent gradualism that existed in the minds of many well-meaning people. It was significantly a bold and necessary affront to the colonization schemes at the time—proposals to solve the "Negro question" (but not the white) by a fanciful and racist mass expulsion of the blacks.

Admittedly, Miss Kraditor has not touched on all aspects of abolitionist history. She feels that the basic decisions on strategy and tactics were made within the time limits she sets. But one more chapter on the massive events between the Compromise of 1850 and the Emancipation Proclamation would have illuminated those new events which changed old ideas and old relationships. In any event, Miss Kraditor has scored brilliantly within her chosen limits.

She undertakes an explanation of the split in abolitionist ranks between 1837 and 1840 as the main thesis of her book, attributing the fundamental cause of the schism to basic differences over social philosophy. The "radicals" were those who believed with Garrison that America's immorality, with slavery the worst of its sins, required fundamental changes in American "institutional structure and ideology." Opposed to them were "conservative" abolitionists, or reformers, who saw "Northern society [as] fundamentally good," and who would abolish slavery as a deviation in order to preserve the North's "basically moral arrangements." Differences in theory led to a conflict over the proper mode of agitation for abolition. Her distinctions are by and large valid, although, as the author shows, some overlapping occurred between the factions. Moreover, this approach is a sane departure from the "personality conflict" explanations of some historians.

The bitter debates and inner organizational struggles that followed from such basic differences find a clear and careful historian in Miss Kraditor. Striking observations and new insights run throughout the book. One worth quoting points to the necessary and complex task of breaking the power of the slave system while it points away from the radicals' individualistic terms of struggle:

> Paradoxically the reformist abolitionists were more radical than they realized; or rather, their demand for the abolition of slavery linked with the establishment of political and civil equality of the races would require an alteration in American society more drastic than they thought or were by temperament prepared for. And the nonresistants [Garrisonians] were less radical than they imagined, for they had no profound understanding of the nature of power and the conditions for its overthrow.

The book's focus on conflict tends to strengthen a prevailing impression of the abolitionists as sectarians who were merely raising ideological hackles on both sides. (One of the lighter ironies is to find each side accusing the other of sectarianism.) At first, both the tactic of moral suasion and that of expedient political action seem to have failed. But when such abolitionists as Frederick Douglass and Owen Lovejoy combined the two tactics in the 1850s, they found themselves denouncing the sin of slavery to audiences larger than those they had faced in the 1840s, gaining wide acceptance and winning elections while paving the way, with Garrison, for abolition. There is therefore more to be said about the unity of tactics and the tactic of unity, if not in this book then perhaps in others to come.

One of the more remarkable achievements in the book is the vigorous rehabilitation of Garrison through a deep look at his thinking on strategy and tactics, his uncompromising devotion to freedom of speech, thought and behavior and, above all, his extraordinarily consistent logic. (Truman Nelson, in his introduction to a selection of Garrison's editorials, Documents of Upheaval, calls him "one of the most seminal of American thinkers.") But there were inconsistencies in Garrison's thinking, and Miss Kraditor also deals with them very well.

Particularly notable is her handling of the abolitionists' sincere effort to join hands with the labor movement. The approaches on both sides broke down fundamentally over ideas about the nature of social change. Miss Kraditor makes it convincingly clear that labor and abolition had common grounds for joint struggle. She also views Garrison's alleged "hostility" toward labor in relation to the systems of labor exploitation and chattel slavery, shedding much needed light on this failure of the radicals.

The author admits to having begun her work with a "rather negative opinion" of Garrison, derived mainly from reading secondary works. But in his letters she found Garrison to be conciliatory, frankly uncertain about some of his opinions, and desirous of discussion in his paper, The Liberator. To her delight, and ours, she also found him occasionally witty, "at his own expense." The former portrait of a man "bullheaded, arrogant, vindictive, and incredibly blind to some obvious truths," dissolved. Most impressive was Garrison's "logical consistency on all subjects." Generous quotations amply bear out her more favorable impressions.

The clash of ideas on strategy and tactics in the 1830s and 1840s will strike a responsive chord in participants in contemporary movements for social change. Too, conservatives might identify with some of the people they find in this book. But the book will surely be taken to heart, especially by young people trying to sort out their approaches to social change. Indeed, this book is intended as one of numbers of historical studies so that "current movements for change will be able to benefit by the lessons of their predecessors' successes and failures."

Means and Ends in American Abolitionism is a necessary and deeply impressive book; it helps to bury the myth of the vain, doctrinaire, fanatical and crazy abolitionists of some latter-day historians. Instead of such fantasies, one finds in Miss Kraditor's reconstruction of the debates serious men and women whose views and modes of expression merit respect. (On those distorting historians whom she implicitly puts to shame, one should look back also at Louis Ruchames, "The Historian as Special Pleader," The Nation, November 24, 1962.)

Finally, the book has some light touches of entertainment which pop up in splendid one-line footnotes, where some scholars' arguments get their comeuppances for errors in fact, judgment and bias.

Notice to Subscribers

Because of postal regulations, The Nation's mailing list must be arranged according to Zip Codes. Therefore—with any correspondence about address changes, renewals, etc.—please enclose the address label from your Nation. If you don't have a label, be sure to include your Zip number, and be sure it is correct. Without it, we cannot find your name plate.

Commonplaces About Women

THINKING ABOUT WOMEN. By Mary Ellmann. Harcourt, Brace & World. 240 pp. $4.95.

GEORGE STADE

Mr. Stade teaches English at Columbia University.

In this book at least, Mary Ellmann is not directly concerned with women as they are. "I am most interested in women as words—as the words they pull out of mouths." Her primary concern is with woman as rumor.

As current literary gossip, or rumor in its aspect of invidious comparison, has it: "the feminine is the not fully conscious, not fully assembled, the intemperate, incoherent, hysterical, extravagant and capricious." Women are fanciful, but unimaginative; complacent, compliant, passive, yet dominating; grossly material, anemically genteel, narrowly pious; drabs of restraint and bawds of the new-fangled; fleshliness itself, yet quick to contaminate sex with obligation; scatterbrained, yet calculating; at once the type of men's aspirations, the source of their inspiration, and the cause of their failure; if not bitches, then witches, all of them.

Each of their characteristic virtues is gamy with an implicit vice: their chastity smacks of frigidity; their intuition, of irrationality; their motherhood, of smotheration; their practicality, of an incapacity for grasping "subtle principles of conduct, large aspirations, bold errors, grand designs." Praise for women tends to be condescending or left-handed; they are celebrated for childbearing, as Negroes used to be complimented for their sense of rhythm—in order to point up their generic mindlessness; and "the domestic functions which are strenuously urged upon American women who are not yet involved in them are precisely the sources of complaint against the women who are."

The commonplaces about women that Mrs. Ellmann exposes proliferate so crazily and stand in such contradictory relationships to one another, that were women "to believe that all opinions about them are true, they would also have to believe that there is too much truth." Their chief effect is to "coarsen judgment and limit choice"; "the individual is assumed into the sex and loses all but typical meaning within it." The unifying assumption of these attributions is that "femininity must disparage," that "femaleness is a congenital fault, rather like eczema or Original sin."

The pervasiveness of this assumption, in modern fiction and criticism, the hostility and revulsion that informs it, as these attitudes inform an appalling number of ancient saws, fashionable clichés, fictional stereotypes, will distress anyone who considers himself a man of good will or of liberal ideas. He will surely find that he has allowed himself to entertain ungenerous opinions just because they were easy to come by and gratifying to savor. Mrs. Ellmann's own fair-mindedness, her refusal to contend and her freedom from cant, makes the demonstration the more discomfiting. But where, we begin to ask, did so much dislike for one-half of humanity come from?

Mrs. Ellmann gradually works her way to a kind of answer: "By whatever accident control is placed in one human group, another will assume the characteristics of contradiction." Women are presented as the obverse of whatever men think of as their own definitive virtues, as Negroes were always presented as the negative of whatever their masters thought of as defining their own right to rule. Women, like Negroes, "have been repeatedly allied to frivolity, improvidence, guile, and disobedience." No doubt Spartans and seigneurs so allied Helots and serfs. And "when the imagination insists upon a form in opposition to reality, the effect must perhaps always be one of simplification." These simplifications are coercive—the controller thinks of those he controls as he needs to think of them in order to remain in control; few among those he controls will have what it takes to make their disagreement audible; many will not even know they disagree, at least while the control is exerted with the remorselessness of perfect self-confidence.

Masculine self-confidence is eroding a bit, thinks Mrs. Ellmann. Strength, the chief physiological trait of masculinity, and reproductive capacity, the chief physiological trait of femininity, are now "socially gratuitous, obsolescent." The kinds of sexual characterization that steadied our fathers now seem comic, pompous, forced. "When Norman Mailer talks about feisty men and languid women, one touches the past." In an increasing number of recent writers, Mrs. Ellmann sees "a divorce from the reaching of conclusions," a turn to "the essential anarchy of detachment. The sense develops of how much that is peculiar cannot and need not be changed." For all that, she sees no more likelihood of an end to sexual characterization than of an end to sexual intercourse. Moreover, tedious as the characterizations are, "imagine the tedium without them!"

For all the insight and wit of Thinking About Women, for all the incisiveness and intelligence, the book falls just short of satisfying entirely. For one thing, there are a number of curious mistakes. It is not true, to take a typical example, that "all imagined forms of fear and punishment, like God and the Devil, are masculine." How can Mrs. Ellmann have missed all the death-goddesses, vampires, sorceresses, crones, succubi, Erinyes, Harpies, sirens, Fates, assorted loathly ladies and voracious vaginas that populate the world's religions, mythologies, literatures?

This oversight is related to another

LEARNING

We sat on the steps. The graduate student
Rested his scrawny neck on the edge
Of one of them, and then
The juggernaut professor with bull shoulders
Lurched across the lawn.
In the mammoth skull the eyes glittered
Like knives, the great intelligence
Wallowed in its pride
And the graduate student laughed.

We were all drunk, and I
Also a student, sat
And watched, while the ham hands
The red knuckles approached
That thin boy with one leg
Half an inch shorter than the other.

A whippoorwill spoke.
The mountain breathed
Silently, behind our backs,
And suddenly, with no warning
Stood like a house above the student,
And the hands grasped,
And held, and started to throttle
The helpless chicken neck.

I could not believe —
Because I was a student, I suppose
I could not bear to look
At what I was starting to see.

I put my hands
On his hands
Right over the neck, as children play
Games of counting out.
Stop it, I cried, Professor
Remember your position
Wondering how I knew, or if
He heard, or if there was any intelligence left
In him, or any of us.

As for the graduate student
(Who got free)
I only cared to keep him alive
To go on learning if
There was anything left to learn
At this school, or any other.

PATRICIA GOEDICKE

THREE POEMS

1

In the huge snow blizzard
the traffic lights go on and off red, green, in the wild dim day;
the angels disregard them
having other signals.

2

Two pigeons slowly walking on a limb seem to be in academic procession.

3

Be ardent, reader

Our eyes must be like the suns to open the flowers of words.

JOHN TAGLIABUE

GEOMETRY

(Translated by Victor Contoski)

A line is straight since Pythagoras with a piece of blessed chalk drew it on the chimney

For a thousand years stretched like a string the line stands at attention for humanity

It is very tired by now and dreams only of rolling itself into a ball

JERZY HARASYMOWICZ

TWO WINTER PIECES

1

Wrapped in artificial fur to my nose, I am mistaken constantly for people I hardly resemble. I can't conceive why, unless it is we are disfigured by the same snow, squint-eyed Tibetans on pilgrimage.

2

The snow fell continuously until it stopped falling and then as if nothing had happened everything was still.

I switched on the radio to hear snow had fallen continuously until it stopped falling.
The weather now is clear.

SAUL TOUSTER

source of dissatisfaction: the inadequacy of Mrs. Ellmann's remarks on how all these opinions on women came into being—clearly the situation of American women is only in a very rough way analogous to that of American Negroes. Any collection of public delusions with a long history serves an important social function. We have our fantasies about women because we need them, whether the need is species-characteristic, social or individual. And clearly one of the functions of certain fantasies about women (including those that tie them to imagined forms of fear and punishment) is to control and allay the quivering terror or abject funk that most men from time to time, and some men frequently feel, when they think about women.

To see the invidious comparisons that men make and many women accept as no more than a conspiracy of gossip to keep the hussy in her kitchen is to miss the powerful emotions out of which they arise, the communal horrors they express, the unhappiness they cause both to those who make them and to those who are unmade by them, and so to miss the difficulty of disestablishing them.

Book Marks

CHARLES STEIN

Mr. Stein is the author of two books of poems, Provisional Measures (Gnomon Press), and The Virgo Poem (Angel Hair Books).

Cape Goliard, London, and Grossman Publishers, New York, have collaborated in producing a distinguished series of books of poetry representing poets on both sides of the Atlantic, of varying fame. No particular school or trend is represented. Each volume has received distinctive book-design treatment, with individual type face, layout and art work. The series has done justice to the several fine writers it includes, and has given poetry of lesser merit a most advantageous presentation. Some of the books already published in this continuing series are discussed below.

IN . ON . OR ABOUT THE PREMISES. By Paul Blackburn. Cape Goliard Grossman. 56 pp. $4.50. Paper $2.50.

Two small groups, The Ale House Poems and The Bakery Poems, are included in this handsome collection of Blackburn's work. These are fast-paced, open-form poems, whose witty surfaces belie a darker, almost desperate content: Bowery derelicts, barroom situations of various descriptions, urban characters in urban poses. Blackburn assumes a number of voices in his poems which realize a compassion that is at once generous and alarming. The poems' matter-of-fact diction and the poet's suggested identification with his characters save him from self-congratulation and make his material potent and immediate. Disparate aspects of a given moment are presented: in one poem, the assassinated President McKinley is lowered in his tomb as a shopkeeper finishes making love to his typist. The connection between these events is that they are observed (really by the poetry, not the poet) at the same time, as part of the same occasion. Time is felt as the subject of the poetry. Simultaneity does not merely unite disjunct happenings, but taken together, happenings reveal a meaning of the moment in which they occur.

T.V. BABY POEMS. By Allen Ginsberg. Cape Goliard Grossman. 36 pp. $4. Paper $2.50.

Several of the poems in this book have been reprinted in Ginsberg's new collection, Planet News, City Lights Books. The Grossman edition, however, does offer an engaging frontispiece photo of Ginsberg as guru. The key piece in the book, "Television Was A Baby Crawling Toward That Death Chamber," addresses itself apparently to atomic holocaust: "either we blow ourselves up now and die. . . ." No alternative is given. Appropriately. What follows is ruled by a vision that might equally apply to a doomsday nuclear explosion, a prophetic revelation, or an acid trip. In fact, these three are mutually resonant in terms of poetic meaning. Though the poem lacks the clear structure of "Howl" or the consistent context of writing while high of "Ether," the language and content at any given point is exciting and absorbing. In it, Ginsberg holds forth on a myriad of things: the media, Standard Oil, the molecular structure of consciousness, of the universe. As in surrealism where images collapse into other images, here contexts collapse into contexts with surety and rapidity. The book also includes a moving elegy for the late Frank O'Hara.

THE MOST DIFFICULT AREA. By Kenneth White. Cape Goliard Grossman. 48 pp. $4. Paper $2.50.

Kenneth White is advertised on the jacket as feeling "a kinship with Chinese Mystics and Celtic Visionaries." Whitenesses, silences, star-bursts, rare dead birds: the props of mysticism are there. The spirit is not. Such images abound in Mr. White's work, but they seldom either induce or bear witness to a convincing visionary experience. White's rhythms are for the most part uninteresting, and his formal organization comes out of the open-form bag of tricks: regular repetition of lines or images at embarrassingly predictable intervals. An occasional arresting metaphor proves on second reading to be merely original. "Metaphysical" words and phrases appear in places in the poems where they are meant to feel surprising, but do not.

PAAVO HAAVIKKO: Selected Poems. Translated by Anselm Hollo. Cape Goliard Grossman. 64 pp. $4.50. Paper $2.95.

As Anselm Hollo writes in his introduction, Haavikko is a "meditative" poet. He is present in his poems as the mind before which the poem's voice articulates itself. He thus stands outside the current split in poetic practice between those who write for the "eye" and those who write for the "ear." His presentations occur in a mythical and sparse Northern landscape, a silent atmosphere that is an externalizing of the inner silence against which the words of the poem arise. "The Winter Palace," the longest work in the book, is divided into nine poems composed of fragments of various lengths. In Haavikko, the poet's "voice" represents itself as a bird, often vanishing into or passing by out of the "Dark North." At times the poet is the bird, at times he wishes to be the bird, wishes to be at one with his voice, to find a place in his poetry for himself. The relationships between poet, voice, winter, bird, woman and Northern European history are complex, yet established quietly and unobtrusively. Hollo's fine translation supports his claim that Haavikko is an important poet deserving of international readership and reputation.

KITCHEN POEMS. By J. H. Prynne. Cape Goliard Grossman. 26 pp. $4. Paper $2.95.

J. H. Prynne is one of several British poets influenced and in a sense schooled by Charles Olson. Kitchen Poems consists of four pieces which are more verselike arguments than poems. They are oddly reminiscent of Olson in concern as well as specific diction, though Prynne's sound, if not perfectly lucid, is at least his own. Like Olson, Prynne's concerns are history, economics, epistemology, methodology. Unlike Olson, the poems read as difficult abstract arguments, though more than once "abstraction" is condemned. For the reader of poetry who delights in the music of language, imagery and thought, Prynne has little to offer, and his works are extremely difficult in content. If, however, the reader takes pleasure in following an interesting intellect through his thinking in verse, he will find this book rewarding.

MUSIC / David Hamilton

A logical response to the announcement that the New York Philharmonic was commissioning, for its 125th anniversary season a year ago, works from such composers as Elliott Carter, Luciano Berio, Gunther Schuller, Milton Babbitt, and even Karlheinz Stockhausen, might well have been "Why?" None of these men—all very different composers—could be expected to produce works accessible to the Philharmonic's regular audience, which has been allowed to remain substantially ignorant of major facets of 20th-century music, and specifically of those aspects that form the background for the work of the men in question. The orchestra's management (or whatever part was responsible for the commissioning) was obviously not acting in response to subscriber demand—and the possibility that the orchestra's members were the constituency to be served by these commissions is patently absurd.

Thus if the Philharmonic intended anything more than a publicity gesture, the motivation for the commissions must have been approximately as follows: "These men are among the composers most respected by their colleagues, and we feel that they should have an opportunity to write works for large orchestra, and to have them performed; and we owe our audience an opportunity to hear their music." There was perhaps a longer-range thought: "If the Philharmonic and similar institutions are to survive, they must make certain that the best musical minds of today are enlisted to create works employing the symphony orchestra. The time has passed when composers are willing to write orchestral music 'on spec,' but perhaps some of the music we commission will demonstrate the employability of the orchestra in these new idioms."

Whether or not just these particular lines of thought were involved, some such "educational-cultural" view of the orchestra's function and responsibilities must have prompted these commissions, and that is well and good. But has the commissioning arm of the Philharmonic any relation to its programming arm, beyond arranging for performance of the new works? At one level, have the orchestra members sufficient experience with music of this order and type of difficulty to be able to cope respectably within the normal limitations of rehearsal time? And, at another, will these works be heard by an audience prepared, both in attitude and in experience, to profit from hearing them?

The answer to the last two questions is certainly negative—from which one may plausibly infer that the first question, too, must be answered negatively. Schuller's Triplum was presented during the 1967 summer festival, and thus to a nonsubscriber audience, but the performance was less than satisfactory (a recording made at that time is issued on Columbia MS-7052). Berio side-stepped the problem with characteristic ingenuity by writing a piece specifically tailored to Philharmonic audiences, who, if they know nothing else, certainly know Mahler's Second Symphony by now (see The Nation, November 4, 1968). The Carter and Stockhausen works are still to come, but the performance of Milton Babbitt's Relata II (at the concerts of January 16, 17, 18 and 20) brought into clear focus what was even fairly apparent at the presentation, last season, of less conspicuously "new" works by Copland and Sessions (and even, I am reliably informed, Roy Harris): "normal" conditions at the Philharmonic comprise a singularly unfortunate environment for the presentation of serious new music.

Babbitt's work is, indeed, of exceptional difficulty, and this was recognized in the rather special measures taken by Bernstein (mostly at the price of still further extra work for himself, it should be noted) to gain rehearsal time, including the programming of a Mozart violin sonata (played by Stern and Bernstein) and a Brandenburg concerto, so that the full orchestra had only the Prokofiev D-major Violin Concerto to prepare in addition to Relata II. The result, by the time of the fourth concert, Monday night, was surprisingly adequate, despite continuing deficiencies of detail (on Friday and Monday, the piece was conducted by Boris Brott, one of the assistant conductors, who demonstrated a remarkable capacity for projecting the work's shape even when important components were missing; we shall surely hear more of him in the future).

Of course, the closer the performance drew to adequacy, the more ironic the fundamental situation became. There was no broadcast, no recording, so that the almost exclusive beneficiary for all the exertions by Bernstein, Brott and the players was the Philharmonic subscription audience—which for the most part simply wasn't interested. And those who were interested found it exceptionally difficult to gain admittance, for the same device of programming that saved rehearsal time also brought a rush on the box office by people who wanted to hear the Stern-Bernstein duo. Furthermore, the marked improvements in execution over the four performances made no impact on the major reviewers, who attended only on Thursday, so that most published reports on the piece were based on what was, in effect, little more than a public run through.

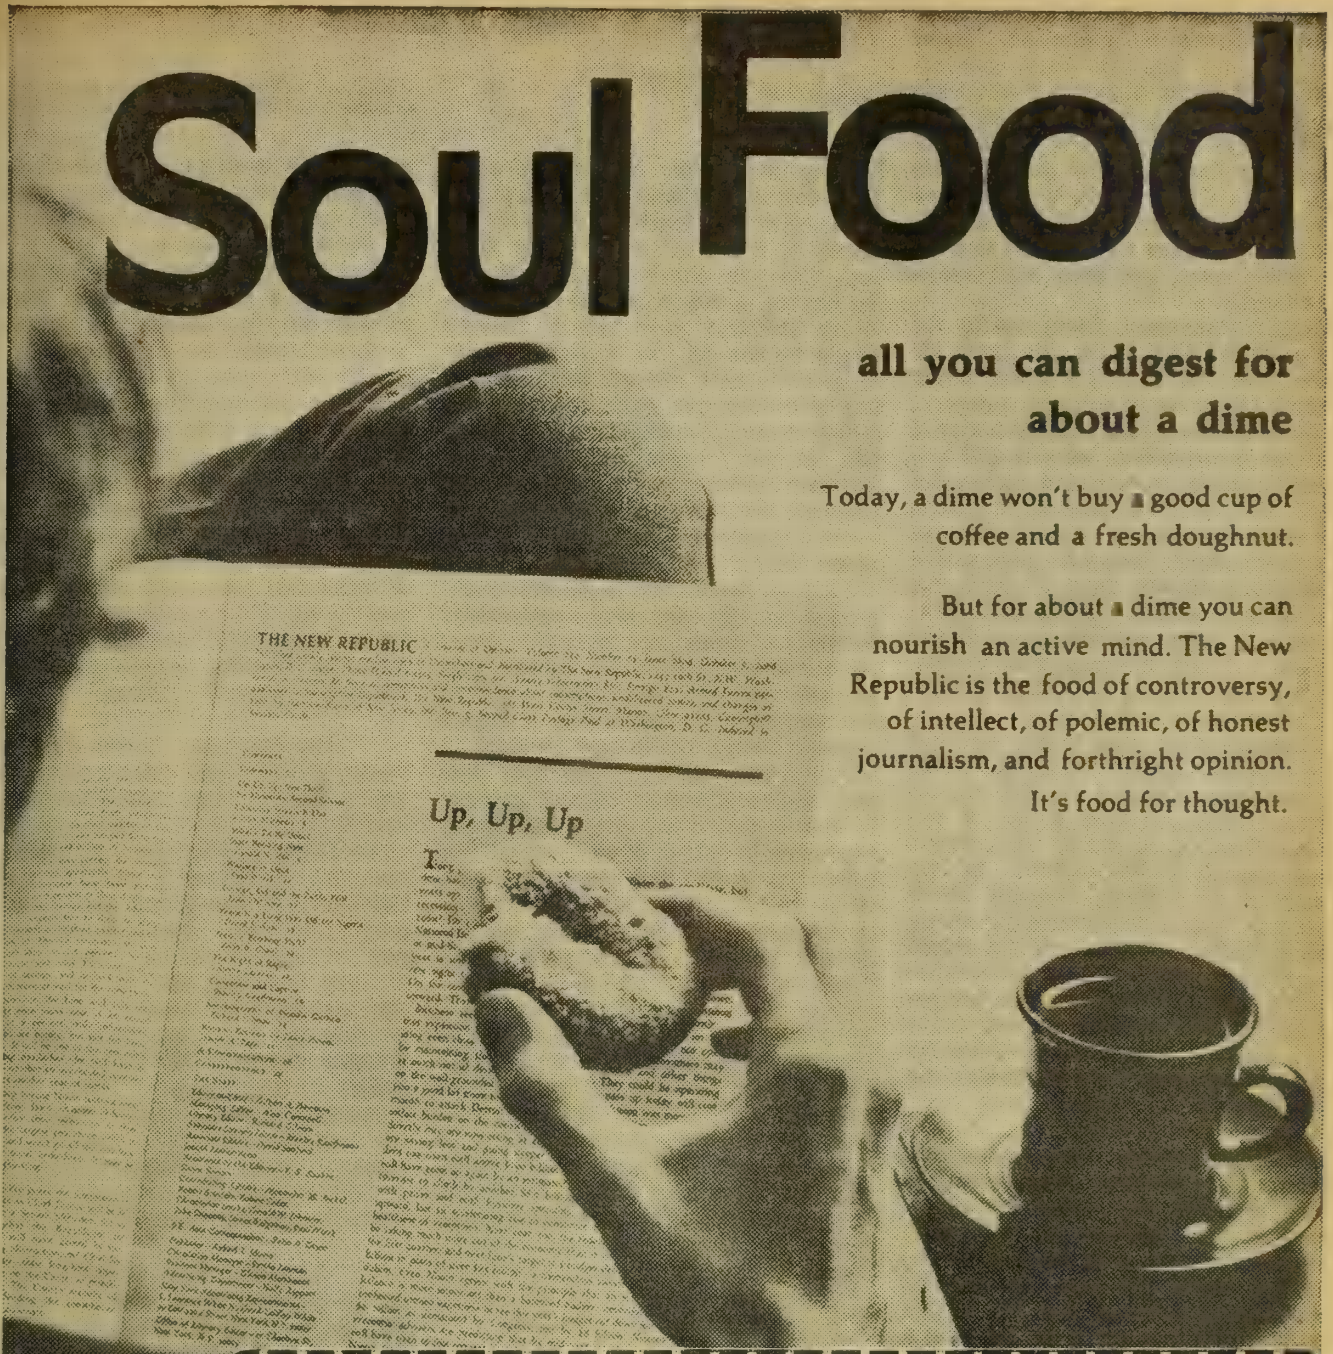
(The fact that the majority of press comment about the Philharmonic's concerts is made on the basis of a single hearing—thus almost automatically dooming works of any significant complexity to miscomprehension and misrepresentation—is but another reason for assuming an educational-cultural, rather than a public relations, function for these commissions. The degrees of factual inaccuracy, intellectual muddling, and philosophical pretension in the reviews of Relata II are more than I can bear to explore; a notable exception was the Boston Globe, where Michael Steinberg devoted two informative and probing Sunday columns to the work and the issue its performance raised.)

In fact, the only efforts that were not to some extent dissipated were those of the composer, for it is clear that Relata II embodies excitingly new conceptions of orchestral sonority, timbral juxtaposition—most obviously some far-reaching octave doublings, whose gradual clarification at successive performances was one bench mark for measuring executive improvement—and the relation of timbral characteristics to rhythmic density. The gestural aspect is exceptionally prominent in the brief, arresting introduction and "extroduction," and elsewhere seems to play a greater role than it did in the composer's earlier instrumental music.

I will not, on such limited acquaintance, comment on the work's structure, but the clear articulation of its main divisions and the parallels among their internal progressions suggest what will probably emerge in further listening. Even under the present limitations, Relata II could be perceived to be an unmistakably significant contribution, and there can be little doubt that it will be performed again, and more satisfactorily.

But if the Philharmonic is really serious in viewing the encouragement and propagation of music such as Babbitt's as one of its functions—and there is every reason why it should—then it ought to extend that seriousness to embrace the provision of adequate rehearsal time and to undertake the education of its present audience (or the acquisition of a new one). Otherwise, the efforts expended are out of all proportion to the results achieved. They will continue to be so, as long as the audience that comes to Lincoln Center is encouraged to come for the wrong reasons.

Between the Berio and Babbitt premières, the Philharmonic offered a remarkable dearth of contemporary mu-



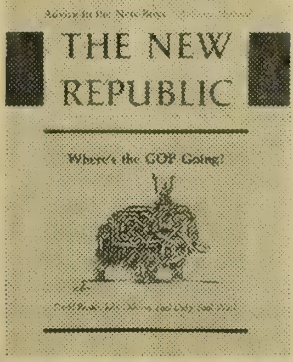
THE NEW REPUBLIC
Up, Up, Up

Soul Food

all you can digest for about a dime

Today, a dime won't buy a good cup of coffee and a fresh doughnut.

But for about a dime you can nourish an active mind. The New Republic is the food of controversy, of intellect, of polemic, of honest journalism, and forthright opinion. It's food for thought.



THE NEW REPUBLIC
Where's the GOP Going?

Send me The New Republic for 48 weeks and bill me $5.00 ☐
or 87 weeks for $9.00 ☐
That's about a dime per issue.

Mail to: Circulation Department
The New Republic, 381 W. Center St., Marion, Ohio 43302

Name

Address

City State Zip

N21769

sic, of whatever persuasion. Among three guest conductors from England, Poland and Italy, only Stanislaw Skrowaczewski made the slightest effort to promote his living compatriots, and this effort was limited to Lutoslawski's primitively schematic Funeral Music of ten years ago. From Colin Davis, we heard no Goehr, no Maxwell Davies, no Bennett—only Elgar; from Carlo Maria Giulini, no Dallapiccola, not even Malipiero—only Casella.

Among these men, Davis was by far the most impressive for his grasp of musical structure and his ability to secure really brilliant playing from the orchestra. A fine Berlioz program showed a special flair for the orchestral weights and balances of that composer, and makes one await his projected Berlioz recordings (especially the much needed Troyens and Benvenuto Cellini) with great anticipation. Throughout these concerts, the Philharmonic played with unusual lucidity and a fluent responsiveness to the various articulative demands of Beethoven's Eroica, Elgar's First, and Stravinsky's Symphony in C.

Giulini, on the other hand, managed to extract no such flexibility; the strings, in particular, produced for him an unpleasant toothpaste-tube stream of undifferentiated tone for all occasions—most conspicuously, perhaps, in the Romanze of Mozart's D-minor Piano Concerto, where Michelangeli's chaste and controlled statement of the theme was followed by a too loud, portamento-laden distortion thereof, suitable for use by the MGM Heavenly Chorus. However, Giulini's programming of Verdi's extraordinary Pezzi Sacri was a welcome benefaction.

Unfortunately, this pattern—or absence of pattern—in programming is exactly what we may expect during the post-Bernstein interregnum, with such occasional exceptions as Rosbaud in the past and Boulez this year. (It must be pointed out, however, that for all his reputation as a prophet of the avant-garde, Boulez's announced programs are extremely conservative; every work on the listings is an acknowledged masterpiece, and should long since have been standard fare for Philharmonic audiences.)

I don't know the management's ideas about the next musical director, but I doubt that any inferior imitation of Bernstein's unique combination of talent and charisma will hold the substantial part of the audience more interested in "Who is playing?" than in "What is being played?" Now would seem an appropriate time to go after the audience that is staying away from the Philharmonic because its programs offer so little that is new and stimulating.

THEATRE and FILMS

Harold Clurman

Nobody knows the trouble I've seen. For instance, there was Chekhov's Three Sisters, filmed by Russians as ineptly as if it had been done by Eskimos. The only convincing element was the birches. And people have the temerity to castigate poor Sidney Lumet's screen version of The Sea Gull which at least has all Chekhov's lines more or less in their proper order and some excellent acting. The players are all English except for an American girl—Kathleen Widdoes and a rather less appropriate Frenchwoman, Simone Signoret—but still everyone looked like a person rather than a "still" or a stick.

I do not cavil at the Renoir-like background in The Sea Gull—authenticity demands a denser and somewhat more somber atmosphere—I am content that Lumet's "Russia" is pretty. And if Vanessa Redgrave looks like a Shakespearean lovely, she is very touching in her final scene as Nina. Kathleen Widdoes' Masha is directed to neck ardently in the bushes with the schoolmaster Medvedenko—which is most unlikely—before he speaks the play's first line, "Why do you always wear black?"; but she suffers well though too overtly through the rest of the play. David Warner's Constantin is so wretchedly disturbed as to belie Chekhov (only American and English poets are so blatantly unhappy). Denholm Elliott's Doctor Dorn is more picturesquely intellectual than he should be and Simone Signoret acts the actress Arkadina as if she were sitting like a pyramid. James Mason's Trigorin is intelligent without being interesting. The best performance is that of Harry Andrewes as Sorin, though he does not appear to be aware of the comedy aspect of his role which is generally true of the direction.

Though the picture thins the play out in its linear progression, and has little of Chekhov's deep delicacy of nuance—after all the play was written for the stage and a change of medium always affects substance—it moved me more than much of the cinematic stuff we ordinarily see.

The British-made Great Catherine is a movie out of Bernard Shaw's somewhat heavy-handed skit. Together with some of Shaw's dialogue a hash has been composed of such ingredients as Errol Flynn-Douglas Fairbanks swashbuckling athleticism, slapstick, horse opera, Moiseyev-like ballet, with dancers doing fantastic leaps over the heads of the guests at an orgy in which no dress is ruffled and no wig is messed—all in a setting so palatial as to have cost as much as the Empress must have spent on her St. Petersburg residence.

Zero Mostel, a Gargantuan Potemkin, mugs like a madman, clowns like a colossus, and is sometimes as funny as he is unfettered. Peter O'Toole, as an English officer, camps only a little less than the out-and-out caricature of an English queer who plays a Russian chamberlain. This is not O'Toole's best side. Jeanne Moreau, disastrously miscast as Catherine, speaks—if she has not been dubbed—in several accents, none of them readily identifiable. One is whacked into an occasional guffaw, but considering the exorbitant waste of funds, justice would demand that everyone responsible for this shebang deserves the classic Muscovite knout.

On the stage in the past two weeks, an airy and then a violent allegory have addled our brains. The soufflé specimen is Celebration (Ambassador Theatre), with book by Tom Jones and music by Harvey Schmidt. It's about the purity of the young and poor, in conflict with the impotence of the old and fabulously rich. No aspect of this charade converted me to its ethereal propaganda. This leads me to wonder whether my heart has been hardened, because several of my colleagues found delight in the show's benevolent antics. I suggest that the authors are more adept at adaptations—their Fantasticks was wrought from a Rostand play and I Do! I Do! from Jan de Hartog's The Fourposter—than at "originals."

I mention Fire! (already closed) by the pseudonymous John Roc because two things worth notice occurred to me in regard to it. Having ridden into town on columns of rapturous praise from the Boston press (the play was first done at Brandeis University), it could hardly have been prepared for the virulently negative reception it met here. Perhaps one has to attend a series of generally staid college productions to appreciate the welcome shock of so intemperately earnest a piece as Fire! Audiences, as I have often remarked, transform plays.

While Fire! was certainly not a "good" play, its faults were by no means heinous. An end of the world parable, its environment a veritable Gehenna in which all the figures are impaled on the horns of their disbelief and exacerbated emptiness, the play suffered from the vehemence of its sincerity, and even more from the perilous nature of all allegory.

Allegory must fail when it is not rooted in the soil of a genuine folk tradition or faith and when the vocabulary of its presentation is not in itself extremely telling. Successful allegory must contain a true fund of wisdom in a form rendered inescapably fascinating by its eloquence and the grip of its fable.

What John Roc wished to say is that our world is so thoroughly diseased that nothing short of its immolation by a universal holocaust can possibly redeem it. One almost believes in his torment, and he is not without writing talent; but since no specific dramatic structure or concrete incident sustains his "poem," it ends in a thicket of mixed metaphors (both in speech and scenic devices), so that his dialogue too often becomes either pretentious or ludicrous.

Red, White and Maddox, called a Thing With Music, by Don Tucker and Jay Broad, must have had a much more resounding impact in Atlanta, where it originated, than it does at Broadway's Cort Theatre. Still, its merit is that it attempts, and to a certain extent achieves, political relevance—something which the "uptown" theatre has eschewed for a long time. Then, too, the show has a grass-roots flavor which saves it, for all its weaknesses, from being meretricious.

Much of it is good fun and, occasionally it thrusts a little harder than one might at first sight believe. The target is not just Maddox as an individual, nor even the Deep South, but the social scene as a whole. The point is clearly made that, while everyone laughed at the ignoramus restaurateur who became Georgia's Governor, "everyone," including those who jeered, voted him into office. Doesn't our history—to mention no other—offer examples of men who were the mockery of nations and who nevertheless were hoisted to power by waves of fear, confusion, pusillanimity, lethargy, cynicism and underground sadomasochism? And isn't it true that such men end by believing themselves gods? While we laugh, we prepare our doom. In this respect, Red, White and Maddox, frail though it be, is both record and warning.

Its cast is generally young, its chorus—there are virtually no distinct voices—muffles most of the lyrics. One tune, Jubilee Joe, with its faintly melancholy irony, haunts by repetition. There is insufficient professionalism or sweep to make the show appear conclusive. Particularly in the latter half of the evening, a disappointing limpness sets in. The "Thing" stands in constant danger of falling between the stools of sharp satire (with a peculiar note of sadness at its center) and being just an amiable juvenile romp.

Special commendation, however, is due Jay Garner whose Maddox is a fatuously smiling bald-headed boy in Bermuda shorts and bobby socks; his voice is piping, his mouth always ajar—tongue pointed as if anticipating a lick of ice cream or ready to incur a deadly sting—while his eyes twinkle with shrewd malice which might easily be mistaken for good-humored idiocy.

During the time I labored through these many film and stage events I longed to return to the exquisite elation of the City Center Ballet with such delicious deities as Allegra Kent, Suzanne Farrell, Violette Verdy and their various partners, as well as to the sweetness of the Harkness Ballet. And Merce Cunningham, in an electrifying moment, struggles desperately to extricate himself from a plastic bag, and imparts in one stroke a sense of modern horror which so many others in our midst fail to dramatize in a plethora of words.

ART

LAWRENCE ALLOWAY

Peggy Guggenheim, reminiscing about her New York gallery in the catalogue of her collection, now on view at the Guggenheim Museum, recalls: "Pollock became the star of the gallery, and for five years I supported him." She records, too: "I gave away about twenty Pollocks to museums and friends"—which left her with eleven. In her Palazzo Venier dei Leoni in Venice, they are crammed into a small lower gallery, but in her uncle's museum they are given place of honor in the High Gallery, the tall flat room off the first ramp. Here the eleven paintings are clearly lit, visible as they never were when hung in Venice. Several are in a deteriorated condition, but are scheduled for restoration by Orrin Riley, the museum's conservator.

The paintings were acquired by Peggy Guggenheim from the four one-man shows she gave Pollock at Art of This Century, as she called the gallery, in 1943 and 1945-47. The latest works, two drip paintings, are from an exhibition at Betty Parsons Gallery in 1948, while Pollock was still under contract to Peggy who had left the United States for Europe. The group of works, though smaller than it might have been if she had had more confidence in Pollock's work, represents admirably a decisive period in American art, the years when New York artists prepared for the work that gave them international domination.

These works by Pollock from 1942 to 1946 are nourished on two of the main themes of New York art in the forties, which might be summed up, rather cursorily, as Cubism and Iconography. The Cubist influence can be seen not only in the containment of paint within certain formal perimeters but in specific references. In "Moon Woman" (originally "The Moon-Woman"), for instance, the earliest work on show, the head includes a bland profile taken from Picasso's lunar heads of Marie Thérèse. Iconography as used here refers to both mythology as general knowledge and to the notion of art as self-discovery. Pollock said as late as 1956, "When you're painting out of your unconscious, figures are bound to emerge." This statement, from near the end of his life, embraces the work of the early forties, as well as the abstract paintings. The early work of Pollock can readily be seen in close relation with the later drip paintings.

Pollock's confidence that he was painting from his unconscious and that its forms would naturally be figures, is not something that we can easily share now. The fact is, Pollock's totems, person-

Sideburns $3
Mustache $2
Van Dyke $3
Wear Any Combination
THE LOOK YOU WANT-WHEN YOU WANT IT!

Be Amazed at the Exciting Change in your Personal Appearance!

Now You can actually select the way you want to look, Older, Younger, Distinguished, Cool, Suave — you name it! Wear each one independently or combine them for the effect you desire.

All items made to exacting professional standards. Firmly self-adhering. Can be worn with self confidence anywhere, anytime. They are so life-like you will have to remind yourself that they can be removed!

FREE with each order, a complete guide that tells how to naturally wear your sideburns, mustache and van dyke.

When ordering state hair color — light, medium, or dark brown, black or off-black, blonde, auburn (red), or silver (grey). If not sure of your hair shade enclose hair sample. 100% Money Back Guarantee. Mustache $2, Sideburns $3, Van Dyke $3. Order all 3 items for only $5. (Save $3)

Send to:
MAN INTERNATIONAL,
6311 Yucca Street, Dept. 597.
Hollywood, California 90028.

PUBLICATIONS

KNOW CANADA BETTER!
See world affairs from a different perspective!
Read CANADIAN DIMENSION
Independent, lively, and original. Canada's leading forum for radical thought.
$4.00 for eight large issues
Write to:
CANADIAN DIMENSION
P.O. Box 1413
Winnipeg 1, Manitoba, Canada

OVER 2,000,000 Back Date Magazines! Reasonable prices. Fast service. Send needs. MID-TOWN, Box 917-N, Maywood, N.J. 07607.

'THE PRESS AND THE BAY OF PIGS'

A detailed study by
Victor Bernstein and Jesse Gordon
The role played by The Nation in breaking the Bay of Pigs story to the American public, reprinted from the Columbia University Forum.
Single copies—15c; 25 copies at 10c each
Orders over 25 at 7c per copy
THE NATION
333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014

EDUCATIONAL

QUAKER STUDY CENTER—Suburban Philadelphia. Special program for study in social change, non-violence and radical living. Also year's seminar on man's search for meaning, confirmation and dialogue. Write: L. W. Lewis, Pendle Hill, Wallingford, Pa. 19086.

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, ALgonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

The Best Way
To Get
THE NATION

THE NATION 2-17-69
333 Sixth Ave., New York 10014
☐ One Year, $10
☐ Two Years, [illegible]
☐ 6 Months, $5
☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed
(Add $1 per year postage for Canada; $2 foreign)
Name ....
Address ....
City ....
State .... Zip No. ....

nages, ritual scenes and animals are less revelatory of the psyche, less the natural form of self-expression, than a learned iconography which is understood to denote deep states. His experience in analysis was alone sufficient to train him in the romantic iconography of nightmare, quite apart from the wholesale myth-raking of American and European intellectuals in the thirties and through the war years. Mythic typologies flourished during the war, when Pollock painted these works.

The luxuriance of Pollock's bestiary and his cast of personnages prove his belief in the connection of individual psyche and mythological pattern. There is other evidence, too, that Pollock was aware of the usefulness to his art of a set of permissive symbols. In an untitled gouache of 1946, now at the Guggenheim Museum, a whirl of bright colors is inhabited by the zigzag outlines of stick figures derived from cave painting. Other drawings of the mid-forties, not in the exhibition, also show microcosmic groups and crowds. Though not especially good, these drawings bring into the open Pollock's conscious interest in visual sign systems and in ideographs. Thus a painting like "Eyes in the Heat," 1946, in which loops of paint make a serial structure of forms resembling sockets and eyes, comes out of a definite attempt to invest painterly improvisation with human content.

"Moon Woman" is linked to two sister pictures in other collections, "The Mad Moon-Woman" and "The Moon-Woman Cuts the Circle" (the recurrence evokes iconographic volumes). Though the central figure is derived from a fairly neat and formal source (Picasso), it is painted in a new way, at once very rough and very elaborate. The paint is clotted, dragged, dabbed, scored, worried; Pollock's handling is heavy (with much sense of the brush's pressure on the canvas), but every touch is countered by another dab of paint on top of it, or justified by an echoing color elsewhere in the picture. It is as if a lot of overstatements, by colliding with and qualifying one another, became a complex statement. The picture, though brute, is internally complex in its oppositions. Toughness becomes the vehicle, not of simplicity but of intricate tensions.

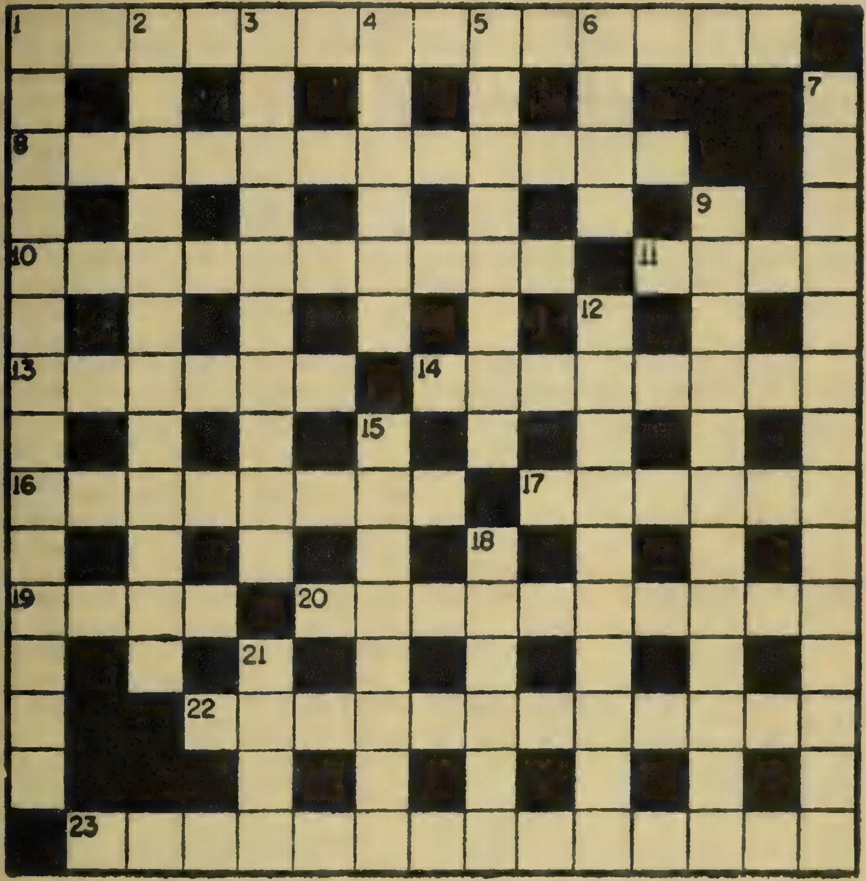
The mythographic imagery of Pollock reaches a maximum point of vehemence in "Circumcision," painted in January, 1946. The turbulent and obscure activity is held on a grid which braces the whole picture, like a trellis beneath unshorn flowers, a mass of blacks greens yellows pinks and whites. In his last show at Art of This Century, 1947, Pollock grouped his paintings in two series: "Sounds in the Grass" and "Accabonac Creek." One of the latter series, which continues mythic Cubism to some extent, belongs to Peggy Guggenheim: "Bird Effort" (1946). It is a remarkable painting in which the smeared Cubism of "Circumcision" has been turned into a subtle interplay of color and line across the flat surface. White canvas intercedes continually between black contours and scabby color patches, so that line and color seem to be pried apart.

Two of the "Sounds in the Grass" series belong to Peggy Guggenheim and both are further developments of the allover emphases of "Bird Effort." In the painting called here "Sounds in the Grass," a structure of white lines is laid over a scratched and bristly paint bed of darkish yellows greens reds blues and purple. The white loses its linearity and frays, expanding, into the colored ground. The density of paint is constant and ceases just within the edges of the picture, a device which has the effect of making the picture edge subservient to the display of paint. The edges do not break or interrupt any images or shapes. The canvas is only slightly larger than the area of the paint field it carries, a principle of organization which replaces internal subdivisions by a holistic definition of area, a kind of space developed superbly in later drip paintings. In both this painting and "Eyes in the Heat" there is, too, what we might call the pulverizing of mythic imagery but not its abandonment. The iconography is present in these later works, not as figures but as atmosphere, as rhythm; it is as if somebody had demolished a pagan idol in the room and its dust had settled on everything. Hence, a pulverized but not absent mythology, with meanings—tidal, seasonal, labyrinthine—evoked by rhythm.

The catalogue entry for the painting "Two" notes: "This picture is usually dated 1945, but Peggy Guggenheim states she is practically certain that it was done in 1943." If it was painted at the later date it must have been early in the year, as it was shown at Art of This Century in March, 1945. In fact, the image of tall totemic forms, partly modeled in volume, partly held flat by large planes of color, is close to other paintings of 1943, and even of 1942, so the earlier date seems likely. The planar flatness is a prolongation of Cubism, but cracking like an old sidewalk split by new grass. Pollock's nervous, harsh, repetitive, unsparing touch gives the emergent figures their own lush life. Pollock's iconography has an imperious presence as painting which reduces most of its Surrealist rivals to surreptitious lechery; a Pollock personnage is Cortez say, to Max Ernst's Crippen.

Crossword Puzzle No. 1285

FRANK W. LEWIS



ACROSS

1 Error is best not tampered with—though the results show the strain of New England breeding. (6,8)

8 In order to be such a person, possibly? (12)

10 Used for dragging large economy size logs? No danger! (4,6)

11 Hamlet questioned flying to those we know not of. (4)

13 One of those classic Japanese productions that makes for Jack's lack of polish? (2,4)

14 Begins to look like what they did in the Garden! (6,2)

16 Does something through typical documents. (8)

17 One of the things Mesopotamia relates to. (6)

19 The first person to defraud an image? (4)

20 Strangely enough, some people mix it up with a soft drink. (4,6)

22 Grammatically general in some titles, for example. (It also suggests what a horse might have.) (12)

23 The rest of the board of trade might be acting in opposition. (14)

DOWN

1 It might bother stenographers and draftsmen, but they shouldn't reach them because of it. (8,6)

2 Eve, this should be you! (6,6)

3 Where a man pressed for time puts powder at five? (The star might, by comparison.) (10)

4 Threefold point in the test? (6)

5 Was one of his titled subjects leaner, when blessed. (8)

6 Was the hibiscus partly venerated by the Egyptians? (4)

7 Dying under peculiar circumstances, as Othello might have said? (7,7)

9 The bourgeoisie go to an island as an annual event. (Bachelors might make up a good part of the crowd!) (5,7)

12 Triple-I flat car made up, but not for real! (10)

15 What they did to the Concord farmers? (8)

18 Notices the eye here? It's a way to gather in a condensed layer. (6)

21 False form of 19 that might be real for the Spanish. (4)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1284

ACROSS: 1 Sports reporter; 9 Life net; 10 Steamer; 12 Stressed; 14 Trireme; 17 Yolks; 19 Oracles; 21 Edgewise; 23 Spider; 25 Enticed; 26 Uttered; 27 Cross reference. DOWN: 1 and 15 across Salisbury steak; 2 Off-beat; 3 Tanneries; 4 Ruth; 5 Pass the hat; 6 Reeve; 7 En masse; 8 Bred; 13 Reconsider; 15 Saltpeter; 16 Kittredge; 18 Lighter; 20 Sadiron; 21 and 11 Even-steven; 22 Wicks; 24 Buff.

PERSONALS

SOCK IT TO ME—over 225 other underground buttons. 1/25c, 5/$1, 50/$5, 125/$10 and 1,000/$75. Bumperstickers, beads and peace jewelry, too. Free catalogue to all! Free sample to stores. A BIG-LITTLE STORE, 1077 Mission, San Francisco, Calif. 94103.

DISCOVER an intriguing, fun way of meeting literate Jewish singles. FREE literature: OPERATION MAZEL TOV, 663 Fifth Avenue, N. Y. C. 10022.

GENE LIVES—Memorabilia of McCarthy Campaign. $4.97 package includes: 3 flower decals (rickee tickee stickees); 5 assorted buttons; 2 bumper stickers; 2 posters ("He Stood Up Alone . . ."; "Give the Presidency Back to the People"); "Keynote" Speech. $2.93 package includes: 2 decals; 3 buttons; 1 poster; 1 bumper sticker. Order from: Memorabilia & Co., Box 3769-N Georgetown Station, Washington, D. C. 20007.

NUMBERS RULE THE WORLD: Numerology is one of the oldest psychic sciences. Know what numbers have power over your life. Know how to use them for more success and harmony. Send name, birth date, and $5 to Marguerite Mann, 6600 N. Oracle, Tucson, AZ 85704 for your personal numerology chart. Satisfaction Guaranteed.

BLOW YOURSELF UP! 1½' x 2' Poster of anyone. Send returned snapshot. $3.00. Pierpoint Products, Box 678, Inglewood, Calif. 90307.

EXPERIENCED man or woman to help start new Public Relations agency specializing in Negro "causes", partnership basis. Write Box no. 622, c/o The Nation.

RECORDS

FREE 40 PAGE CATALOG offers hundreds of recordings of rare Renaissance, Baroque and Classical music. Some records priced as low as $1.00 each! All late recordings in stereo only. MHS RECORDS, Box 932 NA, New York, N. Y. 10023.

FOLK, JAZZ, BLUES. We specialize in hard-to-get LPs. Send us your wants. MONON RECORD SERVICE, Box 18221 BH, San Francisco, Calif. 94118.

HISTORY OF THE BLACK MAN. LP Album. Educational. Authoritative. $4.00. Postage included. Lovett Records, Suite 1800, 230 Peachtree NW, Atlanta, 30303.

The Nation

BOOK SERVICE

Offers the following at a discount:

☐ VIETNAM FOLLY by Sen. Ernest Gruening and Herbert W. Beaser (National Press, $8.95) $7.15

☐ FRIENDSHIP AND FRATRICIDE by Meyer A. Zeligs (Viking, $8.95) $7.15

☐ THE GOODBYE LAND by Jose Yglesias (Pantheon, $4.95) .... [illegible]

Remittance accompanying orders should be made payable to THE NATION, 333 6th Ave., N.Y. 10014

Readers can avail themselves of our regular offer to send them any book (except paperbacks), published in the U.S. at the retail price post-free. When ordering, please give title, author and publisher.

2-17-69

Printed by Milford Publishing Inc., Milford, Conn.

Why Read The NATION?

Information –	if you want the facts that are hard to find.
Opinion –	if you care for an independent point of view.
Stimulation –	if you're challenged by tabooed questions—and answers.

Why Subscribe Now?

Four free issues –	We'll add four bonus issues to your subscription.

One more question:

Why not enter your subscription today?

BONUS OFFER: If you join us now for 1 year, we will add four bonus issues to your subscription free of charge.

THE NATION 333 Sixth Avenue New York, N.Y. 10014

☐ I'll join you for 1 year (48 issues). I enclose $10 and understand you will add four bonus issues to my subscription.

☐ I'll try you for 6 months (24 issues). Enclosed is $6.
(Add $1 per year postage for Canada & Mexico; $2 other foreign.)

Name ....

Street ....

City .... State .... Zip ....

N2-17

JOIN THE FIGHT

THE NEW FEMINISTS JO FREEMAN

THE NATION

FEBRUARY 24, 1969 35 cents

J-09K PL-5337
BURLINGAME PUBLIC
LIBRARY
BURLINGAME CA 94010

BURLINGAME
FEB 24 1969
LIBRARY

The Politics of Anti-Poverty

ROGER H. DAVIDSON

California WHY THE COLLEGES BLEW UP

KINGSLEY WIDMER

BRITTANY: REVOLUTION IN A CEMETERY

MARION MAINWARING

Berryman Without Impudence MICHAEL GOLDMAN

The Month of March JOSEPHINE W. JOHNSON pickets on the long march

LETTERS

San Francisco, Calif.

Dear Sirs: We write on behalf of the striking professors of San Francisco State College, in whose company we have proudly marched the picket line that commenced on January 6th. . . . We are aware that from that date on we have . . . been accused of being a minority group of opportunists riding on the student turmoil in order to swindle for ourselves such particular gains as reduced teaching loads, higher wages and free parking, along with such generally subversive intentions as power for the local American Federation of Teachers. . .

We do admit to opportunistic action. We saw the opportunity to avoid mass murder on our campus, and we acted on behalf of that opportunity. . . . We saw the opportunity to object effectively to the high-handed appointment of S. I. Hayakawa to the Acting Presidency of our college, and we took it. It is apparent by now to all that Hayakawa . . . is reaping a personal bonanza of TV and radio time, as well as newspaper and magazine space. The general public now knows the name of this instant college president as it would that of a new mentholated cigarette, but it knows nothing of the enormity of the problems the college faces.

They are not the problems of San Francisco State College alone. The chaos here is exportable. Every tax-supported urban college in the country is vulnerable to it. And through our present struggle here all such institutions can foresee whether they will go the way of Hayakawa and of repressive governmental powers that will mix politics with education, or gain an inch in the long march for meaningful faculty and student voice in faculty and student affairs.

The vast majority of the striking faculty has no other source of income than its teaching salary. One month of that is already sacrificed . . . But as of now there is no foreseeable end to the strike. The ability of the striking faculty to carry on in its cause is dependent on money to pay the rent and buy the food. All money raised by the striking teachers is to be shared with the culinary workers, the library assistants, and those of the clerical staff and student workers who, in support of the strike, have left their campus jobs.

We shall be grateful if you will forward such contributions as you can make, and as soon as you can, to: American Federation of Teachers, Local 1352, 4097 19th Avenue, San Francisco, Calif., 94132. Please make checks payable to AFT, Local 1352. Kay Boyle, Leo Litwak
Ray B. West, Jr., Herbert Wilner

Gruening in Boston

Cambridge, Mass.

Dear Sirs: Massachusetts Political Action for Peace will be honoring Senator Gruening at a testimonial dinner in Boston on March 7. . . . Besides Senator Gruening, the speakers at the dinner will be Sen. Harold Hughes of Iowa, I.F. Stone, Sam Brown, who was the National Youth Coordinator for the McCarthy campaign, and Canon James Breeden, who is a black priest and on the Commission on Race in the Massachusetts Council of Churches. Tickets are available through Massachusetts Political Action for Peace, 44 Brattle Street, Cambridge, Mass.

Martin Peretz

goals and tactics

El Paso, Tex.

Dear Sirs: Smith Simpson ["Diplomats in Disarry"; The Nation, Feb. 3] predicts a decay in the decision making of

(Continued on page 244)

EDITORIALS

Angry Voices, Harsh Words

It has been a wretched season in "Fun City." The embittered dispute over "decentralization" and community control of the schools has precipitated a flood of harsh language and mutual recrimination. And not alone in New York. In other cities, the angry name calling has echoed. Propelled by passion, words have been used in reckless disregard of their meaning and of the consequences that attach to certain terms and phrases in current settings and situations. Now, fortunately, a realization is spreading that the time for language therapy has arrived; spokesmen for various groups are being urged to lower their voices and watch their language. This is a sound first step. While group tensions are not "caused" by words, in times like these name calling can be disastrous.

It is true that many individuals who could fairly and accurately be described as "racists" watch their language and never give public expression to their private views on racial issues; the polite, well-mannered, powerfully placed bigot is a familiar type. But now, when dialogue is needed as never before, words take on special importance. In many communities abusive language is substituted for communication. Indeed, in some situations ugly words are being used to disrupt or prevent communication. In these instances, epithets are employed not to relieve anger, or to say anything, but as tactical weapons. For example, in certain ghetto communities rival groups of black militants are competing for control of unstable constituencies. In settings of this kind, violent language is nowadays used by some groups to isolate the black community—that is, to keep whites out—and at the same time in the hope that verbal violence may be taken as the true measure of militancy. In some cases, although it is clear that the angry voices do not intend to incite physical violence, the action often gets out of hand. Flamboyant language directed by a spokesman for one group against another can provoke a retort in kind which not only embitters relations between them but alienates groups not directly involved. In some instances, some blacks, without perhaps being fully aware of the consequences, have used language that could be interpreted as a bid for support by anti-Semites in the white community. And some whites are no doubt quite willing that Jews should be made scapegoats for every imposition and harassment against which blacks must contend.

What is needed is not merely a moratorium on abuse—although that would be a boon—but the validation of serious discourse about real problems. Verbal violence may be less disastrous than race riots, but there comes a time when abuse must give way to genuine talk, aimed at forging a political movement strong enough to bring about changes in all the relationships that handicap racial and other minorities—blacks, Indians, Mexican Americans and others.

It would be one thing if the society showed no movement at all in this direction. But change is occurring—not fast enough, not in enough significant areas—but it is apparent and it should be accelerated. Half measures, palliatives, sociological soothing syrups, temporary pressure relievers hawked like aspirin tablets, public relations gimmicks, magic words and phrases are of no avail. Similarly futile is appeasing unrest by automatically granting every demand, no matter how unworkable or regressive, out of a feeling of guilt and in the vain hope of achieving "peace." Massive political pressure for social change must be initiated at every level and sustained without interruption for as long as may be necessary. All those, of whatever races and groups, who believe in a multi-racial democracy must insist that their views be heard and heeded. The aggravation of group relations that has occurred since 1965 has been caused as much by their default as by any single factor. It is now their move.

The Missile Pause

It is all to the good that Secretary of Defense Melvin Laird has announced a temporary halt in the Sentinel missile defense system. However, rejoicing would be premature. For one thing, the standstill is only of the token variety. Research, development and some manufacturing have not been interrupted—the "halt" affects only clearing operations on the proposed Boston site and perhaps some others. The public, therefore, should not relax or conclude that the whole fantastic project has been sidetracked. Even less should the public conclude that the Pentagon is at long last on the defensive to such a degree that military spending can be curtailed.

Mr. Laird is no lion tamer when it comes to keeping the Joint Chiefs of Staff and the Pentagon's industrial beneficiaries under control. When Bernard Nossiter asserted in The Washington Post (January 26) that the highest profits in the aerospace industry seem to accrue to the poorest performers, and analyzed thirteen aircraft and missile systems built at a cost of $40 billion, Laird called the Post in an effort to stifle further criticism. He argued that public discussion of unreliable weapons could weaken American negotiators in the forthcoming arms-reduction talks with the Soviet Union.

As we noted editorially in the issue of February 17, the Senate's recent coolness toward Sentinel is largely the result of indignant mail from constituents. But public reaction is spasmodic and undependable, because it is largely set off by personal apprehension or distaste. Much of the steam against Sentinel has been coming from suburban communities that didn't like the idea of nuclear monstrosities squatting in their backyards. Essentially the same thing happened some years ago, when the shelter mania was high on the agenda—the citizens began to protest against a hairbrained military scheme when it impinged on them directly.

The Pentagon might have got away with its Sentinel scheme if it had sited the installations out in the boondocks, but this would have interfered with the development of the system to really impressive dimensions. It started as a $5 billion "thin" defense against primitive Red Chinese missiles consisting of a single warhead atop the rocket. These were to be brought down by long-range (about 400 miles) Spartan anti-missile missiles

MAY 15
JUL 26

IN THIS ISSUE

February 24, 1969

EDITORIALS

226

ARTICLES

229 Brittany: Revolution in a Cemetery Marion Mainwaring
233 The Politics of Anti-Poverty Roger H. Davidson
237 California: Why the Colleges Blew Up Kingsley Widmer
241 The New Feminists Jo Freeman

BOOKS & THE ARTS

245 Berryman: Without Impudence and Vanity Michael Goldman
246 On March: Time to Take Stock Josephine W. Johnson
248 On Resurrection (poem) David Ray
249 The Weight of Tradition Norman J. Gallo
250 Memory and Revelation Laurence Goldstein
251 Nero Wolfe's Brand of Beer Max Byrd
252 Nation Book Marks Sara Blackburn
253 Theatre Harold Clurman
254 Films Robert Hatch
255 Crossword Puzzle Frank W. Lewis

Publisher
JAMES J. STORROW JR.

Associate Publisher
GIFFORD PHILLIPS

Editor
CAREY McWILLIAMS

Associate Editor
PHIL KERBY

Executive Editor
ROBERT HATCH

Literary Editor
HELEN YGLESIAS

Copy Editor, MARION HESS; Poetry Editor, JOHN LOGAN; Theatre, HAROLD CLURMAN; Art, MAX KOZLOFF; Music, BENJAMIN BORETZ; Science, CARL DREHER; Advertising Manager MARY SIMON.

Editorial Associate, ERNEST GRUENING

Washington, ROBERT G. SHERRILL; Paris, ALEXANDER WERTH; London, RAYMOND WILLIAMS; Bonn, C. AMERY; Canberra, C. P. FITZGERALD; United Nations, ANNE TUCKERMAN.

The Nation is published weekly (except for omission of four summer issues) by the Nation Magazine Company and copyright 1969 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014, Tel: CH 2-8400 West Coast office (for editorial correspondence only); 825 South Barrington Avenue Los Angeles, Calif. 90049. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. and at additional mailing office.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Add $1 per year postage for Canada and Mexico; $2 other foreign.

Change of Address: It is essential that subscribers ordering a change of address give five weeks' notice and provide their old as well as their new address. Please give Zip Code numbers for both addresses.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Book Review Index and the Public Affairs Information Service.

THE NATION Volume 208
No. 8

—a Chinese ICBM headed for Washington, say, being brought down over Chicago. But if the Chinese resorted to all sorts of decoys, or multiple warheads, or other ingenious designs still in embryo, there would be no guarantee that Spartan, though equipped with a 2-megaton warhead (2 million tons TNT equivalent), would stop all the incoming missiles. Secondary defense would have to rely on relatively small (10 kiloton—equivalent to 10,000 tons of TNT) defense missiles with a range of only about 50 miles, and these would necessarily have to be sited close to the target city. An advantage of this duplex system, from the viewpoint of the military-industrial complex, is that it would cost something more than $10 billion, thus making it worth while for the generals, bankers, executives, scientists, engineers and workmen charged with bringing the system into being. Later, when deployed against the Soviets, such a system might cost $40 billion or more.

These present and future Sentinel features are known to but few citizens, and would not be known to them if Sen. John Sherman Cooper had not been apprised betimes by his legislative aide, William G. Miller, a former Foreign Service officer. Even when the facts are thus uncovered, only a few newspapers in the whole country will give the story much of a play.

What is needed, then, is some continuing mechanism by which citizens, as taxpayers, consumers and possible victims of the nuclear holocaust, can be given technologically sound advice about the defense budget. This might take the form of an independent institute for the critical study of proposed defense outlays, backed by foundation grants, with a sizable staff of scientists and engineers, and the right kind of names as trustees. Such a body could alert the electorate, politicians, journalists, et al., to the menace to national security which constantly emanates from the very sources that are supposed to enhance that security.

The Misuse of Science

Scientists are citizens too, and some of them are starting to behave like citizens as well as scientists. The germ of an organization to ride herd on the Pentagon can be discerned in the "research stoppage" planned at M.I.T. and other universities for March 4. As described in Science (January 24), a group of professors and graduate students have scheduled a voluntary work halt to focus attention on "the misuse of scientific and technical knowledge [and how] it presents a major threat to the existence of mankind." Instead of getting on with their research, these men of science will discuss problems and possible ways for scientists to initiate political action. Sen. George McGovern will speak at M.I.T. on reconverting the U.S. economy from defense to domestic production. Prof. Hans Bethe of Cornell, a Nobel laureate, will discuss the anti-missile missile. Prof. Noam Chomsky will speak on the responsibility of the intellectual. There will be panels on the world food crisis, urban problems, and finding jobs for young scientists and engineers outside defense industry. At Yale, Cornell and other schools, psychologists are joining with physicists in the research stoppage. The original call for the protest was signed by forty-seven M.I.T. faculty members including the heads of three departments—B. Magasanik (biology), J. Ross (chemistry) and V. Weiskouf (physics).

Although Vietnam has played a catalytic role, the aims of this group are of far wider scope. They want to turn research away from the present overemphasis on military technology and toward the solution of pressing environmental and social problems; to interest students in devoting themselves to bringing the benefits of science and technology to mankind; and to expose "ill-advised and hazardous projects," such as the missile "defense" system.

At M.I.T. separate faculty and student committees have been formed. The student group is called Science Action Coordinating Committee, the faculty group is the Union of Concerned Scientists. This bifurcation can be an advantage, since the students may wish to do some things the faculty cannot do or may not want to do. Although the whole movement is only in the nascent stage, it is impelled by sound thinking and may have widespread influence.

The M.I.T. movement is not the first of its kind. In their several ways, the Society for Social Responsibility in Science and the Federation of American Scientists have been active for many years. At the recent meeting of the American Physicial Society in New York the chief excitement centered upon proposals for participation in social issues. A particularly striking example of social thinking came last year from a citadel of the military industrial complex. At a meeting commemorating the 150th anniversary of the founding of the New York Academy of Sciences, Dr. Simon Ramo cited as one mark of our failure to control our technology that we have developed a system to provide pure air for an astronaut on the moon, but seem incapable of doing as much for the inhabitants of our cities. Dr. Ramo is closely associated with the development of the American ICBM. When a scientist-engineer of his prominence criticizes the country's technology, something significant is beginning to stir.

'A Sticky Situation'

To Washington spokesmen the latest flare-up over West Berlin is merely "a sticky situation" and will not lead to another major East-West confrontation. That it is sticky is evident. The Soviets and East Germans have announced that travel permits—land and rail—will not be issued to the 1,000 or more delegates who will be traveling to West Berlin for the Presidential election on March 5. Presumably they will have to be flown in, a "sticky" if not exactly serious nuisance. It is also a bit "sticky" that President Nixon, with full knowledge of the West German election plans, and the likely East German-Soviet reaction, decided to visit the city on February 27.

The President had to visit West Berlin. Ritual requires it: every new President must visit Berlin, there to receive the predictable "thunderous" reception from a million or more West Berliners made "deliriously happy" by his presence. This is the stuff of which good television shots are made, even if the scenes somewhat lack spontaneity. Such visits are said to boost the morale of the West Berliners, but a fair inference would be that their prime purpose is to brighten the President's image. By now the jaded and unhappy residents of West Berlin must be bored with command performances. If President Nixon runs into some flak on this visit, it will be because his advisers needlessly exposed him to it.

But more important, why did the West Germans feel that the election had to be held in West Berlin? Perhaps to make a point. But the point had been made in 1954, 1959 and 1964. The decision to hold the election in West Berlin, we are told, was "not made at the highest level." But that, too, is a bit "sticky"; for one thing, the allied powers had been consulted.

As to the timing, the Soviets had recently made "a serious effort" (David Binder, The New York Times, February 10) to negotiate several issues with the West Germans, including an attempt to get Bonn's signature on the nonproliferation treaty. Recent Soviet notes had "exuded reasonableness." This, then, was hardly the time to bait them—unless, of course, accommodation was not to the West German taste.

As a matter of fact, Mr. Binder reports that some West Germans and allied officials, "at intermediate levels," had sought to shift the election to Bonn, but were told that the announcement of President Nixon's visit precluded such action. So everyone, more or less, is locked into "a sticky situation," which might easily have been avoided. Mr. Binder gives all parties bad marks for inept "crisis management," but this is a case not of the mismanagement of a crisis but of the manufacture of one.

Josephine Herbst

Over the long and active span of her life as a critic and reporter, Josephine Herbst participated in the great social movements of the period and reported on them with grace, honesty and consummate humanity. She was involved in many of the vital publications: Transition, Smart Set, New Masses, The Nation. Her reporting was distinguished by a rare combination of stylistic simplicity and radical commitment to a human view, and she remained true to her own tone over the decades. She was also well known in the thirties as a novelist, but none of the novels she wrote then is now in print, and her essays have never been collected in a book. New Green World: John Bartram and the Early Naturalists (1954), is the only Josephine Herbst book in print. This failure of appreciation will surely be righted in time.

What she has left behind, in addition to her early work, is a correspondence of great interest and—what may well be the crowning achievement of her life—a memoir on which she had been working up to the time of her death. Excerpts from this work published in The Noble Savage and New American Review have aroused wide enthusiasm, and it will undoubtedly appear soon in book form.

For The Nation Miss Herbst reported from Germany on the underground anti-Hitler movement in the thirties and from the front lines of the Spanish Civil War. Thirty years later she still displayed the same passionate concern, writing in The Nation on July 25, 1966: "The Spanish Civil War was a profound personal experience for me and I am hopelessly biased. It was also a period of exposure. Exposure can be merciless and when it is we can gain the most valuable sort of understanding there is to be had. Then we are forced to examine what we believe about ourselves and our experience, our justifications of our institutions, our practices and conduct." In the fifties, in one of her most eloquent essays, "The Ruins of Memory" (The Nation, April 14, 1956), she salvaged the thirties from the destructive views of the cold-war critics: "In a period of demoralization and terror it was no bad thing to try to act, however mistakenly or inadequately, as the conscience of the age." In the same essay she said: "It takes a true writer to show us what has been missing in our lives." She was that kind of true writer.

Brittany: Revolution in a Cemetery

MARION MAINWARING

Miss Mainwaring, who divides her time between Europe and America, was the foreign research editor for The Adams Papers. Her translation of Turgenev's short novels will be published in the spring by Farrar, Straus & Giroux.

Paris

Not long after he announced his forthcoming visit to Brittany, President de Gaulle received a letter from the Comité d'Emigration Bretonne. It called on him to choose between two alternatives: "Either to order the French occupation troops to evacuate Breton territory; or to resume observance of the conditions of the Treaty of 1532—that is, to reconstitute the sovereign Breton assembly . . . and restore to it all the powers stipulated in the treaty," powers amounting to "administrative, legal, fiscal and customs autonomy."

"You see," cried "Caerléon," the Breton leader who showed me a copy of this diplomatic note, "our position is luminously clear! That letter was written by a doctor of laws. France has no case. French presence on Breton soil is foreign occupation. Brittany was settled by Celts from Britain and was independent from the fifth century till the French forced union on us in 1532. Even then, the treaty of peace guaranteed political autonomy. In 1789 it was unilaterally annulled by France—whereupon we declared that action, and all acts of the French National Assembly affecting Brittany, null and void.

"That treaty of 1532 is the sole basis of France's claim! As to the marriage of Anne of Brittany with Charles VII in 1491, the French forced that on her—it was a rape, and her earlier marriage by proxy to Maximilian of Austria is the only one we recognize.

"France has crushed our institutions, but we have resisted the Revolution, the Restoration, the Empires, the Republics. Our movement today is nothing new. Brittany is a country in a permanent state of revolution."

Breton nationalism has long been regarded by outsiders as a picturesque part of the French Establishment, an opera set of menhirs, Druids, fisherwomen and Celtic twilight, with alien touches of Passport to Pimlico. Even the plastique bombs of the Front de Libération de la Bretagne (FLB) have been shrugged off indulgently by the public, if not by the authorities. Today, the sentiment is different. On the one hand, there is a growing expectation that the government will make some real concessions to regionalist demands; on the other hand, the police have been jailing persons suspected of FLB activity.

What is Breton nationalism, beyond being the overt expression of a sense of otherness? I have talked with two leaders of the movement, Alan Al Louarn and Ronan Caoussin or "Caerléon." Louarn lives in the pleasant airy city of Rennes. The "Bézedach" ("BZH" for "Breizh" or Brittany) is chalked up on walls; old women go to the supermarket wearing the traditional stiff white lace coiffe; university students lunch on crepes that are griddled on a hearth whose black and white tiles form the Breton flag —ermines and stripes. "The flag is rather recent, 1923-24," says Louarn; "the symbolism is plain. The five black stripes are for our five provinces." (The fifth of these, the "province" of Loire-Atlantique, is considered part of Brittany only by the nationalists.)

Louarn works in a dilapidated 18th-century house in the Place des Lices, near the old Halles. A sign across the façade proclaims that here is the Mouvement pour l'Organisation de la Bretagne. Louarn's office is warmed by a wood fire; a slip of paper tacked up by the chimney points a penciled arrow at the smoldering logs, with the gallant conceit: "The Breton Movement rises from its ashes." The room is chock-full of Breton flags, Breton musical recordings, tourist souvenirs, framed 19th-century photographs, mostly of clerics. There are car stickers, the flag, the Bézedach, and—"This one is a little more clandestine, take this one," said Louarn, handing me a "Celtic sign" or triskel. Above all, there are papers, files, books, newspapers, magazines and hundreds of little mimeographed leaflets. The office is the "Information Center" of the movement, and Louarn is its director.

"One finds information here," he said, "on Ireland—Scotland—Cornwall—the Isle of Man—the Jura—Val d'Aoste—the Occitans [those natives of southern France who speak langue d'oc]. All the minorities, whether they be European or extra-European. All . . . ? No; that is impossible. But all who send us their materials. We have just this morning received L'Ecosse Nouvelle, and here I've just received the Journal Basque. We are always en rapport with the Basques. We are en rapport with all the minorities! That doesn't mean that we are necessarily in agreement with them all. For example we can very well have, over there, you see, materials from a minority like the Arabs, and on the other side of the room, from Israel.

"And Quebec, of course. Our principle is to claim for Brittany the same status as Quebec. De Gaulle calls for a Québec libre; well, in refusing us a Bretagne libre he is not very consistent! But we have many allies among the French minorities: Normans, Alsatians, Basques, Occitans. We are the strongest minority—the most numerous, and with a well-defined territory. We try to keep in touch with all the organizations which demand liberation. The American Indians: we are not directly en rapport with them, but our delegation in Quebec is in contact with them.

"You see, our structure is not like the French. The French system is a star; everything radiates from one center. We have one ray going out: a ray goes out from that, others from that—perhaps yet others from some of them. There is endless ramification. It is not at all the Jacobin system; quite the contrary. It has perhaps certain disadvantages, but it is ours. It is very Celtic.

"Every cell, every sector, has its own radiation. There are an extraordinary number of different and specialized Breton movements. The traditionalist movement concerns itself with ancient history, with recalling historical events. Then the economic movement, which concerns itself with Breton production in the world markets, with transport, with the material organization of the country—there are several organizations like that. Then the cultural organizations concern themselves especially with questions of Celtic civilization and language; you have a whole series of folklorique groups devoted to dance, music, arts. And there are several political organizations; certain ones are purely socialistic, others entirely nationalistic.

"And you have, furthermore, the organizations which are preparing for a Breton state. A sort of 'shadow cabinet' [Louarn used the English term] which covers all the structures. If tomorrow, for example, by some strange circumstance, we were to assume responsibility for the life of the Breton community, there are people ready to take the places of the present establishment. We, or certain organizations, know who would be in the place of the prefect, of the archbishop, of the chief of police. Again, you have the army group, which anticipates the Breton force de frappe. You have some small implementation of every sector of life—religious, political, military, economic.

"That is not to say that everything is ready; one must go gently. But there are persons who are readying themselves for responsibility, and who work every day, every free hour, to prepare the Breton state.

"A new group is Sao Breizh—that is to say, Brittany, Arise! (These posters read 'Sav,' but actually 'Sao' is a better spelling.) It attracts many young people. In fact, our movement has especially young people, and they are the ones we especially seek. We have many links with the students. As for the professors . . . it is better not to go into our links with the professors; it might cause them trouble. We are in touch with some.

"Today there are young people who have been brought up in the Breton idea, in families interested in the movement. But we who became interested before the war had first of all to destroy our own education and to contract another. We were alone. We had to teach ourselves Breton. Even today only a very few of our schools teach Breton; it is not well supported by the authorities.

"Probably the commandos of the FLB are young; but we ourselves don't know who are in the commando army.

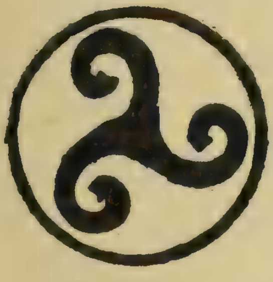
You can understand that the boys who carry out military operations, who plastiquent, when they come in here they don't tell us what they've done! One may suspect, one may or may not believe—but one does not know. It must be so. Absolutely. The police would come, and everybody would be interrogated—in one month, ten months. Therefore, no information!

"We have a modus vivendi with the French police. I am known to them, and certain others are known. We live in correct relations with the police; we aren't on bad terms. But it is a question of prudence."

Breton culture, above all language, is one of the two fields of major interest for the nationalists. France, they say, is guilty of "cultural genocide, genocide by absorption." They demand that Breton be recognized as the, or an, official language, and that the language and literature be taught at all levels. Linguistic kinship is the basis of the "Celtic League," though the League's dreams are political: if its wishes were fulfillled, Northern Ireland would be annexed by Eire; and Eire, Alba (Scotland), Cymru (Wales), Kernow (Cornwall) and Mannin (Isle of Man), as well as Breizh, would be autonomous states in a Federation of Europe—each the peer of dismembered France and England.

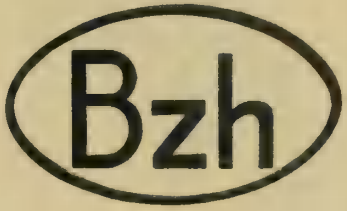
The other great area of grievance is suggested by a glossary in a little news sheet. Some Breton words, the editor notes, are not yet familiar; and he gives the Breton for: economy, bureaucrat, oil tanker, oppression, underdevelopment, tourism and colony.

Brittany's economic predicament is generally acknowledged. The nationalist interpretation may be melodramatic ("France deliberately keeps us in a state of chronic economic underdevelopment, colonial in its nature") and all the problems may not be peculiar to the region. But there is substance to many nationalist assertions. Breton farmers are poor, though they work hard. Factories in Brittany are closing down, without being replaced by new ones, though throughout the country Breton workmen are highly regarded. Tourism is not what it could be. Communications are poor. (Roads are inadequate, but in any case Brittany is "boxed off" as, say, New England is boxed off; and furthermore is cursed by a mountain which "forces north and south apart like a knife in the claw of a lobster.") There is what U.S. sociologists call massive out-migration: "deportation," the Bretons call it. Young people, seeing no future at home, "emigrate" to other parts of France and above all to Paris. Old people come home to die. It has been said that Britttany is becoming a "cimitière des elephants." A French rejoinder to this is that it is at least a cemetery with a lot of elephant calves playing about in it, the Breton birth rate being well above the national average.



The Triskel

Proposed economic solutions vary, of course. One group wants a reconstituted Breton States-General to "undo the French laws that favor big business and prevent development of small or new ones." Another, the new Sao Breizh, rejecting "capitalist neo-liberalism, as well as every form of exploitation or oppression of one group by another," would have cooperatives in agriculture, self-management in business and industry. There is widespread agreement that Breton interests are different from those of "Rhine-axised" France and the Common Market, that Brittany should make its own tariff and trade arrangements, particularly with England, and that if Brest were developed into a great port, Brittany would be the "advance post of Europe, facing the New World."



During our conversations in Rennes, Alan Louarn urged me repeatedly to talk with the very important Ronan Caoussin, known as "Caerléon," historian of the movement, author of Complots pour une République Bretonne (Editions de la Table Ronde, 1967), who lives in the outskirts of Paris.

A few days later I did meet Caerléon, in a brasserie near the Gare Montparnasse. He was identifiable not only by the copy of Complots which, by prearrangement, he carried, but by a tendency to look over his shoulder. "I am known," he told me immediately. "Whenever I go into Brittany I am followed by the French police, and after any plastiqué there are policemen outside my house."

Like Louarn, he is intense, enthusiastic and single-minded; he talked very fast, in a low voice, stroking his beard, and added generously to my collection of photographs and leaflets.

"Regionalism? All right in its way—it is a breach in Jacobin centralization. We want autonomy: not separation, not independence, but autonomy in a federated Europe. Holland is no more important than Brittany! We have the same territorial and maritime possibilities. If only de Gaulle had begun federation with Algeria, made Algeria a province! But he preferred to ruin the empire to save the Republic. About Quebec, he is not consistent.

"Our young people even envisage, if it is necessary in years to come, making Brittany a nation like Ireland. They are only a minority, but it is the minority that makes a revolution."

Asked if there is much support for regionalist or separatist programs among Bretons in general, apart from those in the various organizations, Caerléon sighed:

"The Breton people follow very badly. They are influenced by government propaganda. They are a people who are chloroformed, depersonalized, and who have lost all national consciousness. The peasant knows he is condemned to leave his country because agriculture isn't flourishing, but he does not know who is responsible. He knows the evil exists, but not where it comes from. Or the peasant believes in the cause but doesn't believe change is possible.

The Christian Science Monitor

"And the Church: before the war the clergy were for Brittany; today they are not. I am a Catholic, and I am a great friend of the clergy. I know them well, and I am their friend. But the bishops are at orders of the prefects. The Breton movement is sliding toward the left, and so the clergy are against it. The new Celtic church will be like the Anglican—Catholic but not Roman. I defend it, because it resists the Francisation of Brittany by the Church.

"Still, we are strong! Though we lack funds—the movement never has money—we are strong. In 1944 people believed the movement was over, so many were in prison, fled, or doing forced labor. But today I believe Breton nationalism is as strong as it was before the war."

The war! The unsavory aspect of Breton nationalism is its record of collaboration with the Nazis—or rather the attitude of many nationalists today toward that record.

"It is a page that has been turned," says Caerléon. But no one can forget it, if only because of the Breton, Yann Goulot. In 1944 Goulot was condemned to death, in absentia, for collaboration. He lives in Ireland, and from there, so he says, directs the FLB and the Breton movement in general. It was he who signed an "Appeal" to the United Nations on behalf of Brittany in 1969; he is reported to have offered a "truce" during de Gaulle's visit. He has a flair for publicity, and foreign papers tend to take him at his own valuation.

His true importance is hard to gauge, as so much is hard to gauge in the Book-of-Kells convolutions of the "movement." The news sheet Douar Brèizh (Mur-de-Bretagne) printed on the first page of its first number (December 1968) what purported to be a categorical statement by the FLB that "it has never authorized the famous Dublin Committee to act as its correspondent and that it disagrees with the declarations of the said committee. M. Yann Goulot speaks only for himself. Information, to be worthy of belief, must come either from Brittany or from Breton Emigration in Paris."

Both Louarn and Caerléon brought up Goulot's name. "Bretons," said Caerléon, "would never tolerate any totalitarian regime, Communist or Nazi. They are temperamentally Socialists—and, as an old leader said, 'Socialists who will have their Matins in the morning and their Angelus in the evening.' Goulot personally was Socialist and Christian, not National Socialist; and we have in our band the Bretons who were allies of the French. Take Ned Urvoas—he was in the Allied forces, a war correspondent, a delegate from the Free French for all Brittany. And he is a chief of the Breton European Federalist movement. And the Commandos of the FLB are young people who don't know the war and cannot be considered pro-Nazi. They tend to be of the Left, not of the Right."

Thousands of Bretons were in the French army or the Resistance, said Louarn; only a handful fought for the Germans. Journalists have confused an innocent youth group which Goulot ran, the "Bagadou Stourm," with the "Formation Perrot" of Bretons who wore the Wehrmacht uniform. Goulot himself, however, in his "Appeal," speaks proudly of this latter unit, which "fought with the Germans against France, the common enemy"; and the comment on it in Complots is that it "engaged in open warfare at the side of Germany against France, thus forcing history to register the Breton fact."

Indeed, collaboration seems to be regretted more because it now hurts the nationalist image than because it was deplorable in itself. "The nationalists," Caerléon explained, "have one sole objective: the liberty of their people. Those who played the German hand marked world history with an undeniable Breton fact. To save Brittany from a conspiracy of silence, they even accepted the risk of defeat. They tried to collaborate with the Germans when there was no longer any French Government or army, in order to establish a Breton state—but it was already too late.

"For," he went on bitterly, "Von Ribbentrop was Francophile! He failed to support a Breton state. He did not want to do what displeased the Vichy government: he wanted to collaborate with Vichy. Brittany was sacrificed to France in the Accord de Montoire."

The ability of the extreme nationalists to see the world outside only as it impinges on their cause gives their version of history a curious two-dimensional quality. According to Complots, the abortive plot against Hitler's life was significant because its leader was "the nephew of Von Stauffenberg, who took a personal interest in the attempted Breton coup d'état of 1940!" The liberation of Europe meant "only the return of the French occupiers to Brittany. One principle, the principle of minority rights, excellent in itself, has been cultivated in isolation until, like the patience of patient Griselda, it has become grotesque; consistency as well as objectivity suffers.

"The Bretons," Caerléon continued, "were accused of treason to France. But they could not commit treason to France, because they did not consider themselves French." But loyalty is not left to the individual conscience, for a little later he informed me, apropos the "shadow cabinet," that "there are also even secret tribunals which at the chosen moment will judge the traitors toward Brittany."

Most Bretons, of course, have a milder vision of the future, more modest expectations; they would simply like to have somewhat more say about their own affairs—which they do stubbornly feel to be their own. But the professional nationalists find it useful, even when working toward moderate objectives, to allude to the threat of violence and extremism. Speaking for the Mouvement pour l'Organisation de la Bretagne, Alan Louarn says: "I believe what it would be very important to say in America is this, that the Bretons at present, while hoping perhaps for a little something from the new French policy, do not count on the good will of Paris. One does not expect that the adversary will give you an opportunity to do what you want! So the Bretons are creating for themselves their own organizations—like the Irish with Sinn Fein."

THE POLITICS OF ANTI-POVERTY

ROGER H. DAVIDSON

Mr. Davidson is associate professor of political science at the University of California, Santa Barbara. He has been associated with Sar A. Levitan of George Washington University in an extensive evaluation of the war on poverty and is co-author with him of Antipoverty Housekeeping: The Administration of the Economic Opportunity Act.

The Nixon Administration is hard at work trying to de-escalate the two Great Society wars that have become increasingly irritating and inconvenient for professional politicians. They are the war in Vietnam and the "war on poverty," which may prove to be the more tenacious.

The focal point of current debate on poverty is the five-year-old Economic Opportunity Act, heralded by President Johnson as "a total war on poverty." The law, and the Office of Economic Opportunity which administers key portions of it, has proved a magnet for controversy from the very beginning. The agency's resources and powers never justified the total-war label, since it spends less than 10c of the federal anti-poverty dollar. Yet OEO has been under continued attack—by politicians as too troublesome, by militants as too tame, by liberals as too cheap, by conservatives as too expensive.

What principally makes OEO the butt of controversy is its frank commitment to "community action," which has come to mean mobilizing the poor into an effective political force which will reshape public institutions and services. As OEO's former director, Sargent Shriver, once put it, the agency's mission is "to serve the poor, to speak for the poor, to marshal America's resources on behalf of the poor." The mission has not been an unqualified success. The poor lack skills and resources to engage in middle-class modes of influence, and encouraging them to participate has been a frustrating business. When achieved, this participation has inevitably raised (in the words of one Congressman) "ugly problems of the political establishment."

Broadly speaking, there are three stratagems for aiding the poor. One is to provide traditional services—job training, some medical care, etc.—designed and administered by professionals. A more radical solution is to redistribute incomes through some such massive commitment as family allowances or negative income tax. The third strategy is to encourage the poor to speak for themselves, on the assumption that they will use their political power to obtain economic and social parity. It is this last objective which characterizes the community action phase of OEO's work. OEO has waged war not on poverty but on the indifference which surrounds poverty—the apathy of the affluent and the passivity of the impoverished. Like all self-knowledge, the process has been painful. "Since the poor have become less invisible, for we know they are there," writes Michael Harrington, "the society has become even more guilty; now it knows its callousness."

Few Washington observers would gamble much on OEO's future. The two-year renewal granted by Congress late in 1967 runs out on June 31; Bertrand M. Harding, OEO's capable acting director, has been asked to stay on in a caretaker role. A post-election task force headed by Richard Nathan has urged "spin-off" of some OEO programs to old-line departments and agencies, and even President Johnson in his farewell State of the Union message invited Congress "to improve the administration of the poverty program by reorganizing portions of it and transferring them to other agencies." Such spin-offs would not necessarily prove fatal to OEO's mission, though they would certainly impair its budgetary leverage. What is at stake, however, is the very notion that the federal government should support the evolution of the poor into a political clientele.

The new Administration is obviously eager to discover ways to remove the political liabilities from anti-poverty programs, and the suggested solutions range from the popular Community Development Corporations to the negative income tax. Meanwhile, an open season has been declared on community action, with new scandals promising to add fire to the controversy. These attacks now include (in case anyone has yet to be told) Daniel Patrick Moynihan's new book, Maximum Feasible Misunderstanding. An early Great Society dropout and a respected urbanologist, Moynihan has the singular distinction—not lost on the press—of having helped draft the Economic Opportunity Act in 1964, and now of working in the White House to plan new urban programs for President Nixon. Moynihan can always be counted on to stir the liberal establishment, and his book has already produced a flurry of protest; but it adds credence to the feeling that community action, not to mention OEO, is in for another bad year.

Moynihan argues that the war on poverty cruelly misled the poor by promising them political muscle rather than jobs or income. His interest in family allowances, in particular, stems from his deep concern for family structure in the ghetto—a concern that is no doubt traceable to his Irish orthodoxy and his fascination with the experience of earlier waves of immigrants. But the crux of his position—and the factor which makes him so useful to the Administration—is his attack on the political component in the war on poverty.

In fact, to assume that OEO's demise would de-escalate the political conflict inherent in anti-poverty programs is itself a feat of maximum feasible misunderstanding. If OEO is scuttled, the conflict inherent in anti-poverty politics will not subside with it; and community action by any other name will still be community action. However unique OEO's mission, it was not the product of a few misguided social theoreticians or overzealous administrators. It is an integral part of the crisis in which we all find ourselves, and to understand the full measure of the predicament, one must recall the OEO experience.

Just before President Kennedy's assassination, White House advisers were looking around for new ideas which could be packaged into an anti-poverty bill. A small task force from the Council of Economic Advisers and the Budget Bureau canvassed each federal agency for ideas, and was dismayed by what turned up. Most of the agencies simply grabbed the chance to push for pet projects, some of which were already stalled on Capitol Hill. President Kennedy's aides were hampered by the fact that economists and practitioners were just beginning to rediscover poverty; tested ways of fighting it were not available in 1963 or 1964.

One proposal, however, attracted the White House planners (by now Johnson had become President). Staff members of the President's Commission on Juvenile Delinquency and Youth Crime suggested funding local community action agencies (CAAs) which would draw up their own plans for fighting poverty. The idea was ridiculously (and deceptively) simple: it respected local prerogatives, and it solved several sticky problems. If new plans were hard to come by, the Community Action Program (CAP) neatly by-passed the dilemma: the federal government would simply hold out "a pot of money," and local people would bid for it. The Budget Bureau, always eager to shore up administrative lines and save a few dollars, saw CAP as a way of coordinating welfare spending at the local level. Only the Juvenile Delinquency people, it appears in retrospect, sensed how radical the idea really could be. Theoretical writings on the sociology of juvenile delinquency—particularly the work of Richard A. Cloward and Lloyd E. Ohlin of Columbia University—were propounding the view that reform must come, not by rehabilitating the slum-dwelling delinquent but by altering the opportunity structure of the slums. Practical work of the Ford Foundation's "Gray Areas" program (headed by Paul N. Yivisaker) and by the Juvenile Delinquency Commission was therefore directed at community reform rather than individual rehabilitation.

While Moynihan details much of this background in his account of the origins of the Act, it is important to remember that few planners in 1964, when Sargent Shriver's Task Force drafted the final legislation, understood the implications of the community action provisions in the Act's Title II. Congress displayed even less comprehension than the executive planners, and Title II became law almost without change.

As defined in the 1964 law, "community action programs" means (to quote the key phrases) a program which "mobilizes and utilizes resources, public or private, of any . . . geographical area . . . in an attack on poverty," and which "is developed, conducted, and administered with the maximum feasible participation of the residents of the areas and members of the groups served. . . ." Almost any effort to reduce poverty can be funded through CAP. Projects have included preschool and remedial education, legal aid, recreation, health services and neighborhood centers. And, of course, federal money was usually required to create the CAAs and keep them running—the only proviso being that at least 20 per cent of the budget be raised locally.

Several questions had to be resolved when the CAP section of the Act was set in action. First, how would CAAs relate to existing community institutions—including city and county governments, school systems and welfare agencies? Second, what was the meaning of "maximum feasible participation"? Underlying these was the deeper question of how much local control would be politically feasible in a federally funded program. The questions were intertwined, and they were pre-eminently political. "Community action has given everyone a problem from the beginning," observed Rep. Sam Gibbons (D., Fla.), floor manager of the 1966 anti-poverty bill—in what must rank as a supreme understatement.

Some legislators and local officials have always been uneasy about CAP's relations to local government. "What scares me," said Rep. Roman Pucinski, an organization Democrat from Chicago, "[is] a tendency to by-pass . . . elected officials . . . to set up . . . so-called nonprofit private organizations which have become somewhat notorious as empire builders. . . ." Democratic mayors like Richard J. Daley of Chicago and Robert F. Wagner of New York contended that CAAs should be run by city governments; Republican Mayor William F. Walsh of Syracuse went so far as to say, "If we could not have direct control of the program we would not want it." Still the hunger for federal money overrode any doubts, and the Act as passed retained its original flexibility.

Spurred by federal funds, more than 1,000 CAAs sprang up throughout the country. Most were private nonprofit agencies—umbrella groups composed of influential citizens, welfare professionals and spokesmen for the "target populations"—designed to finance actual field projects. Because CAAs could embrace "any geographical area," they traversed political boundaries with ease: some were essentially ghetto organizations, others paralleled municipal boundaries, still others (especially in rural areas) ranged over multi-county areas. Relations with "local power structure" (to use the emerging phrase) were as varied as the organizations themselves.

The first operating grants had no more than gone out, however, when the cry of "by-passing City Hall" began to show political urgency. The central event was the battle over political registration in Syracuse. In February, 1965, OEO funded an experimental political-action training program, sponsored by Syracuse University, to train political organizers and instigate field work in slum areas. To Republican Mayor Walsh the program looked suspiciously like a drive to register Democratic voters—about 2,500 of them. By mid-1965 several influential Democratic mayors were having similar trouble with CAAs and, led by Mayor Daley, they stormed into Washington to confer with Vice President Humphrey, who assured them he would instruct OEO on the facts of life.

Thus ambushed, Shriver saw little choice but to make peace with City Hall. Militants and pragmatists in the ranks of his advisers had been at loggerheads from the start; now the militants began to depart and the agency came increasingly under the influence of old Washington hands. The Syracuse grant was terminated and its militants instructed to work through the Mayor's Crusade for Opportunity, the local CAA. Détentes were reached in Chicago, Newark and other cities, and in early 1966 it was revealed that OEO was giving numerous mayors an informal veto over CAP projects. The Conference of Mayors, which had agitated for City Hall control of CAAs, now became one of OEO's staunchest allies.

While relations with local politicians improved markedly after 1966, CAP continued to be politically vulnerable. John Kenneth Galbraith once observed that "whenever you spend money on behalf of the poor you get into trouble." Certainly community action was scandal prone. Home-town CAA recruits were unfamiliar with federal fiscal practices and often became hopelessly mired in funding irregularities; some questionable programs were undertaken—a racist theatre group in Harlem, Black Power classes in Tennessee; and some activities were simply misinterpreted, as when a local training officer who purchased surplus gun sights to use for microscopes was accused of providing arms for the poor. Moreover, it was impossible for the CAAs to be effective without putting some prominent citizen's nose out of joint: consumer education inevitably stirs up landlords and merchants, and neighborhood workers necessarily flirt with political activism in performing their duties.

Congressional harassment of OEO therefore persisted long after the agency had made its peace with local officialdom. In the fall of 1967, Congress petulantly voted to exclude OEO employees from a general salary increase for government workers, then refused the usual continuing resolution permitting OEO to operate at the previous year's budget level pending new authorization. For two weeks, OEO was literally without funds and had to discontinue expiring projects. That Congress had misread the national situation became apparent when CAA clienteles—including many local politicians—raised a cry about imperiled programs, among them many of the popular Head Start projects. Before it adjourned, Congress funded OEO for two more years and passed an amendment giving local governments authority to designate CAA organizations. Sponsored by OEO's unpredictable critic, Rep. Edith Green (D., Ore.), the provision was dubbed the "bosses and boll-weevil" amendment because both big city and Southern Democrats could support the bill, on the assumption that local prerogatives would henceforth be protected.

Little has changed under the Green amendment, a fact that confirms how adroitly the bulk of CAAs have handled their relations with City Hall. Of the 1,012 CAAs now in existence, only thirty-four (less than 4 per cent) were run by public agencies before 1967. Under the Green amendment, another twenty-five are being taken over by public agencies. Some 94 per cent remain private nonprofit organizations.

In point of fact, the formal status of CAAs is not the best measure of their relations with "local influentials." Typically, CAAs were formed by a mayor's committee or a coalition of traditional welfare officials; and the Green amendment now requires that up to one-third of the seats on CAA governing boards be allocated to elected or appointive public officials. Sometimes a mayor exerts a firm hand, as with Chicago's Committee for Urban Opportunity; sometimes—as in Oakland, and at one time Syracuse and San Francisco—the CAA coexists with local authorities in a state of high tension. But in between lies a vast majority of CAAs which have reached a workable accommodation with old-line politicians and welfarists.

The charge that community action has been unrelentingly hostile to local government is a hangover from OEO's first year or so, when the agency's militant faction was in its heyday. Even then, the lurid tales of "war on City Hall" were at best true of only a few of the 1,012 CAAs. Syracuse was such a battleground, as were some activities of New York's Mobilization for Youth. Moynihan bases his criticisms on these two areas—hardly what social scientists would call a valid sample.

The more frequent criticism of OEO today is quite the opposite: that it knuckled under too readily to political pressures, that it too quickly retreated from its mission of (to borrow a phrase from Saul Alinsky) "rubbing raw the sores of discontent." Some of these critics, professing that extremism in the defense of the disadvantaged is no vice, would measure OEO's success precisely by the number of sores it rubs.

That OEO is subject to such diametrically opposed evaluation is evidence of the tightrope the agency has walked in the past five years. Being, after all, a product of public largess, OEO had to come to terms with established institutions, without whose experience and political influence the war on poverty would have ended long ago. As one OEO evaluation put it, the agency has pursued "a limited form of pressure and antagonism [which is] preferable to extremes of vehement antagonism or docility."

It is here that OEO's second great dilemma—involvement of the poor in decision making—becomes germane. The Economic Opportunity Act speaks not of the poor but of "residents of the areas and the groups served." Nor does it say the poor should run anti-poverty programs; its words, if anyone can forget them, are "maximum feasible participation"—an expression which, like "all deliberate speed," encourages diverse interpretations. As with CAP itself, there was no consensus within OEO as to what it required.

SAGSOORIAN

Again OEO was torn between powerful forces. Mayors and welfare professionals maintained, in the words of Nashville's Mayor, that "you can't have unqualified people running good programs." Radical militants defined participation as control. OEO as usual had to chart an unpopular middle course. "We have no intention," Shriver said, "of letting any one group, even the poor themselves, run the programs. That's not community action."

The law could be honored without having a single low-income person on the local CAA board, and at first CAP loans failed to specify criteria for including the poor in decision making. OEO then began sponsoring local elections for target-area representation on CAA boards. In the first year of CAP about a dozen cities held such elections, but turn-outs were disappointing; voter participation ranged from a low of 1 per cent to a high of 5 per cent of those eligible. Lacking middle-class habits of political involvement, lacking issues or party labels or inspiring candidates, taught by experience that the ballot box is no remedy, the poor were not prepared to go to the polls in force. Involvement could not be achieved overnight.

Working from another angle, OEO began to require informally that at least a third of the members of local CAA boards be poor people or their representatives. OEO was somewhat reluctant to stipulate guidelines; inflexible requirements would smell like dictation from Washington and would foredoom some CAAs in the South. But failure to maintain these standards would expose OEO to charges of "welfare colonialism." The issue was settled when Congress wrote the one-third rule into the 1966 amendments to the law.

To lay a groundwork for long-term participation, however, OEO had to rely on the programs themselves. Activists in and out of the agency tried to push CAP into funding projects that would encourage political education, but these often rebounded. Good locally initiated plans being hard to come by, and many being politically risky, CAP has increasingly backed safe, popular "national-emphasis" programs like Head Start. But more subtle devices were geared to the same objective: lobbying for a voice for the poor in policy making; funding projects—such as legal aid, neighborhood centers, or consumer education—which produce skills needed for participation; and hiring and upgrading the poor in CAA operations.

Thus CAP has helped create a large cadre of disadvantaged citizens who are educated in their rights and knowledgeable about techniques of influence. In assessing the first two years of CAP's experience, William C. Selover, a close journalistic observer, found that in the forty cities he surveyed "poor people . . . have gained a foothold in running many local anti-poverty programs." Nor is the full legacy of CAP limited to the program itself: many poor people who received their initial civic education in CAAs later "graduated" to a host of action groups.

It is not easy to evaluate OEO's success in organizing the poor. Five years is a short span, and the full dividends—or deficits—of OEO's work will not be known for some time. Moreover, social scientists have yet to develop precise yardsticks for the political impact of programs. Finally, it is next to impossible to relate CAP to the broad political movements of the 1960s, including the rise and demise of the civil rights movement, the upsurge of Black Power, and the ghetto riots.

Moynihan purports to find a conjunction between community action and urban unrest—although the first riots, in Moynihan's home city of New York, flared up before the federal programs were operating. "The seven-year span that had seen the establishment of Community Action programs in over one thousand American cities," he writes, ". . . had witnessed also a rise of internal conflict and violence that in truth was without precedent in American experience." No direct causal linkage of the two facts is warranted, and one wonders what other observer would attribute so much punch to OEO.

OEO officials, despite their past reputation for glowing press agentry, are circumspect in evaluating CAP's influence for institutional change. A recent internal memorandum describing some preliminary findings concludes that "CAP is not a powerhouse, but it is not insignificant." Based on assessments by observers in forty-seven sample locales, the study found favorable developments in almost all cities; in nearly two-thirds of the cases, CAAs played some role. This evidence hardly implicates OEO in urban riots; given the limitations of publicly funded efforts, it does permit the modest conclusion that OEO has been a useful catalytic agent.

The experience of the war on poverty, or at least the community action phase of it, should not be overlooked by President Nixon's poverty planners. The basic lesson is certainly that political action is an inevitable component or consequence of all anti-poverty programs. Any attempt to aid the poor raises fundamental issues of citizenship and political influence. Localized control of programs—to the extent that the local representatives in Washington will allow it—reinforces rather than removes this political content.

A case in point is the Community Self-Determination bill. Under this scheme, target-area residents would buy shares in Community Development Corporations, which in turn would run subsidiary businesses and administer social services. The federal government would underwrite the CDCs, first by purchasing nonvoting stock, then by tax incentives and perhaps supplemental grants. The plan is complicated, and there is reason to question its economic feasibility. But, probably because it is untried, it is enormously popular—thirty-four Senators and forty-eight Representatives of both parties supported it in the 90th Congress, and President Nixon has endorsed it. Not only does the CDC idea (often linked with "black capitalism") appear to remove the politics from anti-poverty programs; it offers instead the orthodox image of the poor helping themselves by becoming capitalists. But if the CDCs are really permitted to be indigenous institutions, they will inevitably become involved in community action. They will then pose the same problems in their relations with local governments, welfare professionals and politicians as have the CAAs.

Whatever the virtues of local control, the history of CAP shows that politicians—conservative no less than liberal—do not dare to permit it. Their instincts are not necessarily wrong, but they are frequently misdirected. There is too much mythologizing of "grass-roots democracy," when in fact local control has often meant the institutionalization of local prejudices. If as a general proposition we are prepared to give social services back to local groups, are we prepared to choose between Mayor Daley and the Blackstone Rangers? And are we able to require that either, or both, meet certain standards in doing their own thing with federal money? As a supplier of capital and the protector of rights, the federal government cannot and should not remain wholly neutral; it must determine to whom the money shall go, and under what terms. Despite inevitable repercussions from all sides, tough political decisions must continue to be made about what the society can or cannot support.

Anti-poverty politics cannot be purged from anti-poverty programs. Nixon's planners, no less messianic in their own way than the Shriver warriors of 1964, seem determined to avoid discordant politics, buy off the discontents, and turn the angry rioters into middle-class capitalists. But the history of OEO shows how visionary such hopes are. By all the omens, the fighting will get a lot hotter before the war is won.

CALIFORNIA

WHY THE COLLEGES BLEW UP

KINGSLEY WIDMER

Mr. Widmer is professor of English at San Diego State College and an officer of, and spokesman for, Local 1407 of the American Federation of Teachers.

La Jolla

The campus revolts of recent months cannot be understood as just one more wave of student rebelliousness, though the world-wide movement sets some of the temper and style. Nor can the militancy in the California State Colleges system be adequately explained by ethnic minority problems, though they are real and often ignite the disruptions. Something much larger, including the revealed illegitimacy of contemporary authority, informs the rebellions. And something quite specific, including the state of California's ambitious program to give a mediocre and stratified higher education to almost everyone, raises new currents of insurrection.

Endemic discontents in the California State Colleges reached an insurrectionary stage in the fall of 1968. In November, some thousands of students at San Francisco State College went on strike. They were led by ethnic minority groups protesting the autocratic suspension of a black English instructor (who was also a Black Panther minister) and demanding an ambitious black and brown counter-racist program. In early January, some hundreds of faculty, partly organized into a union and angered by the attempted suppression of the student strike as well as by their own grievances, created a parallel strike which closed down about three-quarters of campus activity. Hundreds of professors are in the process of being fired and hundreds of students have been arrested.

A little later, an unsuccessful sympathy strike at San Jose State College resulted in the firing of twenty-eight professors. Protests, disruptions, violence and mass arrests, often organized around Afro-American and Mexican-American demands, repeatedly occurred on other campuses, one of them being San Fernando Valley State College in suburban Los Angeles. Student rallies and black ultimatums, faculty picketing and brief strikes, took place on at least nine other campuses. While protests similar in style but usually of lesser duration also occurred at universities and local junior colleges, there seem to be especially good reasons for the recent state college furors. These upheavals also uncover more general problems of American institutional containment.

NOTICE TO SUBSCRIBERS

Because of postal regulations, The Nation's mailing list must be arranged according to Zip Codes. Therefore—with any correspondence about address changes, renewals, etc.—please enclose the address label from your Nation. If you don't have a label, be sure to include your Zip number, and be sure it is correct. Without it, we cannot find your name plate.

The California State College system, with nineteen campuses, 10,000 professors and more than 200,000 students, has swollen into one of the largest academic bureaucracies in the world. Grubby sibling of the prestigious University of California (which has nine campuses, half the total enrollment, but about two and a half times as much money per student), the state colleges generously exist to provide free academic preparation for much of the lower-middle class. With a mixture of good intentions, social blindness and ambitious political manipulation, California established in the early 1960s a Master Plan of Higher Education which structured social class differences, and hence bigotry and other repressions, into a three-tiered system of public academic institutions. Before that, the University of California had accepted students from the arbitrarily defined "top one-third" of native high school graduates. But the rapid expansion of the technocratic and status education provided by the university was felt by many powerful people to be both expensive and vaguely threatening.

The university, with self-interested encouragement from private higher education and other tax-fearful and prudent groups, compromised its expansion in exchange for buttery treatment. Its cream became the top 12.5 per cent, the milky remainder of the top third being poured into the state colleges, those incoherent jumbles of semi-liberal arts programs, trade training centers and former "normal schools." This autocratic but inefficient system was intended to provide white middle-class education at less than half the per-student university expense to the state. And even the underclasses were to receive benevolent, if cut-rate, academic inculcation. The social and cultural minorities, who largely and necessarily fall within the "lower two-thirds" of graduates from the middle class and competitive and authoritarian high schools, were to be skimmed into the lowest tier—those fancied-up super high schools, the local two-year "community colleges." But something started curdling.

By a strange but usually unquestioned logic, the California Master Plan not only re-enforced social and racial class differences but provided the least funding and concern for those students and social groups who needed the most. Effort and quality in higher education were roughly proportionate to privilege in the society, not to need and potential. Resentment, frequently displaced against "trouble-making" students and professors, became widespread. Investigations were launched, appropriations for higher education cut, bond issues for university and college expansion defeated: bumbling rant against the campuses became stock political oratory. Actually, the stratified system operates confusedly, which may be its major virtue. As I learned by teaching at both the main campus of the university and at one of the largest of the state colleges (a procedure usually forbidden in California by an elaborate educational snobbery), much of the most incompetent teaching and nastiest anti-intellectual bureaucratization is to be found in the university. Nevertheless, many of the negative effects of class-stratified education continue to be pervasive.

At present, they bear most heavily on the state colleges, which have not only been legislated into second-rate education but also seem most vulnerable to economic reprisal and ideological attack by pressure groups and state officials. Though rightists also assault the university, it retains some considerable autonomy because of its traditional status and its service to, and partial funding by, the national technostructure and the military. The junior colleges are under local control and retain some petty autonomy, though hardly anyone takes them seriously as more than custodial institutions. The state colleges carry on the main work of technical training and indoctrination for submissive service in the middle ranges of corporate and state hierarchies. Thus the righteous control.

To those who know them, California's State Colleges seem not as bad as they should, and might well, be. Yet being neither quite academic halls nor entirely custodial playpens, their half-benevolent confusions encourage dissatisfaction rather than gratitude. In the state colleges, mediocrity is the end as well as the rule. A mean and muddled bureaucracy, chronically short of everything from mimeograph paper to auditoriums, and constitutionally unable to treat professors and students in the university style for which they yearn (registration is always a hassle, sabbaticals are rare, programming is uncertain, procedure is usually slow and petty), manages in the end to irritate everyone.

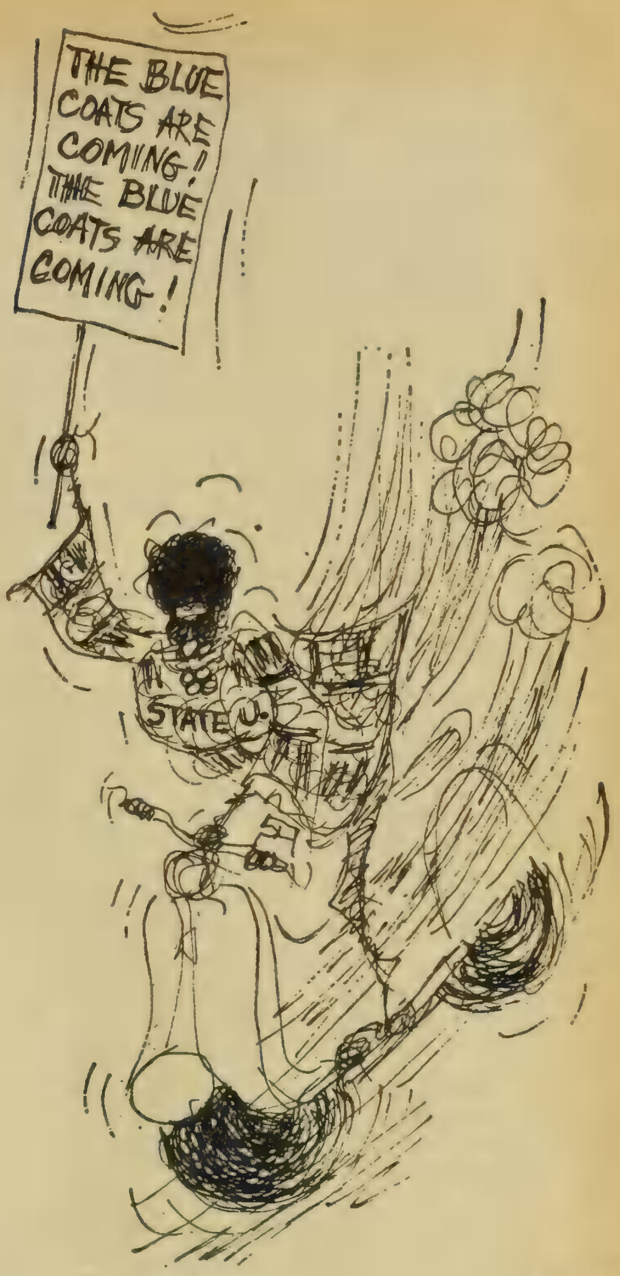
And now the minorities are the most irritated of all. Newly self-conscious black and brown students constitute disproportionately small numbers in the state colleges. For example, before the master plan took effect, San Francisco State apparently enrolled about 11 per cent ethnic minority students, which was somewhat below the community proportion. Now it enrolls about 3 per cent. The blacks and browns recognize the structural bigotry in institutions, which don't merit much respect anyway; and so they angrily demand change and more change.

The intellectual faculty, which takes a similar stand, is another small minority. These heterogeneous colleges carry heavy ballast against internal reform, including a large anti-intellectual emphasis upon schools of education, business administration, industrial arts and other sub-academic services which, in programs and faculty and students, encourage protective imitation of universities of a generation ago and a fearful academic conservatism. The state colleges also systematically perpetuate resistance to change by recruiting faculty only at the bottom, and by a civil service stylization (minus legal tenure). Because of inefficiency and a very rapid expansion, however, the colleges failed to screen out an intellectual minority which now germinates discontent. One can almost sympathize with the super janitors who run the colleges: knowing that the system intentionally excluded intellectual ferment and social experimentation and academic quality, they are perplexed as to what the dissident faculty and students are doing within their institutions. In the state colleges, as so often in America, intermittent freedom and quality result not from official purpose and order but from inefficiencies and contradictions.

In the early sixties, the minority faculty in the state colleges slowly started to unionize. They now constitute a College Council of the American Federation of Teachers (AFL-CIO) with sixteen locals and a membership a bit less than 20 per cent of the system's faculty. Committed to activism in deliberate contrast to the ineffectively genteel American Association of University Professors, to the servile state employee organizations, and to the pedantic professional associations, the union deviates considerably from usual professorial attitudes. The membership, rather weighted with the younger and often more intellectually active faculty in the social sciences and humanities, certainly does not reflect the stock personnel of the system. Now, in two colleges (and threatening in several others), the unionized professors have done the really exceptional and gone on strike.

Striking college professors seem to arouse even more discomfort in the citizenry than striking police and priests. To the stolid, including a majority of colleagues, dissident professors may be indulged in their oddities of intellectual criticism and moral gesture only if they do not flaunt them in the everyday world. It is strange, for a picket line of professors shuts down very little. Much of the better education at striking San Francisco State continued outside the classrooms.

At first, the union emphasized the traditional issues: salary, teaching load, leaves and, adopting the not altogether appropriate industrial model, "collective bargaining." That last was a moderate demand for the rule of law within the institutions, of mutually binding regulations mutually agreed upon, rather than the continued arbitrary rule of men (administrators, trustees and the congenitally intruding California politicians). But the extremity of events partly took over: the reduction of pay by trustee fiat in the middle of the year (senior ranks in all colleges); the censorship from the top of art exhibits and theatre productions (Long Beach State and Fullerton State); the autocratic suspension or dismissal of faculty (San Francisco State and Fresno State); and, most recently, the firing of ostensibly tenured professors for striking (San Jose State and San Francisco State). Other troubles have included the state's drastic reduction of funding in spite of overcrowding, frequent attempts at reprisals against the "liberal bias" in the colleges, and the generally authoritarian and unresponsive businessmen-trustees and bureaucrats who admit little faculty or student prerogative. Under these conditions, "collective bargaining" becomes, uncertainly, wistfully, something larger; a demand for autonomy, for self-government, for faculty-student power, for major change. Further pushed by student radicalism and its repression, the union's bread-and-butter concerns have expanded into social and political issues. Then, quite without precedent in America, the faculty strike at San Francisco State (and the grievances elsewhere) formally insists that radical student demands "must be resolved and implementation assured."



THE BLUE COATS ARE COMING! THE BLUE COATS ARE COMING!
STATE U.

Pat Fink

That stand smacks of political syndicalism, but the vagueness also indicates the unionized professor's uncertainty. The college locals somewhat embarrassedly obscure the radicalism. (For example, at San Diego State College I wrote two versions of our official—and officially ignored—grievances: one, for campus distribution, emphasized student demands and social and educational change; the other used the more narrow union jargon of "job security" and "working conditions," and was designed to elicit support from the outside and strike sanctions from the local labor council.) What claimed to be a rather traditional union of public employees took on some tones of political syndicalism, just as what had been student rebellions became more fully rationalized student-faculty insurrections. This shift has not yet occurred in other American institutions. Finally, the refusal of any negotiation by the paternalistic authorities has probably raised the collective purpose of the dissenting beyond what can be bargained for in this society.

The shrewder officials recognize that the current insurrections inherently push beyond employee grievances and youthful rebelliousness. Almost everyone in official power, even the ostensibly "liberal," resists control of the community of scholars by, as well as for, that community, and blames all problems on the blacks, the SDS militants and the now radical-intellectual seeming union. The organized blacks persist in their demands to set the standards of admission for minorities, which means redefining the educational class structure. And they insist on self-determining power over their rather synthetic ethnic studies schools and black (or brown) studies departments. The unionized professors more euphemistically demand faculty "due process," college "autonomy" and procedures which would reduce the administrators to their proper functions as hired help and the wealthy businessmen-trustees to a committee of liaison with the financing legislature. Apparently those in power sense that all these student and faculty demands might ultimately lead to communal control in the institutions, and lead to more direct democracy in the offices and factories and streets of America.

The party of order in California takes up the challenge in vehement style. Gov. Ronald Reagan regularly and righteously makes large ideological pronouncements about the campuses, avoiding the more usual American politics of accommodation by insisting that there will be "no compromise," not even any "negotiations," with the insurgent students and professors. One can easily mock Reagan's theatrical rhetoric, his cosmeticized face and mind, as when he denounces the rebels as "anarchists" and "Fascists" (in the same sentence) and declares that he will "maintain education in California" at "the point of a bayonet." However, he knows what, and whom, he serves. In the quaint diction now characteristic of American authoritarianism, Reagan repeats to great applause his slogan that "higher education is not a right but a privilege." This is social nonsense, given the current American piety about formal education (and its ritualistic necessity for jobs, social place and even personal identity), but it has the real meaning that the economically privileged shall keep full power over education and withdraw its access from the socially and politically unsubmissive. Inevitably, then, the insurrections in the colleges become part of a larger ideological struggle.

Reagan's smugly manipulative straw boss of the state colleges, Chancellor Glen Dumke, denounces the "trouble-making few faculty who cause the problems." The Governor's shrewdly clownish chief cop at San Francisco State, Acting President S. I. Hayakawa, alternates denunciations of the "handful" of striking professors who "read such magazines as . . . The Nation and encourage students in their alienation," and projective vituperation against the "Nazism" of a "little minority of revolutionary students out to destroy society." These educationist brothers in arms of the notorious State Superintendent of Public Instruction, Max Rafferty (who also sits on the State College Board of Trustees), distort the facts as well as ignore the basic issues. Disinterested estimates indicate that about 40 per cent of the 900 faculty and a probable plurality of the 18,000 students at San Francisco State provided significant support for the strike in January. However, these officials may ultimately be right in their simple political arithmetic. Insurgent professors and students run a course which probably assumes an impossible degree of support. Exacerbated circumstances at San Francisco State, including violent repression of the students' strike and the crass failure of traditional academic liberalism to show any relevance to such provocations as faculty firings, temporarily allowed militancy a major role. But the gritty realities of the state colleges and their rightist officials, and a generally hostile and misinformed public, suggest that students and faculty cannot really achieve the radicalization which the logic of their efforts requires.

Against the odds of massive police force, intransigent officials and public antagonism, insurrection requires a mystique to carry on the arduous struggle. That explains much of the style of the rebellious movements everywhere, including the pure disruptiveness and overcooked rhetoric. What continues to justify the dissidents may be seen in the very harshness of the authorities. Further sanction comes from the now evident contradiction between the rhetoric of generously offering higher education to vast numbers and the reality of arbitrarily reducing it by outmoded bookkeeping, class stratifications, ideological impositions and autocratic control and force. A half-benevolent order loses all legitimacy. While the programs and ideas of the insurrectionists often appear appallingly thin, change in itself becomes the goal. Against the prevailing meaningless power, change promises to liberate energy, to transform fatuous order, to affirm life itself. In their desperate hopefulness, the rebels may also reveal the failures of a dubious education and a dreary middle-class life style.

The hard-shelled system of bureaucratic indoctrination called higher education would like to expel its irritants, its minorities of black militants and Yippy-ized dissidents and radical intellectuals. Reaganism would probably like sooner or later to chance a showdown, betting on warped populist support by an "outraged public" and its ability to manipulate the myth of a "silent majority" opposed to all humane change. The aim would be a final reduction of such dangerously mixed systems as the California colleges and universities to tamed custodial institutions, and the freezing of large sections of society into repressive mediocrity.

But rightism may also get by with concessions to the minorities, and some further process of attrition against other dissidents and against autonomous education. The very differences of style between insurgent students and professors suggest the method for splitting, and thus containing, the protest. Surely broad conditions and consciousness for truly radical changes do not yet exist. Even very well-intentioned people express "grave doubts" that higher education provides the proper place, and that this is the proper time—is there ever one?—for the social experimentation required for the institutions to relate meaningfully to the underclasses, and to give real quality and liberation to mass higher education. An expansive higher educational system which promises much but performs by heightening the old class and caste restraints, and enforces a new mediocrity and repression, generates hardly answerable discontents. Reasonably moderate men offer few alternatives, in or out of the colleges, to an arbitrary and increasingly illegitimate social order. Insurrection in the California state college system, including political syndicalism among the faculty and the demands for a community of change among the students, points to radical possibilities. That is why it is so bitterly fought, but no one can be sanguine about the probable results.

THE NEW FEMINISTS

JO FREEMAN

Miss Freeman, a free-lance writer and photographer, is currently compiling a book of readings on the women's liberation movement.

Chicago

When the Nineteenth Amendment became part of the Constitution on August 26, 1920, the nation thought it had washed its hands of "this woman business." Almost fifty years later the granddaughters of those suffragettes are declaring that the business is unfinished. Consciousness that women are still second-class citizens has been growing at least since President Kennedy established the Commission on the Status of Women in 1961. Created at the urging of Esther Peterson of the Women's Bureau and Eleanor Roosevelt, the commission in its short life came out with several reports documenting just how thoroughly women are still denied many rights and opportunities. A citizen's advisory council and fifty state commissions continue to gather such information.

Data from the Department of Labor outline the present situation: One-third of all women work and one-third of all workers are women, but women are disproportionately concentrated in the underpaid and menial jobs. As a result, the median income of white women employed full time is lower than that of Negro men employed full time. Needless to say, the median income of black women, discriminated against for both race and sex, is lower still. This situation prevails although the median education of both groups of women is higher than that of their male counterparts. Their unemployment rate is also higher.

Even within the same occupations, the median income of women employees runs 50 to 60 per cent that of men. Only twenty-five states have laws that dictate equal pay for equal work, and these are not vigorously enforced. Lower pay for women is justified by the general belief that theirs is a luxury income, which supplements that of their husbands. Yet 35 per cent of all women of marriageable age are not married, and Department of Labor studies show that, married or not, most women who work do so from economic necessity. In fact, more than one-fifth of the 65 million women in this country, aged 16 and over, live in poverty. Ten per cent of the nation's families are headed by a woman, but 40 per cent of the families classified as poor have female heads.

The wage situation is exacerbated by the fact that forty-three states limit the number of hours a woman can work—generally to eight per day. Passed at the turn of the century in an attempt to curb sweatshop exploitation, this "protective" legislation prevents women from earning overtime pay or from promotion to jobs in which overtime is likely. As Governor Rockefeller remarked in a speech last year, the laws are "more often protective of men."

These economic facts of life have for a long time been softened by the belief that "things are getting better." But in reality, while the percentage of women in the labor force increases steadily, the gap between the incomes of full-time men and women workers has been widening at the rate of .5 per cent a year for at least fifteen years.

According to Mary Keyserling, former director of the Women's Bureau, "occupationally, women are relatively more disadvantaged today than they were twenty-five years ago. In 1940 they held 45 per cent of all professional and technical positions. Currently they hold only 37 per cent. This deterioration has occurred despite the increase in women's share of total employment over the same period and the rising number of women who enroll in and graduate from institutions of higher education."

For fifteen to twenty years after women were given the vote their participation in every field expanded rapidly. Then, in the late thirties and forties the reaction set in and the era of the "feminine mystique" began. This course parallels the experience of the black man after the passage of the Thirteenth and Fourteenth Amendments: Negroes enjoyed a wide expansion of opportunities during Reconstruction; then the imposition of Jim Crow laws created a new form of slavery.

And like the Negro, women have once again begun to revolt. Two major feminist organizations have formed within the last two and a half years. In 1966, the National Organization for Women (NOW) was created under the slogan, "full equality for women in truly equal partnership with men." It is a top-down structure with an office in Washington. Its some 2,500 members are primarily career women, women whose families are grown and no longer occupy most of their time, and some sympathetic men.

The second feminist group is not exactly an organization, but a loose confederation of about seventy-five "sister chapters" spread across most of the United States and Canada. It has no national structure but does mail a newsletter from Chicago. The groups attract primarily young, white, college-educated, middle-class women. Many have been involved in the various social-action projects of recent years and women in different cities, largely unknown to one another, had met quietly for months to analyze their perpetual secondary roles in what has become known as "the Movement." About a year ago they discovered one another and since then their ranks have been growing at a rapid clip.

These feminists call themselves "radical women" and call the new surge of feminism the "women's liberation movement." They object to the term "the woman question" on the ground that the only question is that of women's liberation. (For brevity, I shall refer to the groups as the Women's Liberation Front (WLF.)

According to the WLF, liberation goes far beyond gaining more rights. It is dedicated to a total restructuring of society, much as is the New Left, and is not content simply to integrate women into male-defined goals and values. And it is adamant that any new society must destroy the social definition of women as sex objects whose major function is the care and maintenance of men and their children.

The WLF bars men from membership and meetings, and in general ignores them. Like the Black Power movement, from which it draws many ideas, it feels that women must run their own show. The ban on men is also tactical, since radical women have learned that female discussions are more open and honest when there are no males about.

With a few extreme exceptions, the women are not separatists, but they do see men as agents of an exploitative society and feel that women must organize for their own liberation. As one militant put it, "Men will not liberate women; women must free themselves. They have waited too long as it is. Now the largest minority group is getting angry. Women are tired of working for everyone's liberation except their own."

When the WLF held its first national conference last fall, bringing together almost 200 women from twenty states and Canada on less than a month's notice, the first thing it did was ask the press to report none of the proceedings. Despite this scorn of publicity, the WLF has grown rapidly by taking advantage of the infrastructure that has been built up by the civil rights and student movements, the underground press and the free universities. To date it has been largely underground, but in the last few months has begun to emerge into sight. Radical women have joined with NOW members to boycott the Colgate-Palmolive company for its discriminatory employment practices; they picketed The New York Times until it "desexigated" its want ads. The WLF disrupted the Miss America contest in Atlantic City, demonstrated at a tea given by Mrs. Nixon before the inauguration, and has given headaches to almost all New Left organizations by refusing to continue to do the bulk of their flunky work. It was also one of the sponsors of the three-day First National Conference on Abortion Laws which began in Chicago on Valentine's Day.

One offshoot has been WITCH (Women's International Terrorist Conspiracy from Hell), a women's guerrilla theatre group which extols the "evil" qualities of women. WITCH made its first appearance last Halloween when a coven (thirteen) danced down Wall Street in full costume to hex the financiers. The stock market dropped five points the next day, and WITCH has been expanding its activities ever since. Its other major targets have been the University of Chicago Sociology Department and the Chicago Transit Authority. A national assault on the Playboy Clubs is planned.

Only a few radical women are involved in WITCH, but it exemplifies the style of the new movement. Partially because it is dealing with more subtle forms of discrimination than Jim Crow laws and partially because typical protest tactics are seen as rather shopworn, the WLF prefers flashy actions. It likes to do what it calls "violating the reality structure" by parodying the typical sex roles. More ordinary actions such as picketing are not disparaged, but the WLF leans toward what it calls "consciousness raising" activities.

A good deal of woman consciousness was raised recently in a dispute at the University of Chicago when the Sociology Department chose not to reappoint the first woman to teach under its aegis in nineteen years. The dismissal of Marlene Dixon, assistant professor of Human Development and Sociology, and an active feminist, stimulated massive protests of students who wanted to retain her and to attain student representation on faculty hiring and promotion committees. The local WLF group, WRAP (Women's Radical Action Project) was also protesting the university's general attitude toward women students. They objected to advisers who recommend marriage instead of a continued academic career, and teachers who disparage women as a group in class or who see their women students primarily as sex objects. They demanded that the more restrictive dormitory rules for women be abolished.

WRAP is the most militant of about two dozen campus groups, primarily graduate students, who have organized special seminars to study women because they found that their regular classes ignored the subject. These women have also begun to appraise their own future job prospects against the fact that positions for women with Ph.D.s are rather scarce, particularly at the major universities.

NOW has been devoting its energies, meanwhile, to several court cases and the Equal Employment Opportunities Commission. Set up to handle complaints of race discrimination, the EEOC was totally unprepared to deal with the flood of complaints of sex discrimination that ensued after Title VII of the 1964 Civil Rights Act was passed. "Sex" was put into the bill as a joke by octogenarian Rep. Howard W. Smith of Virginia, and since then that little word has gone on to plague the agency.

According to Rep. Martha W. Griffiths of Michigan, the EEOC "started out by casting disrespect and ridicule on the law." She later decided that their "wholly negative attitude toward the sex provisions of Title VII" had changed—for the worse.

After several years of pressure by NOW and other groups, the EEOC decided the women were serious and even entitled to some of the same rights which the law gave to Negroes. Although the relevant section of the Civil Rights Act had clearly prohibited discrimination in employment on the basis of an "individual's race, color, religion, sex or national origin," the EEOC had maintained that, while this meant newspapers could not segregate want ads by race, they might still do so by sex.

Last August, the commission changed its ruling and ordered newspapers to desegregate their want ads by December 1, 1968. The American Newspaper Publishers Association and the Washington Star promptly filed suit. ANPA claimed that compliance would hurt job seekers, employers and newspapers, and that "newspapers and their advertisers are unwilling to depart so radically from a successful system." The newspaper publishers lost the first round but the District Court did order the new EEOC guidelines suspended until an appeal could be decided. On January 24, the U.S. Court of Appeals vacated the stay, bringing the guidelines into effect.

Despite the court-granted delay, the New York newspapers desegregated on schedule. This was partially because of a newly passed city regulation prohibiting separate listing of want ads. In early November, Consumer Affairs Commissioner Gerard M. Weisberg mailed letters to 956 New York City employment agencies saying that their licenses would be revoked if they violated the new ordinance. In large part, however, the newspapers' compliance was due to NOW's consistent picketing of the venerable Times. To celebrate, NOW held a "thank-you" picket of the Times the day it desegregated.

These developments all indicate a growing awareness among women that they comprise the nation's largest minority (indeed, they are a majority—51 per cent of the population). The mythology that women are inferior and need to be protected by men went out with the mythology about the superiority of the "Aryan" race. But the Kinder, Küche and Kirche philosophy that it supported has not entirely receded. It has only been transformed into more sophisticated terms.

With increased prosperity, increased education, and increased freedom from unplanned pregnancies, women have been moving out of the home and into the world in greater and greater numbers. Men have welcomed them; but only if they abided in their place as assistants to men. The attitude is that of what Caroline Bird calls "the New Masculinists." They are all "for updating women's traditional role, providing their jobs don't change the lives of men."

This attitude is reflected in an occupational structure which refuses to admit more than a token number of women to major positions and almost none at all to jobs where they would have authority over men. While doing research for her book, Born Female: The High Cost of Keeping Women Down, Caroline Bird interviewed several hundred "successful" women and discovered that almost every one of them had either made it through a loophole or was significantly better qualified than the men in comparable positions. Harvard Business Review once decided to do a survey of opportunities for women as business executives. They concluded that there were hardly any. Scan the masthead of any magazine or the faculty listings of any university catalog: the higher you look, the fewer women there are.

Chemical and Engineering News made a study of chemists' salaries last fall which showed that, with seniority held constant, women with Ph.D.s made less than men with only B.A.s. James J. White recently compared all the women who graduated from law school in the last ten years with a similar group of male law graduates. With every variable he could think of controlled, the figures still showed that a year after graduation the average man earned 20 per cent more than the average woman and that ten years later he earned 200 per cent more.

The general attitude toward women is also solidly enshrined in law, which reflects the English common law tradition that "the husband and wife are as one and that one is the husband." In many states, a woman's income and property are under the control of her husband. In most states she cannot use her maiden name if her husband objects, or maintain a separate domicile for tax and voting purposes.

Study after study has shown that children are not harmed by the fact that their mothers work (that, on the contrary, they frequently benefit), but employed mothers are still made to feel that they are shirking their maternal responsibilities. Because the United States is the only industrialized nation in the world which does not provide public child-care services, women whose income is less than $1,500 must pay out most of it in baby-sitting fees.

This egregious situation has gone unnoticed by all but a few because the culture has never been particularly interested in what happened to women as a group. As Gunnar Myrdal once commented, America's values and concerns are those of the white male. In a little noted Appendix to his monumental study of the American Negro, he wrote that when a legal status had to be found for Negro slaves in the 17th century, "the nearest and most natural analogy was the status of women." Progress in the emancipation of both groups has been parallel ever since.

What has also been parallel is the attempt by society to stereotype both groups. The Masters and Johnson milestone study, Human Sexual Response (1966), shattered the foundation for the myth that women are sexually passive, but passivity, in mind as well as body, is still deemed a feminine characteristic. The social sciences have given little study to women, except to discern the ways in which they are different from men. All that has been discovered is that (1) Individual differences are greater than sex differences. (2) Almost no ability differences appear until a child enters school. They then increase with age, and seem to be more strongly correlated with child-rearing practices and social expectations than with sex.

Yet woman's only important function, for which she is "naturally" made, is held to be that of wife and mother. If she wants a career she is told to choose between that and motherhood because she cannot do both well. Men are never asked to choose between their career and fatherhood; it is assumed that they can do both. These attitudes are so pervasive that they are rarely even noticed. They are reflected in movies, fiction, advertising and popular opinion. They are now being challenged by the new feminists.

These women place no value on ascribing special advantages or handicaps to women. Similarly, they believe that men should take greater responsibility for domestic duties at home and for their children. They want to break down sexual stereotypes, so that women and men may be free to choose the extent of their participation in both domestic and economic spheres.

The major thrust of the new movement is not to prove that women are as good as men—almost. Neither is it to say that women are "different but equal," if only they'd be recognized as such. Its challenge is much more fundamental: the women's liberation movement has begun to question whether what we define as feminine and masculine has anything to do with being female or male. And it is objecting outright to the traditional dominance of male values and of men as their agents.

LETTERS (Continued from page 226)

the Department of State will cause Mr. Nixon his "seventh crisis." "Lawyers" and "pragmatists" Rogers and Richardson might prove too preoccupied with the troublesome "facts" of foreign policy in a department too unoccupied with direction and management.

Mr. Simpson's solution: fill the six remaining strategic State posts with career diplomats; dispatch these deputies to a "suitable" business graduate school; retrain them in up-to-date management concepts and techniques; and turn over U.S. foreign policy innovation, reform and management to these MBAs who emerge.

Much of Mr. Simpson's appraisal and suggestion has merit. It was just such McNamara management which gave Defense its long lead over State (as Simpson knows and fears). . . . Yet Mr. Simpson's originality must be questioned. Indeed it is his almost totally present perception which gets him in trouble. Haven't "lawyers" and "pragmatists" been the typical and not the unusual choice for top State spots? Why, save the President's penchant for crises, should this become a peculiarly Nixon problem? Furthermore, haven't Secretaries, deputies and advisers, whether lawyers, careerists or managers been trying to do just what Mr. Simpson now suggests for the last half century at least? . . .

Certainly meaningful breakthroughs might occur in the use of modern organizational tools. Surely the structures of the past need to be remade. . . . Yet can more of the same be the answer? Is management breakdown the major American diplomatic problem or is the Department's morale decay simply symptomatic of what the President himself described as the real seventh crisis, one of the spirit? . . . Perhaps Messrs. Rogers, Richardson and Simpson might, for once, lay aside the flow charts, management seminars and suggestion boxes and go to a "suitable" place, graduate school or otherwise, to be retrained in the substance not the structure, the goals not the tactics, of our foreign policy. Jerry Israel

BOOKS & THE ARTS

Berryman: Without Impudence and Vanity

HIS TOY, HIS DREAM, HIS REST. By John Berryman. Farrar, Straus & Giroux. 317 pp. $6.50.

MICHAEL GOLDMAN

Mr. Goldman is the author of First Poems. His second volume of poetry, At the Edge (both Macmillan), will appear this summer.

Wouldn't it be an excellent thing for criticism if, as I. A. Richards once remarked, we could always write as though the author were sitting beside us, listening to every inflection? It would certainly help suppress the occupational diseases of criticism, which Richards rightly named as impudence and vanity. And in the case of John Berryman's new book, it seems even more than ordinarily important that the impulse to score cheap points be recognized and resisted. Berryman's sensitivity to our perverse literary environment is so great that the impudence and vanity of its criticism and competition have become part of his mime, and with all his sparkling baggage of allusion and aggression he offers appealing targets for the impudence and vanity of others. But his aim, as I begin to see—and part of the burden of his remarkable music—is to chasten these more-than-literary afflictions, in others and in himself. The puzzles, the intellectual "content," the mandarin touchiness are all present; indeed, they advertise themselves. But as Berryman says in one of his sudden shifts of direction:

These Songs are not meant to be understood, you understand.
They are only meant to terrify & comfort.

Terrify and comfort are perhaps not the words for the characteristic effect. Stun and relieve would seem closer to what happens in this presumably final installment of the Dream Songs, exactly four times the length of its predecessor, 77 Dream Songs. There is less juice and crazy glee in the new poems, more steel and somberness. But like the first seventy-seven, the songs of His Toy, His Dream, His Rest are distinguished by Berryman's unique cadence and idiom, a manic goosing into music not only of the demotic but of all the fossil dialects of poetry in English as well as the hopped-up jargons of American life. What is striking in the new book is the extent to which he can invest this music with a degree of grim repose.

The book's narrative framework seems to provide little aside from momentum and accessibility. The poems follow a loosely chronological sequence in the life of Henry, their protagonist. Henry is inexplicably dead in the opening section (all its songs are marked Op. posth.). Later he is resurrected, suffers from a broken arm as well as the more usual disturbances of the academic year, and travels off to Ireland on a grant. A more important element in the book is the presence of certain obstinately recurring themes: Death, Fame and Love. These are classical enough, and Berryman, as one would expect, is brilliantly responsive to their provenance in the lyric tradition; but they are nakedly personal, too, even obsessive. The reader deserves at least one song in full:

Draw on your resources. Draw on your resources.
It's not clear if I can. In a French town
Autun
where the grand cathedral stands, Henry's mental gown amazed the residents, and his mental forces exceeded Verdun.

But he was not up to that ancient sculpture cold and uneasy witnessed he them scenes:
the figures put him down.
The figures figure what the lost soul means, so long ago, in an acre of sepulture insisting on the verb, not the noun.

I wanted so to go to the Windward Islands, and I will never make it, stuck in this French vaulting cathedral thought.
We've been here long, long, lowlands & highlands but not as they have. Draw on your mere mensch for the benefits we sought.

Berryman does not so much meditate his themes or exhibit them as he is stricken with them. They worry him, seize him, flay him, come over him like thirst. As in the 77 Dream Songs but more insistently, the artist is seen as someone who manages loveliness while suffering degrading tortures:

. . . a broken heart
but not as bad as Schubert's:
that went beyond the possible: that was like a man dragged by his balls, singing aloud 'Oh yes' while to his anguish glance the architecture differs: he's getting on, the tops of buildings change, like a mad dance,
the Piazza Navona

recovers its calm after he went through

Death makes its appearance not only in Henry's foretaste but, later, as the death of friends, especially Delmore Schwartz and Randall Jarrell. There is, too, the death by suicide of Henry's father, which receives its full statement in one of the group of extraordinary songs with which the book concludes.

The theme of Fame, as I have called it, is perhaps the most crucial for grasping the tone and method of the work. Fame appears at times in its traditional monumental bronze form, the immortality of poets, but much more often as a typically contemporary and typically American anxiety, a nervous, often mean concern with the phenomena of making it. I'm not convinced that the confessional mode is necessarily the one in which I would most like to see Berryman develop. A poet's self is not always as good or as interesting as his poetry. That is one reason why poetry is written. Still, many of the personal details that most irritated me when I began to read these songs—the fame-dropping, the references to literary prizes, the self-advertising humilities—now strike me as perfectly gauged to the cultural and emotional atmosphere Berryman evokes.

The American-style yearning for eminence, though it is certainly not limited to our country, is something unique to our times. The desire of a serious artist to win a National Book Award or to be on the cover of Time (or The Village Voice) is a far cry from the spur that the clear spirit doth raise. It is a cheat and a humiliation. What it reflects, of course, is a familiar and appalling doubt as to one's identity, and the reliance on publicity's mechanical methods only heightens the anxiety:

I say the paralyzed fear lest one's not one is back with us forever, worsts & bests spring for the public, faded.

Berryman is talking about poets here, but the fear is universal. Shakiness, the lack of sustaining self-confidence, is the mark of the age, and Berryman has been in tune with it since he published "The Nervous Songs" a couple of years ago.

Love, in this volume, is sometimes the aftertaste of past affairs, sometimes the relieving loyalty of certain good women and friends, and most of all the sustaining love of wife and child. The last few poems bring all the themes of the book together with great skill and force, and it is altogether fitting that the final line refers us to "my heavy daughter"—the adjective receiving from its context an equal suggestion of innocent growth and of progress into the sorrows of the world.

The Henry of His Toy, His Dream, His Rest is reborn as a solicitous father contemplating the wreck of pleasure and hope and comfort—the toy, the dream and the rest all broken by time and grasped at in love and poetry. His daughter restores these elements of happiness, but in this respect she is like the season of the year in which the book concludes:

> Fall comes to us as a prize > to rouse us toward our fate.

These lines are also from the final song, and are not only perfect in themselves but resonate profoundly with what the book has shown us of love, fame and death.

The book is big. As I read it, I kept thinking, "There is either too much of this or too little of me." And though I now think that there are things in it I have not yet learned to hear, I think, too, that some of the longeurs and inconsequences I still detect are real. In his use of long form here, Berryman strikes me as more like Pound or Crane, who turned to length as a way to accommodate—or overcome—a tendency to incoherence, than like Eliot or Williams, whose large structures are poems in themselves, natural and rewarding patterns of feeling. But to go on like this, in the face of the book's achievement, is impudence and vanity indeed. In the Dream Songs, Berryman has managed to be himself as only extraordinary resourcefulness allows a poet to be himself. More important, he has surprised us in our condition; he has even at moments succeeded in singing aloud "Oh yes;" he has given us startling and memorable poetry.

On March: Time to Take Stock

JOSEPHINE W. JOHNSON

Miss Johnson's first novel, Now in November, was written in 1934, and awarded a Pulitzer Prize. The essay below, "March," is a section of her most recent work, The Inland Island, a "nature book" which describes the detailed changes, month by month, for the twelve months of the year, as observed by the author on her farm in Ohio. It will be published this month by Simon & Schuster.

The hear-hear of the cardinals in the cold is an icy sound. Knuckles on glass. It will sound different in April. The great wicker cage of the forsythia bush, which covers thirty feet now, is turning yellow. It has moved outward from a moderate bush to this wild tangle—as the banyan tree expands—up and then down, to root in an ever-widening circle of curved earth-seeking arches and wild, unrooted shoots. A beautiful mess, a witch's hair. An open cage, through which the birds pour all day long, or sit in sullen lumps to feel the morning sun. Rabbits and opossum move along its floor; it is the quails' way station in their endless circling of the land—a line of bright, speckled globes, brown heads, they run into this wild witch shelter. The hawk beats silently away. The voices of the quail are strange and sweet. A cat pounced on one female in the flock, and she carried a grey ragged patch directly in the center of her back where all the neat, exquisite feathers had been torn away. She was not crippled, but the purplish skin was bare for a long time, circled with grey down.

The hill edge is rimmed with daffodil shoots, falsely called forth, betrayed by snow and ice. Yellow-sheathed buds surviving grimly. This is a new month because a little bunch of squares on the calendar says so. Once it was the year's beginning. The Saxons called it Hlydmonath, loud and stormy month. Around and around the seasons go, and every year the gaping mouth of March, the windy month that breaks the season open. Mars, god of war, lengthening month, and out of this month flow lengthening days, wind, leaves, and war, torn crows and promises. O promises.

There are brick-red elm buds against the sky. The far hills appear lavender instead of grey. Or do I imagine this because I turned the calender page over? Month of the bloodstone, that strange stone of polished plasma, green with red spots, those drops that represent the blood of Christ in our mythology of gems.

How long can I go on pretending the world is not changed beyond recognition? The blood from that one nation which we ravage flows all over the world. It flows into my mind night and day. Blood, despair and rage. It's not frozen into a stone. It's living blood and it's turning black, not red.

The traditional March winds have been around for several months, but now they come again, leaf lifting, tree shaking. It is terrifying to see a huge tree move and shake clear of its roots. Or does it only seem to move? The branches whip and bend, they strain, and the roar of the wind strikes terror to our hearts and we think the tree has moved from bud to root. The wind is glorious and pagan. It blows the dust of our lives a thousand miles. We read the dust. If there's a deadly message in it, that's for us to know. The wind comes bearing things with it, lifting up, sweeping on. The great invisible river that has no need of knowledge of us.

. . . The wind's an enemy, too. Except the joy of hiding from it, finding a hollow haven in the leeward side of a ravine. It seldom turns corners. Like the ancient Chinese ghosts, it must flow straight ahead. Weak, furry creatures watch from holes. Birds flatten against the bark. The crow locks his knees. One doesn't find the small perching birds in heaps like tumbleweeds, so they survive somehow. Shoulder up in the heart of the prickly cedar. Cover their eyes with their wings or hole down in their feathers, flatten their crests. The leaves, not mashed by ice and heavy snow, break up, turn on end. Dry leaves start awkwardly on brief journeys, wild risings, brown and ghostly dispersions to a traveling nowhere and a huddling under the thorns.

* * *

The quail come through the snow, which is steady and slanted, not aimless; thoughtful, as in slower snows. The quail rouse up the leaves, make disorderly beds. The snow covers them. The grass sticks up green hairs. The daffodils stick up, their pale heads watery and discouraged. The delicate cold petals of forsythia open in the house. A triumph. A success. It makes one feel among the great gardeners at last. Didn't rot; didn't slump; didn't wait until its brethren outside were also in full bloom. These frosty fingers I regard with awe again.

The near trees are stark black. The far trees a net of white webs, the far hills grey. Now the snow shifts its pattern. The steady slant turns to a spiral. The flakes seem larger, rounder. Some trees are turning green with lichen. Yesterday the fields were alive with flocking robins. When the robin flies down he does not flutter, he drops. When he eats, he pulls at his food, as though pulling a worm out of the ground. He lifts the leaves in his beak and tosses them aside. He jerks up the crusts of bread.

Copyright © 1969 by Josephine W. Johnson.

The forsythia cage has turned pure white. An arched net of snow. The delicate grey juncos line its inner branches. Its buds are white. It has caught and caged every flake of snow that's fallen. And under the snow run the thin gold lines of sap. The forsythia came from China and is related to the olive. Forsythia suspensa has hollow upright branches, Forsythia intermedia has arched branches, and most forsythia are hybrids of F. intermedia, which was the offshoot of F. viridissima and F. suspensa, the wild olive ancestors from Asia. Intermedia is a dull name for those great arching bridges and branches, half in heaven, half in earth. It's viridissima—virere, to be green, vire, the arrow-feathered, to achieve a rotary motion . . . vir, to turn . . . virent, freshness . . . to shoot up . . . up and turn . . . burrow down and rise again . . . virbiasses . . . being twice a man (and sississimus is Swahili for red ants—are you with us still?).

This is suspensa-viridissima that we have here, not just a squatty intermedia, studded with barn sparrows, huge brown buds on every hoop.

The snow is slowing down. A trilling comes. Some early amorous bird. The cardinals feed each other. A courting gesture. He offers her a sunflower seed. Her beak is full already. He jabs away. Eventually his loving peck is received. Usually it's better handled, better beaked, a sweet reciprocity.

He stretches lean in his courting song. His crest stretched up, his whole body thinned out as he sings, watching the female, tung tung tung . . . the strained persistence of a single note. She flies away . . .

The ground is whiter, whiter, the bark greener. The mournful sounds of the Norfolk and Western hoots up the valley. It rolls up two miles through the snow.

The quail are eating and down comes a squirrel, snow-frosted pink-rimmed eyes, icy little claws. What is the quail attitude toward the squirrel? They stop eating, they huddle together, and each and every quail turns its back toward the squirrel and stares off into the distance. He rummages about, digs up snow-covered bread, runs away. They turn around and resume their eating. A curious sight. How does he feel? He doesn't give a damn. He is long gone with his greasy bread.

It appears to be snowing birds—sparrows and juncos, tomtits and chickadees, woodpeckers and cardinals, and suddenly a robin is snowed down.

May God make the snow fall on this terrible war. Bury the armor. Cool the burned.

The year moves on toward spring. The wicker cage of the forsythia grows more yellow every day. They used to call these changeable days "the dangerous weather." Every day is dangerous now, climatewise and otherwise. For three months there have been these shiftings, these extremes.

Woke one morning to an extraordinary snow. Deep soft blanket world. Great white elephants looming everywhere. The honeysuckle and the fence a hairy mammoth. The wind releases the pine branches slowly—a long exploding tip of pine moves in a circle, like the sensitive tip of an elephant's trunk.

On the green-grey ice of the pond a caravan of camels is kneeling. Strange shapes everywhere. The garbage cans like giant popovers. Two men with guns. "We didn't see no signs." One was kneeling in the road, his gun pointed at the field's "No-Hunting" sign.

A world too beautiful, too strange for words. After awhile the sun and wind turned all the snow into something mad and messy. Suds, batter, dashed against the trees. The snow on the ground was pitted from odd falling clumps off the branches. Once a load descended like a falling bird with outstretched wings that shattered into light.

Showers of snow fell in a veil before the sun. All through the woods white birds flying and falling. And yet it was silent. Lovely and silent and blazing white.

Then, in a few days, the warming began. The invisible melting.

Spongy ground. The dry hummocks of grass squashing under foot into the snow ooze. Saw tadpoles in the brown water of the pond and, dimly, mossy encrusted crawfish crawling near the shore. The algae rose in green clumps with curious rootlike hangings, green Medusas. The ground is pitted with mouse and mole and shrew holes. It looks like a big brown cheese around the bird feeder. Bees are out; mosquitoes. Big black ants appear on the sink.

That kingfisher sound was a flicker. I should have remembered that peculiar call. It paused briefly, high in black cherry. (Was it a flicker the opossum gnawed . . . sitting preposterously calm on the flood-lighted lawn, his little nasty hands shuffling yellow feathers, spreading the wings like a fan before his face, and gnawing the bloody bones?)

Two doves flew down. Indescribable softness of their color, pink over grey; the shape of doves is maddeningly beautiful. Their feet were pink in the moss. They have tiny little heads. Their descent, awkward, nervous, twittering, is a disaster more than a descent. Their rising is labored and noisy. They are so slow only their extreme nervousness saves them. But beautiful—oh, beautiful—dove grey, dove rose, dove blue, and the exquisite lines of their stupid little heads. They drive the bluejays away.

Very warm in the woods. The big creek filthy—a greasy grey like an enormous flowing of dirty dishwater with tiny particles as from thousands of human teeth pickings.

But the second creek is pure and flowing over the stones. Sweet wet earth smell. Sat by the large granite boulder, almost green now, orange where the water edged around it. Found two silvery nests of vireos still knitted well with the moss between. No birds. No tracks. Only the leaves on the move.

NO MORE VIETNAMS?

The War and the Future of American Foreign Policy

Edited by
RICHARD M. PFEFFER

"This wholly fascinating book offers twenty-six scholars in a total-disagreement symposium on what has happened, and what will, might, or should happen, in South Vietnam, and on what lessons can be drawn from the United States' involvement there.

"The variety of subtlety of opinions is impressive. . . . Because the work so clearly expounds the reasoning behind almost every conceivable policy alternative, it is unusually helpful, as well as engrossing." —The New Yorker

Contributors include:

THEODORE DRAPER
STANLEY HOFFMANN
HENRY A. KISSINGER
HANS MORGENTHAU
EDWIN REISCHAUER
ARTHUR SCHLESINGER, JR.
ADAM YARMOLINSKY

Paper, CN154, $1.95 • Cloth, $5.95

At all bookstores

Harper & Row
1817

Leaping up, tugging at the thin frozen blanket of themselves, moving about like squirrels. Got scared by a rabbit bolting out from his shelter. Sounded louder than a gunshot.

Stroked a fallen log covered with moss as though it were a green, living thing. A cloud of yellow pollen blew from my hand. Other logs had every crack filled with the oyster-shaped fungus of Stereum versicolor, some small and greyish, upright as oysters, shoved in the cracks, and the larger spread as the tails of drumming pheasants, beautiful with copper bands, brown, grey and mossy-green bands, damp and velvety smooth to touch. Another fungus grew with them, less distinctly banded, whose underside was ridged and folded, Daedalea quercina, which means worked cunningly, and labyrinthine—after Daedalus who made the Minotaur's deep winding labyrinth. A heavy name for this crimped and greyish bit of stuff! I would like to find a Polyporus squamosus, which they say grows seven feet in circumference, forty-two pounds in weight, and all this colorful expansion in four weeks alone. Found, instead, a root so resembling the head of a goat that horns, ears and beard were clearly there, a rude yet delicate resemblance that startled.

It grows almost hot in the ravine. The air is soft and damp, a soft light breeze at times. The creek is running well. The cold water flowed through hollow cow bones on the pebbles, the air full of little white things flying. And on a rock a lively coal-black springtail brisked about. The bright-green varnished shoots of the star-of-Bethlehem came up in clumps, and the pure-white bulbs were exposed along the creek where the earth had washed away. Moss everywhere—green moss on stones, on logs, bright emerald green. The tree across the creek that slants up skyward is covered with moss now, snow all gone. The only whiteness, odd, bleached rocks stranded here and there, returning to their old shell color. And there are flat square stones, grey, ominous, chiseled with laws, like some mosaic tablet (or one could think of them as stone sandwiches instead, very old and stale).

Someone has upturned a big stone under a tree, its earth side raw and exposed. And has ripped a great vine from the tree and knocked it aside.

The stream is crossed and recrossed by fallen logs. And on one a mourning-cloak butterfly sits in the sun, slowly folding and opening his dark wings edged with cream. A red so dark it is black. A phoebe has come, but it is silent. The only sounds are the crows and the creek.

Almost invisible under the leaves, the salt-and-pepper flowers are opening with a faint honey scent. And from a fresh hole comes a puff of skunk. The scarlet cup fungus are open. Bright cardinal mouths among the leaves.

And then comes a more believable March day. Harsh, cold. The week of warmth and sun has urged everything forward in preparation for this grey descent, this icy air, this icy mist. Fold on fold, over every bud, every gold daffodil. Every premature arrival. Get them up. Freeze them out. Chill. Chill. It's some ghastly gothic joke that's played each year.

The forsythia fountain looks alive though, runs yellow in all the hoops, and all the hoops are hung with yellow drops, the unopened flowers arrested by the cold. Above them the elms are a mass of brown buds, brown lace. The redbirds are shrill, deceptively cheerful.

It's a good cold day for burning. Three thousand scraps of paper bearing things of importunity and word of man's sinning, cries for help, and stuff for sale. The very things you save accumulate until they press you down. Too much of everything. I am obsessed with the thought of starting over. Starting again with everything gone. A March thought. Fifty-seven years of accumulation. But man is not earth. He does not change to marble under pressure. Just assumes a curious shape. Living conglomerate.

> Conglomerates represent consolidated gravel, and always indicate an aqueous origin, often the delta of an ancient stream or the invasion of sea over land. Important to geologists in interpreting past events.

Well, here we stand. A mass of rounded pebbles of varying sizes cemented together. A few of boulder size, but all rounded in water and transported a great distance. Waiting to be interpreted. Blue clay, yellow clay, and some geodes, hollow and lined, surprisingly, with beautiful crystals. These lumps gathered around some hard and undissolving memory. Love, failure, hate—or that lost ice-cream soda on the streetcar ride. The refused, the ungiven, the undone. These lie inside like fossil insects, but in some no nucleus can be found. No leaf. No shell. No bone.

* * *

Now is the time for taking stock. What do we have to deal with here? Shut the door. Or put your shoulders against the wind. Stomp on stuff coming up. Hold it down. We've got to have a quiet moment here. Tides of life and tides of decay, and all more silent than the sea.

What can we learn from the past? What teach? Our experience is vinegar. Mother-of-vinegar. Mother, this strange transparent stuff. Membrane of yeast cells and bacteria, added to wine and cider to start vinegar (and also—for the record—mother is modder, is mud). How can I live in two worlds? As you have been living. Torn, divided, growing by shreds and wounds, growing by ridicule. Until one resembles the astonishing corn plant emerging from rolled and shredded newspaper. Behold the poet, the ragged and upright soul of man.

ON RESURRECTION

1.

The reason for her pride in the soup was not that it came out good but that when she started making it (even five minutes after, even ten while stirring it) she expected it to be no good and then and there knew that it was a nothing soup but then out of nothing came suddenly the good soup, she was so proud

2.

Now I have not seen her tears glisten for a long time and when the tears began rolling down her face out over the entire continent of joy I knew she was feeling again (something) and I rejoiced mingling myself among her and hands and flowers

3.

For I had filled out the death certificate and it was matter of factual and at the counter. The men were waiting and said they would take me and I checked that I had died (and had) and then I checked again (no
I had not.) I'll tell you what: we were quite simply looking for a little place to rejoice

DAVID RAY

The poets were honored men in the old days in Ireland. They had a place then. Voices of wisdom, bearers of tidings, good, bad, true, invented, newsmen and singers. We're a small bunch today. Fellow tapirs. We cannot understand each other. Gather seven hundred together in a kingdom? One hundred in a castle? I wouldn't spend the night there. But things were different then.

I had a strange thought this month in the wind and snow. A vision of the Coming—not the Second Coming, that dream of Christians, but a Coming of man from the Arctic, marching slowly down. Brown, broad, majestic. Great, flat, moonshaped face. Black eyes. A pagan man to deliver us from our bloody and binding dreams. To deliver us from our stinking wars of religion, wars of patriotism. Our wars in which we use the bodies of burned children to ward off our childish nightmares of a Communist world. Our war for democracy in which we blind, burn, starve, and cripple children so that they may vote at twenty-one.

The bud ends of box-elder twigs look like hard green roses. Green stem, green rose, tough buds. Smooth and wiry branches. Very tough. Formed like the horsetails, the ancient plants. Scarred already, and only a year alive. There is a chill wind, and the clouds are edgeless and thin.

The Weight of Tradition

THE GATE OF DARKNESS: Studies on the Leftist Literary Movement in China. By Tsi-an Hsia. University of Washington Press. 266 pp. $7.95.

NORMAN J. GALLO

Mr. Gallo has lived in the Far East for three years. He is currently writing a novel about the Far East.

There is a Chinese legend which tells of a tournament held for the purpose of determining who would win the title of the Supreme Rebel and the honors due a king. The reigning ruler, however, was of a treacherous nature and had a plan whereby he would kill off any survivors of the tournament's contests and thus remain in power. His plan centered upon a huge, massive gate which, lowered into the city wall, would block the escape of any of the tournament's warriors and thus allow them to be massacred by the imperial troops. The plot was foiled by a herculean bandit who held up the gate with his own superior strength and enabled some of the warriors to escape to safety. He did so, however, at the cost of his life. The gate was too heavy even for a man of his immense power and he was crushed to death.

This legend had lasting significance for Lu Hsun, probably the major Chinese writer so far in the 20th century. He wrote in 1919, the year in which the famed May 4th movement began: "Let the awakened man burden himself with the weight of tradition and shoulder up the gate of darkness. Let him give unimpeded passage to the children so that they may rush to the bright, wide-open spaces and lead happy lives henceforward as rational human beings."

To Lu Hsun, the gate of darkness was the onerous traditions of China's infinite past. He exerted a great effort and literally gave all of himself to holding up that immense barrier. Upon his death in 1936 it was remarked that: "When the Chinese Communist Party was greatly handicapped by lack of funds, Lu Hsun more than once made donations and loans from what he laboriously earned by his writing. When some comrades of the Chinese Communist Party were being hunted by the reactionary police force, Lu Hsun defied all danger to secure the safety of these revolutionary fighters."

Mao Tse-tung himself has said: "Lu Hsun was the greatest and the most militant standard-bearer . . . the most loyal and most zealous hero who stormed and broke up the enemy's front. . . ."

This is only one of this collection's revealing vignettes of the leftist literary movement in China from 1919 to 1942 provided by Tsi-an Hsia, a literary scholar and writer who died in February, 1965. Hsia, a former teacher and professor both in mainland China and Taiwan as well as in the United States, gives an accurate account of those twenty-three stormy and eventful years in a series of six essays.

Two of the essays deal with Lu Hsun, one depicting his struggles with the forces of darkness, the other a record of his relationship with the League of Leftist Writers. Hsia feels that the gate of darkness represented for Lu Hsun not only Chinese tradition but also death and despair. The League of Leftist Writers, "an organization of revolutionaries" formed in 1930 and dissolved six years later, was engaged in the creation of proletarian art and "dedicated to class struggle." Its members took part in the Chinese civil war "on the literary, artistic, ideological fronts," and "had more than diversionary effects on the outcome of what turned out to be the most important struggle for power in modern China."

Another essay deals with the young Chinese writer, Ch'ü Ch'iu-po, who was executed by the Kuomintang in 1935 at the age of 36. A poet as well as a journalist, he left China for Russia in 1920. Despite intense homesickness and tuberculosis, he became an accomplished Russian linguist. He was one of the rare individuals who used his fluency in both languages to teach the first generation of Chinese students as they arrived at the new University of Toilers in Moscow.

Thus Ch'ü joined the Communist Party while he was in Russia and took an active part in the Chinese Communist Party's struggles upon his return to China two years later. He enjoyed a cordial relationship with Mao Tse-tung and sacrificed both his health and, ultimately, his life for the party.

Chiang Kuang-tz'u seems to have been a very different type of poet and individual. "A writer of mediocre ability," he requested permission to resign from the party in 1930, but was expelled instead. He died the next year from illness at the age of 30. Chiang looked upon himself as the Byron of China and felt he could contribute more to the party as a writer than as an active revolutionary. Despite his expulsion, his name was rehabilitated in 1949 and his remains were later reburied in a ceremony headed by Ch'en Yi, then Mayor of Shanghai and now Foreign Minister.

A most interesting section of Hsia's work is entitled: "Enigma of the Five Martyrs," an account of the execution of five young Chinese writers killed by the Kuomintang on the night of February 7, 1931. Of the five, one was a young woman, and their ages ranged from 22 to 29 years.

"One of the few substantial achievements of television is that it has been responsible for these essays."—NAT HENTOFF

Living-Room War

by MICHAEL J. ARLEN

"Michael Arlen writes like a water-bug skates and his commentaries, ostensibly on television, are in truth among the best prose poems being written on life, love, war, and the state of the nation."—JOHN UPDIKE

$5.95 · VIKING

Hsia suggests that the five were caught in an intraparty power struggle and that they were betrayed to Chiang Kai-shek's forces by a member of a rival faction. But as the author points out, the full truth will probably never be known.

A statement he makes about the Chinese youth of that turbulent time hits a nerve in the United States today:

"If the importance of an event is to be judged by its consequences, then the handful of young people, who broke away from their families and lovers to participate in street demonstrations foredoomed to failure, were harbingers of bigger events to come. It was young intellectuals . . . who kept replenishing the ranks of revolutionaries. It was they who carried on and spread the revolution in its most difficult time."

Memory and Revelation

LEGENDS OF OUR TIME. By Elie Wiesel. Holt, Rinehart & Winston. 197 pp. $5.95.

LAURENCE GOLDSTEIN

Mr. Goldstein is on the staff of N.B.C. News. He is also a free-lance book critic and film maker.

For Elie Wiesel memory is an instrument of revelation. Each word he uses to document the past transforms both the word and the memory into an act of faith. The writings of Elie Wiesel are a journey into the past blackened by the Nazi death camps where the charred souls of its victims possess the sum of guilt and endurance that mark the progress of man. It is a compulsive, fevered, single-minded search among the ashes for a spark that can be thrust before the silent eyes of God Himself.

Early in this book of stories and essays, Wiesel says, "For me writing is a matzeva, an invisible tombstone, erected to the memory of the dead unburied. Each word corresponds to a face, a prayer, the one needing the other so as not to sink into oblivion."

This is the substance of legend. Each episode in Wiesel's life marks a portion of a journey that has torn the provincial Jew from the confines of the shtetl and set him loose upon the world. Since the fact of his life is a triumph over the indifference of that world, his destiny is dramatically self-contained. He is both the living repository of his people's legends and the sole interpreter of their meaning.

Legends of Our Time is a celebration of the liberation of memory from horror too terrible to be recounted or dismissed. If the holocaust defies analogy, it can be confronted only by an assault of an imagination determined to humanize the bestiality, guilt and fear that have sealed it from human experience. For Wiesel "Auschwitz, by definition, is beyond the vocabulary" of those scholars and philosophers who have had the opportunity to observe the tragedy. And so, for Wiesel, memory and its compulsive, mythic extension into fantasy become probes to search out feelings that remain in the brutalized nerve endings that are the final legacy of the holocaust.

"Stretched out on a plank of wood amid a multitude of blood-covered corpses, fear frozen in his eyes, a mask of suffering on the bearded, stricken mask that was his face, my father gave back his soul at Buchenwald." From that beginning in the first story, "The Death of My Father," Wiesel moves back to his origins in the insulated and idealistic childhood world of the shtetl surrounded by Eastern Europe. The death, which impends, filters through each memory, preserving his childhood in the glow of the ovens which wait in the distance.

In "An Evening Guest" a stranger comes to Wiesel's family's household on the first night of Passover, the celebration of freedom. He is seized upon with childlike inspiration as the incarnation of the prophet Elijah who ascended heaven alive, in a chariot of fire, to go on through the centuries as the herald of deliverance. This is 1944, the last Passover when, in just a few weeks, the stranger will take that brief rail trip to a peaceful little town somewhere in Silesia, "where his fiery chariot was waiting to carry him up to the heavens." Wiesel asks, "Is this not proof enough that he was the prophet Elijah?"

And what of the world after? "The Last Return" painfully describes Wiesel's return to the town of his childhood where he and 10,000 other Jews were condemned. He remembers the silence as Jews, by the thousands, were prodded into cattle cars; and he feels the intolerable weight of that indifference when he returns. "Nothing had changed. The house was the same, the street was the same, the world was the same, God was the same. Only the Jews had disappeared." And then the final knowledge: "If the Jews were to come back, they would be driven away again." The town had never really existed for him or for the Jews. Only in the cemetery was he truly welcome; outside he was on foreign soil.

But the compulsion to return, to understand, to confront his hatred and make it as axiomatic to his values as justice and compassion drives him to revisit Germany. It doesn't work. In "An Appointment with Hate" Wiesel realizes the Germans "had started and lost the most ignominious war in history, and afterward had managed to surpass their conquerors in wealth and happiness. Above all, in complacency." Yet knowing there is no forgiveness, knowing that each Jew betrays the dead unless he houses that healthy, virile hate "for what the German personifies and for what persists in the German," Wiesel cannot forge that hatred. He quotes the Israeli humorist Ephraim Kishon: "Logic, too, went up in smoke at Auschwitz."

This ambivalence, the knowledge that irony is as much the servant of sanity as commitment, moves him to see life as a process where each experience affords a double vision "between them and myself, between the self I had left at Buchenwald and the other self that thought it was healed." The possibilities offered by this vision account for the remarkably compassionate tone of Wiesel's work. He writes with that possessive reverence for language that celebrates, as much as describes, experience. The written word becomes a powerful assertion, the triumph of life over death and indifference. To carve words, especially in a graveyard, is to love.

Wiesel's ironic vision lies at the heart of "The Wandering Jew," a brilliant fable in which the narrator meets and compulsively follows an ugly, abrasive hobo who is the repository of Jewish wisdom and Jewish endurance. The wanderer is the humanized sum of Judaism which even the holocaust has left intact. The narrator clearly sees the duality of what the man represents and he is finally "afraid to plunge once more into his legend which condemns us both, me to doubt, and him to immortality."

"An Old Acquaintance" is the darker side of Wiesel's excoriating dialogue with his past. Here memory is transformed into the drama of a victim's confrontation with his tormentor. The narrator suddenly encounters in Israel a brutal Kapo from one of the barracks in Auschwitz. He challenges him. "I was in your barracks. I used to tremble before you. You were the ally of evil, of hunger, of cruelty. I used to curse you." The man denies his identity. The narrator persists, remembering the horrors inflicted upon him. Suddenly the barracks chief turns on him, shouting in brutal German, threatening to break his bones, make him eat dirt, melting the narrator in his voice. The narrator is beyond the fear of dying or even of killing. "It is something else, something worse. I am suddenly aware of my impotence, of my defeat. I know I am going to let him go free . . . but I will never know if, face to face with the executioner, I behaved like a judge or a victim." With the barracks chief still shouting obscenities and threats, the narrator flees—grateful that "he let me go. He granted me freedom."

In his essay on the Eichmann trial he concludes that the tragedy of the Jewish victims was that "they believed themselves to be guilty, though they are not . . . they prefer, in this condemned world, not to hurl their defiance at men and their anger into the face of history, but to keep silent, to pursue the monologue which only the dead deserve to hear. Guilt was not invented at Auschwitz, it was disfigured there." And in his final "Plea for the Dead," Wiesel begs us to learn that "The lesson of the holocaust—if there is any—is that our strength is only illusory, and that in each of us is a victim who is afraid, who is cold, who is hungry. Who is ashamed."

Words carved on gravestones, legend torn from the pit where millions of broken bodies lie. This is the inheritance which Elie Wiesel brings to us. His voice claims us with its urgency. His vision lights the mystery of human endurance.

Nero Wolfe's Brand of Beer

NERO WOLFE OF WEST THIRTY-FIFTH STREET. By William S. Baring-Gould. The Viking Press. 203 pp. $5.50.

MAX BYRD

Mr. Byrd teaches English at Harvard. He is a former editor of The Harvard Crimson.

> cult: great and esp. faddish devotion; also, its object or adherents.

Nero Wolfe would hardly take it well that I thus quote from Webster's Third International Dictionary (he once burned all 25 pounds of it, page by page, in his fireplace), but no other word really describes his vast and loyal order of admirers. Drawn-to-scale plans of Wolfe's study, long hours searching in paperback book stands and out of the way libraries, a truly childish capacity for rereading—all this has set apart the adherent for thirty years or more. Now the late William S. Baring-Gould, distinguished editor of The Annotated Sherlock Holmes, has supplied the cult with what amounts to a handbook for informed appreciation, a compendium and a chronology about America's largest and most irascible detective.

It is fitting, of course, and even patriotic that an authority on Holmes should at last have looked homeward to Wolfe. Similarities between them have not gone unnoticed by scholars, and some have grumbled that Rex Stout has done little more than up date Holmes's eccentricities and translate him to New York. Such a charge, though serious, deserves to be answered, and almost the only thing I regret about this handsome volume is that Baring-Gould did not fully address himself to it. For Rex Stout has restored great sleuthing to the country that, properly speaking, discovered it. And in matters far more subtle than geography, he has Americanized the genre.

Take the original Holmes-Watson relationship, for example. As Stout himself has cunningly seen, it depends upon a major archetypal configuration. Years ago, in a speech to the fanatical Baker Street Irregulars entitled "Watson Was a Woman," Rex Stout advanced the thesis that Watson was more than a friend; that he was in fact Holmes's wife (and that her name was Irene). Whether Conan Doyle's Victorian shiftiness or perhaps his love of a mystery led him to disguise the truth, Stout does not say. But in America both Archie and Nero are assertively masculine, triumphantly so. They belong to that great American company of buddies, spiritual kin to Huck and Jim, Ishmael and Queequeg.

Indeed, it may be more precise to regard the devoted duo simply as the national type of father and son (Baring-Gould gives over a number of controversial pages to genealogy). After all, who can have failed to see the bond of trust between those two, the nearly symbiotic dependence between fat maturity and athletic youth? Who can have missed the note of wonder when Archie describes Nero at work. So small boys worship fathers. Even his occasional engaging irreverence toward Wolfe smacks of familiar adolescent rebellion.

This arrested development, so to speak, is an important part of Stout's shrewd Americanizing. More problematic is Wolfe's bourgeois, embarrassingly grasping attitude toward money. Nero Wolfe, as Baring-Gould points out in an elaborate fiscal analysis, never fails to consider publicly his bank account, and frequently charges a client $50,000 or more. Soaking the rich, of course, is something that any detective, hard-boiled or egghead, might understand. ("To be broke is not a disgrace," Wolfe once said; "it is only a catastrophe.") But the Englishman Sherlock Holmes rarely mentioned a fee and frequently served for nothing. Might not a Marxist make dark work of all this?

Jingoism aside, however, in every other respect the book conforms splendidly to the high standards of the author's earlier studies. His chronology of the definitive book on the DRAFT

LITTLE GROUPS OF NEIGHBORS:
THE SELECTIVE SERVICE SYSTEM

James W. Davis, Jr.
Kenneth M. Dolbeare

"This book is unquestionably the best piece of work that has been done on the Selective Service System. It is an objective, scholarly, factual, and to me at least, therefore devastating analysis of how a very large and very complex bureaucracy works. It separates fact from myth, and fully documents and supports every conclusion reached. As a result, the Selective Service System is made understandable, really for the first time."
BURKE MARSHALL

276pp
$5.95 Hard Bound $3.50 Paper Bound

MARKHAM publishing company
[illegible] N. Dearborn ■ Chicago 60610

Wolfe's career seems entirely accurate, and he includes much else that we have needed to know. The news, for instance, that Viking Press will shortly publish a Nero Wolfe Cook Book is most welcome. The glossary of orchids is appreciated. And the authorized floor plan of Wolfe's house is indispensable. The information that Wolfe's brand of beer is Remmers (six quarts a day) has settled a long-standing bet in at least one home. Also, an anthology of Wolfe's aphorisms and wise sayings, which might have been called "The Thoughts of Chairman Nero," is thoughtfully included. There are, I believe, two errors: Johnny Keems, not Archie, questioned Wolfe on the verb "contact"; and Purley Stebbins did not call Marko Vukcic a "chicken-chaser." But these are quibbles. The cult is grateful for such a treasury, and few members will manage to be without a copy. Satisfactory, as Wolfe might say. Most satisfactory.

Nation Book Marks

SARA BLACKBURN

THE LOVE OBJECT. By Edna O'Brien. Alfred A. Knopf. 172 pp. $4.95.

The eight stories collected here make a strong book, and a moving one. "The Love Object" is that upon which we fix our hopes and fantasies: whether lover or possession, its possibilities are always somehow more real than its actuality. In the title story, a very likeable young woman refuses to part with a lover who has become more of a pain than a pleasure simply because she's incapable of giving up the world she's built around him. In another, an aging working-class woman trapped in a bad marriage cuts off the possibility of a happy love affair with a neighbor because the new furniture around which she's fantasized their relationship turns out to be as drab as her life has been. Although Miss O'Brien writes about sex and love with an accuracy and perception that are often startling, what is most arresting about her book is its exploration of that fine, sometimes invisible line between hope and obsession.

NOG. By Rudolph Wurlitzer. Random House. 164 pp. $4.95.

"I have received no instructions. I will just lie here. . . . I can inhabit and furnish this space so that travelers will have a refuge, on the way to the bathroom or the way back from the bathroom." No one usually notices whether a writer imitates someone else's style unless it doesn't work. Mr. Wurlitzer's hero is a young and American version of a Beckett hero; the problem is that where Beckett's heroes, for all their apparent catatonia, are always saner and more brilliant than the mad society which has produced them, Nog's hero is more a boring nut who can't cope. Even though his afflictions arouse proper sympathy, reading about his paralyzed adventures across America is itself paralyzing. Mr. Wurlitzer is a serious writer with important concerns, and there are some brilliant passages in his novel, but only the most devoted reader will be able to struggle through the anesthetic quality of the rest to get from one reward to another.

HEADS. By Edward Stewart. The Macmillan Company. 224 pp. $4.95.

Breeze, of the New York City police, is called in to investigate what grows into a series of crazy murders: the pattern is that the victims, all of whom are heads of various institutions, get their heads chopped off by apparently different murderers. What the victims have in common is their association, twenty years earlier, with an Eli College musical, but that's only the beginning, and there are two separate endings. The mysterious rabbi of Temple Beth Rico (in a changing neighborhood); a shallow, alcoholic and lovable public relations man; a sex-loving, soon-to-be-decapitated priest, and a groovy Bengali girl who may be the murderer—or one of them—are only a few of the characters in this fine, funny book which swipes at everything from Hitchcock and the police to professional virgins and detective novels, and never misses. Mr. Stewart, who wrote Orpheus on Top, isn't simply a skilled satirist but a very superior novelist.

THE WOMAN DESTROYED. By Simone de Beauvoir. Translated from the French by Patrick O'Brian. G. P. Putnam's Sons. 254 pp. $5.95.

Mlle. de Beauvoir has been accused of being a humorless tattletale with maddeningly total recall, but few contemporary writers have so generously exposed their own lives for our inspection and instruction. It is difficult to believe that she has now reached 60, and just as difficult to dissociate her current "work of fiction" from that fact. The Woman Destroyed consists of three separate novellas about women who are variously unable to bear growing older, and who destroy themselves by their inability to change as the lives around them do. In the most successful, an intelligent but empty middle-class woman becomes so distraught over her husband's affair with a younger woman that she descends into a literal orgy of self-contempt and, almost, self-obliteration. All three tales are highly melodramatic, but the quality of the experiences they record, and the stern and wise perspective of their author, will make them of interest to a wide audience.

THE HUSBAND. By Sol Stein. Coward-McCann. 288 pp. $5.95.

The proposition that to divorce your wife and marry your mistress is the honest thing to do may have a lot going for it, but not in this novel. Once his ad-man hero is gotten out of his dead marriage (with much breast beating) and into the arms of the woman he really loves, Mr. Stein spends the rest of his book tch-tching at other people's sexual hang-ups. His highly moral hero, Peter Carmody, is shocked and repelled when his voyeuristic boss fires him because Peter virtuously refuses to be blackmailed into participating in his sexual machinations; but he is grateful when the same boss generously hires him back again after Peter's almost successful suicide attempt. It all ends happily with a brilliant campaign for a beer account, a steep divorce settlement, and visitation rights. This is a genuinely dirty book, an observation which has nothing to do with the frequency of its sex scenes.

The Nation

BOOK SERVICE

Offers the following at a discount:

☐ VIETNAM FOLLY by Sen. Ernest Gruening and Herbert W. Beaser (National Press, $8.95) $7.15

☐ FRIENDSHIP AND FRATRICIDE by Meyer A. Zeligs (Viking, $8.95) $7.15

☐ THE GOODBYE LAND by Jose Yglesias (Pantheon, $4.95) .... [illegible]

Remittance accompanying orders should be made payable to THE NATION, 333 6th Ave., N.Y. 10014

Readers can avail themselves of our regular offer to send them any book (except paperbacks), published in the U.S. at the retail price post-free. When ordering, please give title, author and publisher.

2-24-69

THEATRE/Harold Clurman

The only new play which has genuinely interested me for some time is Lonne Elder's Ceremonies in Dark Old Men, as given by the Negro Ensemble Company. When I say "play" I refer to the whole phenomenon of stage presentation: "words" in the "music" of an acting team perceived as a single experience. (Tango, in contrast, contains a vital text damaged by inadequate acting.) With Ceremonies in Dark Old Men I did not think to evaluate any of its parts (script, acting, setting, direction) separately. That is theatre. With Elder's play the Negro Ensemble has achieved its own proper pitch.

One may note some repetitiousness in the text and there were overfacile strokes for comedy effect. The total impression, however, is without blemish. Even the crudities in the play's texture are of a kind which appear organic with the material, part of its reality.

There is no special pleading: it proclaims no thesis, espouses no cause, appeals for no largess. Ceremonies is a family play whose characters are foolish, fallible, sweet, stupid, lovable, always understandable folk. They are richly human and as such not easily subject to petty compromise in humdrum jobs at paltry wages.

Russell Parker was a pop dancer till one day he no longer had the strength. He became a barber, but without any aptitude for the work, earned little in his Harlem shop and allowed his faithful wife to support him till she died of the burden. Their daughter took over her mother's task; now she supports her father who spends most of his time playing checkers with a kindly friend and recounting tall tales to the delight of his two sons, who also find indolence more convenient than work. One day the hard-driven girl, fed up with the situation, announces that either they get jobs or she will refuse to contribute her earnings to their further maintenance. Crisis!

The younger brother has already begun to amuse himself by larceny; the older one has hit upon a scheme suggested by a local racketeer, Blue Haven. Since the young idler has a talent for making bootleg whisky on the premises, they will arrange to convert the barber shop into a speak-easy. Parker balks at the proposal but, faced with the alternative humiliation of finding work "downtown," agrees to the plan.

It all ends disastrously, though the play cannot be said to have an "end." We know at the last fade-out only that the family will abandon their illegal trade after (but not because) the young brother has been killed during a robbery which is one of the activities into which he had been led by Blue Haven.

None of this gives any idea of the humor, the oblique pathos, the unsentimental pain—affecting the racketeer himself—with which the story is told. If the play were to be summarized in a bald reduction of its theme, it might be stated as an account of how poverty and other wretched circumstances in the lives of a black family force them into a tragic mess, for which there is no base motive, but only the wish to enjoy life, freely and fully. But such a summation lacks the savor of what I felt while observing the characters through what, despite elements of violence, are really little more than casual happenings in a poor black neighborhood. There is no sensationalism, not even a "problem"—only the warp and woof of ordinary living: funny, crazy, frightening and somehow strangely innocent, heartwarming as much as heartbreaking. The play, the first by a writer of 30, is a "little" comedy—much more telling than many that are ambitiously "significant."

What makes it altogether delightful and arresting is the unadorned, exciting, joyous and entirely devoted nature of the acting—the kind which not only makes one believe that he is there (yet happily in the theatre), but that the actors have invented their own lines, on the spur of the moment. Speech and flesh are one. It all seems so artless as to constitute the truest art.

If only one member of the cast were to be singled out, it would have to be Douglas Turner in the central role. His passion, his raciness, his vigor, his total commitment to the essence of each moment make his performance one of the memorable occasions of the year: far more expressive and useful than some of those exuberantly touted elsewhere in town. There are few more hilarious scenes in recent days than the one in which Turner, as Parker, tells of his travail on a chain gang—a yarn which ain't necessarily so but which he makes more vividly to the point than truth itself.

It would be a critical misdemeanor to pass over Arthur French, Parker's companion in fun, games and sorrow; he is inescapably winning. And William Jay as the older son, David Downing as the younger, Rosalind Cash as their doughty sister, Samual Blue, Jr., as the racketeer, and sexy Judyann Jonsson as Parker's fling all contribute more than honorably to the evening's success.

After Ceremonies, I find little I wish to say about the rest of the things I've seen since. Canterbury Tales, a London hit, with book by Martin Starkie and Nevill Coghill, with lyrics by Coghill and music by Richard Hill and John Hawkins, conveys the mildest sort of ribaldry (Eugene O'Neill Theatre).

Speaking subjectively, I submit that it is the kind of show to which you should take your nice aunt—if she is a rather dull woman. More objectively, I note that George Rose, craftily and amusingly made up as a rakish medieval burgher, provides a pleasant moment in a semi-Calypso song and dance called "If She Has Never Loved Before," that the production is visually neat and that the entire company performs agreeably. But though I am still hung up on the theatre (with some difficulty in New York nowadays), I prefer Chaucer on the printed page.

I must also append a word on Dear World (Mark Hellinger Theatre) to pay tribute to Angela Lansbury, an actress who has humor, feminine grace, "class" and a talent for characterization with a down-to-earth heartiness. She sings, dances: a consummate trouper. As to the show itself—based on Giraudoux's The Madwoman of Chaillot, one of the finest comedies written since 1945—I am tempted to exclaim with the perpetually ravished Candy, "Good grief!" Why don't the uncouth keep their hands off Countess Aurelia, that delightfully daft old lady?

Black Scare

The Racist Response to Emancipation and Reconstruction

Forrest G. Wood

This is an account of the first "white backlash" in American history. It describes the responses of white racists to emancipation and reconstruction: their misuse of "science" and the Bible; their libidinous fantasies; their fears of "Negro domination" and "mongrelism." Thus, this is a book about white men, not Negroes, and as a description of the origins and early applications of American racism it is highly relevant to the present.

275 pages Illustrations [illegible]

At your Bookseller

UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA PRESS

Berkeley · Los Angeles · New York

FILMS / Robert Hatch

Watching Martyrs of Love by the young Czechoslovak, Jan Nemec (Diamonds of the Night, An Account of the Party and the Guests), it occurred to me that one reason for the extremism, hysteria and cunning presentation of much contemporary fiction is a generalized fear that human beings are inherently boring. Put a man out on a limb or into the wrong bed, give him a formidable tic or a surrealistic assignment, and he may provide a flicker of interest in the museum's hall of mammals. But man in his normal habitat, it seems to be thought, is a dull dog.

That it is not so, Mr. Nemec is on hand to testify. He offers in his current film three episodes, independent but related by theme and temper, in which three unimportant—in at least two of the cases, you might say ineffective—people daydream somewhat more adequate lives for themselves. A young clerk is not making it with the more swinging members of his age group; a housemaid finds that her Prince Charming is curiously delayed; an orphan, no longer quite young, is oppressed by the intuition that his very real charm does not win him any very real friends.

The dreams, and therefore the narratives move more by impulse than by logic. Yet they are in no sense mystifying, because the viewer is given a double orientation. In the first place, he will find in his own longings the substance, if not the furnishings, of these reveries; we would all eat the rich, obvious fruit if we could reach it. And in the second place, if his experience of the screen goes back any distance at all, the viewer will recognize that Nemec is speaking a simple and direct filmic language which has now been somewhat dated by metaphoric editing and camera exploitation. Nemec has himself said that a possible title for the picture would have been "A Tribute to the Cinematograph," and he has added that it is really a silent film with accompaniment. Martyrs of Love will not lead you astray—or let you down—if you keep your eyes on it and do not try to guess. The picture is about what it shows, not about something quite other which you are intended to supply from your guilty knowledge of the intolerable. One forgets how tangible the movies used to be—Douglas Fairbanks laughing from behind a saber, the rackety staircases of René Clair.

And the spirit that suffuses Martyrs of Love is nothing more unusual than an affection for men and women. You can say much the same of War and Peace—it is all a matter of what discrimination you bring to the love. I won't burden Nemec with allegations of genius, but his powers of savoring the human species, of being compassionate without turning sentimental, of being racy without turning rank, of laughing on the side of folly and recognizing that illusion is preferable to despair—his powers of thus participating in the available richness of mundane experience are sufficient for his needs as an artist. And sufficient to put us in his debt.

I switch from fantasy to Me and My Brother, which is reality disturbingly unreal. Peter Orlovsky, poet and companion of Allen Ginsberg, has a brother, Julius, who is mentally disturbed ("catatonic schizophrenia" seems to be the term; the effect is that he fails to respond). Julius has been for some time in an institution. The treatment there has not helped him, and Peter feels, with some justification, that he is too nice a man to be kept locked up. He joins the Ginsberg-Orlovsky floating family.

There is good logic to this: these poet-prophets are trying to fight their way out of the mortally complex present into an older communal simplicity, and simple societies have always coped with their own naturals. Indeed, they have often been disposed to revere their fools, and this picture, directed by Robert Frank (Pull My Daisy), but I suspect controlled by Ginsberg and Orlovsky, seems to be nudging all the while at the notion that Julius has found the truth we all seek. It won't wash; Ginsberg and company may be genuinely simple but they are not innocent and, being themselves possessed of excellent brains in good condition, they value them. They treat Julius with a rough, impatient affection that is no doubt a great deal better for him than institutional routine, but to pretend that they envy him his state is both unnecessary and unseemly.

I found that suggestion estranging, and I also found estranging Frank's highly mannered approach to the material. He seems as much interested in making all the stations of the cinematic avant-garde as in recording this engrossing situation. Thus, he offers enigmatic shifts between color and black and white, makes a film of the showing of the film (with audience reaction), features himself at work (he is young, handsome and almost excessively well-dressed), introduces scenes and personalities not evidently related to the matter at hand and looks dispassionately on deviant sexual activity. Further, he provides an actor to play Julius in scenes which Julius could presumably not manage (in such episodes he also supplies an actor for Peter), thus raising the question of how much acting the real Julius is being asked to do. I'm not objecting to acting, by Julius or anyone else in the film; only to the confusion between document and narrative. Is Julius participating—when and how much? It makes a difference.

Roscoe Lee Browne appears as a photographer. He is no doubt a friend of the company, and the underground cinema, from which this picture springs, casts largely from friendship. But Browne is also a professional actor of great force whom one immediately recognizes; his appearance—for no very important reason—breaks the verisimilitude with the question, "How did they get Browne to play a bit part?" One can understand the temptation to use him if he was around, and one can see why it should have been resisted.

Peter Orlovsky and Ginsberg project marvelously—naturally enough: after the Beatles, they are the most successful international entertainers of the day. Julius is touching, a little frightening. The whole situation is honorable; strange but somehow heartening. But you have to struggle against Frank's intrusive manipulation to keep the document in focus. Less art would have been a great deal more.

Then at the end, Julius does speak—they have put him on the far side of a window, speaking in the cold, the symbolism of that being as explicit as a blunt instrument. But he does express himself—haltingly but cogently, in a pleasant voice. What was everything that went before—some sort of game with sympathy? Frank's time indicators may be at fault here: the picture was made over many months and Julius may be coming back. That is a point which I wish they had made explicit.

The Best Way
To Get
THE NATION

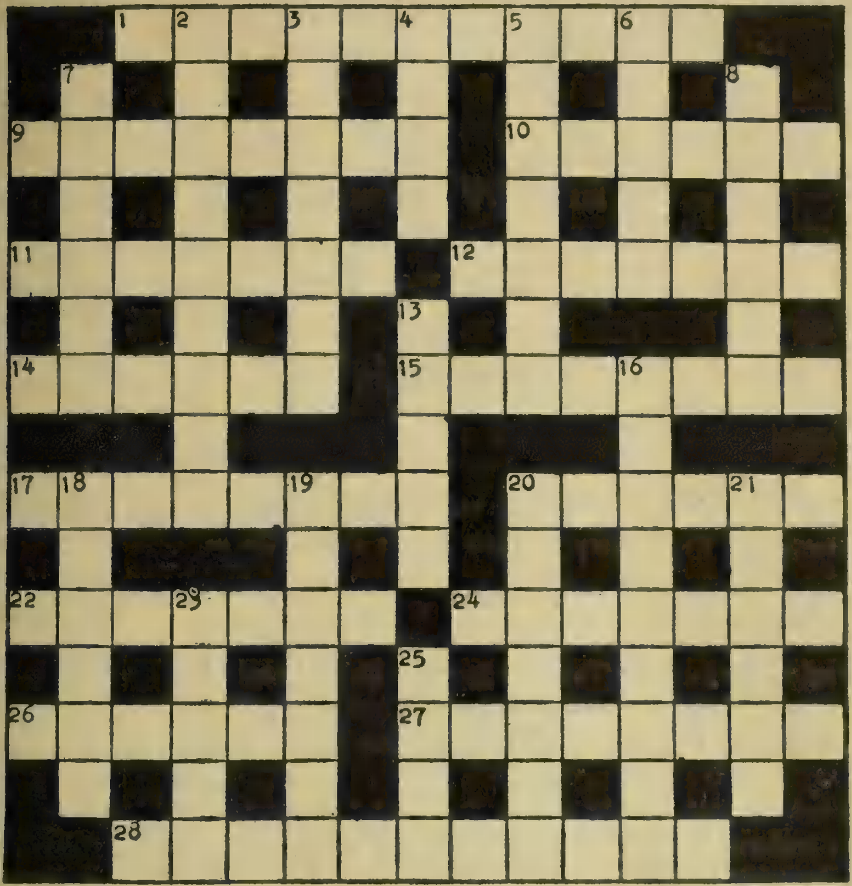
THE NATION 2-24-69
333 Sixth Ave., New York 10014
☐ One Year, $10
☐ Two Years, [illegible]
☐ 6 Months, [illegible]
☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed
(Add $1 per year postage for Canada; [illegible] foreign)
Name ....
Address ....
City ....
State .... Zip No. ......

Crossword Puzzle No. 1286

FRANK W. LEWIS



ACROSS

1 An old-time performer suggests what the more daring Go-Go Girls might be doing. (7,4)
9, 21 and 25 down Nursery rhyme report on the probable choice, if Middle East cuisine prevailed. (4,3,1,6,4)
10 See 2 down
11 Where one is almost certain to be dining out. (7)
12 What a raconteur might be doing is certainly effective! (7)
14 To us, the sort of stuff like coal should be of service. (6)
15 Do they demand a sound sense of humor from us? (8)
17 We have to listen and listen for such approval. (4,4)
20 Some of the things questioned in today's society are not the fabulous type. (6)
22 Let out, or let out again? (7)
24 Charges offensively? (7)
26 With proper balance, we don't have to 17 with it—once is enough! (6)
27 Is the fire laid rather poorly? Port might be associated with it. (8)
28 How to press directors into service? (Are they listed among induction coils?) (5,6)

DOWN

2 and 10 across Invitation to a court function? (6,3,6)
3 The probability of anything happening to a number in the church? (7)
4 Evidently the animals are without water. (4)
5 To a point, this bird is disagreeable. (7)
6 One of those short and simple things to the poor, according to Gray. (5)
7 Clothes are continually being picked up, even by those not naturally 4. (6)
8 One might have a circle at the track. (6)
13 Not altogether a role one plays. (5)
16 Make a 23, if bound to get around it, not like the brave. (9)
18 Time's were dark to Walt Whitman. (6)
19 What a sailor might do to a rope implies the holiday is over! (4,3)
20 Island with lots of layers? (7)
21 See 9 across
23 Conceivably a muff. (5)
25 See 9 across

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1285

ACROSS: 1 Boston terriers; 8 Ecclesiastic; 10 King snakes; 11 Ills; 13 No play; 14 Starts in; 16 Performs; 17 Tigris; 19 Icon; 20 Hard liquor; 22 Post position; 23 Counterbalance. DOWN: 1 Breaking points; 2 Second person; 3 Overshadow; 4 Trinal; 5 Rossetti; 6 Ibis; 7 Passing strange; 9 Class reunion; 12 Artificial; 15 Embattle; 18 Adsorb; 21 Coin.

Readers are invited to send for a free copy of Mr. Lewis' "ground rules." Address Puzzle Department, The Nation, 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014.

RECORDS

FREE [illegible] CATALOG offers hundreds of recordings of rare Renaissance, Baroque and Classical music. Some records priced as low as $1.00 each! All late recordings in stereo only. MHS RECORDS, Box [illegible] NA, New York, N. Y. 10023.

FOLK, JAZZ, BLUES. We specialize in hard-to-get LPs. Send us your wants. [illegible] RECORD SERVICE, Box 18221 BH, San Francisco, Calif. 94118.

HISTORY OF THE BLACK MAN. LP Album. Educational. Authoritative. $4.00, Postage included. Lovett Records, Suite 1800, 230 Peachtree NW, Atlanta, 30303.

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, ALgonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

PERSONALS

BLOW YOURSELF UP! 1½' x 2' Poster of anyone. Send returned snapshot. $3.00. Pierpoint Products, Box 678, Inglewood, Calif. 90307.

EXPERIENCED man or woman to help start new Public Relations agency specializing in Negro "causes", partnership basis. Write Box #622, c/o The Nation.

SOCK IT TO ME—over 225 other underground buttons. 1/25c, 5/$1, 50/$5, 125/$10 and 1,000/$75. Bumperstickers, beads and peace jewelry, too. Free catalogue to all! Free sample to stores. A BIG-LITTLE STORE, 1077 Mission, San Francisco, Calif. 94103.

NUMBERS RULE THE WORLD: Numerology is one of the oldest psychic sciences. Know what numbers have power over your life. Know how to use them for more success and harmony. Send name, birth date, and $5 to Marguerite Mann, 6600 N. Oracle, Tucson, AZ 85704 for your personal numerology chart. Satisfaction Guaranteed.

DISCOVER an intriguing, fun way of meeting literate Jewish singles. FREE literature: OPERATION MAZEL TOV, 663 Fifth Avenue, N. Y. C. 10022.

PUBLICATIONS

'THE PRESS
AND THE BAY OF PIGS'

A detailed study by

Victor Bernstein and Jesse Gordon

The role played by The Nation in breaking the Bay of Pigs story to the American public, reprinted from the Columbia University Forum.

Single copies—15c; 25 copies at 10c each Orders over 25 at 7c per copy

THE NATION

333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014

KNOW CANADA BETTER!

See world affairs from a different perspective!

Read CANADIAN DIMENSION

Independent, lively, and original. Canada's leading forum for radical thought.

$4.00 for eight large issues

Write to:

CANADIAN DIMENSION
P.O. Box 1413
Winnipeg 1, Manitoba, Canada

Printed by Milford Publishing Inc., Milford, Conn.

How Does A People 'Vanish'?

Few of us know the grim story of America's first victim: the American Indian. Alvin Josephy, Jr., traces the history of their heroic resistance in THE PATRIOT CHIEFS.

Here are the lives of nine leaders and their peoples in various times and localities — from "The Real Hiawatha" to "The Last Stand of Chief Joseph." Without bias, Josephy simply tells their stories, stories which smash any illusions about Western "civilization" triumphing over "barbarism."

In the Epilogue, Josephy briefly sketches the events following the more or less total conquest of the Indians in 1877. But he also raises the question of the Indian's status in America today.

For the American Indian never vanished. Robbed of his land, massacred and humiliated, the Indian never capitulated and remains a "problem" in a generally uncaring nation.

This is a story that should be known. Subscribe to The NATION now and we'll send you free Alvin Josephy's THE PATRIOT CHIEFS.

THE NATION 333 Sixth Avenue New York, N.Y. 10014

☐ I'll join you for 1 year (48 issues). Enclosed is $10. I understand you will send me free Alvin Josephy's THE PATRIOT CHIEFS.

☐ I'll try you for 6 months (24 issues). I enclose $6.

(Add $1 per year postage for Canada and Mexico; $2 other foreign)

Name ....

Street ....

City .... State .... Zip ....

N-2-24

The good fight is now in THE NATION —Why not join now?

NIXON'S VIETNAM TRISTRAM COFFIN

THE NATION

MARCH 3, 1969 35 cents

5-69H FL-3337
BURLINGAME PUBLIC
LIBRARY
BURLINGAME CA 94010

BURLINGAME
MAR 3 1969
LIBRARY

America as Superpower

HOW WE LOOK to the THIRD WORLD

EQBAL AHMAD

No More Sombreros

THE CHICANO REBELLION

ROY BONGARTZ

East of the Wall

GERMANY NO LONGER

SIDNEY DU BROFF

Latin American Radicalism

ROBERT F. SMITH

LETTERS

mental hospitals

Topeka, Kan.

Dear Sirs: I would like to express appreciation for Max Gordon's clear and objective presentation of the issues involved in the strikes against the mental hospital system in New York ["Emancipating the Mental Wards," The Nation, Dec. 16]. It was written with a rare understanding of the needs of both sides. Dr. Alfred Paul Bay, Superintendent
Topeka State Hospital

no slur

New York City

Dear Sirs: I am delighted to learn that Claudia Dreifus regards the case of United States v. David A. Gearey (not "Gerry") as a "landmark in draft law" ["Which Memo? The Odor of Fraud," The Nation, Feb. 10].

I doubt very much, however, if either David Gearey or Antonio Fargas would appreciate being referred to as "draft dodgers" even in quotation marks. The whole point of the Gearey case was that a man could legitimately reach the conclusion that he is a conscientious objector after he received an order to report for induction. The receipt of the induction order can be the triggering mechanism which resulted in the final crystallization of a conscientious objection to participation in killing. . . .

The courageous young men who undertake this uphill struggle to have their consciences recognized—and face jail if they lose—deserve more of The Nation and its writers than to be called draft dodgers.

Marvin M. Karpatkin

P.S. I was, and am, David Gearey's attorney.

New York City

Dear Sirs: The purpose of my article was not to accuse Antonio Fargas and David Gearey of draft dodging. Rather, it was to explain that someone high in public office was working terribly hard at obtaining convictions for draft violators. So hard, indeed, that he was willing to use fraudulent papers to send Antonio Fargas to jail.

In using the term "draft dodgers," I was sarcastically describing an attitude that is all too common around the Federal District Attorney's Office in New York. In no way did I intend to impugn the motives of Mr. Gearey or Mr. Fargas. I have the greatest respect for these so-called "draft dodgers," and if I were a male, I might indeed be one of them. Claudia Dreifus

Spanish exile

Given in part below is a telegram sent on February 13 to Secretary-General U Thant and signed by thirty-two American writers, artists and scholars, of which a few representative names are here given:

On February 1, The New York Times reported at least eighteen prominent economists, editors, lawyers and professors have been seized by the Spanish Government and sent to forced residence in remote villages in Spain. . . . Some [of those seized] have played a prominent part in the moderate and, until now, tolerated opposition. . . . The exile can last as long as the state of emergency—three months if not extended. . . .

This random seizure of some of Spain's most respected intellectuals as well as arrests of hundreds of students and workers is an unpleasant reminder of the early days of Nazi Germany and the totalitarian Spain of thirty years ago. . . .

Have these men been arbitrarily arrested? Have they

(Continued on page 276)

EDITORIALS

The Tactic of Terror

The grenade-and-machine-gun attack by four Arab terrorists on an El Al airliner in the Zurich airport should dissipate "the climate of forgiveness" about which the Israelis complain. For if a preponderant world opinion criticized the Israeli retaliation against the Beirut airport for an earlier terrorist attack on an El Al airliner in Athens, opinion of equal measure and force should now condemn this latest act of terror aimed not alone at Israel but at the international community itself, or what is left of it. This latest attack, like the one in Athens, is an offense against the sovereignty of a neutral nation and a criminal act directed against civilians. In theory, the cycle of terror-reprisal-terror can escalate until it culminates in the disaster of another war in the Middle East or until, by some miracle of will and cooperation, the UN and the Big Four powers intervene.

The cycle is more dangerous today than at any time in the past. The Arab commandos have spread through most of the Arab world. More and more young Arab intellectuals have joined the revolutionary groups or work with them. In Jordan, the Palestinian refugee children have grown up. Some 25,000 Jordanians, mostly Palestinians, are attending universities. "It is out of this educated, politically conscious reservoir of the Palestinians," reports Donald Grant in the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, "that the guerrilla movement against Israel has been formed." Andrew Borowiec reports in the Washington Star that, whether Jordan wants them or not, it has been swamped by Soviet and Chinese arms distributed, even to children, in refugee camps. Syrian, Egyptian and Algerian instructors are "indoctrinating the disoriented refugee masses by a network of commando camps and their slogans of victory."

The immediate objective of the acts of terror is to provoke reprisals. Strong reprisals contribute to the mystique of the movement; they are cited as proof of the commandos' ability to hurt the Israelis; this in turn builds popular support. As the commandos see it, the Israelis are already overextended and their problems will increase if they can be baited into seizing more land and holding it pending a settlement. In brief, the commando scheme—for the moment—is to lose, to be defeated, to suffer reprisals, to forfeit more territory, always with the thought in mind that in the end they will be able to destroy Israel. And as the terrorists gain prestige, the host governments are increasingly subject to their pressure. Hussein and Nasser have recently given what amounts to formal approval of commando activities. Thus even if they do not control the organizations, they can hardly deny responsiblity for their activities.

At the moment, the Israelis can, and will, defend themselves; they have a clear preponderance of power. But the long-range implications of the terror tactic must worry the most intrepid Israelis. In an interview with Donald Grant, Ben-Gurion stated the basic dilemma. Israel had won three wars, he told Mr. Grant, but Nasser can "make a fourth war, a fifth war and if he is defeated, a sixth war. But if only once he manages to defeat us we will be finished. We are not going to destroy Egypt and all the Egyptians, but they can do it to us, so our position is not an easy one."

And it is not likely to get any easier. Since the Beirut raid the Israelis have shown commendable restraint and this latest act of Arab terror should swing world opinion back to them. But in the meantime nothing happens. The Big Four talks seem to have bogged down. The Security Council will not condemn the Arab governments because of the Soviet veto. So the Israelis are denounced when they take reprisal actions, but the Arab states escape the same formal condemnation for acts of terror. The world community "deplores," but does not act; the Big Four "talk" about "talking," and the UN succeeds only in discouraging its mediator. Not only has Israel shown admirable restraint but Premier Eshkol, in his Newsweek interview, struck a conciliatory note. However, the continued willingness of the world community and the great powers to tolerate the terror-reprisal cycle offers little hope for an early reduction of tensions, much less for significant negotiations between the parties.

'Selling' the ABM

Readers of Fred J. Cook's The Warfare State (which developed from a special Nation feature) will not need to be reminded that we have harped for years on the proposition that the Pentagon is far too deeply involved in "selling" its multifarious programs. Cook's Chapter 4, "Madison Avenue in Uniform," deals with this aspect of military prowess. As a general rule, he finds, the more dubious the product, the more intensive the public relations effort. On this principle, it is not surprising to find a massive push behind the current version of the anti-ballistic missile, christened "Sentinel." The campaign is described by Philip Geyelin in a February 16th Washington Post story titled, "U.S. Bid to 'Sell' ABM Told."

Last fall, Secretary of the Army Stanley R. Resor proposed to his superiors in the Defense Department an all-out effort to counter the opposition of such highly placed scientists as Dr. Hans Bethe, Dr. George Kistiakowsky and Dr. Jerome Wiesner to the Sentinel system. Although Resor's memorandum deals only with public relations, it was and remains classified, giving Defense officials a good excuse for not discussing it in any detail with reporters. What Geyelin has managed to uncover, however, leaves no doubt that every resource is being used to convince the public that millions of American lives will be saved if Sentinel is installed to intercept Chinese and Soviet ICBMs.

It is all there in the Resor package—the promotion of friendly magazine articles by leading scientists (although not usually as leading as Bethe, Kistiakowsky and Wiesner), intensive lobbying in Congress by high Defense officials, calls on local editors and publishers, a trans-

NOV 24
DEC 1

IN THIS ISSUE

March 3, 1969

EDITORIALS

258

ARTICLES

262 Nixon's War in Vietnam — Tristram Coffin
265 America as Superpower: How We Look to the Third World — Eqbal Ahmad
269 East of the Wall: Germany No Longer — Sidney Du Broff
271 No More Sombreros: The Chicano Rebellion — Roy Bongartz
275 A Tip from the Conqueror — Judith T. Younger

BOOKS & THE ARTS

277 Latin America: Radical Interpretations — Robert F. Smith
278 The Things You Do Not Say (poem) — Adrianne Marcus
279 Macmillan's Middle Years — Thomas J. Spinner, Jr.
280 House Affairs — Sara Blackburn
280 Ski Power — Daniel Stern
281 Theatre — Harold Clurman
282 Click (poem) — Michael S. Levinson
283 Letter from Germany — Leslie R. Colitt
284 Music — David Hamilton
287 Crossword Puzzle — Frank W. Lewis

Publisher
JAMES J. STORROW JR.

Associate Publisher
GIFFORD PHILLIPS

Editor
CAREY McWILLIAMS

Associate Editor
PHIL KERBY

Executive Editor
ROBERT HATCH

Literary Editor
HELEN YGLESIAS

Copy Editor, MARION HESS; Poetry Editor, JOHN LOGAN; Theatre, HAROLD CLURMAN; Art, MAX KOZLOFF; Music, BENJAMIN BORETZ; Science, CARL DREHER; Advertising Manager MARY SIMON.

Editorial Associate, ERNEST GRUENING

Washington, ROBERT G. SHERRILL; Paris, ALEXANDER WERTH; London, RAYMOND WILLIAMS; Bonn, C. AMERY; Canberra, C. P. FITZGERALD; United Nations, ANNE TUCKERMAN.

The Nation is published each week (except for the omission of four issues) by the Nation Magazine Company and copyright 1969 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014. Tel: CH 2-8400. West Coast office (for editorial correspondence only); 825 South Barrington Avenue, Los Angeles, Calif. 90049. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. and at additional mailing office.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Add $1 per year postage for Canada and Mexico; $2 other foreign.

Change of Address: It is essential that subscribers ordering a change of address give five weeks' notice and provide their old as well as their new address. Please give Zip Code numbers for both addresses.

THE NATION

Volume 208
No. 9

portable display exhibit, films, taped interviews, invitations to newsmen to witness test firings (including trips to Kwajalein in the Pacific), widespread distribution of "information packets," coordination with aerospace public relations efforts on behalf of Sentinel, and every other gimmick of the make-'em-believe-it industry.

Senator Kennedy's announcement that he is setting up his own study of the ABM because the Department of Defense "Review" is in fact no review at all adds substance to our editorial assertion ("The Missile Pause," February 24) that citizens need an independent research organization in Washington to maintain continuous surveillance of the military budget. His charge that for too many years nothing has been available on Sentinel but official reports could be directed against many other items in the defense budget. Reports put out by such an organization would help the press, the public and the Congress to arrive at sound judgments of what is required, what is prudent and what is irrational. It would substitute sense and reason for pressure, particularly Pentagon pressure.

The Sentinel campaign is only the latest of such Pentagon machinations. This kind of tampering with the public's mind goes on all the time; it should be exposed and stopped. Nor should that be too difficult. No new Congressional committees are required. Senator Symington has a subcommittee in being which is free to go into this field, to dissect what is being done, and to analyze the effect on foreign policy of the creation, at enormous expense, of weapons systems that will never benefit anyone but the members of the military-industrial complex.

Deadly Moderation

Deceptively billed as a mere "change of name," the newly approved HUAC mandate clothes the committee with even broader and more substantive powers. The "Committee on Internal Security," as it is now called, is a full-fledged institutional member of the security establishment, with credentials rivaling those of its Senate counterpart. Under the pretext of curing constitutional defects in the superseded resolution of authorization, the committee has acquired new status.

Court decisions— in the Watkins, Barenblatt, Krebs and Stamler cases—had cast a cloud on the committee's mandate. When the new chairman, Richard Ichord, joined the committee, he announced his disapproval of the mandate as written, proposed that such terms as "un-American propaganda" be dropped, and raised the banner of "moderation." In 1968, Ichord and Rep. Del Clawson introduced the present "clarifying" resolution, but it came too late in the session for House action.

As part of its masquerade of moderation, the committee has announced a new set of rules which, though not materially different from the old, is calculated to attract support. The moderation package also includes a proposal that the House set up a special committee to screen all contempt citations—a persuasive sop to its critics. But while stating that the committee would in the future use moderation even in calling hostile witnesses for exposure purposes, Mr. Ichord took great care to propose that the committee be given contempt power to punish "misbehavior" by hostile witnesses in its presence.

The purpose of the new jurisdictional provisions (approved by the Rules Committee after a one-day private hearing) is to furnish the committee with an instrument to cope with the new radicalism. The enlarged resolution uses as a model the Internal Security Act, which makes a target of those seeking the establishment of a "totalitarian dictatorship within the United States." It adds even broader jurisdictional authority by including the power to investigate organizations and groups, "their members, agents and affiliates" which seek "alteration" in the United States form of government by "treachery" or "unlawful means." It has obtained power to proceed against members of organizations or groups who use "any unlawful means to obstruct or oppose the lawful authority of the government of the United States." It has obtained authority to investigate the administration of any law "or any portion of law" relating to the enormously expanded jurisdiction approved in the new resolution, as well as "all other questions" relating to its new powers. The purpose of this catchall provision is to give the committee "legislative oversight" not only over laws within its own jurisdiction but laws within the jurisdiction of other committees which "may have general jurisdiction over the whole or major part of said law." With the announced committee investigation of Students for a Democratic Society (Senator Eastland's subcommittee has also subpoenaed SDS members and files), the stage is set for a new witch hunt which may make us long for the bad old days before "moderation" took over.

'Basically Honest'

President Nixon led with his chin when he appointed Willie Mae Rogers to be White House consultant on consumer affairs. Miss Rogers was—and is—director of the Good Housekeeping Institute. Connected with the magazine of the same name, the institute purports to function as a consumer-protection organization. But even as the President was appointing Miss Rogers to this sensitive and vital position, Rep. Benjamin S. Rosenthal (D., N.Y.), in his capacity of chairman of a Government Operations subcommittee, was investigating the Good Housekeeping Institute and its Seal of Approval. He had already discovered—what had been known in the advertising and consumer-protection field for many years—that only products advertised in Good Housekeeping were eligible for the seal, that apparently few products so advertised had ever been denied the seal, and that to keep its seal a company had to agree to maintain a proportionate share of its total advertising with Good Housekeeping. This meant that if the company decided to increase its advertising budget, Good Housekeeping would have to get the same percentage increase, or more.

And here came Miss Rogers, to advise Mr. Nixon on giving the restive consumer a break. Moreover, she was to be an unpaid consultant, continuing to receive her salary from the Good Housekeeping Institute ($100,000 a year, according to reports). In Mr. Rosenthal's view, and in that of anyone interested in real protection for consumers, it was almost too brash to be true. He likened Miss Rogers to a fox in the chicken coop, and was joined in denunciation of the appointment by Sens. Harrison A. Williams, Jr. (D., N.J.), William Proxmire (D., Wis.) and Richard S. Schweiker (R., Pa.). Miss Rogers' position was made even more delicate by the circumstance that at least one product of which samples had been seized by the Food and Drug Administration was still advertised in Good Housekeeping and still carried the seal. Two other products were said to be under investigation. How, Mr. Rosenthal wanted to know, could Miss Rogers report on the vitality and efficiency of the FDA when products advertised in Good Housekeeping were being scrutinized by that agency?

Miss Rogers was of another mind entirely. She said at a press conference: "You've got to accept the fact that I'm basically honest." We hasten to do so. But there is more involved than conflict of interests; could a person of her background, experience and connections ever qualify as a protector of the consumer's dollar? Miss Rogers is convinced there is no consumer problem that business itself cannot be relied on to cope with, because it is in the interest of business to do so. But the growing and widespread demand for consumer protection refutes the assumption. Patently there is a consumer interest. It is not identical with the interest of all business, and it does need protection.

The incident shows that Mr. Nixon badly misjudged the strength of the new consumer movement. When the Rogers appointment blew up in his face, he quickly backed away. Miss Rogers was out of the White House office almost as soon as she was invited in. And knowing now what the public temper is, Mr. Nixon will hardly find it prudent to put another Willie Mae Rogers in this key post. He must name a person whose attitudes are seen to be sympathetic to the consumer interest. He is now in somewhat the same spot as when Mr. Hickel was under fire. Russell Train, a real conservationist, was appointed to backstop Hickel and to be the "conscience of the conservationists" in the Department of the Interior. Nowadays both conservationists and consumers are quick to spot foxes among the hens.

Twenty-Seven Billie Budds

On October 14, 1968, at about 7:30 A.M., a group of twenty-seven prisoners in the stockade of the Presidio of San Francisco left their formation, sat in a circle on the ground of the courtyard, locked arms and began singing We Shall Overcome. The Sixth United States Army decided this action constituted a "nonviolent mutiny."

The Presidio twenty-seven—most of them in the stockade for being absent without leave—hardly fit the popular conception of mutineers. Indeed, they don't even resemble those tough movie cons who used to hold the prison chaplain hostage until the warden agreed to open the gates. They are for the most part scared youths of about 20; in some cases they appear to be mentally disturbed and should never have been drafted in the first place.

The most immediate reason for their being scared that October morning was that another stockade prisoner, 19 years old, had been shot to death seventy-two hours earlier in what the Army alleged was "an attempt to escape from a work detail." The Presidio twenty-seven said they felt it was murder. There is some evidence that this man was mentally disturbed.

The trials of the twenty-seven got under way last month. The first defendant soldier was convicted after thirty-five minutes of deliberation by the court; he was sentenced to fifteen years at hard labor. Two more, aged 20 and 21, were given sentences of fourteen and sixteen years.

Assemblyman John Burton, of San Francisco, said the sentences are an attempt by the Army "to stifle the expression of legitimate grievances." American Civil Liberties Union attorney Paul Halvonik, who defended one of the men, said: "Military justice is to justice as military bands are to music."

In a sense the Army, rather than the twenty-seven, is on trial at the Presidio. It would appear that what one lawyer called a "military backlash" against the alleged mutineers could cause the Army to lose its case in the wider court of public opinion.

A Little Freedom

For the past year The Nation has been trying to keep the issue of the American bases in Spain high on the agenda of items with which the press, the public and the Congress should be concerned. Now the deadline is approaching.

Spain renounced the treaty covering American bases on Spanish soil on September 26, 1968. Since the treaty was negotiated, some $2 billion in military hardware has been given to Franco. In return for a renewal, he wants a higher rent and still more benefits. Unless a new agreement is negotiated by March 26, we have a year in which to dismantle our bases and go home, although negotiations might continue for a while after the one-year period had started to run.

In the meantime, Spain's internal situation has deteriorated. Some elements of the Franco dictatorship sensed the need for a degree of relaxation and, beginning in 1966, some slight easing of controls was started. It soon began to get out of hand and on January 24 of this year Franco cracked down. A national state of emergency was proclaimed and remains in force.

Much the same thing happened in Portugal when

NOTICE TO SUBSCRIBERS

Because of postal regulations, The Nation's mailing list must be arranged according to Zip Codes. Therefore—with any correspondence about address changes, renewals, etc.—please enclose the address label from your Nation. If you don't have a label, be sure to include your Zip number, and be sure it is correct. Without it, we cannot find your name plate.

Salazar was stricken. His successor, Caetano, tried to create the impression that some liberalization might be in store. But as the Lisbon wisecrack has it, he signaled left while turning right. In Portugal, too, there has been a crackdown.

In Spain the rationale offered for bringing back the shackles was "the historic incapacity [of the Spanish people] to live together in freedom." It is the same old Franco line, voiced in this instance by an editor, Emilio Romero. In Portugal the trouble was "the beast within the Portuguese psyche." The same old quack psychology.

The fact is that, in part because of the influx of U.S. funds, the Spanish have been a little more prosperous. The bases contribute $300 million a year to the national income. Spain also has a $1.25 billion tourist industry. Spaniards working abroad send home another $300 to $400 million. Portugal also has a substantial income from workers abroad, tourism, etc.

Whenever improvement, however modest, occurs in a dictatorship, there results a general lifting of spirits, and politics begins to revive. Also, a new generation has come along to worry Franco. When people have had a taste of freedom, however dilute, they want more. This frightens the dictatorship, and not without reason. Franco observed the May upsurge in France and he is taking preventive measures. He fears an alliance of students and workers (since February 1 workers have been on strike in Bilbao). The Basques keep him awake nights.

As long as we maintain our Spanish bases and pay Franco tribute, we are in effect upholding the dictatorship and repressing the Spanish people. If we stay, and big trouble develops, the bases will be worthless—they probably are anyway. We will be caught in the middle, and a large sector of world opinion will blame us for supplying Franco with the arms with which he will try to reassert his authority.

March 26, then, is a date to watch. And it would be a good day to start getting out.

Big Deal

Some insurance companies are interested in buying the California State College system. The plan is endorsed by Sen. John G. Schmitz of Orange County, well known as a member of the John Birch Society. He thinks the insurance companies would be able to stop campus disturbances and would also help reduce the taxes of the good Californians. It would be, he said, "a multi-billion-dollar windfall" for the California taxpayer . . . though it might not look so good to him when he has to find the tuition for his children.

The California State College System comprises nineteen campuses and has about 125,000 students. It is estimated that in ten years this number will almost double. The advantages of selling the colleges to an insurance company, or a group of them, are not to be dismissed lightly. It would give a tremendous shot in the arm to the actuarial science, and to the business schools in general—which are quite ragged. Quality faculty could be lured to the system by promises of reductions on insurance policies, options on stock and similar inducements which corporations offer their workers. Parents can be reassured that their children will be "in good hands," in institutions as "solid" as the Rock of Gibraltar.

And there is no reason why the principle cannot be extended to the university system; it might even be advisable to sell the whole state. Howard Hughes is buying Nevada; might he be a prospect for California?

NIXON'S WAR IN VIETNAM

TRISTRAM COFFIN

Mr. Coffin is an author and journalist, based in Washington.

In a brightly lit Pentagon niche a sergeant performs a melancholy task: he adds the latest figures of American deaths in Vietnam to the grand total. There were 150 in the week of February 8, bringing the total to 31,562.

The Washington news gatherers tend to ignore the sergeant and his statistics in their fascination with the public relations techniques of President Nixon. Besides, the Administration is providing jim-dandy headlines—a trip to Europe, messages to de Gaulle on the Middle East, the tricky backfield shift on ABM, patriotic remarks on West Berlin.

The real story of Vietnam is that the United States has again escalated the war, in the face of disengagement from the other side. President Nixon has given in to the advice of his old friend, Gen. Andrew J. Goodpaster who, by report, is running the show from the White House. General Goodpaster, second in command in Vietnam, was called back for consultations with Nixon, sits in on all the conferences on Vietnam; his return to Saigon has been put off indefinitely.

The President has chosen to listen blankly to the realism of such old hands as Averell Harriman, Edwin Reischauer, McGeorge Bundy. Reischauer said recently: "Vietnam has shown the limited ability of the United States to control at a reasonable cost the course of events in a nationally aroused, less developed nation. . . ."

According to Republican legislators who have talked to Mr. Nixon, he apparently sees Vietnam as a problem in public relations and American politics. General Goodpaster has convinced him that victory can be won in Vietnam. The argument is drearily familiar. ("I fully expect the defeat of the Communist Union after six more months of hard fighting": Gen. Henri-Eugene Navarre, French commander in chief, January 2, 1954. . . . "With a little more training the Vietnam army will be the equal of any other army in its ability to combat the enemy": Secretary of the Army Wilbur Brucker, December 18, 1955. . . .

"The militant march of communism has been halted": Vice President Nixon, July 7, 1956. . . . "South Vietnam is beginning to hit the Vietcong insurgents where it hurts most": Secretary of Defense McNamara, July 25, 1962. . . . "The war in Vietnam is turning an important corner. Government forces clearly have the initiative in most areas of the country": Secretary of State Rusk, March 9, 1963. . . . "I feel we shall achieve victory in 1964": Maj. Gen. Tran Van Dong, October 1, 1963.)

Nixon has allowed himself to fall for the fantasy, because of his own obsession with communism. Roscoe Drummond, a Washington columnist close to the new Administration, writes that Nixon "will not go for a fake peace, for a make-believe face-saving peace which for a few weeks or a few months might look like peace but which really would mean turning the South Vietnamese people over to the Communists at the conference table."

The President reportedly expects a military victory in Vietnam within a year or two. His job as he sees it is twofold: to razzle and dazzle the populace so that it will not complain about the sergeant's statistics, and to get the war over at least six months before launching his campaign for re-election. He also has a short-term goal. He hopes to put together by midsummer a relatively tough U.S. ultimatum for the Paris talks. Joseph C. Harsch writes in The Christian Science Monitor that his formula for Vietnam "should emerge sometime in July or August." The timing is significant. Nixon expects the U.S. military position to be so improved by summer that he can call the tune at Paris.

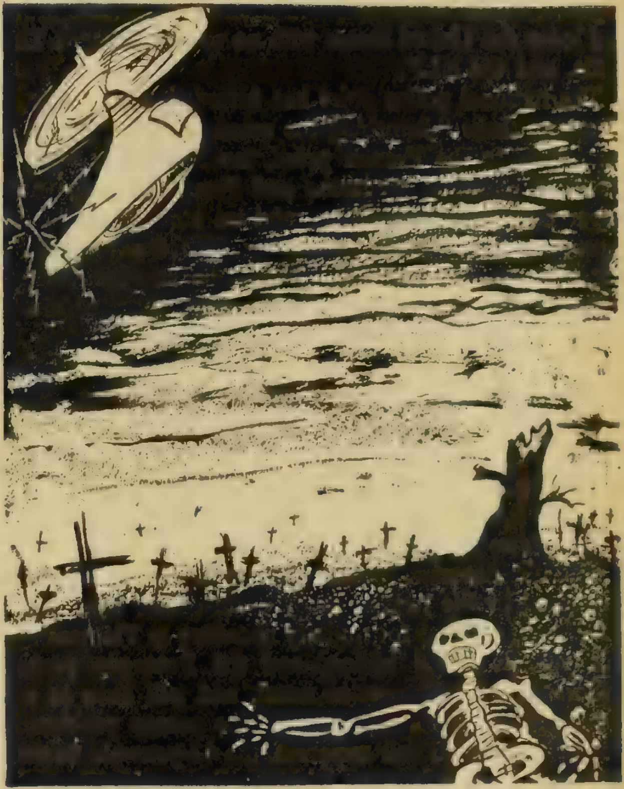
By report, the formula shaping up is not much different from the hard LBJ line, but with one grand concession to be announced with blinking neon lights and horns: the NLF will be allowed one place in the postwar Saigon regime—some post like commissioner of traffic lights.

The NLF, of course, will not agree to that, now or in August. It insists upon a new caretaker government, with equal representation for the Saigon regime, the NLF and the non-Communist dissenters. This would mean that airline flights from Saigon to Paris would be quickly filled with departing Thieu-Ky executives.

While President Nixon smiles upon the populace, ominous events are taking place in Vietnam. The order of the day is escalation. The New York Times reports that General Abrams has embarked on a new campaign "to extend South Vietnamese Government control over disputed areas and territory long controlled by the Vietcong." Another Times dispatch refers to "an accelerated pacification program which might be called a 'territorial security program.' "

The Washington Post, in a high-keyed editorial about this "absurd, futile business," recalls a series of events: after the bombing halt, North Vietnam pulled troops "back from the lowlands into the mountains; they have, in fact, disengaged their troops." The Post says some of the experts claim "that the basic decision was political, not military; it was a conscious act of de facto de-escalation. If that is what it was, the American response to it was all wrong." The editorial suggests that the enemy reaction to our escalation (I. F. Stone reports that the tempo of our offensive operations rose about 25 per cent in December over November) is a hardening of the line, and a decision to kick off a new offensive. An Agence France Press dispatch says the NLF has vowed to "push forward" in a general offensive because the United States "feverishly steps up the war and keeps piling up barbarous crimes against the people."

Another casualty of the Nixon escalation seems to be the Chinese "soft line." Late last fall, our China watchers in Poland sent word of a surprising development: Peking was willing to guarantee the neutrality of Southeast Asia, if we would wind up the war and pull out. This was not a humanitarian gesture but the result of some hard thinking by the Communists. China, expecting that it must eventually fight Russia, hoped to break up the possibility of a Washington-Moscow axis, which would pummel China from west and south. Peking's intelligence at that point was saying the United States wanted, above all, to get out of Vietnam with reasonable "face" and let the Asians run Asia.



Backes, Nuremberg

This line has now been abandoned. A Peking broadcast on February 8 said that Nixon and "American imperialism . . . will step up its counterrevolutionary global collusion and make counterrevolutionary deals with the Soviet revisionist renegade clique."

The current escalation is bringing death and horror to South Vietnam. A Vietcong commentary quoted in the Times says, "On a single day the B-52s dropped 1 million pounds of bombs on a tiny area northwest of Pleiku." No matter what the military objective, 1 million pounds of bombs is an indiscriminate attack, in which a lot of innocent people are killed and maimed. The anti-personnel bombs, armed with metal pellets, are particularly indefensible.

With the accelerated offensive has come a crackdown by the Saigon regime on all moderate opposition. A Times dispatch quotes President Thieu as saying, "We will strictly and vigorously apply martial law to anybody—private citizen, politician, priest or monk—if he incites the people to revolt, if he tries to overthrow the Government, if he helps the Communists, or if he does anything harmful to the national security." This hardly seems possible without at least the tacit consent of Ambassador Bunker and Washington. The aim is obvious—to destroy the middle ground and leave the United States with no choice between Thieu & Co. and the NLF.

The national police chief has invented a new category of crime, those "disturbing the minds of the population." According to the French press, hundreds have been arrested, a Buddhist magazine and French-language newspaper have been shut down, and an atmosphere of dark repression has returned to the city. The Washington Post states in another editorial, "From the standpoint of the United States and its interests, the harassment of dissenters is ominous."

Meantime, the acid of the Vietnamese War is dripping deeply into the American scene. The sergeant's figures may be ignored by the Washington news gatherers, but not by the people. The latest Gallup poll finds that 40 per cent list Vietnam as their chief worry, as compared to 17 per cent who list crime and violence.

Nixon's domestic chiefs find themselves increasingly frustrated by the heavy money drain of the war. The official budget figure for military spending in Vietnam alone this year is $28.8 billion, and the Pentagon probably underestimated the cost as usual, and will have to come sneaking back for a supplement. The money problem hits Nixon's presumed heir apparent, the 43-year-old Secretary of Health, Education and Welfare, Robert H. Finch. Unless he can get more money for education and welfare, his jurisdiction and reputation may go up in smoke this summer. But Finch runs up against Nixon's confidence that, by public relations stunts and diversions, he can cool off the domestic scene until his generals win the war. No President ever put so much faith in the PR game as this master of Checkers.

There is a direct relation between the war and student demonstrations, according to a suppressed report by the National Commission on the Causes and Prevention of Violence. It argues: "The primary cause of anti-war protest is the course of the war itself. . . . It is safe to say that by now the only effective countermeasure against the bitterness that leads to violence would be the termination of the war in Vietnam."

The armed services themselves are deeply, though privately, worried by an undercurrent of passive disobedience, dissent, mutiny and racial antagonism that grows out of the war. You simply cannot run an army with this kind of ferment.

A new youth ethic toward the military is emerging and could collapse the whole gigantic, futile military-industrial complex while the politicians and peaceniks argue and hold banquets. The ethic was enunciated by a young deserter, the son of a Pentagon official, in letters to his mother from a Swedish jail. In excerpts published by The Washington Post he said: "The North Vietnamese are fighting for a political point of view they think would be best for all of Vietnam. The same reason the Yankees fought in the Civil War. . . . But Americans are actually killing thousands of people in the small country of Vietnam to spread a political belief they like to talk about but never really get: freedom of this, that and the other thing. . . . If you want to be open-minded enough to see out of the plastic red, white and blue shell you are in, you've got to stop taking it for granted that people should kill. . . ."

Disturbing omens can be detected in the American economy. The consumer price index climbed 4.2 per cent in 1968, the biggest jump since the Korean War year of 1951, and the Department of Agriculture predicts higher food prices in the near future. In late January, the Nixon Administration, negotiating its first financial operation, had to pay the highest interest rate imposed on the federal government since 1865, the last year of the Civil War.

Signs as alarming are to be found in a study issued by the Joint Economic Committee, and blithely ignored by Washington news gatherers during their winter romance with Nixon. It shows that the Vietnamese War is contributing $4 billion a year to the balance-of-payments crisis. As the London Financial Times has consistently pointed out, this drain could pull down the West's monetary system at almost any moment. The United States narrowly escaped a showdown last year, when money from West Europe, frightened by the instability of the franc and pound, poured into America.

A study by Peter Passell, a young Yale scholar, also shows how the war has brought a basic change to America's position in the nonmilitary world market. American corporations have been so busy filling orders for the Pentagon that they have neglected the export market and even, to some extent, the domestic market for non-maiming goods. In 1966, our foreign trade position was $1.3 billion below what could be expected had we held our pre-Vietnam trading balance. This includes lost exports and the rise of non-defense imports. Since 1964, there has been a decline in the U.S. current account position of more than $6 billion. Passell says, "The Vietnamese War has played a major role in this deterioration."

To bring this judgment up to date, the Commerce Department said on January 30 that our trade surplus—the excess of exports over imports—plummeted from $4.1 billion in 1967 to $726 million last year. The Department also revealed that imports exceeded exports by $81 million in December for the fifth monthly deficit of the year.

Nevertheless, the end of this miserable war is not in sight. President Thieu said blandly at his Saigon press conference on February 6, "I can by no means assert that peace will come in 1969." President Nixon prepares to traipse off to Europe for more PR exposure via Telstar. (If he really wanted to sound out other heads of state, he has ambassadors and a State Department for the purpose.) And the sergeant in the Pentagon goes quietly about his doleful business.

How We Look to the Third World

EQBAL AHMAD

Mr. Ahmad, a Pakistani, is a Fellow of the Adlai Stevenson Institute in Chicago. His Politics and Labor in the Maghreb will be published later this year, and he is now at work on a comparative study of the Algerian and Vietnamese revolutions. Part of the material in the following article was used in No More Vietnams? The War and the Future of American Foreign Policy, edited by Richard M. Pfeffer (Harper & Row).

During America's first two decades as a superpower, its foreign policy escaped harsh judgments by foreign as well as native analysts. West Europeans were grateful for American help in surviving the menace of fascism, and acknowledged the success of the Marshall Plan in reconstructing their war-torn economies. Among the nationalists of Asia and Africa the United States enjoyed, in Wendell Willkie's words, an inexhaustible "reservoir of goodwill." Americans had waged the first successful struggle against colonialism, founded a nation dedicated to the exciting proposition that all men are created equal, and fought a civil war to uphold that principle. During the crucial years of Asian and African struggle for independence America had been our model; faith in its friendship was part of our rising expectations. As a schoolboy in British India, my first act of rebellion had been to substitute the phrase "American Rebellion" for the "War of American Independence" in a history reading class. Even Ho Chi Minh has regularly invoked the example of George Washington. An anti-imperialist, revolutionary United States was part of our nationalist mythologies.

Somehow that myth lingered on through two decades of disappointments. Richard Barnett has pointed out that between 1947 and 1965 the United States sent military or para-military forces, on an average of once every eighteen months, against local revolutions or nationalist governments of which it did not approve. It spent in excess of twenty times more money on its military operations in underdeveloped countries than on economic aid to the poor. At the same time its investments abroad grew from $7.2 billion in 1947 to $50 billion in 1965, and it consumed 60 per cent of the world's raw material. With each successive year, its war budget reached an all-time high. Yet, except for a handful of pacifists and Marxists, few Americans challenged the assumptions and goals of this policy. Total consensus on matters of policy is an anomaly in a democratic, pluralistic society; yet in this instance it lasted until the continued escalation of an undeclared war put intolerable strains on the country, and particularly on its young.

To us in the Third World, America appeared increasingly a status-quo-seeking, interventionist monolith, whose allies were the Samozas, the Diems and the Saigon generals who had once collaborated with colonial France and are now sanctioning the destruction of a people and country they claim to represent. In the crucible of Vietnam the myth of revolutionary America has finally exploded.

Or should we regard Vietnam as a unique aberration? That depends on one's perspectives and priorities. In the underdeveloped countries the uniqueness of Vietnam generally refers to the peculiar historical and political circumstances which permitted the Vietnamese people to resist American intervention in a manner that the Guatemalans, Iranians and Dominicans did not or could not.

Threat of Nationalism

The United States, the protestations of its leaders notwithstanding, has been, in effect, opposed to Third World nationalism—historically in South America, and recently in its client states. This opposition, however, has been manifest not in the initial stages of the demand for independence from Spanish, French, Dutch or British colonialism; but in the stage when a particular nationalism has begun to acquire a diplomatic, economic and social expression. American analysts are beginning to acknowledge the objective factors behind this fact. Nationalism appears to threaten the "interests" of those who are responsible for or exercise influence over government policy. The status and opulence of the military and civilian bureaucracy connected with the "national security" establishment depend on accumulating and expanding military power and political influence. Business interests which, in the absence of countervailing forces, exercise a near monopoly of influence on foreign policy, prosper under a policy characterized by overmilitarization and interventions in behalf of right-wing oligarchies hospitable to private U.S. investments.

In the recently emerged nations, by contrast, the diplomatic and economic expression of nationalism entails an independent and neutralist foreign policy, the rejection of foreign military bases and socialization of national resources. It threatens potential or actual American investments; it implies the loss of a potential or actual ally in the cold war; its revolutionary program appears dangerously similar to communism.

American tolerance for such a development appears to vary inversely with its political and economic investments in a country. In client states, like Guatemala, Iran and the Dominican Republic, the United States has engineered coups d'état, or mounted sharp, swift, armed interventions to suppress the expression of radical nationalism. In non-client states the development is tolerated if it occurs unexpectedly, or if a country turns radical, gradually and without serious challenge, under a popular leader. Egypt is an example of the first type; Tanzania of the second. But relations with such regimes remain reserved, often restrained; if local conditions permit, their subversion is encouraged, as it admittedly was in Indonesia (1957-1958) and British Guiana (1962-1963). In recent years there has been an inclination to encourage radical governments in zones of French influence; Tunisia is an example. But only among the Eastern European clients of Russia has America consistently welcomed and encouraged assertive nationalism.

Policy by Paranoia

The subjective but equally important factors which reinforce American policy in underdeveloped countries seem related to the following aspects of U.S. political culture:

The paranoid strain in American politics has been analyzed at some length by Richard Hofstadter. He states: "The distinguishing thing about the paranoid style is not that its exponents see conspiracies here and there in history but that they regard a vast and gigantic conspiracy as the motive force in historical events. History is a conspiracy set in motion by demonic forces of almost transcendent power and what is felt to be needed to defeat it is not the usual methods of political give and take but an all out crusade."

The deep hold among the people of an almost theological anti-communism, which the realists like Morgenthau, Kennan and Senator Fulbright have bewailed, becomes more understandable when viewed in this light. It also accounts for the easy and, until recently, total public acceptance of the official ideology. Like other powers which preceded it, the United States needed a rationale to police the world. A democracy claiming an anti-imperialist character would have found it particularly difficult to justify such a role on the ground of Realpolitik. The doctrines of historical necessity and moral responsibility combined to produce a compelling ideology whose most important single component is the constant invocation of the threat of conspiratorial communism.

A sense of power is congenial to any people. Its exercise becomes morally acceptable when it is felt to be directed in behalf of a noble cause and against a mortal threat. Officials contend that America was reluctant to assume the guardianship of the world; but the nation, come of age, could not shirk its historical responsibility of defending humanity against communism. History and metaphysics had crowned America to become, in John F. Kennedy's stirring phrase, "the watchman on the walls of world freedom." President Johnson echoed more sadly that "We did not choose to be the guardians at the gate." The stake in the struggle, according to President Kennedy, was nothing less than "sway over the destiny of man." The principal battleground was assumed to have shifted in the late 1940s to the poor countries. Hence, every important local event has global significance.

The mixture of globalism and paranoia produces a rhetoric so senseless and extreme that were it not uttered by serious and successful politicians, one would tend to dismiss it as irresponsible. Thus, in a letter to The New York Times (October 29, 1965) Mr. Nixon warned that "The victory for Vietcong . . . would mean ultimately the destruction of freedom of speech for all men for all time not only in Asia but in the United States as well. . . . We must never forget that if the war in Vietnam is lost . . . the right of free speech will be extinguished forever." Whatever opinion one may hold of the military-industrial complex or of economic imperialism in American foreign policy, it would be difficult to deny that such a statement by the most durable and successful of contemporary American politicians reveals more about the political pathology of this society than do the economic interests of its ruling class.

The conspiratorial view of history leads also to the habit of seeing historical events and social processes in ad hoc, technical terms. Even the social scientists are conditioned by it; the official literature on counterinsurgency is a case in point. Revolutionary warfare is seen essentially as a technical problem—that of plotting and subversion on the one hand, and of intelligence and suppression on the other. As the chief conspiratorial group, the Communists are believed to be the most likely initiators and beneficiaries of revolution. This belief produces a pessimistic posture toward a transforming world, and underlies the obsessive concern of the United States with stability and order in the countries under its influence, an attitude which led to the quashing of what was construed as the Dominican Communist conspiracy. A logical extension—the belief that any revolutionary movement is inspired, directed and controlled from abroad—leads to a ridiculously simplified puppeteer view of the world, which disregards the force of nationalism. Dean Rusk's famous description of China as a "Slavic Manchukuo on a large scale" is now legend. The belief in Washington, perhaps once sincere, that the National Liberation Front was a puppet of North Vietnam, which in turn was a puppet of one or the other of the larger Communist powers, may fly in the face of facts; but it has been held with tenacity by the government and is believed by most of the people.

Management of Dissent

Perhaps because its immigrant character necessitated the successful integration of diverse groups into the system, the American political culture is management oriented. Historically, group demands have been managed through political bargaining and selective rewards. Ideological and social dissent has been dealt with by coopting both individuals and ideas. Insofar as the society was endowed with expanding resources as well as an extremely mobile social structure, the politics of management within a pluralistic framework was possible. It was further facilitated by a basic consensus to which all aspiring groups tended to subscribe.

Yet the same forces which produced a flexible tradition of bargaining and cooptation also produced an overemphasis on the maintenance of a basic consensus—which could accept differences of opinion, but not cleavages—on how society was to be organized. Unmanageable dissent, therefore, has often met swift and ruthless repression in America. The IWW comes immediately to mind. Groups defined as being outside the political boundary faced extermination—as did the Indians; or were forcibly kept on the outer limits—as were the blacks. The result is an authoritarian superstructure, that allows for a well-defined but extremely permissive infra-structure. This cultural complex has important ramifications for American response to the stresses of social change in underdeveloped countries.

First, the Americans expect that the Asian and Latin versions of robber barons and party bosses will, out of self-interest, come around to introducing serious reforms and achieving an orderly resolution of the conflicts that arise from pressures for political participation and distribution of income. Washington therefore clings obstinately to the hope that institutions will be promoted and social progress will be achieved under a Diem, the Thai generals, or the Filipino politicians. But this optimism misconstrues the value system and class characteristics of the rulers in traditional and feudal societies: their concept of self-interest and their relationship to society, upon which their defense of the status quo is predicated.

Since rewards and bargains are essential aspects of the domestic political style, the United States increases its economic and military commitments to client states in the expectation that these will be useful levers for political and economic reform. Yet students of American foreign aid have noted that in many countries American pressures for reform, backed by direct economic aid, fail to produce the desired reforms; but somehow expand the American presence, undermine the legitimacy of the native government, and sometimes culminate in military intervention on behalf of the defaulting client. This phenomenon, called "incrementalism" in academic parlance, results from transposing an American style and expectation of behavior to relationships with traditional or feudal elites whose techniques for assuring political and economic survival are often the exact opposite of the American.

The consensus upon which the American system of bargaining and boundary management is predicated does not exist in underdeveloped countries. It is likely to be particularly lacking in client states, since foreign alignments tend to exacerbate internal divisions. There is growing in the Third World a trend toward the radicalization of conflict. The imposition of modern technology and values is drastically altering social and economic configurations which formerly held discontent in the traditional societies within the boundaries of religiosity and rebellion. The countries are feeling a fundamental shift in the equation of human condition; it produces a shift from rebellion for limited goals to revolution whose basic aim is the transformation of all relationships—political, economic and social—between groups and individuals. As groups previously outside the political realm force their way into politics, the common man becomes politically relevant. For many newcomers to politics, this mass is their only capital. Politics, thus, ceases to be a mere struggle within a privileged minority for the spoils of power. It becomes a contest between the contenders of different social systems and political ideals. The opposition in such societies is frequently unmanageable because it does not share the values of an often ill-defined and sometimes unlegitimate authority.

When faced with unmanageable dissent of this nature in countries of its paramount influence, the United States inclines to intervene, responding according to the traditions of its domestic style. The opposition is defined as being outside the legitimate political boundary (it often does not matter if legitimacy as well as a defined boundary are absent). Paranoia seeks plausible enemies; radical nationalists, Socialists, all become Communists; "outside agitators" are repressed. If the clients are unable to defeat the opposition with American aid and advice, then direct intervention appears to be necessary. After listening to a State Department official's defense of Vietnamese policy at Tougaloo College in Mississippi, a black woman remarked that he spoke exactly like the white leaders she knew: people in the South were generally satisfied; trouble began only when agitators from the North infiltrated; there was Communist subversion. For the same reason Ambassador Nolting in Saigon "reminded" Time's correspondent, David Halberstam, "of some white community leaders in Mississippi and Tennessee."

Latin American Extrapolation

Perhaps the most important single factor in influencing American style in the underdeveloped countries has been its experience in Latin America.* There radical nationalism has been the greatest threat to vested American interests. There the pattern of alliance with right-wing oligarchies was established and paid economic and political dividends. There even the practice of labeling radical nationalists as "Communists" developed long before the cold war had begun. (For example, in 1933 the American Ambassador in Cuba found the ill-fated Grau San Martin government "Communistic"; in 1937 Cordell Hull referred to a Mexican Government intent on nationalizing oil interests as "those Communists down there.") There, too, was confirmed the belief in the efficacy of violence as an instrument of foreign policy.

There has been a great deal of discussion in recent years of the part played by violence in American culture. However, I have seen insufficient analysis of the extent to which a belief in the efficacy of violence appears to be an important aspect of the historical outlook in the United States. As a newcomer, I was struck by the thematic consistency of films on American colonization, and the audience reaction to them. The whites are shown as a human grouping with all its diversities, emotions and failings. Tension builds up when a pioneer group, united by a common enterprise, is threatened by an invisible, elemental enemy. The Indian is an outsider, and dehumanized. One does not learn of his family life, hopes, fears and grievances. Indians come in hordes, screaming; white guns, strategically placed and skillfully fired, wipe them out. They fall in stylized movements which bring cheers or laughter from the audience. Efficiency and superior technology in the service of a mission overcome the Indian; violence is seen as an instrument of national purpose.

---

* See review of Latin American Radicalism, page 277.

"I Say Bomb Them into Submission! It's the Only Language I Understand"

At first one hesitates to believe that this constitutes a fundamental source of socialization in America, but an examination of decades of school history texts confirms one's fears. They display some pity, but little self-examination; considerable chauvinism and self-righteousness. They may show some respect for the Indian, but only in his role as a noble savage. (The Negro, also an excluded group who suffered another form of violence, is denied even this honor.) But his extermination is accepted as the natural offering to manifest destiny. The destruction of a people and culture has become an object of public entertainment and children's games. Instead of deriving a sense of tragedy from it, America has institutionalized even its genocide.

The violence which has been practiced against the Indians or the blacks is not genocidal in intent; it is instrumental, political and ethnocentric. It is seen as a natural vehicle for the attainment of societal goals, especially when it involves confrontation with culturally and racially alien groups who are often perceived as inferior and expendable. The belief in the efficacy of violence, when reinforced by the feeling of racial superiority, augments interventionist tendencies, brutalizes the resulting conflict beyond legal or necessary bounds, and also produces miscalculation regarding the will and tenacity of the enemy. As an alien and colored people, Asians are particularly vulnerable, which is one reason why a rapid military disengagement of the United States from their countries will be highly desirable.

New Assumptions, New Goals

If the above analysis of the American political culture is valid, it points to the danger of continued interventionism, especially in the client states. It should follow that, if the dialectic of intervention is to be broken, scholars and policy makers must give attention to the manner in which the United States must disengage from direct involvement in underdeveloped countries. Such a disengagement need not be the result of isolationist sentiments. It must envisage a new role for the United States and new forms of relationships which will take into account the interests of both America and the underdeveloped peoples. Yet such a change in policy must necessarily be preceded by not only an examination of its assumptions but also a redefinition of its goals.

At the very least and without envisaging a revolution in America, one has a right to expect Americans to understand that the underdeveloped countries are undergoing a simultaneous triple transformation—social, economic and political—in telescoped time, and under the multiple pressures of colonial heritage and growing population. We citizens of these countries hope to avoid excessive civil conflicts, or regression into the colonial, racist, Fascist and Stalinist aberrations that attended the phased modernization of Western countries—even though they enjoyed the luxuries of time, superior psychological, economic and cultural resources, plus the opportunity of relegating to the colonies and the expanding frontier the tensions and ambitions produced by technology and social change. But we shall inevitably experience conflicts and disorders in the process of formulating our values and reconstructing our societies. The interest of the United States does not lie in influencing the outcome of such conflicts, but in preventing their enlargement into international wars and in reducing the extent of destruction.

Second, the United States might redefine its goals just enough to permit an operative admission that the world, particularly the parts inhabited by the dispossessed and the poor, is not a hunting ground for American business nor, more importantly, a dumping place for its surplus weapons. Third, one could reasonably expect contemporary Americans to understand that, just as it proved unsafe to have Harlem and Watts in their midst, the poor and the oppressed in a shrinking world will eventually make it an unsafe place to live. It is, therefore, a good investment to spend some money on, so to say, water power instead of fire power.

More specifically, this means that the United States must disengage militarily from and dismantle its bases in Latin America, Asia and Africa. It means also that the great powers must start negotiations to bar the supply of heavy arms to underdeveloped countries. Such an agreement is more crucial to world peace and well-being than the more dramatic issue of nuclear disarmament.

A plan for restricting military capabilities of the Third World can probably be enforced only in stages, for in certain areas—Korea, Middle East, India-Pakistan, etc.—it will be hard, initially, to obtain great-power agreements, and to assure reliable protection for the constituent states against aggression by an industrialized neighbor capable of producing heavy arms. Yet assuming America's willingness to exercise its leadership as a superpower in this direction, it is not difficult to conceive of several workable alternatives.

The United States, if it genuinely desires to help the poor, must shift its priorities. It could begin by offering favorable terms for international trade. Also, one-fifth of its military budget (i.e., more than $20 billion) could be shifted to developmental research and anti-poverty programs around the world. To avoid incrementalism and intervention, as well as to achieve maximum efficacy and freedom from diplomatic and political constraints, this benevolence would best be internationalized. A multinational Organization of International Cooperation, endowed by the rich countries to the tune of some $50 billion annually, would certainly mark the beginning of peaceful cooperation among divergent nations of the world. I doubt that even the USSR could long resist the pressures and prestige of joining this consortium of the rich, especially if the small European and nonaligned countries were given a prominent role in fixing the criteria for aid, thus keeping it somewhat free of cold-war diplomacy.

I am not optimistic that even these minimal expectations will be met in the near future. That being so, I feel that the poor countries will eventually be better off without direct American military and economic assistance, for American presence and intervention can only distort their development and enhance their sorrow. In America today the thoroughly discredited dogma of anti-communism is being replaced by the specter of isolationism. Although my country is on the receiving end and although I am fully aware of its misery, I feel no inhibition in acknowledging that I would rather live in this world with an isolationist than with an activist and interventionist America. But we may not have a choice.

EAST OF THE WALL

GERMANY NO LONGER

SIDNEY DU BROFF

Mr. Du Broff is an American author, resident in London, who frequently visits and reports on Eastern Europe. He also writes fiction, his most recent novel being Woe to the Rebellious Children.

London

A state now almost twenty years old, East Germany—the German Democratic Republic—is little known, little understood and little liked. Two important reasons contribute to this: the skillful and expensive press-agenting by West Germany, and the clumsy, rigid and unskillful East German presentation of themselves. While West Germany has been marketed and sold like a product, East Germany, deliberately isolated, is best known for the escape attempts of its citizens. These feats are often engineered under West German auspices; if the escapee winds up dead in the barbed wire, so much the better for the West German propaganda media. [See "Letter from Germany" by Leslie R. Colitt, page 283.]

West Germany, rebuilt after the war as a "bulwark against Bolshevism," is America's best friend in Europe, perhaps in the world. United States foreign policy requires a dangerous, belligerent, sword-rattling East Germany to justify the maintenance of troops in Europe. An enemy is the prerequisite of a war machine. America is the parent of West Germany and the policies of the two countries run parallel. They have very successfully branded East Germany as the outlaw of Europe.

West Germany, laying claim to all of East Germany, as well as part of Poland, does not really want unification since that would upset the delicate religious balance in the Protestants' favor. Russia has tried not to take the existence of East Germany too seriously; the Soviet Union is both afraid and jealous of it, and would probably be glad to exchange East Germany's present Socialist status for a unified, neutral, disarmed Germany. For the present at least, West Germany is not ready to make this kind of deal, though it may become increasingly attractive as East Germany's economic strength continues to grow. But economic strength is what Herr Ulbricht is depending upon to prevent such an eventuality.

Much of the animosity once felt toward Germany as a whole is now directed toward East Germany, not only from Western Europe but from East European countries as well. The Hallstein Doctrine lays down that countries which recognize East Germany cannot be recognized by West Germany. (Russia is an exception.) Thus Bulgaria, Hungary and Romania find their sister Socialist Republic an embarrassment when they attempt to conclude wider diplomatic functioning and increased trade relations with hard-currency West Germany, which is itself eager for these new markets. In 1966 East Germany was turned down for membership in the United Nations. To travel in the West, an East German must apply to the Allied Travel Board in West Berlin for permission, which is not granted lightly or often, and is frequently refused in an arbitrary assertion of power. If a visa should be granted, the holder may not say that he comes from the German Democratic Republic, the official name, but only from East Germany. Isolated, demoralized, harassed and threatened, the East Germans feel—and are—alone in a very hostile world. Their reaction has been one of bitterness and hurt pride, particularly in view of their considerable material progress.

A real split exists in the German Democratic Republic (the GDR) between young and old. Those of 35 and younger are very different from their elders. Many of them knew Nazism as children, then Stalinism, then anti-Stalinism. They are skeptics. If you, or Walter Ulbricht, says something, they will listen; then want you, or Walter Ulbricht, to prove it.

This new German is very un-German, pleasant to see and encounter. He is not rigid, nor dogmatic, nor a blind follower. Though the government told him he should support the Arabs during and after the Six Day War, he preferred the Israelis. He, and most East Germans, including party members, also supported Czechoslovakia last year, and some of them said so quite openly. This younger East German, more often than not, is a Socialist, aware of the advantages, which he feels are perfectly evident in his ordinary, everyday life. But he dislikes bureaucracy and in time will probably change it in a quiet, calm and orderly way, with hardly a pause to indicate that any change has taken place.

The young, who know the future is theirs, are waiting. In some respects they are impatient, angry because the government puts so little faith in them and their loyalty as to deny them unlimited access to the printed word from Western sources. They completely and entirely resent and reject this censorship, which they feel is a reflection on their ability to discern good from bad and right from wrong. At the same time, West German radio and television programs are readily received on multitudes of East German sets.

From a personal and practical point of view the East Germans see that huge housing units are going up in relatively short time, and that they are moving into them. Usually both husband and wife have jobs. There are nurseries for their children—the need is not fully met but is rapidly approaching that point and moving infinitely faster than in the other Eastern European countries. Up until 3, children are under the care and supervision of the Ministry of Health; beyond that, of the Ministry of Education. There is one nurse for every five children in the 3 and below group; you can count for yourself as you see the kids, beautifully dressed and clean, strolling slowly down the street, hand in hand with the nurse or the other children.

A couple will probably have a combined income of 1,200 to 1,400 marks a month—often more (a man's suit costs 125 marks and up). The stores are filled with merchandise of every description, priced within reason. Weekends, children and parents will usually be together, walking slowly along Karl Marx Allee, holding hands in a most loving, and un-German, manner. If there is a head of the house here, it is the child, who generally appears fully aware of his exalted position.

High school students are given a government grant when they reach the age at which they could choose to go to work. Starting at about 40 marks monthly and increasing appreciably as the students advance, it covers their expenses and eliminates the need to take money from parents who might encourage them to leave school and become wage earners. In families where there has never been a tradition of education, and only a regular pay envelope has real significance, grants are a concrete inducement to stay at school. Indeed, grants have become a keynote of recent East German domestic policy—bonuses and incentive payments are used to induce people to do more and to produce more. The effect has been quite startling, as a visit to any shop will prove.

Boys with long hair and stylish clothes walk up and down Karl Marx Allee in groups of two or more, often carrying transistor radios (the larger the radio, the more prestige; and the very "with it" ones are now carrying portable transistor tape recorders). The authorities do not appear to be disturbed by this display, though were the same young men to produce and distribute leaflets condemning the Soviet invasion of Czechoslovakia, they would soon find that official tolerance is not very elastic.

The German Democratic Republic is the fifth industrial power in Europe, ninth in the world. Its population is only about 17 million, as compared with a West German population of about 52 million. It started with less than nothing—delivering what it could produce to the Soviet Union, at the same time that America's Germany was receiving massive aid. As late as 1960 the buildings on Unter den Linden were held up by long poles. Today Unter den Linden houses the new Soviet Embassy, smart cafés, an automobile showroom, the Chamber of Foreign Trade, fashionable clothing shops for men and women, stores selling furs, imported liquors and tobacco, leather goods and jewelry. East Berlin is the shopping center of Eastern Europe. Russians churn out of the revolving doors of the giant Warenhaus department store at an amazing rate, laden with suitcases and other packages. Poles, with the black-market dollars readily available in Poland, shop at the expensive store which specializes in imported French fashions. East Berlin will soon complete the tallest building in Europe, a television tower.

The government is liked; government popularity, particularly in East Europe, is usually based on the standard of living it is able to provide. Since the construction of the Wall, which put an end to the drain of currency and skilled manpower, the climb to prosperity has been steady. Freedom is a relative and abstract term, more significant to intellectuals than to a factory foreman who is figuring how long he will have to save to buy a car, taking into consideration his ever-increasing production bonuses.

Ulbricht is liked, if not loved. He is a remote figure, despite his appearances at farms and factories to shake hands and present awards. He is the old-fashioned German Papa, the head of the house who made the decisions which no one dreamed of questioning. But in this new Germany, Papa is head of the house only because the rest of the family approve of the manner in which he functions. Ulbricht, thus, is something of an anachronism. The young, encouraged perhaps by the externally enforced isolation, feel an urge to participate; among older people isolation sometimes has the opposite effect, making them unable or unwilling to take part.

East Berlin, despite its position, is a calm, tranquil and relatively tension-free city. It would appear to be a very normal sort of city—much like anywhere else. The citizens are annoyed because West Berliners, many of whom have relatives in East Berlin, cannot come across the border to visit, as they once did. GDR policy now is to consider West Berlin as an entity separate from West Germany, and to accord it the status of independent municipality. This is not acceptable to either West Berlin or West Germany. Hence, while visitors may come to the GDR from West Germany, West Berliners are barred.

Once you are inside the borders of the GDR, the ogre image suddenly disappears. The people, accustomed to foreigners from both East and West, including GIs and British Tommies sightseeing for the day, are without hostility, and will talk quite freely on the streets or in a café. The waiters, particularly in the better restaurants, remain the most enthusiastic proponents and practitioners of free enterprise—as well as the best argument against it; they are notorious cheats.

Desperate for recognition, East Germany has been thrusting itself heavily upon the coquettishly demurring Arabs, who do them the favor of accepting large amounts of aid. The Arab threat to recognize East Germany is useful in exacting more assistance from West Germany. Arabs are a luxury the GDR can afford without depriving its own people, but the misalliance will not go on forever, with the Arabs taking everything and giving nothing—not even recognition.

East Germany—the German Democratic Republic—would do itself a favor if it stopped calling itself Germany, either East or Democratic. It should change its name—divorce itself from its past, and emerge as a new and separate state, with many of the accompanying advantages. The West Germans, paranoid in their efforts to prevent any form of recognition for East Germany—including sports activities and UN membership—would be undermined. Besides, East Germany is not really German any more, and the new generation is proving it.

NO MORE SOMBREROS

THE CHICANO REBELLION

ROY BONGARTZ

Mr. Bongartz, author of Twelve Chases on West 99th Street (Houghton Mifflin), has been a radio announcer, educational adviser, reporter and Nation contributor for many years. He is now a free-lance writer, specializing in travel, and wrote the following article on assignment from The Nation during a recent visit to California.

Now it's the Mexican Americans—Chicanos, they are called in California—who are appearing on the scene of protest, with a self-evaluation that breaks radically away from the old, degrading stereotype of fatalistic loafer asleep under a sombrero. These young Chicanos are wide-awake, and when something happens, they intend to be the ones who make it happen. Militant Chicano student organizations are active throughout California, not only in colleges but in high schools as well, and they are growing in the rest of the Southwest: the Mexican-American Student Association, United Mexican-American Students, Mexican-American Student Confederation. They all make a central demand for courses in Mexican-American studies, such as are now available at San Francisco State College, Sacramento State College, California State College in Los Angeles, San Fernando Valley College and the University of California at Berkeley.

Teaching the course at Berkeley is Octavio I. Romano, an anthropologist, born in Mexico and raised in California, who wants to destroy the myth of the passive Mexican. He points out that Mexican Americans have been the main figures in the labor movement in the Southwest, that they published the first Western underground newspapers, that they have pushed through bilingual education in two states, that they clinched the victory for John F. Kennedy, that they have a strong influence on the Spanish language that extends into Mexico itself, even that they originated driftwood sculpture.

Romano's most energetic attacks are aimed at sociologists who are preserving stale anti-Mexican prejudices in the academic jargon of scholarly works. In place of "the Mexican is lazy," the academic (in this case Celia Heller) writes: "The combination of stress on work and rational use of time forms little or no part of the Mexican-American socialization process." Instead of saying that you can't tell them apart, she writes: "They exhibit a marked lack of internal differentiation." Referring to this and other writers of Chicano studies, including William Madsen, Ruth Tuck, Lyle Saunders, Florence Kluckhohn, Fred L. Strodbeck, Julian Samora and Richard Lamanna, Romano says: "Contemporary social scientists [are] busily perpetuating the very same opinions of Mexican culture that were current during the Mexican-American War. These opinions were, and are, pernicious, vicious, misleading, degrading and brainwashing."

Romano has some new ideas on how to give a college course. For one, students will think up a subject and assign it as a term paper to the instructor, then grade the paper and discuss it in class. Students' own papers must be presented in three versions—one in academic style, one in a "journal" style for possible publication in a Chicano review, and the last a newspaper version to be submitted to a local paper. Students writing the papers for publication will work directly with the editors. Members of the course may take a third of class time to address their colleagues on any relevant subject. It is Romano's hope that by using students' own ideas and writings the course may improve and grow in the future. Sacramento State is already planning a four-year program leading to a B.A. in Mexican-American studies.

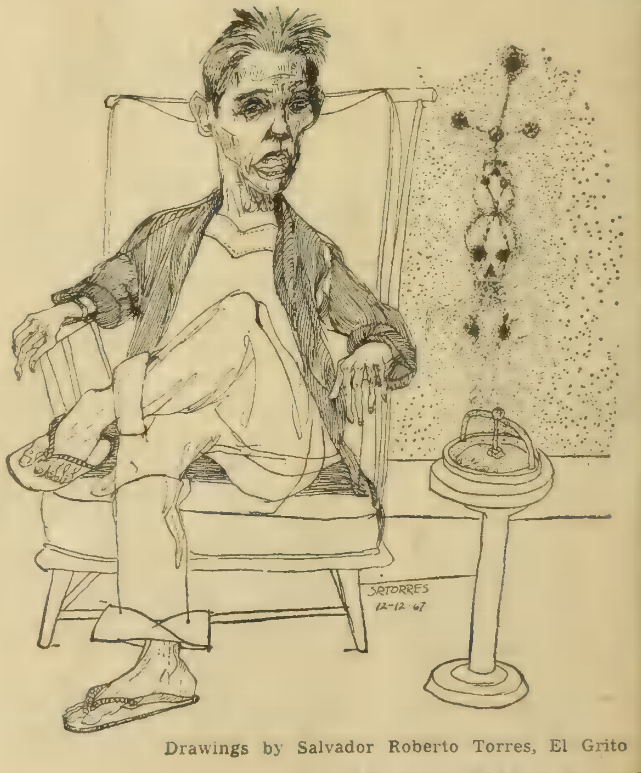
But the Mexican Americans at Berkeley have not confined themselves to the classroom. A number of Romano's students are among the hundred-odd members of a student group called Quinto Sol, some of whom two years ago marched in upon hearings of the U.S. Civil Rights Commission in San Francisco to protest the exclusion of Mexican Americans from a program designed to recruit college students from minority groups. They also attacked the commission for having but one Mexican American on its staff of 350, yelling "Practice what you preach!" at commission members until police threw them out. Quinto Sol members invaded and occupied the office of the university president at Berkeley to protest the purchase of California grapes by the university cafeteria—student groups all solidly support the nation-wide grape boycott led by César Chavez and the United Farm Workers. The Chicanos were forcibly removed from the office and eleven of them were jailed.

Says one Quinto Sol leader, Nick Vaca, 24, a graduate student and an editor of a sharp new quarterly review called El Grito (The Cry): "The message our group wants to give is that the Mexican American is not docile. That idea of the 'sleeping giant' is an insult—it's that same old peon taking his siesta under his hat. Mexican Americans are not an emerging people. We're already here!" Bill Vega, 24, and John Carrillo, 27, who, along with Professor Romano, also help edit the review, agree that the Chicano is here; but they add ruefully that he is here in very few numbers at Berkeley—some 200 out of an enrollment of 25,000. Though they do not want to deny the Negro his chance, they have been forced to vie with him for benefits from the Educational Opportunity Program, whereby colleges recruit a certain number of minority students who cannot satisfy the regular academic entrance requirements and lack the money for college. Even though there are nearly twice as many Mexican Americans as Negroes in California, blacks in the Berkeley Opportunity Program outnumber Chicanos 9 to 1. The average Chicano has an 8th-grade education; the average Negro has ten and a half years of school (Anglos, 12.1 years) in California. Chicanos earn less money than Negroes; that is, less than anybody else in the state.

A little more than two years ago a conference was held in Berkeley to enable Mexican-American high school students from the Bay area who were interested in college to meet counselors from all the colleges in the state; the idea was to help them pick a school and find out how to go about getting admitted. Nearly 2,000 Chicanos applied to attend the conference, which had to be limited to 600 from lack of space. Two counselors showed up, only Mills College and Contra Costa bothering to send anybody. "We're facing a monumental indifference to the Mexican American," says Romano. "And they blame the kid in the barrio for being 'non-goal-oriented.' "

In the continuous political free-for-all at Sather Gate, Berkeley students wearing great Walt Disney pig heads rush a group of sign carriers in a noontime skit lampooning police attacks on militants over at San Francisco State. But Chicanos and their problems are invisible. El Grito is aware that Berkeley students are supposed to be radicals, but notes that they give Chicanos very little support. They don't back the grape boycott; they don't demand increased Chicano student enrollment. The editors believe that the Anglos are moved by self-interest and that the Mexican-American cause doesn't fit the pattern.

Chicanos have only a toehold at Berkeley, but they are more numerous at some other colleges. At San Jose City College, for example, the Mexican-American Student Confederation (MASC) recently organized a Mexican Week for both students and townspeople. It provided an art show, film festival, discussions, a show of regional Mexican clothing, a charreado (football match), and a horse show put on by Los Charros de la Plata Aspada (Silver Spurs). The climax was a talk by an old Mexican revolutionary who had fought with Pancho Villa and Zapata. Says one MASC member, Manuel Madrid, 23, "Our main goal is to orient the Chicano to think Chicano so as to achieve equal status with other groups, not to emulate the Anglo. A decade ago, the idea was that the Mexican American wanted to be totally assimilated into the American culture. But not now."



Drawings by Salvador Roberto Torres, El Grito

A Mexican-American counselor named Angelo Atondo is on the scene at San Jose City College as a direct result of Chicano student agitation. "The attitudes of Mexican Americans toward themselves has completely changed since I graduated from college in 1956," he says. "We never spoke Spanish. We would have been stared at. There was a silent taboo against Spanish." He explains that San Jose is an "open door" college, with a two-year program that can lead to continued studies at one of the state colleges or can give a diploma in a wide variety of vocational fields, mostly technical. "A student can get in here even if he had straight Ds in high school," says Atondo. "We salvage many students that way."

One student who dropped out of high school is Lee Polanco, now 31, a qualified electrician who bitterly recalls answering a help-wanted ad by telephone, being invited for an interview, and then, because he's a Chicano, being greeted with: "What do you want? Get out of here!" Polanco, director of campus activities in MASC, is studying social sciences. "We found that the colleges were paying attention to the blacks because they were militant, so we started to get as militant as the blacks," he says. His friend Manuel Madrid adds, "I hope we don't have to get as militant as the blacks. But if we have to, we will."

Polanco points out that of the 12,000 students at San Jose, some 1,200 are Mexican American, while 200 are black. But four courses are offered in black studies, and only one in a Mexican-American subject. Naturally the Chicanos want to adjust that balance. "We're being ignored," says Madrid, "but we want to work with the blacks."

Besides getting a counselor assigned to the college, the Chicanos succeeded in having a committee from their group screen the professor who teaches the one Mexican culture course; they even got some money from the administration for their Mexican Week. In addition to demanding more Chicano-oriented courses, including one in Spanish for the Spanish-speaking, they want free buses to town and back. Going beyond their own issues, they have held a vigil of sympathy for students at Mexico City who were killed or injured there by troops last year.

Manuel Madrid also dropped out of high school from discouragement. "The white kids knew you weren't like them. Talking Spanish was a 'no-no.' It gave us an inferiority complex." One of the most encouraging things about Madrid and other dropouts now in college is their concern for the young coming up behind them. They go out to the high schools to talk with Chicano students and encourage them to stay in school, and they intend to have MASC make this a part of its official program. Madrid, who may well realize that he's on his way, still says, "Let's get a little uncomfortable about our friends back there."

But these days there is much less apathy among the friends back in high school. Thirteen East Los Angeles Chicanos were arrested last May for organizing a boycott of their schools to protest intolerable conditions. In Livingston, fifty-three Chicanos skipped their high school classes on Mexican Independence Day, demanding it be made an official holiday. They also wanted the schools to hire Mexican teachers and counselors, and to offer courses in Mexican and black history. They wanted the double lunch periods ended—white kids at the first sitting; black and brown at the second. Police picked up the truants, although at harvest time, when the big local farms need extra help, the compulsory attendance law is ignored.

Hospital Daydream

At Fremont High School, in Oakland, students demonstrated for weeks to demand a Chicano student union, and Mexican-American entertainment and speakers at assemblies. A Chicano group called Los Carnales at Redwood High in Visalia made twenty-one demands on the principal, including Mexican food in the cafeteria, mandatory attendance by all teachers at classes in black and Mexican culture, and a rule to keep police, probation and parole officers off the school grounds.

Though nothing enrages the young Chicanos more than to be called "emerging," the facts are not only that their political awareness (like that of all young people) has become greatly sharpened of late but also that their presence as an intellectual force is for the first time establishing itself. Bronze, a new militant paper at San Jose, deals with problems that haunt Mexican Americans. Writes Luis Valdez: "This is a society largely hostile to our cultural values. There is no poetry about the United States. No depth, no faith, no allowance for human contrariness. No soul, no mariachi, no chili sauce, no pulque, no mysticism, no chingaderas." Valdez sees a gloomy future for Mexican Americans who lose their identity in the cities: "They have solved their Mexican contradictions with a pungent dose of Americanism, and are more concerned with status, money and bad breath than with their ultimate destiny." But he does not despair altogether. "There will always be raza [the race, the people] in this country. There are millions more where we came from." Manuel Madrid says that the 50,000 immigrants who arrive every year from Mexico "give us all a shot in the arm."

Another student describes the strains of holding to a clear identity: "Sometimes you have to go to a Mexican show or a Mexican bar and be by yourself, to remind yourself of what you are. And then you . . . begin to see that you are becoming something that you are not and you know it. I had to relearn how it is to be a Mexican and what it is like for so many Mexicans to be poor in San Jose. Hijo, I was so dumb that I used to be proud to have Mexicans die in the war. I used to be so dumb that I used to think in college how beautiful it would be to pick fruta again and watch la raza work against the rays of the sun, that is how stupid I used to be."

A number of newspapers have formed the Chicano Press Association, which includes El Malcriado in Delano, La Raza, Carta Editorial and Inside Eastside in Los Angeles, El Gallo in Denver, El Papel in Albuquerque, Inferno in San Antonio and Compass in Houston. A note in El Grito says they are all "very relevant to Mexican Americans, Spanish Americans, Chicanos, Hispanos, Spanish-Speaking Latin Americans, Mexican-Latin Spanish Speakers, greasers, spics and bandits." (One of El Grito's favorite targets is the way some Tío Tomás Mexicans try to dissociate themselves from la raza by using fancy group names: "a vacuous ethnic taxonomy," El Grito calls it.

By far the most impressive evidence of intellectual liveliness among Chicano students is to be found in the pages of El Grito, named for the famous "cry" of the Mexican Revolution. It grew out of publication by Quinto Sol, the Berkeley student group, of articles attacking social scientists; these were called The Mexican-American Liberation Papers, and were priced at $2 for students, $15 for federal agencies, $500 for governors of states and $15,000 for the President of the United States. El Grito first appeared in the fall of 1967, after the editors had each contributed $50 to $100 to pay the printing bill; it has been solvent ever since. The journal threatens its readers: "Subscribe now, or La Llorona will get you" (she's the witch who grabs bad Mexican children). The journal has been much helped financially by the fact that several of the Mexican-American college courses use it—900 copies, for example, go to San Jose State. But at Berkeley itself enthusiasm remains low; a mailing of 300 fliers brought in but one subscription. "Publishing in Berkeley is a real hang-up," the editors say.

The editors want to explore relationships between Chicanos and Mexico. They believe they can see philosophies of life that are very different here and in Mexico. They say the United States has a nationalistic ideology that develops "self-interest groups through a combination of political and religious affiliation." The Mexican idea, in their view, is much broader—people tackling moral problems as world-wide concerns, not just Mexican. The editors have published some work, and want to carry more, from the Mexican nueva ola—new wave—currently being produced by a café clique in Guadalajara.

Chicanos accuse both Jews and Negroes of nationalism. Writes Nick Vaca, "After viewing the effects of the nationalistic fervor in Israel, it is not surprising to note that it has been the Jewish merchant who has exploited and continues to exploit Negroes in the ghettos. . . ." Vaca is no more friendly toward the black, who, he writes, "is systematically 'putting down' his 'brown brother.'" The Chicanos were especially angered by a black teacher's remark: "While blacks were out protesting, Mexican Americans were sitting at home before their television sets, eating beans." Chicanos have much warmer feelings toward the smaller ethnic groups—American Indians, Filipinos, Hawaiians, Samoans and Koreans, and include them in demands for a fair share of educational opportunity.

A more encouraging aspect of El Grito's point of view is its concern about aspects of American society that affect everybody. For example, they would like to do away with commercials in television and radio news broadcasts: "When a people have to wait for news of the world, for news of their country, and even of their own community, while mascara is peddled, then that people have lost the right to be called civilized." The editors would also put an end to Congressional hearings on local social problems: "It seems absurd, as we do today, to elect a man to Washington only to have him return to find out what problems exist. . . . People are electing representatives who do not know what is going on, and who then, at taxpayers' expense, must return in order to find out." El Grito also favors having the length of military service determined by income, and in wartime would draft industry, so that workers and management receive soldiers' pay.

The journal runs thoroughgoing pieces on the use of Mexican national workers in the border areas, which El Grito calls the Mexican-Dixon line, and one of its contributors has offered the pertinent suggestion that U.S. aid to Mexico should go mainly to raising Mexican income, along the border, and "not, as is happening now, to lowering the American to present Mexican levels." A joint border authority would take over the economics of these international communities. The journal prints some of its material in Spanish, and derides such continuing tenets as that of Theodore Roosevelt, who said: "We have room for but one language here, and that is the English language, for we intend to see that the crucible turns our people out as Americans, of American nationality, and not as dwellers in a polyglot boarding house." The editors point out that many people "speak English somewhat colorfully," and suggest Lyndon Johnson, May West, Zsa Zsa Gabor, Wernher von Braun, Lawrence Welk, Everett Dirksen and George Jessel.

Excellent graphic work, both drawings and photographs, enliven the pages of El Grito. The clash-and-blend flavor of Mexican-American life is expressed in a renewed tradition of bilingual poetry in which lines of Spanish alternate with lines of English. They do not translate each other, but move the thought along in the two tongues.

Mexican Americans everywhere in the Southwest are feeling their oats, not only in traditional labor-movement unity but now also as students, writers, artists, teachers—as thinkers. A bilingual poem by John J. Martinez, a mathematics major at Berkeley, sounds the note:

brown power!
qué?
Together we must . . .
Sí!
The problem . . .
qué?
It's your fault . . .
who?
I mean . . .
qué?
brown power!
testing, testing, testing
uno, dos, tres . . .

A TIP FROM THE CONQUEROR

JUDITH T. YOUNGER

Mrs. Younger is an Assistant Attorney General of the state of New York and a former teacher of land use planning at New York University School of Law. The views expressed here are those of the author and do not represent the official policy of the Attorney General.

There are, according to the latest United Nations' count, 3.42 billion people in the world. Two hundred thirty-nine million or 7 per cent of them are in the Soviet Union and 200 million, or almost 6 per cent, are in the United States. The Soviets have one-sixth of the world's total land area, or 8.7 million square miles, to romp in; the American national playpen is less than half that size, 3.6 million square miles. Soviet and American boundaries, barring conquest or moon colonies, are fixed, but inside them the populations expand. Thus the need for land multiplies, and ever-increasing numbers of Russians and Americans clamor for more room. Take, for example, three of modern life's greatest consumers of space.

Housing. More and more land is destined to be occupied by housing. The Soviet Union is the third most prolific house builder in the world. It has been filling up acreage at an annual rate of ten new dwellings per 1,000 people, and last year completed 2.3 million new units. Despite this intensive building program, begun in the mid-fifties, available housing facilities still lag behind the demand. To meet future needs in urban areas alone, the Russian house-building rate will have to increase by more than 30 per cent in the next eleven years.

The United States boasts 342 dwelling units per 1,000 people as compared to 240 for the Soviet Union. It proposes, nevertheless, to build another 26 million homes in the next ten years. Even if this fantastic goal is met, a trend toward two-house families foreshadows unlimited need. A Bureau of the Census Survey reports that 1.7 million households (one out of every thirty-five) now have second homes and 300,000 more planned to acquire them during the two years beginning in April, 1967. As the number of dwelling units increases, so does their size. In the five years from 1960 to 1965, the average number of rooms per Russian dwelling went up from 2.8 to 3. There was a comparable rise in the United States, from 4.8 to 5.

Cars. A record 9.6 million cars were sold in the United States in 1968, with almost 73 million of known age already in use in 1967. Despite the almost 4 million miles of municipal and rural highway on which cars can travel, more land continues to be set aside for their use. Last year Congress added $14 billion to its already burgeoning highway construction fund, authorized 1,500 miles of "missing link" highways, launched a program by which the federal government will pay half the cost of demonstration parking lots built at the boundaries of business districts in cities of more than 50,000, and ordered the construction of the controversial Three Sisters Bridge and an eight-lane Potomac River Freeway in the District of Columbia.

If the Soviet Union now assigns less land to cars, it is only because it has fewer of them. Recent developments indicate that it is catching up fast. Next year, for the first time in its history, the Soviet Government will allocate funds under a separate budget heading for gasoline stations, car wash facilities, repair shops, spare parts suppliers, garages and other services associated with automobiles. Passenger car production—now about 250,000 a year—will increase fourfold when the $800 million Fiat plant in construction at Togliatti on the Volga River begins operations in the '70s. According to the magazine Soviet Life, private automobile ownership is already common enough to provide the subject matter of a current hit movie, Beware the Automobile, in which the hero insures cars by day and steals them at night; and traffic conditions are bad enough in Leningrad and other cities to warrant the installation of talking traffic lights which tell pedestrians when they may safely cross.

New Towns. In forty years from 1926 to 1966, the urban population of the Soviet Union rose from 26.3 million to 124.8 million; the rural population decreased from 120.7 to 107.1 million. Fifty-four per cent of the population now lives in urban developments; by 1980, the figure will grow to 70 per cent. Determined to avoid the "urban sprawl," characteristic of American cities, the Soviets, like the English, have adopted a policy of containing the growth of old communities and settling increasing numbers of the population in new ones. Thus from 1917 through 1965, the Russians built more than 900 new towns, 400 on completely new territory and 500 through the development and radical reconstruction of existing small settlements. Despite similar long-term population trends, new towns in the United States, unlike those of the Soviet Union, have been strictly private affairs. No one knows exactly how many there are, estimates ranging from 250 to fifteen, but President Johnson's Advisory Commission on Intergovernmental Relations expressed doubt that "new communities actually incorporating significant residential, commercial and industrial features exceed fifty projects in all of the United States." In its April, 1968, report it listed fifty-three new towns in construction, covering 879,913 acres in eighteen states and ranging in size from 1,000 acres (Oxmoor, Ky.) to 101,120 acres (California City, Calif.). Whatever their exact number, new towns are likely to proliferate. Congress has given them its imprimatur, offering, in 1968 legislation, to guarantee bonds, debentures and notes of those brave enough to undertake their development.

Houses, motor cars and new towns are a few of the contenders for available space. Advocates of jetports, heliports, power plants, parks, universities, atomic blasting grounds, wildlife refuges, jogging trails, subways, dams, offices, industrial complexes all want more land for their projects. They are getting it, but not in the most suitable places; developing it, but not in the most beautiful ways; and using it recklessly, as if the supply were inexhaustible. This is a familiar story in America, where land development is the haphazard result of dickering between private landowners and a multitude of local governments endowed with the power to regulate them. Owners are interested in profits; local governments in satisfying those who elect them. In the last twenty years Congress has passed a host of laws, ranging from Title I of the Housing Act of 1949 to the New Communities Act of 1968, designed via financial incentives to teach owners and local governments to think in terms of the public good. The educational effect of these programs, judging from the ugly buildings, dreary roads, smog-covered cities and polluted waters which surround us, has not been impressive. Despite the deteriorating environment, few Americans would vote to scrap the present system of local land use regulation. They doubt that regional or central controls would yield anything better. The Russian experience supports them.

In the Soviet Union land belongs to the state. The government has absolute powers and public values are supposed to take precedence over private. Despite these advantages, the Russians have hardly made perfect use of their land. Rich farmland is allocated to housing and industry while nearby uncultivated acreage lies overlooked. Industrial enterprises build and mine but fail to take protective measures or rehabilitate the land. Thus, large areas of the country have been ruined through wind and water erosion and lost fertility. Arable land per capita declined sharply from 1.06 hectares in 1956 to .96 in 1966. The situation is worse in individual republics. The private sector (see "Russia's 'Private' Sector," by Margaret Miller, The Nation, September 23, 1968) continues thornlike to prick the governmental hide. Citizens farm their private plots intensively—these make up only 3 per cent of the country's total cultivated area, but produce more than half its eggs and potatoes and nearly half its meat and vegetables—to the neglect of less rewarding obligations on state and collective farms. Others grow rich on profits from illegal building, rentals and sales.

The Soviet Government has responded with a "new" scheme for determining priorities, allocating land and controlling its use. This plan, "Draft Principles of Land Legislation," as it is called, is based on an idea which came out of Norman England 884 years ago. The Russians, concerned for the future, have harked to William the Conqueror's "deep speech with his wise men" which resulted, according to W. F. Maitland, in "the mission, throughout all England of 'barons,' 'legates' or 'justices' charged with the duty of collecting" for the Conqueror, "from the verdicts of the shires, the hundreds and the vills, a descriptio of his new realm." In essence, the Soviet "Draft Principle" is the same thing as William's descriptio or "Domesday Book," as it came to be called. If the Russian plan, now being discussed throughout the nation, is passed as expected, the central government will be charged with compiling a nation-wide descriptio of the use, soil characteristics and economic value of every bit of land in the country. The ultimate product, a Domesday Book for the Soviet Union, will be the basis for rational classification, assignment and use of the land.

The idea of a land census—the Russians call it a cadastre—is a good one in these times of expanding population and diminishing open space. It seems particularly apt for America, where land development is becoming a profitable corporate venture. Companies which have never been in the field before are suddenly buying up land. They are acquiring large tracts, planning their use, and marketing to builders what J. W. Van Gorkom, president of Union Tank Car Company, calls a "complete package," including roads, utilities and zoning. This kind of program may be good for stockholders in Union Tank Car Company, Chrysler, Westinghouse, I.T.T., Gulf and Western and the other corporations that will join them in the land development business. The important question, however, is whether the rest of America can afford it. Large corporations are unlikely guardians for a dwindling natural resource. They are in business for profits. Land development, Van Gorkom freely admits, is expected to "yield ample rewards." Should big corporations be allowed to enjoy them? Perhaps. Corporate giants may produce better landscapes than do individual developers or national governments, and we may still have enough undeveloped land left to afford the experiment. But perhaps not. Corporate carelessness made a cesspool of the Connecticut River, defaced the Kentucky countryside and created the oil slick which at this writing is killing sea birds in the Santa Barbara Channel and threatening ruin to California's finest beaches. Whatever the decision, it should be an informed one. We ought to take a leaf from the Conqueror's book and arm ourselves, like the Soviet Union, with an up-to-date inventory of our land. Once we know what we have, we can perhaps agree how to use it.

LETTERS (Continued from page 258)

been advised of any criminal charges against them? Are they being subjected to cruel, inhuman, or degrading treatment or punishment? Are they able to confer freely with counsel of their own choosing? Will they have a fair and public trial by an independent and impartial tribunal? Will they have all the guarantees of justice necessary to their defense?

These are among the human rights set forth in . . . the Universal Declaration of Human Rights of the United Nations. . . .

It is most fitting, indeed it is urgent, that the United Nations, and the Commission on Human Rights inquire immediately whether the Spanish Government is observing or violating the human rights of the men it has recently arrested. . . .

Hannah Ahrendt, W.H. Auden, Richard Hofstadter,
Irving Howe, Robert Lowell, Hans Morgenthau,
Arthur Schlesinger, Jr., Barbara Probst Solomon

BOOKS & THE ARTS

Latin America: Radical Interpretations

LATIN AMERICAN RADICALISM: A Documentary Report on Left and Nationalist Movements. Edited by Irving Louis Horowitz, Josué de Castro and John Gerassi. Random House. 656 pp. $10. Paper $2.45.

ROBERT F. SMITH

Mr. Smith teaches history at the University of Connecticut. He is the author of What Happened in Cuba? (Twayne).

For many years the standard textbook interpretation of the historical development of modern Latin America has remained essentially unchanged. Emphases may vary, but in general the history of the various republics has been presented in terms of struggles between modernism and feudalism, civilian and military, middle class and landowning oligarchs, and democracy and authoritarianism. We have been told ad infinitum that the inevitable, evolutionary road from "dictatorship to democracy" is dependent upon each nation attracting foreign capital in order to industrialize. As the latter takes place, an expanded middle class will take charge and insure democracy, stability, civilian government, and private enterprise capitalism. And, the threat of revolution will disappear forever. In short, Latin American republics (even when controlled by the military) are on the road to becoming just like the United States; except for aberrations such as Cuba. There are, of course, liberal and conservative variants of the orthodox interpretation, but these agree on the latter point.

Since the 19th century, numerous Latin American intellectuals and political activists have attacked these ideas and the ideology behind them. From Simon Bolívar to Fidel Castro such critics have rejected the conceptions that the Estados Unidos del Norte represented a model for all to emulate (willingly or not), and the fount of revealed truth in economics and politics. Some intellectuals and politicians have tried to reproduce what they thought they understood about the traditions of the United States and Western Europe. The great Cuban, José Martí, severely criticized these "Young men [who] go out into the world wearing Yankee or French spectacles, and hope to govern by guesswork a nation they do not know." The "emulators" are considered by North Americans to be friends of democracy, freedom and U. S. interests. For the most part, the critics and their North American counterparts (such as Carleton Beals and the late Waldo Frank) have been ignored or arrogantly dismissed by the higher echelons of our academic, government and business worlds.

During the last decade (thanks in large part to the Cuban Revolution) criticisms of the orthodox interpretation have received increasing attention in the United States. This volume of essays and documents is a significant addition to the bookshelf of dissident views. The specialist in Latin American affairs, through the expenditure of much time and effort, is probably familiar with most of the writers and views presented. But, in assembling these materials from a wide variety of sources, the editors have vastly simplified the task of locating relevant literature for the many nonspecialists who need to see the Latin American experience through the critical lenses of intelligent radicals. The editors are incorrect, however, when they claim that this is the "first documentary which singles out for special attention the role of the left in Latin America." Latin America: Reform or Revolution?, edited by James Petras and Maurice Zeitlin, was published last spring by Fawcett Books (95c). There is a little overlap between the two, but the interested reader should consult both since each fills gaps in the coverage of the other.

Irving Louis Horowitz (sociologist), Josué de Castro (geographer) and John Gerassi (journalist) present what they consider to be the basic themes in their preface. They conclude:

> . . . that the defining characteristic of Latin American radicalism internally is the need for social development; and that would mean the elimination of internal colonialism. But the basic international need is for political revolution; and that would entail the expulsion of foreign imperialism.

The need for fundamental structural change (socioeconomic and political) and the role of the United States in preventing such change are stressed in a number of the selections. But others deal with the first theme only and either avoid or disagree with the second. Some of the authors are convinced that revolution (the real kind, not that of State Department rhetoric) is the only answer to these problems, but others take the line of peaceful reformism. The latter writers do not venture very far from the orthodox interpretation.

The selections of the three editors constitute a very broad definition of the radical spectrum. It is apparent that they agreed to disagree as to the nature of radicalism, and this approach does convey the "pluralization within the left." The lack of precision in definition does pose a few unanswered questions. Are nationalist movements invariably radical? Is there a line, however dim, which separates a radical from a liberal?

In at least three cases this reviewer would argue that the label of radical has been stretched too thin to have any real meaning. An able, scholarly essay by the Argentine sociologist Gino Germani ("Mass Immigration and Modernization in Argentina") analyzes the acculturation of foreigners but does not make any connection between this development and radical or nationalist movements. The essay is informative and worth reading. For the purposes of a reader on radicalism, however, it would seem that something by the economist Gustavo Polit, for example, on the power structure of Argentina would be more to the point. Raúl Prebisch and Paul N. Rosenstein-Rodan both call for reforms and restructuring of the economies of Latin America. Yet, both use the term "restructure" for measures to make private enterprise capitalism work more effectively; they certainly do not interpret it as fundamentally changing the economic system or making basic alterations in the power structure (except as long-range results). I would classify both arguments as fairly traditional, and not radical in either the Latin or North American sense of the term. Perhaps these essays were included to provide a contrasting background for the solidly radical analyses provided by such men as Rodolfo Stavenhagen, Pablo González-Casanova, Salvador de la Plaza, Manuel Maldonado-Denis, and Hélio Jaguaribe.

John Gerassi includes only revolutionaries in his section, "The Political-Activist Pivot." Three of the writers have been killed as a result of their activities as guerrillas—Che Guevara, Fabricio Ojeda, and Camilo Torres Restrepo—and another, Regis Debray, is in prison. The activist credentials of all are well established. In fact, the editor is quite blunt in his assertion that one cannot be a genuine radical unless one is also an active revolutionary. Perhaps this formulation confuses tactics and goals, and draws the definition of radicalism much too thinly. Following the logic of the purist argument, the only persons who can truly claim to be revolutionaries are those who have joined guerrilla bands; "deeds not words" according to the OLAS Declaration of August, 1967.

Several of the selections in this section are specific calls to revolutionary action, and even the more analytical essays include similar declarations. Since all selections basically share the same point of view, there is a fair amount of repetition of arguments and rhetoric. Gerassi's two contributions help to provide some variety. His introduction is a complete and unrelenting damnation of U.S. foreign policy since 1823, which asserts the absolute primacy of economic interest groups in the policy-making process. His discussion of the OLAS Conference of 1967 illuminates in striking terms the growing gulf between the Communist parties of Latin America and the revolutionaries.

Section I ("Socioeconomic Pivot," edited by Horowitz) contains some of the best interpretive essays in the volume. In his introduction, the editor bases his interpretation of the political sociology of Latin America on what he terms the "norm of illegitimacy." This he defines as, "the perception of the state as primarily a power agency which is cemented by a common reliance on illegal means to rotate either the holders of power or the rules under which power is exercised." The preservation of this norm is now guaranteed by the imperial system of the United States which manipulates it to preserve the interests of the United States. This is acceptable to the power groups in Latin America, since it preserves their position. Using a less theoretical approach, Celso Furtado specifically demonstrates the limitations placed upon self-determination by the United States. Furtado rightly argues that the sophisticated U.S. definition of "security" goes far beyond defense, and is an inseparable part of economic, ideological and political hegemony. Thus, any change in the socioeconomic system of a Latin American country becomes a "threat" to the United States, since U.S. officials believe that the status quo is necessary for hegemony. John Saxe-Fernandez presents a specific example of the tactics of hegemony in a detailed essay on the Central American Defense Council.

Rodolfo Stavenhagen and Pablo González-Casanova stress the phenomena of "internal colonialism," especially the urban vs. rural aspect. As Stavenhagen notes, this is not a conflict between new (industrial) and traditional (landed) upper classes. The two are allies in maintaining the status quo which benefits both groups. Horowitz looks at the urban-rural problem from a slightly different perspective. He argues that the urban sector is "a center of reform," but that the rural sector is the center of both reaction and revolution. In the short run, urbanization will lessen the chances for revolution. If, however, urban-based reformers fail to promote social change (and Horowitz is equivocal regarding their chances for success) then the cities will become the "essential proving grounds" for change based on social revolution.

THE THINGS YOU DO NOT SAY

Before
Our tongues
Can make liars
Of words,
We stumble
Over the simplest Feelings.

I think of us
Moving towards,
Away
From language.

I think of our bodies
As a language
Of their own.

I would have you
Translate me
Into yourself.

ADRIANNE MARCUS

The second section of the book (edited by de Castro) is entitled, "The Nationalist Pivot." Most of the essays do concentrate on single countries, but the nationalist aspect keeps blending into the socioeconomic. The introductory essay in fact would fit very well in the first section, since it concentrates on the role of U.S. business in the Latin American economy. More specifically, Fred Goff and Michael Locker set the 20th century U.S. involvement in the Dominican Republic against a backdrop of interlocking government-business connections. In a well researched essay they show the intimate relationship between the political, economic and military aspects of U.S. policy, and the important role played by "political and economic forces within American society." Salvador de la Plaza analyzes the relationship between foreign control of the oil industry in Venezuela and the problems of overall national development. Here again the emphasis is upon the role of the United States in preserving the socioeconomic status quo.

Bo Anderson and James D. Cockcroft break new, interpretive ground in their discussion of "Control and Cooptation in Mexican Politics." They show the skill with which the leaders of the dominant party have maintained political stability by utilizing control and cooptation to balance diverse interests and goals. The result "provides an example of a complicated system of exchanges between interest groups and an oligarchy that provides decisive and sometimes rather ruthless leadership." In his essay on "Political Strategies of National Development in Brazil," Hélio Jaguaribe analyzes the attempts to create a similar system in that country, and the reasons underlying the growing list of failures. Concerning the present situation he concludes: "The military will have to either return power to political parties and the social forces represented through them, or they will have to change in an essential form the orientation of their regime."

A final essay by Eduardo Frei Montalva, the President of Chile, calls for a revitalization of the Alliance for Progress, and its ideological identification with the "more progressive groups in Latin America." Perhaps there was some intention of irony in placing this selection at the end of Section II, since the previous essays by Furtado, Saxe-Fernandez, González-Casanova, de Castro, Goff, Locker, de la Plaza and others, explain rather precisely why the Alliance has not fulfilled Frei's expectations.

The book leaves the reader with the question: which road will Latin America take; reform, revolution, or continuation of prevailing systems? Arguments for the first two are clearly enunciated, but indirectly the third position does emerge in various selections. The predicting of national developments is a precarious game at best, and I have a few reservations about bold proclamations concerning "waves of the future." Yet, there is a kind of historical irony which often follows the attempts of major powers to shape the development of smaller nations.

Perhaps the very efforts of the United States to prevent revolutions and mold nationalisms in Latin America may in the long run produce unexpected (i.e., by the official planners) results. The recent nationalization of U.S. petroleum interests by the military government of Peru is a case in point. Radical action by what appeared to be a rather conservative regime demonstrates something of the unpredictable relationship between nationalism and structural change in Latin America.

Macmillan's Middle Years

THE BLAST OF WAR, 1939-1945. By Harold Macmillan. Harper & Row. 623 pp. $11.95.

THOMAS J. SPINNER, Jr.

Mr. Spinner teaches history at the University of Vermont and has just completed a book about Britain in the 19th century.

Without Hitler, neither Winston Churchill nor Harold Macmillan would ever have become Prime Minister of Great Britain. The second volume of Harold Macmillan's memoirs reveals many of the qualities which helped him climb to the "top of the greasy pole" in British politics.

When World War II began in September, 1939, Harold Macmillan—grandson of a founder of the publishing firm, son of an American mother, student at Eton and Balliol before being severely wounded on the Somme in 1916—was 45 years of age and still a back-bench member of the House of Commons despite almost fifteen years of service in the Conservative cause. His interest in the Disraelian notion of Tory democracy and his desire to find a "middle way" between capitalism and socialism did not endear him to his party chieftains. Opposition to appeasement only furthered his isolation from the Conservative leadership.

Macmillan was not offered an official post until Churchill succeeded Chamberlain in 1940. He was appointed Parliamentary Secretary of the Ministry of Supply—not a major assignment but a beginning—and had the good fortune to serve under Herbert Morrison and Lord Beaverbrook before leaving for the Colonial Office in early 1942. Macmillan's great opportunity came in December, 1942, when Churchill asked him to become British Minister Resident at Allied Headquarters in North Africa.

Macmillan's decision to accept made his future career. For the first time he was able to play a commanding role, to make important decisions, and to recognize and appreciate his own ability. While his own wounds from World War I would never allow him to forget the terrible horror of war, it must be said that Macmillan enjoyed his new assignment in the Mediterranean. Arriving in North Africa in January, 1943, he was promptly thrown into the de Gaulle-Giraud controversy and the Casablanca conference. He worked well with General Eisenhower and Robert Murphy, although there is occasionally a rather patronizing attitude toward Americans—not that we do not sometimes deserve it. Obsessed with the idea that Britain must be Greece to the American Rome, he regarded it as his duty to allow the Americans to talk, while he carefully defended the interests of the British Empire.

To Macmillan, the Mediterranean was a part of the British sphere of interest. He always preferred monarchists, conservatives and liberals to Socialists and Communists—which left little choice between Giraud and de Gaulle—but Macmillan was thoroughly anti-Fascist and anti-Vichy and naturally sympathized with de Gaulle. After tedious negotiations between the two French prima donnas, an agreement was finally achieved but, as Macmillan anticipated, Giraud was out and de Gaulle in full control by early 1944.

Despite the terrible blow de Gaulle dealt him in 1963 when he vetoed Britain's Common Market application, Macmillan can still write that "de Gaulle had, in spite of many faults, real genius. Passionately devoted to France, ruthless where French interests were concerned, insular, half revolutionary, half reactionary, he showed then the first signs of the great career which clearly now places him in the front rank of French statesmen."

By late 1943 Macmillan had been involved in the Sicilian invasion and the Italian surrender. Once again he demonstrated his diplomatic skill and his devotion to monarchy as a stabilizing force. His romantic nature was attracted by the Churchill-Alexander scheme to invade the "soft underbelly" of Central Europe through northern Italy and the Ljubljana Gap, and he concludes that the failure to pursue this idea was "one of the sad turning-points of history." Macmillan never considers the possibility of an Allied rebuff in this rugged region, which might have led to the Russian "liberation" of North Germany, Denmark, the Low Countries and Northern France.

As the Germans retreated from the Balkans in late 1944, the British prepared to rush troops to Athens in order to prevent the Communist-dominated resistance forces—EAM-ELAS—from seizing power. This entire undertaking stimulated Macmillan. He lived for a time in the British Embassy in Athens with bullets whizzing about as he tried to work out a settlement.

The anti-Communist Prime Minister brought back from exile by Macmillan was none other than George Papandreou. But Macmillan fails to see that his description of the British counter-revolution in Greece in support of a "Grove Press has done us all a service by publishing truth that needs to be read."*

SAMMY YOUNGE, JR. "will become a classic case history of that common phenomenon of 1960-66, the radicalization of a middle-class black youth. James Forman provides a look into worlds hidden from most Americans: the world of 'nice' Negroes, the world of almost suicidal in-fighting among Negro organizations, and the world of young blacks who, three years after Sammy Younge's death, will not setle for what he was willing to settle for...An eye-opening book."
—JULIAN BOND, Life

"A hard and affecting story that explains in very personal terms why more militant Black Power has replaced patient attempts at integration as the program for many young Negroes."—Library Journal

SAMMY YOUNGE, JR.

BY JAMES FORMAN

$5.95, now at your bookstore, or order directly from
GROVE PRESS
315 Hudson St., New York 10013
(Please enclose payment, including 25¢ postage) reactionary monarchy provides additional proof for the argument of the "New Left" historians that the British and the Americans must bear a fair share of the burden for the origin of the cold war.

At this time the United States refused to support British counterrevolutionary activities in Greece; Macmillan makes clear his dislike for President Roosevelt's anti-colonialism. Macmillan thought he had preserved democracy, but he seems to have saved Greece for the repulsive colonels who now govern that unhappy land.

Harold Macmillan was destined to be Prime Minister for a longer period of consecutive years than any Conservative premier in the 20th century. It was his activities between 1943 and 1945 which made his later career possible, and this volume will remain an indispensable source for British policy in the Mediterranean during these critical years.

Macmillan's style is usually charming and pointed, but it occasionally becomes precious and bland. One looks forward to the third and final volume of his memoirs. How was it possible for this tough intellectual and man of action to become a caricature of the tired and ineffective Edwardian during his last three years as Prime Minister? And to be brought down by poor health and Christine Keeler was surely a tragic end for a man who had so loyally served his country—and his class—for so many years.

House Affairs

THE GREEN HOUSE. By Mario Vargas Llosa. Translated from the Spanish by Gregory Rabassa. Harper & Row. 405 pp. $6.95.

SARA BLACKBURN

The American publication of Mario Vargas Llosa's widely celebrated second novel will do nothing to alter the general indifference toward Latin American literature which prevails among readers of fiction in this country, and justly so. With Julio Cortázar from Argentina and Colombia's Gabriel García Marquez, Vargas Llosa is Peru's representative to that small party of Latin American novelists whose work is currently enjoying international publication and critical acclaim. Readers of The Green House will be surprised that he is only 33, because the novel, for all its grandeur and the continuously dazzling quality of its style and language, would seem to be the late work of a brilliant older man who has stopped caring much about life, and whose sense of humor has been eroded over the years—an aged Faulkner, say, but without the wit.

The Green House is a brothel on the outskirts of a city on the Amazon, and Vargas Llosa uses it as center for the sprawling biographies of the characters whose lives it touches. Among them are its mysterious, half-saintly founder; some members of the hopelessly corrupt army; the Amazon Indians, who are being destroyed by the combined forces of the local missionaries, the army and the area's revered businessmen, and Fushia, a marvelously evil Japanese smuggler, who is literally rotting away as a result of his own malevolence. The setting alternates between the city in which the Green House is located, and the Amazon jungle, inhabited by the Indians, the missionaries, and Fushia. In alternating and disjointed sequences about the origin and lives of some of the inhabitants from both locations—none of them clear without the parallel narratives about their fellow characters—the novel becomes a history of the founding, destruction, rebuilding and endurance of the brothel. Although we learn about its current life from a young Indian servant at the jungle mission who becomes a prostitute there, we are left to piece together its past and to set it in proper sequence from the histories of the novel's older characters.

The characters are connected with one another somewhere in the narrative, for it is what Vargas Llosa has done with time that gives his novel its originality and makes him more than simply a neo-Faulkner. The novel takes place in a single tense which successfully incorporates what happened in the past, and what might have happened then, into an immediate present. The technique is annoying at first and never quite unintrusive, but it gives the novel a richness of texture which is admirable, even if it is often exhausting to sift through. The world of the novel is timeless, and although almost all of its characters are subjected to indignities of the most profound kind, they absorb them with humdrum ease. Their lives are not about to change. They remain, grotesque and static, as if in an immense and beautiful canvas titled "Suffering Humanity."

While Vargas Llosa's first novel (The Time of the Hero, published here in 1966) about the brutalities of a military school, was widely discussed as a "political" book about Peru, The Green House is only incidentally concerned with social forces. The author seems much more interested in constructing and decorating his ghastly and remarkable landscape than in caring about—or making us care about—who inhabits it, and perhaps this is what accounts for a certain stuffy, old-fashioned flavor in spite of its radical style. In language and construction, it is masterly, but it is finally more exhausting than exciting, the kind of book that professors recommend and students turn away from—a "literary" book to be admired but not much liked.

Gregory Rabassa has made a translator's nightmare into a model of translation at its best: while he is always accurate and true to the Spanish text, he takes great risks and makes them work. He deserves every translation prize going for the accomplishment.

Ski Power

SNOW GODS. By Frederic Morton. World Publishing Co. (NAL book). 365 pp. $5.95.

DANIEL STERN

Mr. Stern is a novelist and critic whose most recent book is The Suicide Academy (McGraw-Hill).

If an ambitious novel, today, does not raise basic questions about the form itself, I tend to question the authenticity of its ambitions. On occasion a novel appears that, by doggedly multiplying the virtues and faults of the novel-as-chronicle-of-society-and-individual-character, restores confidence in the medium. The Fixer, by Malamud, was one such book. Then there are books by Nabokov and Beckett which do quite the opposite. By placing every element of the novel form in question on every page, they transcend its limitations and create a personal art which is a kind of halfway house of the novel: far from Balzac and his miniature societies and too close to poetry to satisfy that deadly hunger to which this infuriating, habit-forming magnificent form has condemned us. And there we hang, distrustful of "social content" in an age when a brilliant para-journalism à la Mailer has appropriated realism for itself—longing for a poetics of the novel that will speak to the sense of strangeness even the least sensitive novel reader feels nibbling at the edges of his life.

This fading away of a secure society as the basis for the novel is at the heart of the problem. It is perfectly illustrated by Beckett's Malone, dying in his room, having, in effect, annihilated the outside world—under the pretext of its having annihilated him. And yet, finally, it won't do. We know there are people out there—perhaps because they cause us too much pain to be ignored. They have power over us and we desire power over them. Perhaps, then, it is still possible to write a serious novel about people in society by isolating this one element: power. Just as, in a way, Thomas Mann isolated the element of disease (or corruption, if you will) in The Magic Mountain.

That is precisely what Frederic Morton has done in his extremely ambitious book Snow Gods. Here at The Griff, the world's most luxurious ski resort in the Swiss Alps, Morton gathers an international cast, much too varied and, at the same time, similar, to be taken seriously. Are we then at The Grand Hotel again? Unquestionably! But our guide, the author, has brought us there to parody such forms of society and art. We are, thus, forced to take these larger-than-life power people seriously.

The puppet master is Perez, the Puerto Rican airlines billionaire. Among the puppets are Walkie Pell, the Negro mime who wears his black nerves on his skin; his hilariously cockney wife, Lady A; Von Elden, an ex-Nazi who is also a major figure in the music world (almost everyone at The Griff is a major something). And, there is Ina Lord the Movie Queen, or rather movie princess awaiting her coronation. It threatens to come about via a cooked-up deal to film a musical version of Kafka's The Trial, co-starring Walkie Pell and to be scripted by her Jewish refugee writer husband, Kurt Wertberg.

It is impossible to describe the intricate plot that ties all of them intimately together. Morton is one of the most skillful novelists writing today. In his previous novel, The Schatten Affair, he sketched a picture of slumbering evil encountered by an American not so innocent abroad, via a German aristocrat. It was a hypnotically successful piece of fiction. In Snow Gods his eloquence, and tale-spinning abilities are displayed in abundance.

But, in writing what is on the surface the quintessential society novel, with all the jet-set paraphernalia, Morton tends to betray his own intention. That intention is to parody, to destroy in a torrent of satirical scenes, the desperate, hopeless and passionately empty lives led at The Griff. (Not to press symbolism too closely, if The Magic Mountain was pre-World War I Europe, then The Griff is the world that has resulted from the postwar marriage of Common Market Europe and affluent America.) By piling on endless details of irony and caricature, where a few would do, Morton subverts his own aim: he gives license to those who would read the book as a terrific tale of high life in which the bad guys are punished at the end in a kind of snowy Götterdämmerung.

By giving us so much information he deprives us of the depth of his vision. By giving us so many round characters he ends up with a cast of flat characters—each with a wisecrack on the tongue; each obsessed with conquest in one form or another. Morton's problem is an illustration of the novel's problem today. Information about societies—whether in microcosm or in realistic scale, is not only seductive but also, finally, disappointing.

Mere description is now almost automatically irony; particularly involving the rich and powerful. Perhaps what's needed is for a writer as skillful as Morton to be absolutely ruthless with his material, by plunging into the fully developed, traditional fabric he is working from within to expose. But irony withers because there are few surprises left in such material. (Where they are to be found, by the way, he finds them. His Prince Olgenau, who has a plan to create a kind of Alpine Mme. Tussaud's by stuffing all The Griff's guests after death, is a marvelous comic creation.)

Frederic Morton is one of the most serious American novelists. Even when he falls short, as he does in Snow Gods, he creates a fascinating fiction. If he would only tell us less—he could move us more—and write the major fiction of which he is clearly capable.

THEATRE

HAROLD CLURMAN

The latest entries of the season are a program of two one-act plays—Adaptation by Elaine May, with Terrence McNally's Next at the Greenwich Mews Theatre (141 West 13 Street)—and Woody Allen's Play It Again, Sam at the Broadhurst. They are all, in one way or another, funny shows. Yet I came away from them asking myself exactly what made them funny. Laughter itself is perhaps its own justification; the fact of laughing may itself be judged an absolute good. Still, I couldn't help wondering.

Adaptation is the name of a TV game in which a monitor requires the contestant to enact his manner of portraying the seven ages of man. If the player makes a proper adjustment to the proposed circumstance, he is credited with a number of points, according to the merit of his reaction: if he muffs, several points are subtracted from his total.

The responses are very brief. Four actors, all except for the central figure, change roles according to the demands of each episode. All the "answers" are jokes, no matter how catastrophic the moment they are supposed to represent.

Remember Paris Last May?

FRONTIÈRES
=
REPRESSION

LA VOIX
DE SON
MAITRE

The posters that capture the spirit of the French Student Rebellion – the Rebellion that brought the DeGaulle Government to its knees – are here!

They're exact reproductions of the impossible-to-get artwork designed and printed by the Rebel Students as they held the Theatre Odéon and the Sorbonne last May in Paris.

This Collectors' set includes six full-color posters, each one 23 by 29 inches, on heavy, beautifully textured stock.

Your check or money order for $11 will bring this spirited and striking artwork into your home. All sets sent insured and postage paid, of course.

Mur Graphique PUBLISHERS P.O. Box 33 Village Station
New York, N.Y. 10014

Name____________
Street____________
City________State________Zip______
Please send____ sets of the French Student Posters.
Find $________($11 per set) enclosed.

They are jokes in the vein of the old Nichols-May improvisations.

There is the one about the father who tries to be a helpful pal to his son, while telling the boy to move out of the way of the television picture he is forever watching. This is repeated to denote that life nowadays is a series of crises only superseded in importance by addiction to television. In fact papa dies at the TV set—as presumably his son will also do in his time.

There is the joke about the cabbie who refuses to drive his taxi where you ask him to go, no matter how crucial your need. There are jokes about politics, sex, marriage, education. Some are very good: the player in a terrible mess about money, social position, marital relations murmurs "It's a hard game," upon which the monitor awards him "twelve points for maturity"—the highest score.

The humor does not consist so much in witty insights as in wry quips of the sort that an alert person at a party of bright folk delivers to the delight of guests who wish to pass a pleasant evening without too close contact. In this fashion they relieve themselves of pressure from whatever is bugging them.

There is a certain "realism" in this. What the sketch comes down to are clichés about clichés. The clichés (agreed-upon interpretations of everyday phenomena) are clever enough, but they tend to anesthetize and flatten one's perceptions and sensibilities. Perhaps that is their function and significance. It makes society—that part of it, at any rate, which frequents the hit shows—seem like a huge bar where people hang out to deaden the sting of experience.

McNally's Next begins in somewhat the same spirit, with a scene in which a man approaching middle age, an assistant manager of a movie house, is examined by a nurse for possible induction into the army. He tries to put her off by every possible gag. This is immensely comic although one is in some doubt as to whether it is the author or the actor (James Coco) who is getting the laughs.

Then, toward the end, McNally changes his tune. The man who has been treated as a dumb beast, and who has tried to kid himself out of feeling himself humiliated, becomes savagely indignant. As in a previous McNally play, Witness (in which Coco played a similar role), we are shown the deep-seated, festering animosity of the "little man" who has unconsciously come to hate everything to which he is subjected by the contemporary world. He bursts with a hitherto suppressed sadism which needs only another prod to turn him into a killer—in backlash imitation of the very thing that has tormented him.

McNally's intention, and it is worthy, is to launch an exacerbated attack on the mechanics of a civilization which is taken as an acceptable, because inescapable, norm. The flaw—though it should be emphasized that this sketch is one of McNally's better efforts—is that the farcical opening fails to anticipate the final onslaught. One is uncertain whether the stronger element in the author's impulse is to be funny as hell or to vent his spleen. The result is a discomfiting insecurity of style. Perhaps something could have been done in the writing or the direction of the early scenes to foreshadow the gathering storm.

Both these plays present types. Individual traits disappear, so that McNally's monster, for instance, becomes both "everyman" and no person. The Everyman of yesteryear was rooted in some honored tradition, faith or profound passion; today he has become a cipher. If we could all be made more aware of this, the May-McNally plays and our response to them might increase in value.

CLICK

Sirhan B. Sirhan
Began
As a genteel man
In this land
Of mail order guns.

MICHAEL S. LEVINSON

An Important Publishing Event

THE COMING THREE-PRONGED ATTACK on the
AUTOMOBILE INDUSTRY

Out June 1, 1969. 100 pages, $5.00

ADVANCE ORDERS ACCEPTED from bookstores and libraries only (on open account: usual discounts)

The contents table and outline available now to all interested persons: One Dollar. Order direct from publisher.

BOOKSERVICE PUBLICATIONS
P.O. Box 1028, G.P.O., New York, N.Y. 10001

Elaine May has done an excellent job in the trim, deft delivery of her material. She understands "flash" comedy. The entire cast of Adaptation is good. Gabriel Dell, an actor of considerable nervous power and intelligence capable of extensive development, is outstanding. If only there were some permanent acting companies of stature in which such actors could work and grow!

James Coco whose countenance is that of the eternal or universal clown is actor through and through. He possesses high visibility. He is sharply expressive not alone in speech but through his eyes and every other part of his body. He is a comedian, not simply in the sense of a funny man; but a comédien, by which the French designate a consummate stage personality. Coco was as convincing in the "legitimate" role of the Austrian scientist in Denis Johnston's The Moon in the Yellow River as he is hilarious in McNally's play.

Woody Allen is a funny fellow. His long "turn," Play It Again, Sam (of which he is both star and author), is about a schnook or shmo, a type which New York audiences readily recognize and greatly enjoy. This harassed young man, having been divorced by his well-stacked wife, is now induced to seek a more compatible bedmate. Marriage and love in such plays are always projected in that vein.

The fun, as far as the plot goes, deals with Woody's abortive attempts, inspired by his idol Humphrey Bogart (who appears as a "phantom" character), to persuade a variety of girls to go to bed with him. When he finally succeeds, it is with his best friend's wife. Though both have a swell time in their one-night encounter, the lady returns to her husband whom she still loves and the hero, released from a delusion of amatory incompetence, proves himself adept at the game.

Allen appeals because he is perpetually hesitant, baffled, desperately inadequate and altogether honest about his constant failure at almost everything that is meaningful to him. Some of his jokes are cheap, but many others are penetrating in their equivocality. He explains, for example, that his parents never divorced, though he begged them to do so. There is in Allen, also, a residue of moral fiber and romantic sentiment—tainted and disturbed but persistent. His finest moment comes when he utters a speech of noble abnegation, which he acknowledges to be Bogart's farewell to Ingrid Bergman in Casablanca, and he adds "For years I've wanted to be able to say that to a girl."

What in addition makes Allen effective is his mask: his red hair stands upright and disheveled around his bald spot, as if in consternation; his glasses cover startled eyes. From his woebegone face there issues a voice always pitched to extreme tension caused by constant bewilderment at perpetual crisis.

The show is smoothly staged, well cast with an array of what I assume are very pretty girls with nice legs. My slight reservation on this point comes from the fact that I was seated in row N which is too far from the front for any reviewer to be placed.

Letter from Germany

LESLIE R. COLITT

Mr. Colitt is Berlin correspondent for the Westinghouse Broadcasting Co. and The Observer (London). His The Other Germany, a study of East Germany, has been published in West Germany.

West Berlin

Millions of Germans, East and West, are recuperating from a recent evening of television when it looked for a few hours as though the longed-for reunification of Germany was beginning. They had watched as the cameras closed in on an East-German town identified on the program as Dubrow, and located directly on the frontier. In the course of a routine land survey, an East-German cartographer had moved the border a mile to the east. Next morning, the villagers wake up to find themselves West Germans. But are they?

Viewers sat spellbound as an astonishingly realistic story of the German dilemma unfolded. The effect of the documentary-style film was similar to the Orson Welles radio adaptation of The War of the Worlds in the United States thirty years ago. Viewers rushed to their telephones to ask the TV station whether the day of reunification had at last come.

Assuming that it had, the program did not show a scene of unalloyed rejoicing. The villagers of Dubrow, having lived under East-German socialism for twenty years, are unable in a day to shed their past and plunge into West-German life. When they were a part of East Germany, they had cursed the collective system of agriculture and yearned for the good old days of private peasantry. But Dubrow's collective farm continues to operate as if nothing had happened. The Communist Free German Youth troop meets, as always, in the village House of Culture under the portrait of a benevolently smiling Walter Ulbricht, as Western journalists record the quaint scene.

Hectic cabinet meetings are held in Bonn, and Foreign Minister Willy Brandt flies to Washington to consult with the President on what has become an international incident threatening the status quo in Central Europe. NATO is put on top alert. As packs of sightseers and newsmen flood the village, aggressive Western salesmen elbow their way into Dubrow's virgin market. The opportunity to become manager of a supermarket chain store is dangled before the owner of a Dubrow grocery who has just gotten his shop back from the state.

Bonn's minister of agriculture is alarmed by the thought that the villagers might want to break up their collective farm into individual plots. He knows that only large agricultural units can survive in the competitive European Common Market.

Gradually, some of the villagers begin wandering toward the new impenetrable border that now divides them from East Germany. Confused and lonely, they gaze across the barbed wire toward where their families and friends still live.

Then, suddenly as it had changed, the old border is restored. The cartographer had erred, and the villagers of Dubrow find themselves fenced back again in the German Democratic Republic.

Some 14 million all-German TV viewers saw the program, East Germans tuning in to the Western channel. Conversations with East Germans afterwards revealed they had been as exercised by the film as their kin in the West. An East Berlin student of philosphy said it had fascinated him because of the message that reunification will "never come about in a stroke of lightning as some Germans still dream." It portrayed East Germans as human beings who have become an integral part of another system. "We don't particularly like it the way it is," he observed, "but we want to improve it—a lot."

German reunification remains one of the most loaded subjects in the divided country. Uttered by West German politicians, reunification still evokes an almost mystical reverence from the conservative minded. A growing number of West Germans, particularly the younger ones, question its inevitability, but in doing so they are automatically labeled unpatriotic. Bonn's coalition of Christian Democrats and Social Democrats pays less lip service to reunification than did the Adenauer and Erhard governments, but the taboos remain.

Apart from a relatively small hard core of East Germans, mainly among the elderly, few Easterners see Germany's salvation in reunification. Too many years have elapsed since East and West Germans lived under one roof, and then it was in Hitler's house of terror. One indication of the real aspirations of the majority of East Germans was their show of solidarity last year with the Czechoslovak cause. West Germany's news media portrayed it as a salve to the conscience of East Germans troubled by their government's dispatch of occupation troops, but it was more than that. (East Germans have learned to divorce themselves from the actions of their government.) Rather, it was sympathy

(Advertisement)

How Fast Can You Read?

A noted publisher in Chicago reports there is a simple technique of rapid reading which should enable you to increase your reading speed and yet retain much more. Most people do not realize how much they could increase their pleasure, success and income by reading faster and more accurately.

According to this publisher, most people, regardless of their present reading skill, can use this simple technique to improve their reading ability to a remarkable degree. Whether reading stories, books, technical matter, it becomes possible to read sentences at a glance and entire pages in seconds with this method.

To acquaint the readers of this publication with the easy-to-follow rules for developing rapid reading skill, the company has printed full details of its interesting self-training method in a new booklet, "How to Read Faster and Retain More" mailed free to anyone who requests it. No obligation. Send your name, address, and zip code to: Reading, 835 Diversey Parkway, Dept. 533-513, Chicago, Ill. 60614. A postcard will do.

with the Czechoslovak reform program which held out so much promise for ther own country.

Most East Germans cannot fathom why Bonn does not recognize East Berlin forthwith, and get on with normalizing relations between the two Germanies. They are convinced that their government will accept no other precondition for ameliorating the worst hardships caused by the division. Conversely, they dismiss the rather wishful West German theory that the East German leadership is little interested in being recognized, since that would deprive it of one of its most powerful arguments against the "militaristic, revanchist nature of the Bonn government."

The opposition Free Democratic Party (FDP) in Bonn recently published yet another proposal for a formal treaty between the Federal Republic and the East German Democratic Republic. It goes further than previous proposals to recognize the existence of two German states. East German officials, however, pointed out to me that it does not guarantee the final irrevocable existence of "two independent German states according to international law." Although the FDP proposal offers a real step forward, there is little likelihood that it will be accepted in either Bonn or East Berlin. Influential members of the Bonn coalition have indicated they will torpedo the plan because it "ignores all the plans already put forward by us to East Berlin."

In the end, a decisive factor determining relations between East and West Germany and thus Europe's security will be the attitude of the 60 million West Germans. Will they be able to exert pressure on their future governments (the current one ends with the general elections in September) to strive for a breakthrough in the nastiest and potentially most dangerous form of cold war remaining in Europe? If the press reviews of the Dubrow program are any indication, the outlook is not rosy. One commentator after another found fault with the technical aspects of the film and ignored the real issues presented.

MUSIC / David Hamilton

Peter Maxwell Davies (born in 1934), one of England's leading younger composers, has been engaged in the musical education of children and the performance of new music, as well as composition. Several of his works are available in this country on records: Five Piano Pieces (1955-56; Odeon ASD-645); O Magnum Mysterium (1960; Argo ZRG-5327); and Leopardi Fragments (1961; Angel S-36387).

Revelation and Fall, a setting of a poem by Georg Trakl for soprano and chamber ensemble, commissioned by the Koussevitzky Foundation, was performed last summer at Philharmonic Hall and later in Washington; a recording is released this month (Angel S-36558). The following conversation about Davies' career, his views on aspects of the current musical situation, and Revelation and Fall, took place during his visit to this country in September.

DH: Mr. Davies, your name first became known over here in connection with the "Manchester Group." Would you tell me a little about this—its history and function, and what, if anything, remains of it?

PMD: I think precious little remains of it now, but it served a function once. Alexander Goehr and Harrison Birtwistle both went to the Royal Manchester College of Music in 1952, and they had absolutely no contact through the professors and teachers there with the sort of music they were interested in—none at all. I remember a famous incident: a certain professor was supposed to take the history class. He didn't turn up on the first day, and Alexander Goehr stood up and gave the class a lecture on music history. Everybody, including Harrison Birtwistle, thought he was the professor—until the next week, when that gentleman actually turned up and lectured. Alexander Goehr stood up, said "But this is all nonsense," and was dismissed and told not to appear in class again.

Birtwistle joined him, and they formed a sort of clandestine cult of their own, together with John Ogdon. And then I met them, and that was one extra to the group, and then we gathered one or two other people in, and started giving concerts of our own. Eventually we gave a concert at the College of Music—of our own works and Messiaen, Webern, things we were interested in. We took the title of "New Music Manchester"—as opposed to the "Manchester New Music Group," which played Poulenc and Hindemith—and we survived for about three years as our own concert-promoting organization. We really looked at scores of Messiaen, Boulez, Stockhausen—things which were then coming out for the first time—and we'd spend, probably, three whole days and nights together, hardly sleeping, just looking at things and finding out how they worked.

DH: What pieces of these people particularly interested you?

PMD: Well, I remember Alexander Goehr's father [Walter Goehr, the late conductor] at that time was doing Messiaen's Turangalîla symphony. And we discovered the Second Sonata of Boulez, the Kontrapunkte I of Stockhausen, which was then comparatively new, and the latest effusions of Pousseur, Nono and whoever.

DH: Does this music still impress you?

PMD: Rarely, but at that stage it was very, very useful.

DH: In contrast to a number of composers, in England and elsewhere, you seem to have established a fruitful relation with the music of the past. How do you feel about this matter of tradition?

PMD: I find the fight against tradition one of the most stimulating things in the whole of my creative life. Particularly in England—I think probably more than in America—you can't help but be so aware of the enormous tradition behind you. In a way, it's oppressive, but if you use it in the right sort of way it can be very stimulating. If you go behind Sir Henry Walford Davies or Sir Arthur Sullivan or whoever, and go right back and find the thing which really makes it work—right back to Purcell and Byrd and before, to Dunstable, right back to plainsong—and you try to learn how those composers worked and apply this, in some way, to your own situation, and work from that. . . .

DH: You certainly don't agree with those who reject tradition wholesale?

PMD: Well, that's a matter of throwing the baby out with the bath water. You can't afford to do it. You lose everything, and you find yourself cut off from your natural roots. What your natural roots are, it's very hard to say—but you live as a student and a child with certain music (and, for better or worse, you live with certain Pop music, certain folk music, certain church music, certain symphonic music), and you feel your roots in some of that music. For me, this was particularly so of Renaissance and medieval British music.

DH: This wouldn't have been possible twenty years ago, of course; that music was simply not part of the current repertory.

PMD: Of course not, no. It wasn't available. Even when I was studying, one of the reasons for my being so attracted to this music was that the professor of music at Manchester University advised us all not to look at music before 1500, because it was "dangerous."

DH: Which immediately drove you to it?

PMD: Of course! On the other hand, I can quite understand someone who really throws tradition out and works from scratch—a person like Cage, for instance, who must have, when he was studying with Schoenberg, had such a violent reaction against all this that he just felt it wasn't worth while. But I didn't study with anybody who was a traditionalist in the first instance. At Manchester University, for instance, I was studying with people who knew less about music than I did. And I was groping to try to find something in the tradition on which to base my own work. Had this been presented to me, I would probably have reacted against it—but in a completely different direction. . . . It's very hard to say.

DH: Were you at that time aware of the work of Cage?

PMD: Until 1957, which was after I left Manchester, I was totally unaware of Cage. That year, at Darmstadt, I came across Cage, Tudor—the works.

DH: How do you feel about the place of indeterminacy in music? I know you use it in a local way.

PMD: In a very local way, yes. As far as my own music goes, it can only have a very limited application, because I have such definite ideas about the musical structures that I want to make—and I am basically interested in musical structure as such, and musical architecture, and the articulation of note in relation to note, pitch in relation to pitch, rhythmic length in relation to rhythmic length, phrase-length in relation to phrase-length (to use very traditional terminology). I have found indeterminacy useful in dealing with young people, with children and adolescents. To improvise and to make their own music in a small group—compose it, write it down, then perhaps improvise on the graphic structure or the sketch—was a very useful thing for them. And for me—I saw how untrained musical minds worked.

DH: But you also use passages of not strictly determined material in your music "for adults."

PMD: Yes, but it really is a very limited application—about as much freedom as a ship going about, and then it's immediately under control again. This is just an extension of a basic, traditional means to an end.

DH: Would you agree that often this sort of indeterminacy is really an evasion of responsibility?

PMD: Well, if you're going to be indeterminate, you're probably going to evade a certain responsibility, I'm sure. But you're going to have to determine something if the structure is going to work. Perhaps pitches, perhaps rhythms, I don't know. But in some way you have to define your parameter so that there are obvious "rights" and "wrongs" which a player can follow, so that he's not going to just feel that he's splashing around in the dark and that everything is possible. Somehow his freedom must be circumscribed; otherwise it's anarchy, and a state of musical anarchy is, I think, totally boring.

DH: Of course, to some of these people boredom is not a relevant criticism. They're not attempting to make anything but a kind of "aural wallpaper."

PMD: Yes, it's the intellectual thing which really gets me, where the intellect is not taken seriously. I find that the more a composer is in control of his intellect—if he's a real composer—the more he can afford to take for granted the validity of what he has to say via the intellect. I just work on the assumption that this is so in my own case, and try to make the musical structure which I articulate as perfect in every respect, as watertight as I can.

DH: What about the problems of getting new music performed in England? I know that you're involved with an ensemble—The Pierrot Players—that performs new works.

PMD: Well, the only way of getting a decent performance, quite honestly, is to do it yourself, or to get somebody who is really in sympathy with your music to do it—and either of these is very difficult, especially where the larger institutions are concerned.

DH: And you don't have the kind of university performing groups that play such a useful role over here. Does the difficulty of dealing with the larger performing institutions affect the kind of music you write—or at least the media for which it is written?

PMD: Yes. I think all of my contemporaries in England tend to write chamber music rather than orchestral music. Perhaps this is a bit unfair, because the B.B.C. has recently come around to letting composers like myself conduct their own works with the B.B.C. Symphony or the New Philharmonia, which they hire for the occasion. This, I think, is one of the most hopeful and healthy signs, which somehow might eventually revivify orchestral music as such. Of course, it's an international thing; orchestral music is dead—it's very much a museum thing, and symphony orchestras no longer have any really viable life as far as most living composers go.

DH: Despite your general lack of confidence in traditional institutions of performance, however, you have written a full-length, full-scale opera. Why?

PMD: That is rather hard to say. I've been writing the opera anyway for fifteen years, and recently finished it. [It is based on the life of the English Renaissance composer, John Taverner.] This is an opera which is perfectly performable by the traditional institutions, and if they don't perform it—well, hard luck. Eventually, I think it will be necessary to create an independent opera group which will perhaps be like the contemporary theatre group or the contemporary dance group, which will do exclusively new opera. This is the only hope, because the opera house, as it exists—and the audience which goes there—is a moribund institution.

DH: Would you agree that the opera audience is worse even than the symphony audience?

PMD: Oh, my God, it is. They're interested in who's singing, who redesigned a work they know, and so on—but it's got nothing to do with living music and

Just Published

How 88,648 Heavy Smokers Stopped Smoking

NEW YORK — The Anti-Tobacco Center of America has just published a booklet which explains how 88,648 heavy smokers (of whom many are physicians) have stopped smoking without straining their will power. This booklet is available free of charge to smokers. All you need to do, to obtain it, is to send your name and address to The Anti-Tobacco Center of America, Dept. A-31-G 276 Park Avenue South, New York City, 10010. This offer is open while the supply of these booklets lasts.

The Nation
BOOK SERVICE

Offers the following at a discount:

☐ VIETNAM FOLLY by Sen. Ernest Gruening and Herbert W. Beaser (National Press, $8.95) $7.15

☐ FRIENDSHIP AND FRATRICIDE by Meyer A. Zeligs (Viking, $8.95) ...... [illegible]

☐ THE GOODBYE LAND by Jose Yglesias (Pantheon, $4.95) .... [illegible]

Remittance accompanying orders should be made payable to THE NATION, [illegible] 6th Ave., N.Y. 10014

Readers can avail themselves of our regular offer to send them any book (except paperbacks), published in the U.S. at the retail price post-free. When ordering, please give title, author and publisher.

3-3-69

nothing to do with the new possibilities of drama and music.

DH: What about getting the modern-drama audience into the opera house?

PMD: Well, first of all you've got to have a modern opera. To try to pretend that Britten's church dramas or the operas of Menotti are in any respect the equivalent of the works of Genet or even Pinter is just nonsense. I think the future of the association of music and text into some sort of dramatic presentation is very much in jeopardy, because there's so much commissioned rubbish around—19th-century operas in the most superficial 20th-century trappings, which have nothing to do with the basic problem of expressing the modern experience.

DH: Do you agree with Boulez that Lulu was the last opera written?

PMD: Perhaps. I exclude my own.

DH: The last performed opera, then. But as long as the opera houses and orchestras must cater to the "museum" audience. . . .

PMD: Well, I pity any audience which goes to a concert hall in order to have its own prejudices confirmed. Surely, when you go to a concert hall you should become involved in experience as it is, rather than just confirming experience as it was—if you're going to really receive from this encounter with music some sort of a spur, some sort of stimulus, as to how to deal with your own experience. And if the musical encounter is going to lead you much further in dealing with your own experience, then I fail to see how it can only be music of the past. It has to include music of the past—but in relation to the 20th century, the experience of the 1960s. And, as far as education goes, this idea that young people, children, should learn old music first (baroque or classical or whatever) and then be led forward to 20th-century music—I think this is nonsense.

DH: You've had a good deal of experience in teaching younger people.

PMD: Yes, and I've found that if you throw them into 20th-century music, into the music of the 1960s, they find their way. They can compose, in a simple way, this sort of music, and they can do so as readily as they paint a picture which has got some sort of relation to what's going on today in art. They can live with this music; it's their natural experience. They take to it, they reproduce what they hear and add on to that. This really contributes to their development, not only as musicians but as human beings—and that's the most important thing, because most of them, in the situation where I was working, were not to become professional musicians. The block, I think, occurs not with the students but with the teacher; he's very, very frightened of the latest developments in music.

DH: Tell me something about how you came to write this remarkable piece that we heard in New York this past summer, Revelation and Fall.

PMD: Well, I was given the complete works of Georg Trakl, the Austrian poet, as a birthday present in September, 1965, and I remember being so taken by this particular prose poem, the first of the Offenbarung und Untergang set, that I couldn't leave it alone. I sat up a couple of nights without going to bed, just reading this and sketching out the vaguest sort of musical ideas—where I wanted it loud and where soft, and the instrumentation. Immediately I wanted to use a loud-hailer [British for "bullhorn"].

DH: What about the other special instruments [the work uses a variety of homemade percussion instruments?]

PMD: Well, all of this was determined in those first two nights, because I found in my mind, working with this text, some quite extraordinary sounds; perhaps as a substitute for getting down to finding out what the notes were, I was thinking of the means of achieving the notes when I eventually got them. This, in a way, was a sort of avoidance of responsibility, but I soon came around to that responsibility. . . . I was too worked up about the overall design and the sort of sound, as yet.

DH: With your interest in unusual sounds, I wonder whether you have ever been attracted to the electronic media?

PMD: Oh, yes, very much.

DH: Is there any particular reason why you haven't yet worked in these media?

PMD: Yes—the unavailability of electronic studios in Great Britain. The B.B.C. won't have composers in their studio, it's used for effects music only. And there are a couple of private studios around, but these are very small yet, with primitive equipment.

DH: But you have no philosophical objections to the electronic media?

PMD: Oh, no. Particularly now that you have the possibility of changing the sounds in live performance by electronic means, perhaps in association with a tape. I think there is a drama inherent in pitting live performance against tape.

DH: Yes, I have certainly felt that in Mario Davidovsky's pieces—that this competition was a fundamental part of it—and in Babbitt's pieces for Bethany Beardslee. . . .

PMD: Certainly, when you pit Bethany against a tape!

DH: You sound as if that prospect entices you. What are you working on now?

PMD: I've been doing an orchestral piece—actually, two orchestral pieces; one's almost finished and one is just beginning.

DH: Anything you'd like to say about them?

PMD: Well, I suppose they're very much "after" Revelation and Fall, and both of them that much stronger, I hope, in sheer internal tension and drama.

EMPLOYMENT WANTED

RETIRED TEACHER, Author, World Traveler wishes position as travel companion. VIP references including Lowell Thomas. Jas. Whipple, 950 S. U.S. 1, Vero Beach, Fla.

PERSONALS

FLUSH TWICE—it's a long way to Washington (Bumpersticker) FREE. Catalog of Buttons and Bumperstickers included. Send 50c handling. SNUFFED—Box 461, Huntington Beach, Calif. 92648.

MAN CANNOT LIVE BY BREAD ALONE. He also needs love. Support free birth control everywhere. Box 4069, Grand Central Sta., New York City 10017.

BLOW YOURSELF UP! 1½′ x 2′ Poster of anyone. Send returned snapshot. $3.00. Pierpoint Products, Box 678, Inglewood, Calif. 90307.

NUMBERS RULE THE WORLD: Numerology is one of the oldest psychic sciences. Know what numbers have power over your life. Know how to use them for more success and harmony. Send name, birth date, and $5 to Marguerite Mann, [illegible] N. Oracle, Tucson, AZ 85704 for your personal numerology chart. Satisfaction Guaranteed.

SOCK IT TO ME—over 225 other underground buttons. 1/25c, 5/$1, 50/$5, 125/$10 and 1,000/$75. Bumperstickers, beads and peace jewelry, too. Free catalogue to all! Free sample to stores. A BIG-LITTLE STORE, 1077 Mission, San Francisco, Calif. 94103.

DISCOVER an intriguing, fun way of meeting literate Jewish singles. FREE literature: OPERATION MAZEL TOV, 663 Fifth Avenue, N. Y. C. 10022.

The Best Way
To Get
THE NATION

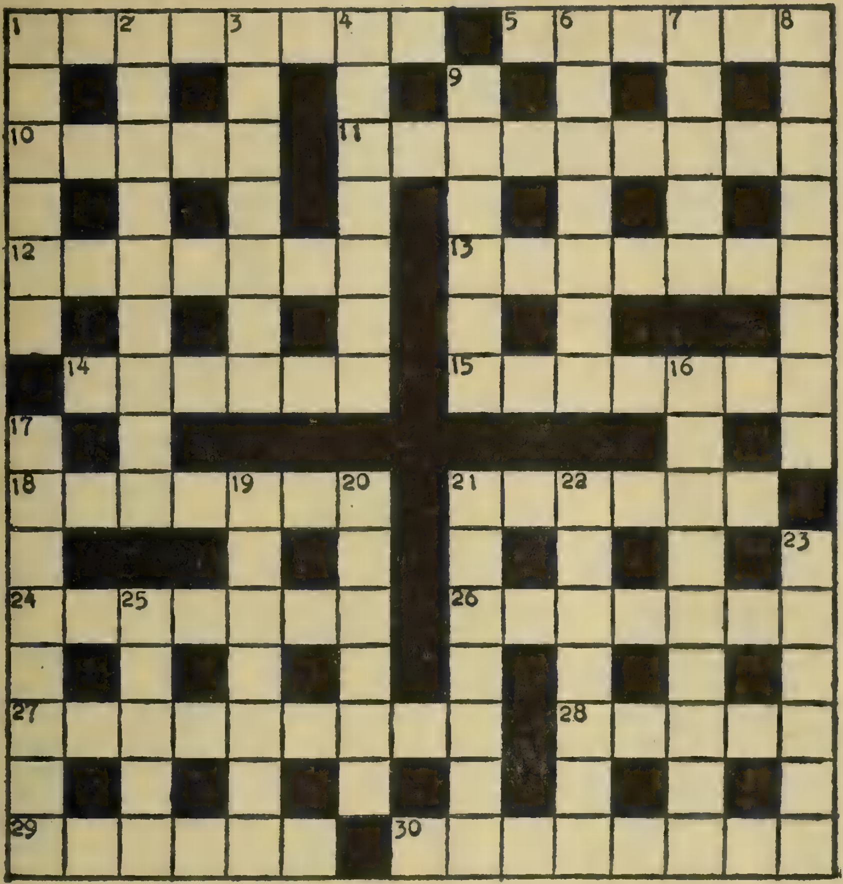
THE NATION 3-3-69
333 Sixth Ave., New York [illegible]
☐ One Year, $10
☐ Two Years, $18
☐ 6 Months, $6
☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed
(Add $1 per year postage for Canada; [illegible] foreign)
Name ....
Address ....
City ....
State .... Zip No. ......

Crossword Puzzle No. 1287

FRANK W. LEWIS



ACROSS

1 He's an apt representative of the 8, it could be. (8)
5 Little this for New York's mayor, as you might remember. (6)
10 See 15 across
11 and 21 across Flea powder might be reserved for traveling in style! (7,2,3,3)
12 What's likely to happen if you're here at the supermarket? (2,5)
13 One might take an oath to be so. (5,2)
14 They might have principals! (6)
15 and 10 across Carried by Typhoid Mary. (7,5)
18 Ready skill, in [redacted] manner of speaking. (7)
21 See 11 across
24 See 9 down
26 Listening to a duet in free form? (7)
27 Foreign aid absent, therefore didn't vote. (9)
28 and 7 down When it comes to drinking, 27? Wainwright used to work there. (2,3,5)
29 Not the most recent sled to manufacture! (6)
30 Lighter should describe the boat if you do. (8)

DOWN

1 Blow-out? Quite the opposite, if you get the bird. (6)
2 Contemplated being wanted in a resentful way, when about to yield in weakness. (9)
3 The cut of a noble beast, in a way. (7)
4 Clause, by the sound of it, covering young Britishers. (7)
6 Suggests some lack of belief on the part of the non-clergy, as the plan might be. (4,3)
7 See 28 across
8 The type of bird that suggests a way to polish him off? (8)
9 and 24 across Play that Winnie's friend might have enjoyed. (1,5,2,5)
16 Chambers, when little? (9)
17 One of your parents has to be told more than once to leave for someplace in Samoa. (4,4)
19 Generally descriptive of baseball teams, as organized and seen here. (7)
20 Saw the possible answer to speaking. (6)
21 Does it imply 20 trivia? (7)
22 Hinder, in a sense. (7)
23 Let fall in pieces. (6)
25 Protesters have been socked this way! (5)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1286

ACROSS: 1 Dancing bear; 9, 21 and 25 Mary Had a Little Lamb; 11 Picnics; 12 Telling; 14 Useful; 15 Punsters; 17 Hear, hear; 20 Morals; 22 Release; 24 Indicts; 26 Stereo; 27 Airfield; 28 Draft boards. DOWN: 2 and 10 Anyone for tennis; 3 Chancel; 4 Neat; 5 Bittern; 6 Annal; 7 Habits; 8 Winner; 13 Apart; 16 Terrified; 18 Events; 19 Ease off; 20 Minorca; 23 Error.

PUBLICATIONS

OVER 2,000,000 Back [redacted] Magazines! Reasonable prices. Fast service. Send needs. MIDTOWN, Box 917-N, Maywood, N.J. 07607.

PAPERBACK CATALOGUE, 270 pages, 15,000 titles, indexed. $2.00 credited toward your order. New York Book, [redacted] W. [redacted] Street, N.Y.C. 10036.

WORLD DEMOCRACY: By Bin Dir Woor. Self-Designated Symbolical World President. Unique. Entrancing. $2. Greenwich Book Publishers, 282 7th Avenue, New York City. Like many saints and others, Bin Dir Woor promises, God willing, to appear many times after death. Purpose—to promote WORLD DEMOCRACY.

[redacted] CANADA BETTER!

See world affairs from a different perspective!

Read CANADIAN DIMENSION

Independent, lively, and original.
Canada's leading forum for radical thought.

$4.00 for eight large issues

Write to:
CANADIAN DIMENSION
P.O. Box 1413
Winnipeg 1, Manitoba, Canada

'THE [redacted]
AND THE BAY OF PIGS'

A detailed study by

Victor Bernstein and Jesse Gordon

The role played by The Nation in breaking the Bay of Pigs story to the American public, reprinted from the Columbia University Forum.

Single copies—15c; 25 copies [redacted] 10c each
Orders over [redacted] 7c per copy

THE NATION

333 Sixth Ave., [redacted] York, N.Y. 10014

EDUCATIONAL

QUAKER STUDY CENTER—Suburban Philadelphia. Special program for study in social change, non-violence and radical living. Also year's seminar on man's search for meaning, confirmation and dialogue. Write: L. W. Lewis, Pendle Hill, Wallingford, Pa. 19086.

RECORDS

FREE [redacted] PAGE CATALOG offers hundreds of recordings of rare Renaissance, Baroque and Classical music. Some records priced as low as $1.00 each! All late recordings in stereo only. [redacted] RECORDS, Box 932 NA, New York, N. Y. 10023.

FOLK, JAZZ, BLUES. We specialize in hard-to-get LPs. Send us your wants. [redacted] SERVICE, [redacted] 18221 BH, [redacted] Francisco, Calif. 94118.

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE [redacted] WAGON, ALgonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

Advertising Rates

Classified: 74c a line (6 words) 3 line [redacted]
Classified Display: $7.42 per inch (min.)
THE NATION, [redacted] Sixth Ave., N.Y. [redacted]
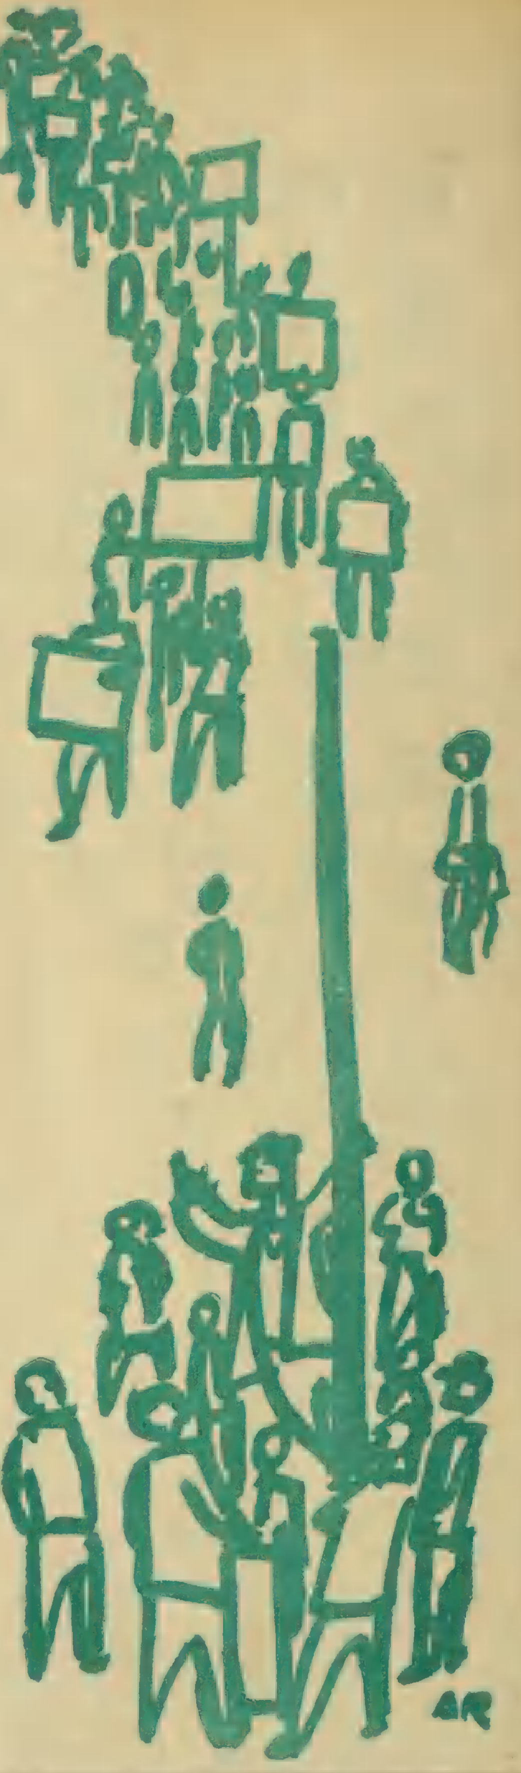
242-8400

[redacted] by [redacted] Publishing Inc., [redacted]

What will we be protesting next?

You don't have to be a fortune-teller to see into the future of human destructiveness. Sixteen scientists from six countries tell us what the Pentagon and others are planning for us in UNLESS PEACE COMES, edited by Nigel Calder. Each essay covers a different area of development: from conventional to geophysical warfare: from nuclear to microbiological weapons.

You cannot afford to be unprepared or unaware. Subscribe to The NATION now and we will send you free UNLESS PEACE COMES—A Scientific Forecast of New Weapons.



THE NATION 333 Sixth Avenue New York, N.Y. 10011

☐ I'll join you for 1 year (48 issues). I enclose $10 and understand you'll send me free UNLESS PEACE COMES, edited by Nigel Calder.

☐ I'll try you for 6 months (24 issues). I enclose $6.

(Add $1 per year postage for Canada and Mexico; $2 other foreign)

Name ....

Street ....

City .... State .... Zip ....

N3-3

BURLINGAME
MAR 10 1969
LIBRARY

BIAFRA STANLEY MEISLER

THE NATION

MARCH 10, 1969 35 cents

-69R PL-5337
BURLINGAME PUBLIC
LIBRARY
BURLINGAME CA 94010

Campus Missionaries

The Laying on of Culture

JOHN McDERMOTT

MANKIND'S FOULED NEST

OIL ON THE WATERS

EDWARD COWAN

DDT AND THE CONSTITUTION

HARMON HENKIN

Portnoy and the Jewish Mama Market

THERESE POL

LETTERS

competence without gadgets

Chicago, Ill.

DEAR SIRS: As Aldous Huxley, in Brave New World, had already done a clever fantasy on the mechanization of recreation, I wonder why you thought it worth while to give us Mr. Csikszentmihalyi's "The Rigors of Play" [The Nation, Feb. 17]. It is not as imaginative as Huxley's, but it is clearly a fantasy, masquerading as fact.

Take one of his three main examples—chess. Csikszentmihalyi would have us believe that today most games are played with complex equipment under deadly serious tournament conditions. But in fact, virtually all "serious" chess players belong to the United States Chess Federation, which has a total membership of about 12,000, a minute fraction of Americans who play some chess. Even in regard to those who play more for blood than fun, Csikszentmihalyi's statements are totally inaccurate. Apparently he glanced at a catalogue of chess equipment and drew unwarranted conclusions; I can assure him that there are many masters and experts who do not own "stamping pads . . . a portable roll-up demonstration board," etc., and who nevertheless manage to avoid feeling "hopelessly amateur." Nor can they afford to consider an opponent as "an interchangable dummy"; nor is their play controlled by "buzzers."

But not only are Csikszentmihalyi's facts wrong; his underlying assumptions are also, I believe, questionable. . . . The values which he would have us find in recreation—spiritual, human, aesthetic—are not dependent upon bumbling amateurism. . . . William B. Stone

Lake Forest, Ill.

DEAR SIRS: Mr. Stone claims that my statements, at least as far as chess is concerned, are "totally inaccurate," and that my facts are "wrong." His disagreement with my statements rests on empirical grounds, and they are very easy to test. All reader Stone has to do is walk a few blocks from his residence either to the northwest, where Jimmy's Tavern is located (unless it has been torn down by urban renewal in the meantime), or the southwest, to the University of Chicago's Reynolds Club, and he will see scores of chess games going on according to the pattern I indicated. At Jimmy's one could see at times three games at different tables, all using buzzing timers. It was this atmosphere of unnecessary and sterile tension which forced me to play at home, with only a few old-fashioned players. There are still a few such left, of course; I was speaking only of a quite noticeable trend which I think is important. Mr. Stone also seems to fail to catch the irony in my use of the term "bumbling amateurism"—what I was implying is that the narrow technicians are defining as amateur anyone who is uninterested in pursuing their game at the level they are playing it. . . . Mihaly Csikszentmihalyi corrections

By a typographical error, David Halberstam was referred to in Eqbal Ahmad's article (p. 267, The Nation, Mar. 3) as a correspondent for Time magazine. At the time indicated, Mr. Halberstam was writing from Vietnam for The New York Times. Editors

New York City

DEAR SIRS: A printer's error of the most innocent kind has introduced a most unfortunate error of fact into my review of John Berryman's His Toy, His Dream, His Rest. "The Nervous Songs" were not published "a couple of years ago," but in 1948 as part of the volume, The Dispossessed. What I wrote was "a couple of wars ago."

Michael Goldman

EDITORIALS

The Unhappy Right

An enjoyable aspect of these first weeks of the Nixon Administration has been the anguish and indignation which some of his decisions have aroused among his loyal right-wing backers. Such appointments as Dr. James E. Allen, Jr., James Farmer, Daniel Patrick Moynihan and Charles Yost are seen as more than objectionable; each such appointment represents a denial of patronage to the hungry legions of the Right. The columnist James J. Kilpatrick, who often articulates the impossible dreams of the ultras, and who may very well have anticipated a minor ambassadorial appointment—say to Liberia—cries out bitterly: "Throw Us a Bone, Mr. President! Throw Us a Bone!" Disappointed Southern Republicans caucus in Washington, bemoan the absence of patronage, and decline an invitation to chat with the President. David Lawrence is agitated and hurt, the newsletter Human Events is indignant, the Liberty Lobby charges betrayal, and Strom Thurmond maintains an ominous and sullen silence. One small item tells quite a story: Secretary of State Rogers has in effect notified Otto F. Otepka, the controversial former security "evaluator," that he does not intend to restore him to his post. During his years in "exile," Otepka has been the right wing's favorite martyr. Nor will the Right be pleased by the astute way in which Rep. Rogers Morton, named to succeed Ray Bliss, who was so cruelly removed after a productive tour of duty as chairman of the Republican National Committee, has eased Murray Chotiner, a chronic hard liner, out of an office he had pre-empted in the National Committee's suite. Mr. Chotiner had let it be known that, regardless of who was named to succeed Bliss, he would be "top banana." Mr. Morton wisely concluded that Chotiner should be sent packing. In brief, the right wing is unhappy to the point of mutiny but, for the moment, mutiny is impossible. They are trapped; they have nowhere to go.

But there is no reason why the right wing should despair. If Nixon has taken a position "a little to the right of the left of center," it does not mean that he intends to hold it. At the moment, the Democrats control Congress and the President must be tactful. Until the Republicans can regain control, the right wing has little to offer Nixon unless their opposition were to become visible and vocal —and in that case he might find it most useful. As Carl T. Rowan points out in his column, Mr. Nixon is clearly "not what he said he was, not what the Democrats feared he was, nor even what Republicans hoped he was during the Presidential campaign." So everyone, more or less, is wondering: "Just what kind of President have we?" And, as Mr. Rowan notes, the President may well be saying to himself: "What kind of President am I?" With Mr. Nixon you rarely know where you stand, because Mr. Nixon rarely knows where he may have to stand. He stands, at any moment, on the point of maximum expediency. Just now it is a little to the right of the left of center but tomorrow, who knows?

The right wingers, true believers all, have turned out to be more naive than might have been imagined. They did not realize, as Joseph C. Harsch puts it, that "in politics as in war, the victory does not always resemble the dreams of the fighting troops." But President Nixon may very well move back in their direction and, in the meantime, if their frustration becomes intolerable, they can always start a movement to "draft" George Wallace.

Mr. Meany's Full Circle

History, under the peremptory guidance of George Meany, has come full circle. Two decades ago, Meany helped set up the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions, designed to combat the World Federation of Trade Unions, which was Communist controlled. Now, in a fit of exasperation, the terrible-tempered Mr. Meany has disowned his child, cutting off its $360,000 a year allowance. The reason Meany gives for this summary action is that the ICFTU is no longer sufficiently anti-Communist for his taste, but the truth seems to be that the WFTU has become less pro-Communist than it used to be, and an old redbaiter like Meany needs a good-guys-bad-guys contrast, as in the Westerns.

What bothers Meany most, one may surmise, is that the WFTU (see our editorial, "A Secret No More," October 21, 1968) denounced the Soviet invasion of Czechoslovakia, with the strong backing of the Italian and French Communist-controlled wings of the trade union movement. Since 1948, the WFTU had not been so much a labor federation as an instrument of Soviet policy in the cold war. And the ICFTU had not been so much a labor federation as an instrument of the West in opposition to the WFTU. But the invasion of Czechoslovakia was too much for the French and Italian comrades, and the gap between the two federations consequently narrowed.

The severance of relations between the AFL-CIO and ICFTU shows once more that in the former Meany remains the boss. Even Jay Lovestone and Irving Brown, Meany's dedicated assistant redbaiters, opposed his arbitrary action. Jacob Potofsky, head of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers, abstained from voting, David Dubinsky, president emeritus of the ILGWU, voted "present." But Meany's action was approved by twenty-five of the twenty-seven top AFL-CIO officers present, with what mental reservations no one can say.

For the ICFTU the severance may be a blessing in disguise. At the moment the organization is well-nigh bankrupt, but Meany's action signifies liberation from his control and dictation. The loss of $360,000 a year is a blow, but it should not be too difficult to make up, particularly if the United Automobile Workers and other independent unions move in. The ICFTU now has a chance to function as a genuine labor federation, i.e., as a bridge between Eastern and Western labor. It might secure the affiliation of Yugoslav unions at the outset, and later pick up some other, more significant affiliations in Eastern Europe. At the very least, the withdrawal of AFL-CIO from the ICFTU is one more sign of the disruption of the cold-war mechanisms that seemed so enduring. George Meany, who has lived largely by these antagonisms, may yet regret his latest tantrum.

IN THIS ISSUE

JUN 10
SEP 24

March 10, 1969

EDITORIALS

290

ARTICLES

294 Kingsley Martin: A Memoir — Alexander Werth
296 Campus Missionaries: The Laying on of Culture — John McDermott 301 Biafra: War of Images — Stanley Meisler

Mankind's Fouled Nest:

304 Oil on the Waters — Edward Cowan
308 DDT and the Constitution — Harmon Henkin

BOOKS & THE ARTS

311 The Jewish Mama Market — Therese Pol
311 A Music of Angels — Paul Zweig
313 The Publishing Game
313 Of Me (poem) — Carolyn M. Rodgers
314 Violence and Rhetoric — Charles Horman
315 Making a Million Under 30 — Lewis M. Andrews
317 Art — Lawrence Alloway
317 Bird (poem) — Timothy Baland
318 Films — Harold Clurman

Publisher
JAMES J. STORROW JR.

Associate Publisher
GIFFORD PHILLIPS

Editor
CAREY McWILLIAMS

Associate Editor
PHIL KERBY

Executive Editor
ROBERT HATCH

Literary Editor
HELEN YGLESIAS

Copy Editor, MARION HESS; Poetry Editor, JOHN LOGAN; Theatre, HAROLD CLURMAN; Art, MAX KOZLOFF; Music, BENJAMIN BORETZ; Science, CARL DREHER; Advertising Manager MARY SIMON.

Editorial Associate, ERNEST GRUENING

Washington, ROBERT G. SHERRILL; Paris, ALEXANDER WERTH; London, RAYMOND WILLIAMS; Bonn, C. AMERY; Canberra, C. P. FITZGERALD; United Nations, ANNE TUCKERMAN.

The Nation is published each week (except for the omission of four issues) by the Nation Magazine Company and copyright 1969 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014. Tel: CH 2-8400. West Coast office (for editorial correspondence only): 825 South Barrington Avenue, Los Angeles, Calif. 90049. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. and at additional mailing office.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Add $1 per year postage for Canada and Mexico; $2 other foreign.

Change [illegible] Address: It is essential that subscribers ordering a change of address give five weeks' notice and provide their old as well as their new address. Please give Zip Code numbers for both addresses.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Book Review Index and the Public Affairs Information Service.

NATION Volume 208 No. 10

Toward a Social Ethic

A chronic difficulty in present-day social organization is the rampant growth of bureaucracy, accompanied by a corresponding diffusion of responsibility, so that in most cases no one can be held responsible for errors and abuses of authority. But there are signs, even if as yet unspectacular, that this pernicious state of affairs may be changing, in the only way in which it can be changed—from within. Some of the faceless bureaucrats, corporate and governmental, are beginning to show their faces, and to become vocal on behalf of the public.

The cutting edge of this development may be discerned in the professions; for example, in the various caucuses which have emerged in some of the learned societies—political science, sociology, economics, physics, even in engineering. Social pressures, the danger of a war of mutual extermination, mounting environmental hazards, military projects like the ABM Sentinel, are forcing certain professionals to adopt a new social ethic which finds expression in open intervention for the public welfare. Cornell faculty members organize against a nuclear power development on Lake Cayuga, a day-long stoppage of research is scheduled at Massachusetts Institute of Technology and other universities, to protest against the way in which decisions on weapons systems are being made, while in Chicago the working press, annoyed with the biased outlook of their publishers, are issuing an excellent publication of their own, the Chicago Journalism Review (sample copies may be obtained by writing 5000 S. Dorchester Ave., Chicago 60615).

In another field we called attention last fall ("Breaking the Code," November 25, 1968) to the action of an employee of the General Telephone Company in California who appeared at a public hearing of the Public Utility Commission to say, as a matter of civic responsibility, what he thought about the company's application for a rate increase. Here is another example: Some twenty-five or thirty staff members of the New York City Planning Commission joined recently with others to submit a petition to the commission in opposition to a re-zoning measure which they felt discriminated against the poor in favor of those able to afford luxury housing. Four members of the staff faced the chairman of the commission at a public hearing and denounced him and the commission. "We have been asked to violate our personal integrity," one of them said, "by justifying decisions . . . on a technical basis when they were made on a political level. . . . We have been asked to conceal information which should be made available to the public."

The group that sparked this protest is an outgrowth of the Movement for a Democratic Society, which is made up of alumni of Students for a Democratic Society. In this instance the young planners think of themselves as a buffer group between the various planning agencies and the communities and the public which these agencies purport to serve. They are attempting to focus attention on the process by which decisions are made at higher levels. It is obvious that they are reacting against the frustration that technicians of conscience experience when they see decisions made by a process which they regard as undemocratic and unresponsive to public needs and concerns.

To date none of these assistant planners has been reprimanded, although they have been "spoken to" as a group. Admittedly, this kind of activity presents problems of protocol, procedure and discipline. But what is emerging here is also a sign of the times and a response to a vital need. If the procedures by which decisions are made are in fact anti-social, then individuals in the bureaucratic structures must speak out. Otherwise, in an increasingly bureaucratic society, in which decision making grows ever more technical, how is the public to know when decisions are made properly and when they are not?

Not many years ago, public concern was focused on the "organization man" and the organizational society—on the kind of people who explained, "I just work here." But organizations, once they are called to account by their own members, may turn out to be more vulnerable than was thought. An orderly insurgency from within may be a salutary corrective for the bureaucracy which oppresses the mass of ordinary citizens.

The Name of the Beast

When Carl B. Stokes, Mayor of Cleveland, calls other Negroes in his city "black bigots," the epithet falls upon one's mind as a blight. But the situation which evoked these words throws new, and it may be useful, light on racism and prejudice in general.

Cleveland wants to build a public housing project in a lower-middle-class section of Cleveland called Lee-Seville. The present residents of this neighborhood are Negroes who, in the past ten or fifteen years, have managed to escape from the city's central ghettos. Like the so-called "ethnic" groups in America, they are fiercely motivated to succeed, ever aware of the fragility of the supports that hold them above their pasts. They do not want the housing project, and they voice familiar objections: declining real estate values, overcrowded schools, degraded public services, public safety.

Leading their fight are two City Councilmen, Clarence R. Thompson and Albert Pottinger, both black. Stokes asserts that these men are attempting to deprive a segment of the city's population of access to a decent style of living. Thompson replies that the basic amenities of the section are scarcely adequate now, and promises continued opposition until he sees specific improvements commensurate with the proposed new construction. That his position may be more than obstructionism is indicated by the announcement by Mayor Stokes of a $4 million improvement package for Lee-Seville. If that project goes through (Thompson says he wants to be shown), it may turn out that the residents of the neighborhood and their political representatives will have found a way to make City Hall attend to their needs.

The broader implication of the situation is that it casts some doubt on the specifically racist character of similar frequent disputes in this country. People, black and white, are jealous of their successes, and most jealous of all are those who have won them recently. If they see, or think they see, a threat to them from a group with different background or experience, the protest will almost inevitably take on the color of bigotry. If this is then taken up by the press and the spokesmen for the proposed change, the debate begins to focus on human wickedness instead of on the substantive issues.

There is indeed racism in this country, as there are many other forms of prejudice, but tolerance will be advanced, and the public tranquility served, if in given situations an attempt is made to distinguish prejudice from self-interest. The latter may be selfishness, reprehensible in itself, but it lacks the confrontation explosiveness of bigotry.

Contamination of the Oceans

Dr. E. D. Goldberg, professor of chemistry at the Scripps Institution of Oceanography, has written a disquieting paper on man's pollution of the oceans. The popular impression is that the oceans, covering two-thirds of the earth's surface to an average depth of 4 kilometers (2.5 miles) can be contaminated only locally, as in the Torrey Canyon disaster and the recent oil leakage in the Santa Barbara channel. (See "Oil on the Waters" by Edward Cowan, page 304.) Unfortunately the one-world concept applies not only politically but chemically, so that seemingly innocent discharges of more or less noxious chemicals directly into the ocean, or reaching it via the atmosphere, may do slow, irreversible harm. Often, also, as in the case of radioactive contamination, untoward effects may occur quickly, thousands of miles from the source.

"Man, a land animal," Dr. Goldberg tells us, "is influencing the chemical composition of sea water more than any of the species that live within the marine environment." In some cases man-made materials are added to those released naturally by weathering of rocks, etc.; in others—DDT, for instance—man is solely responsible.

Lead and mercury are examples of the former process. The annual world production of mercury is about 9,200 tons. The metal is used in industry and agriculture as a fungicide, catalyst, etc. It is estimated that about half of the total tonnage reaches the oceans via rivers and the atmosphere. No investigations have been made of mercury in the marine environment, but the levels found in the wings of birds in Sweden are ten to twenty times those detected earlier, and high concentrations have been discovered in the San Francisco smog. Fish, accumulating mercury compounds, may transfer them back to man.

Since tetra-ethyl lead was introduced as an anti-knock agent forty-five years ago, the input of lead into the oceans has come mainly from automobile exhausts. Some 350,000 metric tons of lead (a metric ton contains 2,200 pounds) are injected into the atmosphere of the Northern Hemisphere annually, and much of it reaches the oceans. The average lead content in surface waters of the northern oceans, while still measured in small fractions of a microgram per kilogram of sea water, has tripled over the forty-five-year period. A similar addition exists in reference to carbon compounds, such as carbon monoxide, carbon dioxide and hydrocarbons. Evaporation of dry-cleaning solvents takes place at a rate estimated at 360,000 tons in the United States alone every year. Since these hydrocarbons are chemically stable, they probably contribute materially to marine pollution.

Many contaminants have geologically long "residence times" in the ocean before they settle to the bottom. Consequently, marine life may be exposed to them for indefinite periods. The lesson of Dr. Goldberg's paper is that environmental studies should include the processes of slow pollution. If they are neglected, some unpleasant surprises may lie ahead.

Cultural Note

In population, at least, Newark, N.J., is a great city, though overshadowed by the proximity of New York. It is outstanding also in its tax rate, which runs well over $8 per $100 assessment. Understandably, the cries of the taxpayers are loud, and recently the City Council gave ear to their anguish. The Council's remedy was to cut off the city's contribution of $2.8 million a year to its library and museum, established in 1888 and 1909 respectively. "This action is out of sheer desperation," the Council president said, while the mayor termed it "tragic."

Without presuming to criticize the city fathers, one is entitled to wonder whether ours is really an affluent society. If so, the Newark museum and library would like to see some of that affluence come their way.

Crackdown

From Fort Lauderdale, Fla., one of the leading abodes of happiness in the United States, comes a disquieting story. A 27-year-old man named Will Willis, a former reporter for the Miami Herald, was accused of selling and possessing marijuana. The jury acquitted him on the charge of selling, and convicted him on one count of possession. The judge sentenced the defendant to three and a half years in state prison. Willis had no police record and appears to have been a model citizen. The judge gave an odd reason for the severity of the sentence: Willis was college educated and intelligent. "It's surprising," said His Honor, "that a man of his intellect would become involved. It was an unpleasant task. If I didn't do something, I'd be as weak-willed as he is." Pending appeal, he set bail at $12,000. A high police official in Fort Lauderdale called the sentence severe and said that first offenders in such circumstances are usually placed on probation.

Aside from the severity of the sentence, the case points to a current trend which is assuming dangerous implications. In proportion as serious social problems acquire a desperate urgency, the attention of law-enforcement officials is inclined to focus on relatively minor offenses, which are attacked with a savagery out of all relation to their importance. The "crackdown" is functional in that it diverts attention from issues of greater urgency, while conveying the impression of strict law enforcement.

Almost any offense can be used to trigger a general crackdown but some are better than others, and possession, use or sale of marijuana is one of the best. Many parents worry that their children are smoking pot or being encouraged to smoke it, and their anxiety is relieved when they read of severe sentences. All that most people know about marijuana is gleaned from sensational news stories, yet as Time pointed out recently, "practically everybody, whether doctor or layman, pothead or puritan, has been expressing dogmatic opinions for years about the effects of marijuana on its users." When reports of serious studies appear in technical or professional journals, they are generally ignored (a case in point being the Weil Report, Science, December 13, 1968).

The danger of Draconian campaigns against relatively minor offenses—apart from their diversionary effect—is that they create a general climate of opinion which encourages what might be called "legal violence" or "legal vigilantism." The sentence in the Fort Lauderdale case falls in this category. Crackdowns of this kind are contagious. At the moment, marijuana users are a prime target, but other offenders will be thrown to the lions if the current insistence on severity does not abate. In time, legal vigilantism stimulates the illegal variety and that, of course, is the greatest danger.

KINGSLEY MARTIN: A MEMOIR

ALEXANDER WERTH

Kingsley Martin, for many years editor of the New Statesman, died suddenly in Cairo on February 17. Before his death he ordered that his body be given to an Egyptian hospital for medical and scientific research. Though the son of a Unitarian minister, he became an agnostic at an early age, and remained one to the end. This was an atypical consistency in a man who, all his life, had been tormented by doubt, and who so often allowed himself to be swayed by the most contradictory influences. It was a common quip in the Great Turnstile office that Kingsley adopted the views of the last person he had seen. This was both true and untrue. He could be influenced, but only if he was predisposed to be influenced—as he was on a famous and shameful occasion during the pre-Munich crisis of 1938.

I first met Kingsley Martin soon after he became editor of the New Statesman in 1931. He had for three or four years been an editorial writer on the Manchester Guardian under the "great" C. P. Scott; and Scott, who had an exaggerated confidence in his own (often very dubious) judgment, intensely disliked his "overfussy" aide. To get rid of him as painlessly as possible, Scott used his influence to have Martin appointed editor of the Statesman, after the death of its previous editor, Clifford Sharp.

Kingsley, who felt himself humiliated by the episode, determined to show that he had been unjustly dealt with by making the New Statesman—then with a circulation of 15,000—both a financial success and a paper of real weight and influence. Its circulation shot up to 30,000 in 1939 and to 90,000 in 1945. As John Freeman, who succeeded him for a few years in 1961 recently wrote me from New Delhi: "On a paper like the New Statesman what matters most of all is the personality of its editor, who gives it its tone and coherent unity; and no one was, and ever will be, as good in this respect as Kingsley."

The paradox was that, although he gave the paper this extraordinary coherence, he himself lacked it. As his assistant editor, the late Aylmer Vallance, remarked: "It is not true that Kingsley is a great editor; but he is a supremely good writer himself, and he expects everybody else writing for the paper to come as near his own standard as possible." But although often torn by doubts and uncertainties, and with some of his colleagues trying to pull him far to the Left, and others further to a kind of social-democratic Right, Kingsley was, in fact, pink, rather than red, and in this respect he was very much an intellectual of the thirties. It is true, though, that what made the Statesman a great paper was, above all, the quality of its writing. Martin's own "London Diary" was the most brilliant journalism in England—witty, well written, and enormously readable.

I was lucky in the 1930s to write for two great editors—Kingsley on the Statesman and W. P. Crozier on the Manchester Guardian. Both had become acutely aware that fascism, and especially Hitlerism, was spreading to the rest of Western Europe. While I reported on the Fascist leagues in France, Kingsley kept an eagle eye on Mosleyism and other forms of fascism in England. Both Kingsley and Crozier were highly sympathetic to the Popular Front in France, and both took a staunchly pro-Republican line at the time of the Spanish War, even though, in the case of the Guardian, the somewhat unbalanced F. A. Voigt managed, for all his genuine anti-Hitlerism, to slip some pro-Franco articles into the paper during a few weeks. In 1937 I had to rush to Spain to repair the damage.

The New Statesman, anti-Fascist, anti-Nazi and pro-Spanish Republic, became the great paper of the younger British intellectuals, so many of whom went to Spain to fight. Like the Guardian, it seemed consistently hostile to appeasement and advocated a return to collective security, together with the indispensable Russians—though on both papers the purge trials of 1936-37 caused considerable qualms, and though neither tried, as did A. G. Cummings on the News Chronicle, to justify them.

In short, the beastliness of Stalinism could not be discounted altogether; but for Kingsley and Crozier it was still a lesser evil than Hitlerism—a line the opposite of that taken by certain press lords like Rothermere or Kemsley who, more or less openly, preached a free-hand-in-the-East for Hitler.

And yet, if Crozier remained consistently anti-Munich, Kingsley did not. One day at the end of August, 1938, he was visited by Roden Buxton, a Labourite who was an arch-appeaser. After this visit, the New Statesman, to the horror of its regular readers, came out with a proposal for the partition of Czechoslovakia. This was nearly two weeks before the Times proposed the same thing. That Times editorial of September 7 is a major landmark of the Munich surrender; but, in reality, Kingsley Martin had started the rot. For many years, he seemed deeply ashamed of what he had done, and gave all kinds of unconvincing explanations. But the truth is that K.M. was at heart a pacifist. He had been a conscientious objector during World War I, and when Buxton, in the name of "peace," advocated surrender, his words did not fall on stony soil.

Although after Munich he tried to repair the damage he had done, Martin became disheartened and pessimistic, if not downright defeatist. He blamed the Soviet-German Pact of 1939 on Chamberlain and, with the fall of France, his gloom deepened. When I returned to London after the French collapse and went to see Kingsley, he threw up his arms in a gesture of despair: "My God! What was the good of coming here? You might as well have stayed in France. The Germans will be here in a week!"

Later, when the British won the Battle of Britain, and there was no Nazi invasion, Kingsley still thought that the British shipping losses would starve the country. However, he pulled himself together once the London blitz had got into its stride and actually began to enjoy the excitement. One of the immortal paragraphs in the "London Diary" went something like this: "I must be the only man to have been blown off the lavatory seat by a bomb blast while reading Jane Austen!"

Though at first pessimistic as to Russia's chances, he became wildly enthusiastic about the Red Army once the tide had turned. After the war, he began to have serious misgivings about the way Europe was shaping. Somebody has said that he had no enemies. That is untrue; he had many enemies, among them Ernest Bevin who, soon after the Labour government had come into office in 1945, said to him: "How long will it take you, Kingsley, to stab me in the back?" Largely under the influence of R. H. S. Crossman—and Crossman had an almost mesmerizing effect on Kingsley—he adopted a sharply anti-Bevin and pro-Israel line on the Middle East. After the war he traveled prodigiously trying to size up the situation in the different countries. In Poland, Gomulka gave him a very nasty reception, and he fared little better in the other countries of the Socialist bloc. I think the only foreign country where this essentially Little Englander was truly happy was India. Nehru was a close personal friend, and K.M. liked to think that under his editorship the New Statesman had done more than any other proponent to bring about the independence of India and other colonial countries.

As for Eastern Europe, he developed, after the Tito-Stalin quarrel of 1948, a genuine enthusiasm for Yugoslavia and was highly pleased with the articles, mainly favorable to Tito, I sent him from Belgrade during several long visits to Yugoslavia in 1948-50. Aylmer Vallance, on the other hand, was furious. Before the Moscow-Belgrade rift he had christened his newborn son Tito, and was now kicking himself for having done so.

There were all sorts of contradictory and conflicting influences on the Statesman during the cold-war years of 1948-53, and Kingsley had some difficulty coping with them. His business manager, the late John Roberts, was a bit of a McCarthyite, who dreaded that the paper could be suspected of Moscow sympathies. Crossman was violently anti-Communist; Aylmer Vallance was known as a "Red," and, before long, Kingsley felt obliged to bar him from writing on any controversial international subject. He was easily rattled; for instance when Vallance signed the "Stockholm Appeal" and, above all, whenever the paper received a spate of "McCarthyite" letters, criticizing this or that article. For it is wrong to imagine that McCarthyism was a purely American phenomenon. There was plenty of it in France, and even more in England—a more insidious kind than in the United States, but nasty for all that.

Although there was weakness in his character, Martin neverthelesss remained, until his retirement in 1961, a great journalist and editor. He took a violently anti-colonialist line in dealing with France's wars in Indo-China and, later, in North Africa. After 1961 he wrote his autobiography in two volumes, the second of which, Editor, I found a little disappointing. Although it contained masses of information about his meetings and friendship with Keynes, the Webbs, Bernard Shaw, H. G. Wells, Harold Laski (whom he truly loved) and other eminent men of the British Left, and some very good jokes, not least about the British monarchy, which he thought amusingly absurd, it somehow failed to expound any coherent political philosophy. Also, it failed to render that pleasantly crazy atmosphere of the New Statesman office, as I had known it for some thirty years.

I think the truth is that Kingsley's colleagues, while admiring him as a writer, found his hesitations, his wobbling, his brainstorms and sudden enthusiasms and equally sudden phobias upsetting and disconcerting. Respecting him, they yet tended behind his back to make fun of him and of his extraordinary personal vanity. Kingsley was, I think, aware of it, but while he could be whimsically (seldom angrily) funny about other people, he somehow refused to admit that he too had a funny side. But this was a small failing, compared with his enormous achievement as one of the creators in England of the anti-Fascist mystique of the thirties. I think it was Muggeridge who recently remarked that it was a lot of fuss about nothing—that it did not delay Nazi aggression and the outbreak of World War II by half a day. Maybe not. But to resist and denounce Hitlerism was, in those days, an inescapable moral imperative for the lost generation of the thirties—whom Kingsley, except for that one terrible lapse, represented so well. A lot of things were wrong about the Spanish war, but to support the Republicans, as Kingsley did in his finest hour on the Statesman, was inevitable; his campaign was part of that genuine mass protest against the unchecked arrogance with which Hitler and Mussolini had been kicking the "democracies" around for years. If we failed, it was because the Chamberlains and Bonnets were determined that we should.

CAMPUS MISSIONARIES

THE LAYING ON OF CULTURE

JOHN McDERMOTT

Mr. McDermott is Field Secretary of the New University Conference and a free-lance lecturer. Formerly, he was editor of Viet Report and has written widely on the Vietnamese War. His book on technology and society will be published later in the year by Random House.

I

About a year ago I accepted an invitation to speak "against the war," at, let's call it, the University of Dexter. It is located in the city of that name, one of the major manufacturing towns of the Midwestern industrial belt. Since Dexter is somewhat off the main circuit for anti-war speech-making, I read up on the university and the town, and what I found made me look forward to my visit.

The university tended to draw most of its students from the town itself. They came heavily from working-class families and were often the first in their families to attend college. Frequently English was not the only language spoken at home. More significant was the fact that the city itself had at one time considerable fame for working-class militancy. One of the great early strikes of the depression was fought in Dexter, and the issue was not settled in the workers' favor until they had fought the National Guard to a draw in pitched street battles. Before that the city had been a center of Socialist Party activity, and still earlier, a stronghold of IWW sentiment. Thus I looked forward to my visit as an opportunity to talk to the kind of students seldom reached by Movement speakers.

It wasn't. Attendance at the well-publicized meeting was spotty; those who came tended to be about evenly divided between faculty and graduate students, almost all of whom were from outside the state. And there were no students at the party to which I was taken later in the evening, though they had helped plan the meeting, for student segregation is the campus rule at Dexter, no less within the Movement than outside it. Perhaps it was that or perhaps my disappointment at the absence of "normal" students at the evening's meeting; anyhow, I deliberately forced the party to become a meeting. It had taken no great powers of observation to note that the anti-war movement at Dexter, and, by extension, its Left, was largely a preserve of the faculty and some fellow-traveling graduate students, and I was interested to discover why that was so. In particular, I wanted to explore the role these teachers had adopted to their "normal" students and to examine with them the contradiction between that professional role and their wider political aspirations. I have taught in several universities, I've suffered the same contradiction and was unable to overcome it.

The most prominent feature of the discussion which followed, and of all the subsequent ones I've started on the same subject in similar situations, was that the faculty, to a man, still aspired to teach in elite schools. Dexter, after all, is what is popularly known as a "cow" college. A state school, it gets those students who, for lack of skill or money or interest, don't go to the main state university and couldn't "make" the liberal arts colleges in the area, even if they wanted to. Its students are very much vocationally oriented and still tied to their families. Most of them live at home.

Dexter is frequently under nuisance attack by some right-wing faction or other. It pays rather badly and is not in an attractive metropolitan area. Its library is inferior, it provides little research money, and the teaching loads are heavy. The administration is fusty and conservative, as is much of the faculty.

My faculty friends, obviously talented men and women, had not reconciled themselves to this exile. They depreciated the region, the town, the university and, especially, the students, even the graduate students. Loyalty and affection they reserved for the graduate schools from which they had come, and they reflected this feeling in their teaching and counseling by relating only to that one student in a hundred who might go on to one of those prestigious graduate schools. Those were the students who shared with them the culture of books and civility—and scorn for Dexter; who might by their success at a "good" graduate school justify the faculty's exile in Dexter.

Of course they didn't put it that way, and neither did I when I taught in similar places. They saw themselves as embattled missionaries to the culturally Philistine. They worked hard and creatively with the students who merited hope. As for the others, these men and women, in spite of their expressed scorn, nourished a vision, hesitantly expressed, of a society in which no student would be oppressed by cultural bondage to ignorance, vocationalism, anti-intellectualism and provincialism. In fact, that attitude and hope gave rise to and was expressed in their left-wing politics.

The guests at the party were woefully ignorant of the background of their "normal" students. They were vaguely aware that most of them came from working-class families, though what that might mean aside from greater resistance to formal education they had no idea. They had no knowledge either of Dexter's militant labor traditions. This was sad, for it penalized the faculty in a number of ways. To cite an apparently trivial instance, most of the faculty present were concerned over attacks made on the university by the right wingers in town. Respect for free speech and expression had an important place in their scale of values, and they tried to convey it to their classes, using all the familiar academic examples, from HUAC witch hunting and Joe McCarthy, to Stuart Mill, Milton and Sophocles.

Yet that they might relate the principle of free expression to the problems of Wobbly agitators in the 1910s or of CIO organizers in the 1930s (or of white-collar workers in the 1970s)—in short, relate it to the actual cultural history (or future) of their own students—never occurred to them. Instead, they were put off when the students responded to the alien and seemingly irrelevant world of HUAC and Milton and academic freedom with either passive unconcern or active hostility.

I believe this example successfully characterizes how the great majority of faculty behave in schools like Dexter, including, especially, the left wing of the faculty. Socialized like all their fellows into a rigid professional role by their university, graduate school and early professional experiences, they have neither the information nor the inclination to break out of that role and relate openly and positively to the majority of their students who cannot accept the culture of the university world as their own.

University professors as a group seem exceptionally uncritical of the limited value—and values—of a university education and the acculturation it represents. In their view, a student who is really open to his classroom and other cultural experiences at the university will, as a rule, turn out to be more sophisticated, more interested in good literature, more sensitive morally than one who is less open or who has not had the benefit of college. The student will also be free of the more provincial ties of home, home town, region and class. In short, most academics take it as an article of faith that a student benefits by exchanging his own culture for that of the university. It is by far the most common campus prejudice.

And it would be harmless enough if it were limited in its sanction to those students who allow their university education to "take," who do well at university work and will go on to graduate school and then to a place within the university world or, perhaps, into some other related profession. University attitudes and values are appropriate to that world. But what about the others, the cultural rednecks, the "normal" boy and girl at a place like Dexter? Do they really profit from acquiring the attitudes, values, life style, and so forth of the peculiar culture whose institutional base is the university? One way of attacking this question is to ask to what extent those values, attitudes and life style may be usefully transferred to other institutional settings—to little towns and big cities, to industrial or agricultural life, to life in a corporation or in government.

That was about as far as we went at that party a year ago. We agreed that we were part of a university system which was actively engaged at its Dexters in destroying whatever indigenous culture might remain among the American working class. We recognized that, consciously or not, we had assumed an invidious clerical relationship to our student laity. Like medieval priests or missionaries to the heathen, we dispensed a culture to all our students, despite the fact that a scant few could participate in it. For the others, the language of that culture, like Latin to the colloquial, was grasped largely in rote phrases, its symbols and doctrines recognized but only dimly understood. To the extent that this majority of students acquired the external trappings of the university, they seemed both culturally pacified and made culturally passive. Pacified because they were acculturated away from their own historical values and traditions; passive because they could at best be spectators of a culture whose home remained an alien institution.

II

In the year that has passed since my visit to Dexter my views of the relationship of general culture to political culture have very much developed under the influence of Edward Thompson's The Making of the English Working Class. [See review by Norman Fruchter, The Nation, April 6, 1964.] I find particularly persuasive and suggestive Thompson's demonstration of how certain aspects of the general culture of the English working class, over a period of time and under the stress of events, came to support a specificially political culture—that is, to enlarge its capacity to define its social interests and to struggle successfully in their behalf. I shall cite several instances of this, for I want later to use them to illuminate the problem at Dexter from a new and, I think, hopeful standpoint.

Thompson shows that the movement into the factories in England of the late 18th and early 19th centuries was made up of two distinct streams. One was the movement of poor, dispossessed rural persons to the city and the factory in search of opportunity; the other of highly skilled, often literate craftsmen being pushed down the social and economic ladder by the new forces of industrialism and technology. The former, abruptly torn from their rural poverty, had some reason to view the change as an improvement. The cultural shock of the transition, the traditional passivity to authority, the stimulus of urban life, and the novelty of cash wages might easily have disguised for a time the exploitative nature of their place in the new factory system. The urban craftsmen, however, having a sense of their own skill and worth, with still lively guild traditions, and a strong sense of declining status and economic position, were most unlikely to think of the factory experience as a road to opportunity. They knew it for the oppression it really was. It was the meeting of these two groups that proved so creative for the future of the working-class movement. The skilled printers, weavers and mechanics recognized that their lot was cast with the unskilled rural migrants, and they became a creative element among the larger mass. Their literacy, their talent for organization, their family and folk memories that working people had once lived secure in their homes, livelihoods and craftsmanship, were transferred over the years to the mass of working people. But they were transferred with a radical difference. By contributing them to the cause of the entire working class, what might otherwise have been merely a narrow defense of guild interests was instead universalized into a struggle for the rights of all Englishmen, a struggle for the rights of man.

Thompson also shows how important for the new working-class movement was the experience so many workers had in the Dissenting Churches. Men and women who, over the years, had learned to contend with the problems of maintaining a minister's salary, keeping up the church and parsonage, administering an active religious and social program, and organizing regional church activities were able to apply these skills to nascent working-class organizations. Of particular importance was their long experience of persecution at the hands of the Church of England. Both ministers and congregations had learned how to preserve their churches and beliefs in the face of official hostility and repression. Thus when Pitt, Burke and their successors attempted to destroy the new workingmen's organizations, these were able to go underground, preserving their organizations, maintaining their programs and extending their networks throughout the country.

Still another general cultural factor cited by Thompson as a primary support for the growing working-class movement was the belief among the English lower classes that they were "freeborn Englishmen." The phrase had no precise meaning, but it was habitually called into play to criticize or resist any arbitrary act against the populace and its organizations, any claim to special place by the upper classes, any innovation in government control over the speech, writing, travels or associations of the common people. It was a useful and eminently flexible weapon in the hands of the working-class movement against the power of the capitalists and the wiles of Edmund Burke.

What makes Thompson's work of more than antiquarian interest is the suggestive analogy it offers to situations such as that at Dexter. There is a double movement into such universities today, somewhat as there was a double movement into the factories of England two centuries ago. On the one hand, a flood of lower-class young people is moving into these universities, seeking entrée into the old independent professional middle class which university attendance supposedly affords. It is necessary to add "supposedly," for passage through a non-elite university no longer qualifies one for that kind of life. The jobs for which the Dexters and the junior colleges prepare students are elementary and secondary teaching, the lower levels of social work, white-collar hire, petty management—that is, employments which were once semiprofessional, but which now are being rapidly industrialized by bureaucracy, managerial science and the IBM machine. Thus the lower-class boys or girls who go to Dexter only appear to escape from the world of industry; they are really taking the first vocational step into a new kind of industrial life.

The second movement into such institutions as Dexter is of a gifted minority of educated persons, who identify with the values, accomplishments and prestige of elite professions, but are forced by the economics of academic employment to take positions they consider beneath their skills, their sense of worth and accomplishment, their lively memories of the recent past.

But here the analogy with Thompson's English working class begins to break down, for these latter specifically and pointedly refuse to make common cause with the lower-class students with whom they share daily existence. This gifted Left minority does not help the students to develop an effective and vital popular political culture. On the contrary, it often occupies the vanguard of a university culture which, as I suggested above and now wish to argue more fully, pacifies lower-class students.

III

The most obvious political characterization of university culture is that it lives by, and presents to its students, the values and attitudes appropriate to its own upper-middle-class life style—a style that is part of the older, now declining, professional middle classes. As indicated above, a university education did once promise membership in the professional classes. This meant that university graduates could ordinarily expect a life of considerable social and economic independence, some measure of personal influence in local business and political communities, significant autonomy and initiative in carrying out their daily work, and thus the possibility of enjoying the pride that follows from personal accomplishment and craftsmanship.

Could it be clearer that no such life awaits the graduates of the nation's Dexters? Today a degree from a second- or third-line institution is a passport to a life style of high consumption and of reasonable job security. But it will probably be an industrial life style, characterized by social and economic dependence on a large institution, by little or no political or social influence, and by participation in rationalized work processes wherein one must try merely "to get by and not step on anybody's toes." Consider, therefore, how the professionally oriented values of the university's culture might function in such an industrial environment. High on the scale of university values, now and in the past, stands the virtue of tolerance—not only personal tolerance in the face of new or differing ideas, attitudes and values but the belief that tolerance itself is of greater personal and social value than the substance of almost any set of creeds. Such a value was useful in the professional worlds of the past, for it would normally help diminish conflict in a middle class made up of highly autonomous individuals. And in elite circles even today it diminishes the weight assigned to ideological differences and helps to harmonize the social and political relations of our pluralistic, semi-autonomous industrial, educational, government and other managers. It carries the advantage, too, that it opens managers to the merits of technological and organizational novelty in a political economy strongly oriented to such innovations.

But how does this belief function for the young men and women of Dexter, who will normally occupy the lower and middle levels of great institutional bureaucracies, and who may have reason to resist those very same innovations: speed-up, compulsory overtime, more and more alienating work processes, forced transfer to another city or region, institutional propaganda, Muzak and the other normal tyrannies of personnel managers? Is it a value that helps them to initiate or continue those collective struggles which are necessary to defend or enhance their interests; or does it rob them of the moral and ideological assurance which must support the beliefs of people who challenge the social legitimacy and retributive power of authority?

A second political aspect of university culture is its almost uniform hostility to the institutions of local and community life. Many churches, fraternities, veterans' associations, councils and boards upon which local and community life in America is built are havens of the narrowest sorts of provincialism, racism, intellectual baiting, babbittry and jingoism. For these reasons, and for reasons having to do with the demands of the national economy for college-trained persons, the tendency of university experience is to propel the young away from local and community life and toward national life and its institutions. A result of the university's liberalism, cosmopolitanism and technologism, this tendency is supported by the national culture, by the students themselves, and by their parents.

But it should be combated by those, like my friends at Dexter, who are interested in building mass resistance to the prevailing currents of American life. A young person from Dexter, unless extraordinarily gifted or fortunate, has almost no means of gaining influence in national politics. And to the extent that university culture directs great masses of lower- and lower-middle-class young people into the institutions of national rather than local and community life, it assists in disenfranchising them from political influence. Of course, the conventional representatives of university culture argue that the decline of local politics and local institutions is inevitable, given the institutional needs of 20th-century industry and government, the gradual nationalization of American life, and the march of technology—i.e., liberalism, cosmopolitanism and technologism. But we should begin to question whether this inevitability amounts to more than advantageous prejudice. For the kind of society which these university spokesmen describe as inevitable appears to be coincidentally one in which the Ph.D. takes its place with property and birth as a means to political influence and social status.

Similarly, the ignorance, racism and the like which characterize so much of local life should not put us off. Given the preoccupation of the Left, over the past epoch, with national rather than local concerns and institutions, it is not surprising that local America has become a playpen of unchallenged right-wing attitudes, persons and organizations. Of course, one could not expect, even under the best conditions, that the life style of local America will rival the faculty club in gentility, civility, humanist learning and other caricatures of university life. But that is not its test, any more than the theological elegance of the Dissenting Churches was the test of their usefulness to a struggling movement of ordinary Englishmen. Those who are today concerned about a different kind of economic barbarism and a similar kind of world-wide crusade should draw the appropriate lessons.

A third political aspect of university culture is its latent hostility to two of the more valuable and humane realities in current popular culture. One cannot move around this country without being impressed by its egalitarianism, that is the depth and vitality of the ordinary American's feeling that he is as good as the next fellow. And the other reality so important in our popular culture is the well-nigh universal belief among our people that they possess an extraordinary range and variety of substantive rights. Like the belief in "the freeborn Englishmen," the belief in substantive rights is often vague and contradictory. Nevertheless, the history of popular political movements is the history of ordinary people acting in behalf of what they believe to be their substantive rights.

It would be too much to say that the university's culture is uniformly hostile to these popular realities, for the situation is ambiguous. However, it is not difficult to identify important hostile tendencies. Thus in contrast to the normal American acceptance of the principle of equality, the professoriat strongly values formalized differences of age, academic rank, scholarly reputation and, it may even be, accomplishment. The effect of this sort of deference is somewhat difficult to gauge and it may be tendentious on my part to believe that it influences student attitudes on legitimacy, authority and equality. Perhaps the issue is instead that university men and women, by failing to provide a living example of egalitarian relationships, merely fail to make common cause with the American people in their resistance to the hierarchic tendencies implicit in the social and economic system.

A more secure case can be made against the disposition in the university world to identify right not with substantive but with procedural matters. Peter Gay expressed this position in the Summer 1968 issue of Partisan Review:

". . . democracy is essentially procedural and what matters is not so much (important though it may be) what a given policy is as how it is arrived at. . . ." Persons as fortunately placed as Professor Gay, whose substantive rights are well established in easily available procedures, have an understandable tendency to overlook the fact that, for example, tenure, sabbaticals, choice of hours, and freedom of expression on the job—are virtually unknown outside the academic world. Obviously there are other, important and thorny issues here as well. Without going into them at any length, note that the test of Professor Gay's remark is its fidelity to historical fact. From that point of view, it tends to obscure the fact that the great libertarian and democratic turning point in postwar American political history, a turning point with great promise still, came not from the narrow defense of procedural rights by academic and other liberals against Joe McCarthy in the 1950s but from the assertion of substantive rights in the 1960s by mass movements of students, blacks, professors and ordinary Americans.

The students at Dexter, and a great part of their countrymen, rightly view the liberal and academic preference for procedural right as a defense of privileges which they themselves are denied. Many view the principle of academic freedom, for example, as they view some of the laws of property. It is a tricky device which enables professors to do things, like criticize the dean or the country, for which ordinary people can be fired; just as the law of property is a tricky device which enables installment houses and loan companies to do things for which ordinary people can be sent to jail. The goal is not to do away with academic freedom, or any other hard-won libertarian procedure. A better approach would be to shape a university culture which would help to extend Professor Gay's tenure, sabbaticals, and freedom of expression on the job to everyone, on campus and off.

The existence of hostile tendencies toward egalitarianism and the primacy of substantive right is very much related to still a fourth political aspect of university culture. Even though the university is the home and source of much of the libertarian ideology within our culture, it is often the source of authoritarian ideology as well. I have two cases in mind. The first has to do with the extensive commitment to technologism found among many faculty members. A considerable body of university opinion believes with Zbigniew Brzezinski that the promises of modern technology demand for their social realization a society characterized by "equal opportunity for all but . . . special opportunity for the singularly talented few." The evasiveness of the formula should not be allowed to obscure the authoritarian social and political processes which are envisioned and justified by it—processes today best exemplified in the area of national security, where the equal voting opportunities of all are nullified by the special bureaucratic opportunities open to a singularly talented few. The second of the university's authoritarian ideologies I call clericism. To borrow from Brzezinski's formula, it is the claim to "equal cultural rights for all, but special cultural authority for a singularly scholarly few." I refer to the still widespread (but declining) academic belief that, whatever else culture may include, it also includes the Western Heritage, the Western Tradition, the Literary Tradition, the traditions of reason and civility, etc., and that these are most fully embodied in the profession of academe and the written treasures of which academe is priestly custodian and inspired interpreter.

This principle underlies faculty sovereignty over curricular matters, justifies any and every required course, oppresses first-year graduate students, and received its most prosaic formulation in the observation by Columbia's vice dean of the graduate facilities that ". . . whether students vote 'yes' or 'no' on an issue is like telling me they like strawberries." Clericism and technologism have their good points; no one wishes seriously to derogate either the social or the moral value of good scholarship or competent technology. But as principles under which to organize cultural or political life they are distinctly hostile to the interests of great numbers of non-elite students, the social classes from which they are drawn, and especially the social classes they will constitute when they leave the university. For clericism and technologism, like the doctrines of apostolic succession and of property which they tend to replace, transpose major areas of social concern from the purview of all to the treasure house of the few. Culture, no less than politics, is a critical factor in the nature of social organization; in the distribution of power, reward and status; in the infliction of powerlessness, oppression and despair. This is becoming increasingly understood with regard to politics, where ten years of war, urban decay and increasing social chaos seem to have been the fruit of the same decade's obeisance to technology's claims. But I am not persuaded that clericist depredations on culture are similarly recognized.

As I think was made clear at the start of this essay, the faculty at Dexter did not feel called upon to know the specific cultural history and experiences of the students they taught. Neither they nor anyone in the academic profession consider it their task to use their own superior symbolic gifts and wider historical perspective to identify the specific historical culture of their students, to clarify its ambiguities, to criticize it, purging it of its moral (not geographical) provincialism, and thus to assist the students to develop a culture which is at once personally ennobling and politically self-conscious. On the contrary, at Dexter and elsewhere the faculty assume that it is their duty to replace the students' actual culture wih an alien culture. Missionaries from these graduate schools, like clergy from colonial empires everywhere and in every time, feel confident that what they bring is good for the natives and will improve them in the long run. In culture, as elsewhere, this is manifestly not so.

Consider the matter of historical traditions. No acculturation worth the name should be permitted to block the transmission of Dexter's militant working-class traditions. Even granting, as is probably the case, that only a small minority of the Dexter students are children of depression workers or the earlier Wobblies, to assist, even if only negatively, in destroying these traditions is to minimize for most of the students the opportunity to discover the reasons for their attitudes on a score of moral and social questions, the reality of their social lives, and the possibility of rebuilding a more humane culture in Dexter for their own advantage. White intelligentsia recognize this danger when they peer across cultural lines at blacks or Vietnamese; why are they so blinded by the class lines of their own society? It should come as no surprise, therefore, that the anti-intellectualism of the students is often as deep and as bitter as the hatred exhibited by other colonial peoples toward foreigners and their works.

A university culture which related positively and creatively to the traditions and history of the working classes, blue collar and white collar, would find allies not only among the hippies and the leftists of Smith and Williams but from the squares of Dexter as well.

What is particularly disturbing about cultural pacification in the university is that it is not entirely an accidental phenomenon. At least since Herbert Croly's Promise of American Life (1909), America's dominant historians have been strongly nationalist, more interested in discovering and celebrating the American essence or character, the national mainstream, consensus or moral epic, or the peculiar quality of our national integration, than in emphasizing its divisions, especially those based on class. It has often crossed my mind that when liberal historians two decades hence write the chronicle of the Southern freedom movement of the early 1960s or of the anti-Vietnamese War movement of today, they will find imaginative and persuasive reasons to show that the first was really part of the New Frontier and the second of the Great Society. It was thus that their predecessors have managed to reduce the richness and variety of popular revolt in the 1930s to the bureacratic dimensions of a Washington-based "New Deal."

Fortunately, some of the younger historians, such as Staughton Lynd and Jesse Lemisch, have begun to undermine the epic poetry of the Crolyites by reviving interest in the history of popular insurgency in America. Thus they have created the possibility that at least at some universities young people will be reacquainted with the real diversity and conflict of their past. More than that, and without exaggerating its importance or extent, this new scholarship provides a point of departure for a fundamentally different university culture than the one I have been describing.

IV

Faced with the vast social diversity of America and in opposition to the variety and strength of its Populist traditions, the thrust of university culture is to pacify its working-class "natives" and thus, I believe, to help preclude any fundamental change in national politics and priorities. Because of the surge of rebellion on campus since last spring, it is likely that this is understood better now among faculty than it was at the time I visited Dexter. But many university men and women, comparing the university's cultural values to those of industry, the mass media and the military, or to the restless hostility of lower- and working-class America, remain partisans and priests of academe, convinced that for all its faults it is, at least minimally, a humane alternative to its rivals.

The analogy I began earlier to the work of Edward Thompson points in a more hopeful and, I think, more realistic direction. A survey of recent campus rebellions would show that it is no longer only the Harvards and the Berkeleys which suffer serious student unrest; some of the most interesting and militant activity occurs at the non-elite schools. In addition, scores of young men and women continue to be exiled by their elite graduate schools into a lifetime of work in the non-elite universities. The narrowest interests of these teachers and their most lofty professional and political aspirations lie in the same direction. It is to take up the task, in common with their students, of rebuilding the vitality of a popular resistance culture—that is, of a culture which will "enhance the capacity of ordinary Americans to identify their social interests and to struggle successfully in their behalf."

This is not a task which individuals can successfully undertake in isolation, nor one whose champions will be free of serious reprisal at the hands of university and political authorities. Nevertheless, there are already a handful of campuses where the work has begun, in critical universities, liberation courses, seminars in local and working-class history, student-taught courses for faculty, and research projects on local and campus decision making. It remains for others to add to these hopeful beginnings.

BIAFRA: WAR OF IMAGES

STANLEY MEISLER

Mr. Meisler, Africa correspondent for the Los Angeles Times, was formerly deputy director of the Office of Evaluation and Research in the Peace Corps.

Nairobi

Images play as important a role as guns in the Nigerian civil war. The Biafran secessionists, among Africa's most sophisticated peoples, have known from the beginning that their chances for success depended as much on evoking world sympathy as on holding back the federal army. Now, after twenty months of war, it is clear that the Biafrans have been far more adept at propaganda than soldiering. If they survive in some sovereign form, they will owe it to their skill with images.

Part of the Biafran success in public relations stems from the federal Nigerian Government's failure at it. At the beginning, the Nigerians made absolutely no intelligent effort to get their point of view across. In fact, the government's publicists often hurt the Nigerian case as much as they helped it. Many officials of the Ministry of Information were new at their job. Before the troubles, the top information officers had been Ibos, but they fled to their tribal home in eastern Nigeria soon after thousands of Ibos were massacred in northern Nigeria in September, 1966. When the eastern region seceded and called itself Biafra in May, 1967, these civil servants remained there.

Besides lacking experience, the new Nigerian information officers also had the disadvantage of working for a military government. The soldiers who ran Nigeria, unlike the politicians before the coups of 1966, were unaccustomed to journalistic glare and annoyed by it. In early 1967, I asked A. K. Disu, the federal Director of Information, for an interview with Maj. Gen. Yakubu Gowon, the federal military ruler. Disu responded with raucous laughter. I then asked for interviews with other top officials of the goverment. "Just go back to your hotel room and read the local papers," Disu said.

The federal government also began to censor outgoing press cables, a practice that embittered foreign correspondents. Cables sometimes disappeared. Key paragraphs were sometimes slashed, all without newsmen being told what was happening to their stories. On the night the civil war began, the censor cut from my story all sentences that contained the expression "civil war." The Nigerians had decided that their invasion of Biafra was the start of a "police action," not a civil war. The censorship accomplished little except to force the foreign correspondents to waste time figuring out ingenious ways of by-passing the censor. The bad feeling grew so intense and obvious that the government finally announced an end of censorship—though it kept right on censoring.

In recent months, important civilian officials of the government, like Commissioner of Information Anthony Enahoro, have tried to make the government more cooperative. But the inefficiency of the lesser bureaucrats still seems to get in the way. In a half-dozen trips to Nigeria, I have not yet been granted an interview with General Gowon.

The Nigerians have a strong moral case for unity. If Nigeria broke up, the numerous minority tribes would become oppressed in three tribal states run by the large tribes; in a unified Nigeria, the small tribes can unite at the center and have at least as much power as the large tribes. But the situation is complex, and the Nigerians have done a poor job explaining it.

The Biafrans, on the other hand, have a stark and emotional case to explain, and they have made the most of it. The Ibos believe there is no security for them in Nigeria. The massacres in 1966 and the continual bombing of civilians by Nigerian planes have convinced their leaders that Nigeria is bent on humbling and shattering and perhaps wiping out the Ibo people. The Ibos believe that life under the other tribes of Nigeria would be oppressive and that the continued resistance of the Ibos in the face of mass killing and starvation is proof that they are a determined, united people who deserve sovereignty. This is a powerful and persuasive argument, but no more so than the argument of the Africans of southern Sudan who have been trying for years to win their independence from the ruling Arabs of northern Sudan. Yet hardly anyone outside the Sudan cares about the southern Sudanese. Unlike the Biafrans, the southern Sudanese do not know how to sell their argument.

One of the key Ibo salesmen has been their leader, Lt. Col. Chukwuemeka Odumegwu Ojukwu, Oxford-educated and the son of one of the wealthiest men in Nigeria. The 35-year-old Ojukwu is a witty, sophisticated and romantic leader. Unlike the military leaders of the rest of Nigeria, he is a colorful politician with a flair for drama. Sometimes, however, he hurts himself by talking too much. At the Addis Ababa peace conference last August, he made a striking impact in his opening speech before Emperor Haile Selassie by repeating the same words that the Emperor had used in protesting to the League of Nations about the Italian invasion of Ethiopia in 1935. He then dissipated the impact by droning on for more than two hours.

A number of foreign correspondents find him egotistical and unrealistic. And some get annoyed by his air of faint contempt when he feels their questions are too foolish for him to answer. But, in general, he is a frank, logical, persuasive man with a good sense of humor and a good sense of news. Most correspondents find him accessible, informative and very quotable.

Ojukwu is well served by the civil servants around him, and these young men, both in the Ministry of Information and in the other ministries, are an important reason why Biafra has been able to get its story out to the rest of the world. The young Biafran officials that foreign newsmen meet are helpful, friendly, well educated and efficient. With a professional competence worthy of Madison Avenue, they set up interviews with Ojukwu and other leaders on a few hours' notice, arrange transportation throughout what's left of Biafra, rush news copy out through Biafra's Telex line to Geneva, cater to the whims of the visitors, and allow newsmen enough free rein to make them feel they are being assisted, not collared and smothered.

Sometimes they falter. Isolated from the outside world, a few imagine falsely that the press of the world is against them. Foolish, insulting remarks are sometimes made. In addition, there has been a good deal of reluctance lately to allow visitors close to the fighting. Now that the Biafrans have new stocks of arms, they seem more fearful of letting military secrets slip away. But, despite these problems, the Biafran officials far excel the Nigerian officials in public relations.

Partly this comes from experience. The Nigerian novelists who once staffed the federal Nigerian Ministry of Information are now working in Biafra. But mostly it comes from the efficiency and Western ways that have long been characteristic of educated Ibo people. The Ibos have been one of the few tribes in Africa to accept modernization wholeheartedly and they have made a convincing go of it. They have adopted the best of Western ways quickly and thoroughly.

As soon as its troubles began, the Biafran Government saw the need for an outside public relations firm to deal with foreign editors and correspondents. At first, they hired Robert S. Goldstein Enterprises of Los Angeles for a reported $400,000 but later switched to the firm of H. William Bernhardt in Geneva. His fee has not been publicized. Bernhardt puts out the Markpress News Feature Service which almost daily issues a news bulletin from Biafra. Most of it is exaggerated puffing about imagined Biafran military victories, but it does offer some factual information—the latest speech of Ojukwu, for example, or the latest total of Catholic relief supplies.

But, more important, Bernhardt arranges the trips of foreign newsmen into Biafra and then makes sure that their Telexed copy is forwarded from his Geneva office to their newspapers. Since Biafra is so isolated and has limited representation abroad, newsmen would have a chaotic time reaching the area if they did not have an outside contact man. Bernhardt himself is a quiet, pleasant, dapper American who never tries to pressure newsmen. Newsmen enjoy his company, and he often can be found with them in restaurants and bars.

Despite his important role, it would be wrong to look on Bernhardt as the all-powerful image maker behind Biafran secession. The Biafrans hardly treat him as such. At the Kampala, Niamey and Addis Ababa peace conferences, they practically ignored him. When Biafran information officials are around, they take charge.

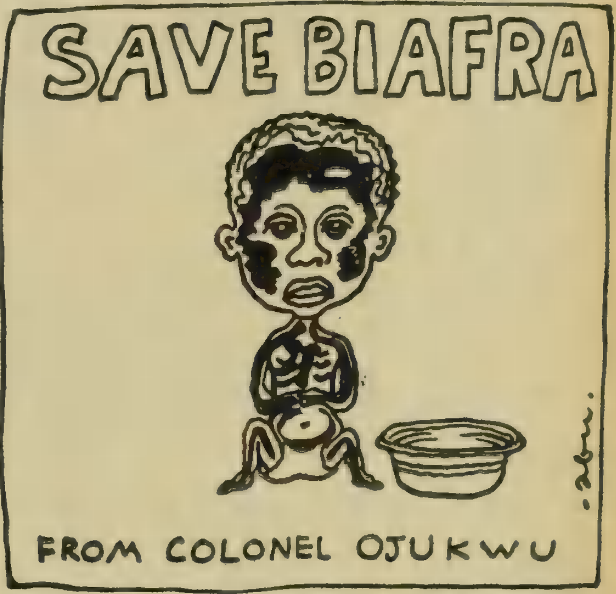
Biafra has had another, stronger proponent overseas in the Roman Catholic Church. There is no doubt that the Catholic Church and Catholic organizations have sympathy for Biafra and a special interest in it. There are perhaps 3 or 4 million Catholics in Biafra, three times as many as in the rest of Nigeria. A visitor to Biafra soon finds the foreign priests there heavily committed to the Biafran cause. Though born in Ireland, most of the priests say "we" when they talk of Biafrans. Some relive the Irish Rebellion. "Listen," one told me, "I led a rebellion in my country in 1916. We lost that militarily, but we won our independence in 1922."

The Biafrans have pointed to their heavy Catholic and, in fact, Protestant numbers as proof that the Moslems of northern Nigeria are engaged in a religious war against them. That is a great exaggeration and oversimplification. But, as one priest told me, "I don't believe this is a religious war, but I do believe the work of the Church here will come to an end if the Biafrans lose this war."

Fearful of losing one of their strongholds in Africa and intensely sympathetic to the Ibo people they know so well, Catholic officials have done a great deal to whip up emotion for Biafra throughout the world and get help to the besieged land. Priests have left Biafra to publicize the Biafran cause in Europe and the United States. Several have manned various points on the air route of supply from Lisbon and Sao Tome. The church was one of the first to cry out for a relief operation and one of the first to organize one in the face of Nigerian resistance. At the beginning, Caritas Internationalis, the Catholic Relief Organization, by paying for the illegal flights that carried food and medicine to Biafra, may inadvertently have paid some of the freight charges for arms as well.

Since last September, according to Bishop Joseph Whelan of Biafra, Caritas Internationalis and the World Council of Churches have airlifted 10,000 tons of supplies into Biafra. That heavy relief operation is a direct result of the early pressure for help by the Catholic Church.

Catholic sympathy for Biafra has angered the Nigerians and provoked them into sensational accusations. Recently the Lagos newspapers accused Caritas Internationalis of recruiting 200 mercenaries and financing their trip to Biafra. Father Raymond Kennedy, a former priest in Biafra who now spends a good deal of time publicizing the Biafran cause in the United States, was named director of the operation. The accusation seemed as far-fetched as it was shrill.



Tribune, London

Some resentment, or at least suspicion, has also cropped up in the United States lately as the Biafran cause has received increasing publicity. For one thing, supporters of Biafra sometimes seem strange bedfellows. They include extreme right wingers as well as liberals, and some cynics assume Catholicism must be the unifying force. At the end of last year, C. Stanley Lowell, the editor of Church and State, said: "The concerted public relations campaign being waged by Roman Catholic organizations on behalf of the Biafran secessionists is amazing. Working every propaganda trick known to man, they are seeking to arouse political support for Biafra on humanitarian grounds. Yet it should be evident that responsibility for starving and suffering in the eastern provinces of Nigeria is not that of Nigeria but of the Biafran leader, the Roman Catholic Colonel Ojukwu." Church and State is the publication of Protestants and Other Americans United for Separation of Church and State, and Lowell's comments reflect a certain blindness caused by the organization's main preoccupation. The fact that the State Department supports Nigeria, and the Catholic Church supports Biafra, should not force believers in Church-State separation to line up with the State Department and Nigeria. In this case, the Catholics are right.

Biafra's greatest public relations problem has come with the mass starvation that has afflicted it in the past six months. The International Red Cross estimates that 14,000 people die of malnutrition or starvation every day. Like Stanley Lowell, the State Department has accused Ojukwu of sacrificing these thousands of children, mothers and old folk for a hopeless cause. Critics suspect that the Biafrans are parading their starving to evoke sympathy. As the London Sunday Times said last October, "The expensive public relations campaign has now become an unashamed exploitation of human suffering."

The criticism of Ojukwu stems from his refusal to (1) give up; (2) allow Red Cross supplies to reach Biafra by land; and (3) allow Red Cross flights to Biafra during daylight. The first criticism can be dismissed quickly. It makes sense to the State Department that Ojukwu surrender to save his starving because the State Department believes that Biafra has been, for all practical purposes, defeated. But it makes no sense to Ojukwu since he believes that time is on Biafra's side.

The other two criticisms are harder to assess. Ojukwu makes a persuasive case that a relief land route would allow the Nigerian army access to roads that it now claims to control but in fact controls only intermittently. He makes another persuasive case that daylight flights might enable Nigerians to slip planes into a Biafran airfield during a relief operation. There is no such problem with night relief flights because Nigeria's Egyptian jet pilots refuse to fly at night.

To my mind, these arguments are fairly good ones; embattled Biafra is obviously in no mood to allow any military advantage to the Nigerians in the name of relief. At the same time, I sense another argument in the minds of Colonel Ojukwu and his associates. It is possible that they are gambling that the horror of mass starvation and death will generate enough world pressure to force Nigeria into a cease-fire agreement. With a cease-fire, the Biafrans believe they could salvage some of their secession and sovereignty at a peace conference. In short, the starving may be Biafran hostages for a cease-fire.

I do not believe this is just callous disregard for the lives of thousands; but given the Biafran feeling that surrender may mean death and the Biafran fear that Nigerian relief overtures are a trap, Ojukwu and the men around him are not above trying to milk as much sympathy as they can out of their people's plight. Moreover, the Biafrans believe the Nigerians, not the Biafrans, are the cause of all the starvation, and see no reason why the Biafrans have to make concessions for relief. If the Nigerians turn down the Biafran proposals on relief operations, then more pictures of starving babies will appear in the newspapers of Britain and America.

Callous though it may seem, the Biafran maneuver is, in fact, a good gamble. There is growing pressure in the United States, including the Congress, for America to move in and mount an enormous relief operation of its own to save the starving. If President Nixon did allow such an operation, the decision might have political overtones. The logistics of a relief project that large might in itself force both sides into a cease-fire. Or, if it did not, it might force the U.S. Government finally to take the side of those trying to pressure the British and the Nigerians into stopping the fighting.

That might give the Biafrans what they are holding out for—to sit at a conference table without the pressure of the Nigerian forces on them. If so, it would be a triumph of Biafran will, spirit and public relations.

MANKIND'S FOULED NEST

Oil on the Waters

EDWARD COWAN

Mr. Cowan, a foreign correspondent for The New York Times, now based in Toronto, covered the wreck of the Torrey Canyon for that paper and wrote of it in greater detail in Oil and Water: The Torrey Canyon Disaster (Lippincott).

The escape of oil from Union Oil's offshore well opposite Santa Barbara, Calif., and the subsequent chain of events, political and natural, should be read as an object lesson in humility. The leak, the difficulties in plugging it, and the quick dashing of hopes that the shore line would be spared serious pollution, are all reminders that man has repeatedly and injuriously lost control of his own inventions, usually when he least expected to.

Fred J. Hartley, the aggressive marketing man who is president of Union Oil Company of California (record 1968 profits of $151.2 million on $1.9 billion of sales), argued that the eruption that produced the leak could not reasonably have been anticipated. Perhaps not. Nor could the loss of a hydrogen bomb over Spain. Nor the 1965 Northeast power failure. Nor the stranding two years ago of the supertanker Torrey Canyon, whose captain ran her onto a well-marked granite reef off England in broad daylight, causing the biggest shipwreck and oil pollution ever. Nor, just a year after that, the stranding and breakup of another Liberian flag tanker, the Ocean Eagle, at the entrance to San Juan harbor—hardly an uncharted shoal.

Surely no one could reasonably have expected in November, 1968, that an oil barge carrying more than 1 million gallons of heavy fuel oil would be torn loose from its tow by rough weather and grounded on Rehoboth Beach, Del., where Washingtonians soak up the summer sun. Or that, also last November, a Standard Oil of California hose would rupture and let 60,000 gallons of diesel oil pour into Humboldt Bay, not far from Eureka, Calif.

Who could reasonably be called on to anticipate that a 365-foot tanker would break in two in the Panama Canal in December, 1968, losing some of its cargo of fuel oil? Or that two days before Christmas, the little tanker Mary A. Whalen would run aground off Rockaway Point, N.Y., on the south shore of Long Island, hard by New York City's most heavily used stretch of beaches? Or that on Christmas Day Japanese authorities would have to close the Naruto Strait because of the danger to ships from gasoline that had escaped from a grounded tanker?

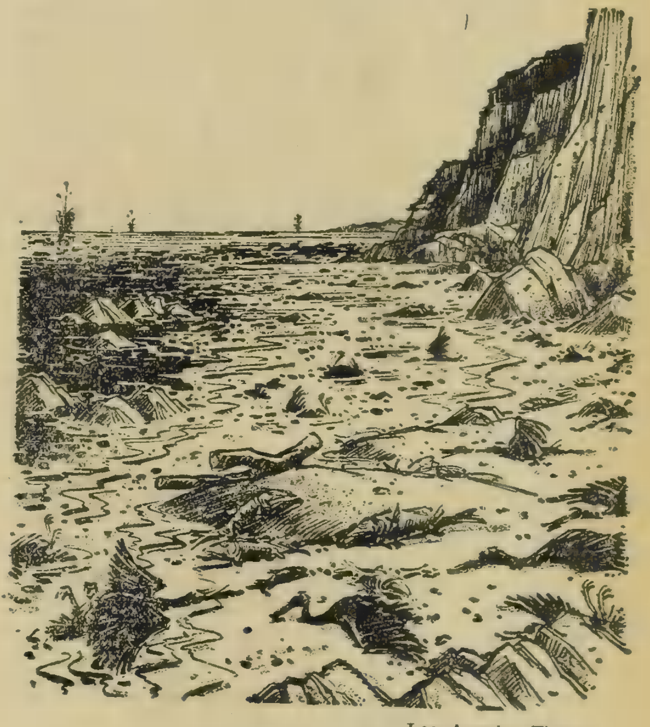
Who might reasonably be expected to warn the Coast Guard that quantities of what appeared to be heavy fuel oil would wash up onto the Rhode Island coast on Inauguration Day, 1969—but that there would be no clue to the ship or shore plant from which it escaped?

As any lawyer can quickly point out, there are differences in the origins of these several disasters which are worth defining if one is concerned about writing useful public policy. There are acts of God, such as violent storms; there is human error, such as putting a tanker on a known reef; there is the inevitable breakdown in any man-made mechanical system, such as the tendency of tankers with riveted sides (a construction technique largely discontinued about six years ago, according to one expert) to ooze oil around the rivets. That leakage may be only a barrel a day, but a barrel of crude oil, thick and persistent stuff, may be more than a drop in the ocean. In the Rehoboth Beach incident, the barge that was washed ashore lost, from a pipe that broke, a quantity of oil described by Interior Department officials as "very small," somewhere from 5 to 30 barrels. That "very small" dose of heavy oil, according to the officials, "marked" 2 to 3 miles of beach and caused substantial pollution to about three blocks of beach front.

Looking back over the two years since the Torrey Canyon disaster alerted the public and governments to the dangers inherent in the transportation of vast quantities of crude oil, it is startling to observe how many pollution incidents and near misses there have been; the list just recited is far from exhaustive.

It was instructive, for example, to learn from a trade publication this winter of two tanker casualties off southern Africa in the spring of 1968. On April 29, about 3 miles off the Cape of Good Hope, the Esso Essen struck an underwater obstruction and cut herself open at three points. She lost about 30,000 barrels of Arabian heavy crude oil. ESSO said it applied its new dispersant, Corexit, "with great success." In the other reported casualty, the tanker Andron, whose owner is listed as a Greek company, split a seam in heavy seas. After discharging her cargo of Kuwait crude, she underwent temporary repairs at Durban, reloaded the oil, resumed her voyage for Venice, and sank about 10 miles off Southwest Africa. Exactly what happened to her cargo of about 16,000 tons (117,000 barrels) is not fully known but there are only two possibilities; immediate or gradual pollution of the sea.

In short, with the world's consumption of petroleum products—in homes, factories, office buildings, schools, chemical plants, aircraft, ships, motor vehicles and electric generating stations—increasing by 7.5 per cent a year (it is now seven times what it was in 1938), the waterborne shipment of oil has become an industry in itself. Twenty-five years ago, the T-2, workhorse tanker of World War II, carried about 16,000 tons. By the early 1960s, Japanese shipyards, emerging as the world's busiest, were building ships to carry more than 100,000 tons and were "stretching" smaller ships. The Torrey Canyon, for example, built at Newport News, Va., to carry 67,000 tons, was jumboized in Japan to carry 118,000 tons. By keeping her original power plant and propulsion system, the most expensive part of a tanker, the Torrey Canyon, at only a slight sacrifice of speed, nearly doubled her delivery capacity. The saving worked out to roughly a penny a barrel. Show any international oil company how to add a penny a barrel to profits and it can make you very rich by cutting you in for only a few daubs of the extra icing.



Los Angeles Times

Oil Depletion Allowance

The same economic logic lifted tanker size to 312,000 tons by 1968 with the launching of the Universe Ireland, first of six such ships to be operated by Gulf. Last November the Japanese yard that built her, Ishikawajima-Harima Heavy Industries Co., got an order for a 370,000-tonner, to cost between $22 million and $25 million. Disputing some industry experts, the buyer, Tokyo Tanker Co., said it thought that economies of scale would persist as capacity approached 500,000 tons.

The 370,000-ton tanker will carry three times as much oil as did the Torrey Canyon. The 50,000 tons or more of oil that she spilled contaminated 140 miles of English coast and a considerable stretch of Brittany's northern shore, 110 miles from the wreck.

Could a Torrey Canyon disaster occur again? Like today's new supertankers, she was well made and equipped with modern navigational aids. She stranded solely as the result of her captain's bad seamanship—an "aberration," one expert mariner called the performance. If it seemed too incredible to happen more than once in a lifetime, one had only to wait a year for the captain of the Ocean Eagle, which split in two, to fracture her bottom on the ocean floor in front of San Juan harbor.

Britain's aerial bombing of the Torrey Canyon (an attempt, successful said Whitehall, to burn the oil remaining in her tanks) and the struggle by troops and civilians to remove inches of oil from beaches and harbors attracted hundreds of newsmen. Overnight, governments, editors and the public discovered how much oil a single ship can carry; how persistent, noxious and, for waterfowl, lethal, crude oil can be; how emotional can be the argument about how to clean it up, with tourism-minded merchants advocating chemicals for a quick, thorough wash, and fishermen and naturalists preferring mechanical methods; how unprepared, in law and in practical arrangements, national states are to cope with, much less put an end to, oil pollution.

In the United States, the Torrey Canyon episode and unrelated instances of pollution to the New Jersey and Cape Cod shores a few weeks later dramatized not only the enormity of the (infrequent) major disaster but the fact that coastal oil pollution is an everyday problem. Despite efforts of the big tanker fleets to dispose of their residues innocuously, there is a lot of clandestine bilge washing by countless freighters, trawlers and tankers.

These events fired up a mood of reform in Washington. President Johnson directed the Secretaries of Transportation and Interior to make a study of oil pollution and recommend legislation. A number of Congressmen—and lobbyists—began to gird themselves for another round in the continuing conflict between public and private interest. In London, meanwhile, an emergency session of the Inter-Governmental Maritime Consultative Organization (IMCO), a UN body, had been convened at Britain's request. It began deliberations on two conventions to supplement existing international law. One would establish the right of a state to take action against a foreign-owned ship lying offshore, but in international waters, to protect the state's coast from pollution. (Britain, despite the readiness of the Royal Navy to try to fire the leaking Torrey Canyon immediately, stood aside for ten days of fruitless salvage attempts, in part because there was no legal authority or precedent for destroying someone else's property on the high seas.) The other convention would establish liability of ship owners for pollution damage. With uncommon dispatch, IMCO also adopted a package of recommendations to national states on technical safety matters and on tougher enforcement of anti-pollution law.

Another aspect of the tanker business that was illuminated by the Torrey Canyon and Ocean Eagle casualties is the role of the Republic of Liberia as the world's leading country in registered merchant marine tonnage. In 1947, because of difficulties with Panamanian consuls who, owners said, sought to collect "fees" every time a Panamanian-flag ship cleared their ports, United States shipping interests were looking for a new flag of convenience (or flag of necessity, depending on how one chooses to approach the wage and tax argument). That need coincided with the engagement of the late Edward R. Stettinius, Jr., to assist Liberia's economic development. The result was the drafting by three Wall Street law firms of legislation, duly enacted in Monrovia, that put Liberia in the business of registering ships.

In the ensuing twenty years, Liberia has taken great pains to rebut trade union accusations that hers is a "runaway flag," flown by unsafe, leaky old tubs whose crews are virtually galley slaves and incompetent, too. Without getting into that argument, it can be said that the jumbo tankers which today fly the Liberian flag are well-made vessels. The African state has what seem to be exacting regulations governing seaworthiness, loading and safety equipment. It issues officers' papers either reciprocally or after an applicant passes examinations which Liberia says are tougher than those of other countries. Liberia, says Albert J. Rudick, an American lawyer who is employed full time in New York with a staff of forty as Liberian Deputy Commissioner of Maritime Affairs, tries to make a ship owner's responsibilities commensurate with the benefits (no corporate income tax) of the Liberian flag.

Nevertheless, the Liberian maritime program remains very much as it was conceived—an affair for the benefit of American ship owners and quietly managed by them and their lawyers who decide, without "benefit" of public scrutiny or debate, how to balance private and public interest. (Mr. Rudick argued that there is meaningful debate in Liberia's Congress but he was unable to name the relevant committees or their chairmen.)

When the Torrey Canyon's board of investigation met, it had no rules of procedure to follow. Its mandate was a regulation for inquiries which stresses the possible negligence of the crew and thereby underplays the possible role in a casualty of the ship's mechanical condition or of acts or omissions by its owners. No wonder that the board failed to mention in its report certain things it learned about the condition and equipping of the ship—matters now very relevant to damage suits by Britain and France against the Torrey Canyon's owner (a phantom Liberian corporation with head office in Bermuda) and operator, Union Oil. Nor, one supposes, is it surprising that nearly a year after the Ocean Eagle casualty the report of investigation had not been released by Monrovia, where, it was explained, they have been very busy this winter celebrating William V.S. Tubman's twenty-fifth anniversary as President.

Similarly, Liberia has not released for discussion changes in its laws and regulations, soon to be put into effect. Surely, the maritime rules of the foremost "seafaring nation" are of interest outside Monrovia; but, except in Wall Street where the proposed changes were drafted, they are generally unknown.

The overriding issue posed by the Torrey Canyon disaster, the Ocean Eagle episode, the eruption of the well opposite Santa Barbara, and lesser instances of pollution is that of responsibility. Shall a tanker, drilling rig, shore installation (e.g., refinery, trans-shipment terminal, depot, etc.) or other oil facility be responsible for damage done by its oil? Shall it be responsible absolutely, that is, regardless of whether or not it is at fault, or only if negligent? And if liable shall it pay the full damages, or only up to a limited amount?

The questions are being debated in London at IMCO meetings of legal experts and in Washington in hearings before the subcommittee on air and water pollution of the Senate Public Works Committee. One of the conventions that IMCO experts hope will be completed at Brussels next November would deal with the liability of tankers for oil damage. The Brussels conference will have to decide how sweeping the liability shall be. A slight majority of the deliberating nations, including the United States, is said to favor absolute liability. More likely, the process of accommodation will produce liability based on fault, with the burden of proof on the ship.

The amount of liability will be limited, partly because it traditionally has been and partly because of the expense and difficulties of getting insurance for unlimited liability. How high the limitation should be will also be resolved at the conference. The United States has proposed two to four times the 1957 liability convention limit of $67 a gross registered ton, with a maximum of $15 million. (Washington has never signed that convention.) The International Maritime Committee, a small, little-known, powerful Antwerp-based network of lawyers, which has drafted several important maritime conventions, is expected to press for its 1957 formula or not much more. Undoubtedly, all opening positions on this point were taken for bargaining purposes. The issue may be argued as one of how much damage can be reasonably expected, with cleanup costs from various spills offered in evidence. At bottom, it is a matter of tanker owners and operators trying to minimize their extra insurance costs. Washington estimates the convention may add 10 per cent to a tanker's normal insurance costs, or about 2 per cent to operating costs. A 2 per cent rise in operating costs in any business is not trivial.

The same question has arisen before the Senate subcommittee, which is considering legislation (S.7) sponsored by its chairman, Senator Muskie. It would, among other things, authorize the government to clean up oil spills in inland and territorial waters and require the tanker to pay the costs. The legislation proposes a limit of $450 a ton up to $15 million. Asserting that these levels would "amount to a denial of ship owners' right to limitation of liability," the Maritime Law Association of the United States, representing some 2,000 admiralty lawyers (who generally work for ship owners) urged the Congress to return to the $67 a ton and $5 million limits written in legislation passed by the Senate and weakened by the House Public Works Committee (where an oil man and a shipping man held sway) in 1968. The American Petroleum Institute proposed $100 a ton up to $10 million. Last year it proposed $250 a ton up to $8 million. It changed its mind, it said, to go along with the limits adopted by seven major oil companies which have established a voluntary cleanup plan (which will come into effect only if a lot more tanker owners adhere). An API tabulation showed that the most expensive cleanup on record—for the tanker General Colocotronis in the Bahamas a year ago—was $800,000. Conveniently, the API explicitly excluded the Torrey Canyon, whose cleanup expenses it put at $8 million (half the claims of Britain and France), because of "technological progress over the past two years and many of the mistakes made in the Torrey Canyon incident would not be repeated, and, of course, research on cleanup methods is continuing." Those few words hardly justify ignoring $7.2 million of an $8 million cleanup bill.

The Maritime Law Association, seeking to establish limitation as something close to divine right, argued that it "is rooted in the universally recognized principle that it is of paramount consideration for maritime nations to preserve the continuity of maritime commerce as a matter of vital national interest." The association, noting that Congress granted limitation in 1851 (the legislation has not been significantly altered since then), went on to cite an 1871 Supreme Court decision which recognized that the law's object was "to induce capitalists to invest" in ships.

The argument could hardly be less relevant. Even if the asserted "paramount consideration" exists, it does not necessarily follow that it applies to the United States or that commerce cannot be sustained in foreign-flag bottoms, which are sent to sea to make a buck and presumably will be available. As for any national security argument, there is good reason (if only the multiplicity of pressures Washington can bring to bear) to believe that American-owned ships under foreign flags would be available in time of urgent need. As for persuading that legendary capitalist to invest in ships, the argument antedates common use of the corporation, when the investor was personally liable for the ship's damage, and the development of today's broad, deep, versatile insurance market. Because of these changed economic conditions, limitation is not so just, necessary or immutable as its beneficiaries argue. According to some qualified lawyers, the courts are moving away from it.

The Santa Barbara mishap and Senator Muskie's bill are forcing the Nixon Administration to review offshore drilling policy and regulation, and also what is known about materials and techniques for cleaning up spilled oil on sea and land without harming natural life. With the oil industry itself accepting Senator Muskie's principle that the government should be reimbursed for cleaning up spills arising from private commerce, it would seem likely that the President will sign the bill—if it is not stranded on one of those hidden shoals in the House Public Works Committee.

NOTICE TO SUBSCRIBERS

Because of postal regulations, The Nation's mailing list must be arranged according to Zip Codes. Therefore—with any correspondence about address changes, renewals, etc.—please enclose the address label from your Nation. If you don't have a label, be sure to include your Zip number, and be sure it is correct. Without it, we cannot find your name plate.

DDT and the Constitution

HARMON HENKIN
Mr. Henkin, formerly with the Baltimore Sun, is a staff writer for the magazine, Environment.

Hearings now being conducted in Madison, Wis., on a petition to ban the use of DDT in the state, not only have demonstrated that the pesticide has disastrous environmental side effects but also reflect the changing mood of what is conveniently labeled the conservation movement. The judicial-type hearings with adversary proceedings before examiner Maurice van Susteren are made possible by a law peculiar to Wisconsin and by the new militancy of conservationists. The proceedings opened in mid-December and were adjourned after the first week of January, so that the agricultural chemical industry might prepare its defense of the world's cheapest and most abundant pesticide.

In Wisconsin, a state agency which enforces a law must hold a hearing if petitioned for a ruling as to whether that law applies in a certain situation—in this instance, the allegation that DDT is a pollutant. The Department of Natural Resources enforces water pollution statutes and was petitioned by the Wisconsin Izaak Walton League, the Citizens Natural Resources Association of Wisconsin and the Michigan Audubon Society to ban DDT as a water pollutant. The petitioners must prove that DDT is a substance which contaminates or renders unclean or impure the waters of the state, makes them injurious to public health or deleterious to fish, birds, animals or plant life. The pesticide industry has entered the case as an intervener—that is, a third party appearing to protect its own interests.

Unless the governing board of the Department of Natural Resources votes to give van Susteren sole responsibility for the decision, he will make only a recommendation, but it is generally agreed that his opinion will carry a lot of weight.

Handling the legal and scientific aspects of the petitioners' case is the Environmental Defense Fund (EDF), a small group of scientists and their attorney, who have stirred—and to a degree frightened—conservationists by their frontal assaults on polluters. EDF was created two years ago during a court fight to stop DDT spraying in Suffolk County, Long Island. Victor Yannacone, Jr., EDF's sole and unpaid attorney, became involved in a struggle with the county Mosquito Control Commission, and during the trial he and seven environmental scientists started EDF. Since then, Yannacone has appeared in state and federal courts in New York, Michigan and Wisconsin, attempting to impose bans on DDT or dieldrin, another chlorinated hydrocarbon pesticide of similar effect. Recently EDF has branched out from DDT, filing a suit in Missoula, Mont., on an air pollution issue—the "garbage" emanating from the smokestack of Hoerner-Waldorf pulp mill.

The ebullient 32-year-old Yannacone is attempting to establish a body of common law that will protect the environment. The fundamental difference between EDF and other groups interested in the environment is that EDF doesn't plead with anyone. According to Dr. Charles Wurster, a biologist at the State University of New York at Stonybrook and a founder of EDF, the group's unofficial motto is "Sue the bastards."

Wurster says that he and the other founders of EDF became disgusted with going hat in hand to officials at various levels of industry and government and begging for the favor of a clean environment. They feel that the Constitution offers ample protection aginst pollution, but that no one up to now has taken advantage of it. The major problems EDF has encountered have been to establish precedent and jurisdiction. EDF's targets thus far have been commissions, cities and the Michigan Department of Agriculture. These are the kinds of groups that spray DDT and recommend its use, and they are kinds hard to handle in court.

In the past, conservation groups have filed lawsuits to protect their own interests. Fishermen and bird watchers have gone to court over the rights of fishermen and bird watchers. EDF has a different orientation. Yannacone brings class action suits, representing the rights of all the people. Wanting the whole population to share in a clean environment is very Jeffersonian, or Populist if you prefer. In the first year of EDF's existence this democratic approach scared away most potential allies in the conservation movement.

Traditionally, such groups have endeavored to "educate" the Executive and legislative branches of government at various levels to the conservationist point of view, and then hoped for the best. Such efforts have not been strikingly successful. The enemies of conservation are much too diffuse, entrenched and numerous for friendly persuasion to be effective, and the environment is steadily deteriorating.

This approach to conservation was more fitting when the movement started up during the 1880s as an upper socioeconomic phenomenon. It had as its founders such men as Theodore Roosevelt and Gifford Pinchot, American aristocrats who fought against depredations of fish and game populations in their own interests.

As the conservation movement began to accelerate in the 20th century, a number of organizations such as the Sierra Club, Wilderness Society, National Wildlife Federation, Audubon Society and Izaak Walton League were formed. But these groups, again, were looking after their own interests and were less sensitive to the social, economic and political realities of the country at large. What they had in common was a basic social and political conservatism, though politics itself was never talked about in public. The groups could find a convenient scapegoat in federal projects such as dams, but even in fighting Washington they were genteel and proper—and usually unsuccessful.

With boards of directors which were, and for the most part still are, microcosms of corporate America, there was a distinct limit to how far the groups could go. Conservationists of that stamp would never dream of drawing a connection between environmental destruction and the very structure of society. In some ways, the times are changing. Some of the groups, especially the prestigious 50,000-member Sierra Club based in San Francisco, have started becoming more militant in their battles, but even in the Sierra Club there is resistance to change of tactics and attitudes.

Accordingly, EDF has had its share of problems with the old guard of conservation. Though it is far from being politically radical, EDF's activist tactics, and especially Yannacone's courtroom style, make some people very nervous. In 1967, when EDF offered to help the Audubon Society take the boondoggling Army Corps of Engineers into a Florida court for salt-water pollution of the freshwater Everglades, it got a polite "no thank you." The Audubons preferred to spend money from their well-stocked assets to "awaken" the public, and the Everglades are still in trouble.

However, it is difficult to argue with success, especially in this era of militancy; and although EDF has yet to win a clear-cut court decision, it has had remarkable effects. As a result of the Long Island trial, with its attendant adverse publicity for DDT, the Mosquito Commission quit squirting DDT, though not so ordered by the judge. Fifty-five cities in Michigan stopped spraying DDT for the control of Dutch elm disease—a practice which is highly dubious, according to most experts—after an unsuccessful suit by EDF. And in the middle of the present hearings in Madison, the state stopped recommending DDT for Dutch elm disease. That cuts in half the 120,000 pounds of the compound normally used annually for all purposes in Wisconsin. A bill to ban DDT has been submitted to the Wisconsin legislature, a similar bill has been introduced in Illinois, and the sprayers in Minnesota are getting nervous.

These quasi-victories have given the conservation movement something to think about when planning tactics. Thus, when the Izaak Walton League, the Audubon Society and the Natural Resources Association decided to petition the Wisconsin Department of Natural Resources, they realized that Yannacone was the best attorney for the hearing and that EDF had its fingers on the best possible data to outlaw DDT.

Even so, for some members of these groups asking the outspoken Yannacone and EDF to join the fight was like calling on the Vietcong to protect them against the Green Berets. The Patchogue, Long Island, attorney handled NAACP cases for nine years, and is frankly using the tactics of civil rights groups in conservation litigation. This, combined with his flamboyant hearing-room behavior, upsets a few people who seem to wish he would be more discreet and, well, Midwestern.

Rosenhouse

He is almost the exact opposite of Louis J. McLean, the quiet and conservative lawyer for the National Agricultural Chemical Association. Yannacone is fighting for the rights of the many and McLean is defending the privilege of the few, thus making Madison a classic American encounter. McLean is technically representing a third party, the DDT Task Force, which defends the virtues of the pesticide, wherever and whenever it is attacked. McLean thus far has made one grievous error—he underestimated the scientific strength of EDF.

Like other corporate giants the $2 billion-a-year agricultural chemical industry is slow to react until stung very hard. The last time it felt the goad was in 1963, when the late Rachel Carson published her Silent Spring. The industry almost immediately launched a heavy counterattack, hiring scientists to aver that pesticides did no harm to the environment.

McLean has been very active in the agricultural chemical people's offensive. He has appeared in court to defend pesticides and has written articles and given speeches about the wonders of DDT and its kin. He is also fond of recounting how DDT is saving the world from widespread famine, adding that those who are fighting to suppress the so-called hard pesticide are promoting widespread famine.

In an article for BioScience (September, 1967) McLean used a pastiche of pseudo-Freudianism and utter rubbish to claim that there are two types of pesticide critics: the purposeful, who are against the compounds because there is some sort of profit in the position, and the compulsive. These latter, according to McLean, are usually food faddists and/or health nuts, preoccupied by sexual potency. While the industry was thus fooling around, scientists were gathering more and more data on the effects of DDT, and their findings outshadowed even Silent Spring.

EDF was ready for Madison. Its previous incomplete battles made it eager for a platform from which to tell the entire DDT story, which it had not done before. To make sure the story was told, Yannacone assembled a batch of sixteen top scientists. Among these were some who would not have testified a year ago; they have become convinced in recent months that DDT is a terrible substance polluting the entire earth. McLean was faced with the task of cross-examining more scientific experts than one man could possibly handle, and before the witnesses had finished their sad picture, the industry had sent in five legal reinforcements and hired a public relations firm to whitewash the image DDT was getting in the local and national press.

The industry seemed to realize that if DDT was banned in Wisconsin, other states might take notice that it had been found guilty by an impartial judge and might take similar action. But the harder McLean tried to break down the scientists the more information they poured into the record, which at this point runs to approximately 2000 pages.

The first witness for the petitioners was Sen. Gaylord Nelson of Wisconsin, who has sponsored a bill in the Senate to ban the use of DDT in the United States. "In my judgment," he said, "Wisconsin should not hesitate to ban the use of DDT under any circumstances where it can enter the world circulation patterns and further contaminate the biosphere."

The main witness for EDF was Wurster, a veteran of all its courtroom appearances. He and McLean have exchanged hot words in scientific journals and no love is lost between them. Wurster spoke in direct testimony for only one hour, but was cross-examined for almost three days. McLean challenged every facet of Wurster's research, his qualifications, and EDF itself. But Wurster managed to counter these attacks, meanwhile getting important information into the record. According to Wurster, who is an authority on DDT, the pesticide has four very serious disadvantages:

(1) It is what some scientists call a biocide; that is, it has broad biological effects on non-target organisms. It has been found in almost every living thing on earth. Tuna, hundreds of miles out in the ocean, carry it in them and so do animals on remote land masses.

(2) The compound has great persistence; its half life is at least ten years and its potency lasts for as long as fifty years.

(3) It is highly mobile, though not very soluble in water. It goes easily into a state of suspension in water and will cling to small particles of matter, being then transported by wind, rain and snow. It is estimated that only half the DDT sprayed onto an area stays on that area. The rest is carried throughout the earth. This is why a ban, to be effective, must be a complete ban.

(4) Not all the DDT ingested by animal or man is excreted. The DDT residues which remain in the body are stored in the fat tissues. As one animal feeds upon another, it ingests part of this DDT content into its own system.

Wurster and the other scientists, among them Dr. Robert Riseborough, University of California; Dr. John Hickey, University of Wisconsin and Dr. Richard Welch, Wellcome Research Laboratories in Tuckahoe, N.Y., catalogued the devastation that DDT has caused in certain birds. The evidence they gave was frightening in its implications for man. The peregrine falcon is practically extinct along the East Coast and is in trouble in other areas. Hickey and other wildlife researchers have shown that since DDT came into widespread use in the 1940s the thickness of the shells of the eggs laid by these birds has declined, thus leading to an increase of breakage in the nests.

DDT is directly implicated in this malfunction through the process called enzyme induction. Enzymes are minute organic catalysts which control the flow of hormones in the body. During the reproductive period of birds, hormones regulate the mobilization of calcium used for shell production. DDT causes enzymes to be produced in the liver and these change the hormone balance that regulates calcium production.

It doesn't take much DDT to influence such hormones as estrogen in females and testosterone in males. As little as one part DDT per million of body weight will do the trick in laboratory rats, according to researcher Welch. In laymen's terms, one part per million is a jigger of vermouth in a railroad tank car full of gin. Whether the enzyme-inducing process is affecting man physiologically is not known for sure. Enzyme tampering by DDT is a very subtle business capable, says Wurster, of utterly wiping out a bird species by meddling with the reproductive process. It is now happening to an ocean bird called the Bermuda petrel, which will soon be totally extinct.

Welch is as cautious as most scientists when discussing his work, but in the hearing he did say that the enzymes in rats are not different from those in man. It is known that the average person in this country is carrying more than ten parts per million of DDT. Welch said: "If we can extrapolate data from animals to man, then a change in these enzymes probably is occurring in man."

That is the type of information which the chemical companies must refute. The scientists who will defend DDT when the hearings resume will be relying for the most part on data gathered back in the dark ages of biology, twenty years ago when DDT made its debut as a miracle pesticide. When safety tests were run on DDT by the federal government in the 1940s, enzyme induction was itself unknown.

The industry will also claim that DDT is a very effective pesticide, but even this has been disproved. During the petitioner's presentation, Dr. Robert van den Bosch of the University of California spoke about the problems which the substance is causing in agricultural use. It will kill all the insects of a given species that it comes in contact with, except those that are naturally resistant. The resistant pests then form the breeding stock for a strain which is immune to DDT and also encounter no natural enemies, those also having been killed by the chemical. The wiping out of predatory and parasitic species has completely upset the insect balance in some agricultural areas, and DDT can be said to cause serious infestations of insects which before its day were kept down by natural control.

The industry will also trot out its sob story about starvation averted because of DDT. There is no doubt that pest-control procedures are necessary for high yield in agriculture, but there are other pesticides and other methods which will keep insects down without threatening to poison the whole world in the process.

How the hearings will turn out depends a great deal on the mind of van Susteren and the political exigencies of Wisconsin. It is believed that whichever way van Susteren rules, the loser will appeal all the way to the Supreme Court. The chemical companies produce more than 100 million pounds of DDT a year for use in this country and for export abroad (so that less developed countries may enjoy our technological blunders). They will not lose gracefully. Because of EDF and the general mood of the country, the conservationists probably won't lose gracefully either. As far as pollution is concerned, the age of politeness is about over.

BOOKS & THE ARTS

The Jewish Mama Market

PORTNOY'S COMPLAINT. By Philip Roth. Random House. 274 pp. $6.95.

THERESE POL

Miss Pol is a writer, and an editor at Rutledge Books. Her father is a German Jew and her mother an American Methodist.

The subject of the Jewish family in general and the Jewish mother in particular —with its catastrophic consequences for all those who move within their orbit— can no longer be regarded as a literary endeavor on the American scene. It has become a big industry, nearly as threatening as the military-industrial complex. In this sense Philip Roth, the author of Portnoy's Complaint, is merely the latest, if enormously successful, tycoon.

It was Philip Wylie who started the mother-kicking bit with his crusade against momism. With brutal impartiality he condemned all American mothers. Reviewers across the land have already praised Roth's new book as the culmination of the Jewish mother motif, apparently forgetting that Bruce Jay Friedman beat him by several miles in A Mother's Kisses. Friedman did a final demolition job.

Now comes the culmination of the culmination—Roth's resurrection of this type of woman. The best that can be said of his accomplishment is that Mama Portnoy is a caricature drawn by a master cartoonist, but she's no more than that.

That is not to say that Roth has not added other touches to the overall picture of Jewish family life which, as depicted, must be the most destructive form of living known to mankind. Some of Roth's scenes are outrageously funny. Alex Portnoy has an obsessively Jewish father, who is an insurance salesman in New Jersey, and chronically constipated (not as irrelevant as it sounds). The bathroom becomes for a while the center of the fun, with papa spending many unsuccessful hours on the john and Alex, the kid, masturbating himself into near lunacy. Roth's treatment of constipation is a scream—but how much mileage can you really get out of constipation?

Roth's book is a long monologue addressed to a hypothetical psychoanalyst (does the man listen?), in which Alex dissects his stifling childhood (mother, father, the whole damn Jewish neighborhood, come under the microscope) and his subsequent, and practically preordained, troubles with sex. Because all the girls he yearns for are Gentiles.

Alex drank in the longing for Gentile sex, whatever that is, with his Jewish mother's milk. Alex, the adult, a successful civil servant of sorts, has the worst experiences with his women. He really picks them. The Monkey, an illiterate high-fashion model from West Virginia, blackmails him with suicidal impulses. The Pumpkin, straight from the Corn Belt, is wonderfully American but becomes a bore. The Pilgrim, a Mayflower product, has too much class for her own good, and is incapable of giving Alex oral gratification (of which there is a great deal in this book, in case anyone wants to brush up on it). The novel ends with a five-line scream of ahhh, and a slapstick suggestion from the analyst to the effect that perhaps now the treatment might begin in earnest.

The pacing of Roth's book is frantic, which gives it a one-dimensional quality. It is filled with orgies of various kinds, saved from total tedium only by Roth's comic vein. The melancholy truth about orgies is that in the long run they are dull, even funny orgies. The barrage of four-letter words is also getting to be a pain in the ass, to use Roth's idiom, although he has justified it on the highest artistic grounds. In effect, Roth has created the same permanent Jewish joke that his Alex so bitterly complains about in the novel, complete with Jewish self-loathing and guilt far beyond anything Saul Bellow ever had to offer, but certainly nothing brand-new.

There are of course some gems in this book. At the age of 5 or so, little Alex is so mixed up by the overarticulate salt-of-the-earth people, their vindictive religion, their superstitions, the whole kosher household, that one day he looks out of the window into the drifting snow and asks, "Momma, do we believe in winter?"

Some people profess to see the depths of despair—both Jewish and cosmic—in Roth's book. Maybe so. But Thomas Mann once said that irony can become so dense that it is no longer recognizable as such. So it is with Roth's despair. There is something else wrong with it: it is basically trivial because it is rooted in endless self-examination, leading nowhere in particular, which no amount of stylistic cleverness can disguise. And his occasional gallant attempt to pass from the ridiculous to the sublime without losing his balance simply does not come off.

The main trouble with the Jewish family theme is that it has been overwritten. Unlike the plague in the Middle Ages or the pogroms in Czarist Russia, the Jewish mother goes on and on, spawning more mother-smothered Jewish girls, who in turn will inevitably smother their own brood. It is a vicious circle which can be broken only by a moratorium on the whole subject, guilt included.

Enough already.

A Music of Angels

PLANET NEWS: 1961-1967. By Allen Ginsberg. City Lights Books. 144 pp. $2 paper.

PAUL ZWEIG

Mr. Zweig teaches at Columbia University. He is the author of The Heresy of Self-Love: A Study of Subversive Individualism (Basic Books).

Communicating vases: so the French surrealists described them. Between the inner and the outer vase, a boil of suffering; memories churning over the psychic obstacles, on their way to be captured in the nets of grammar and consecutive statement. If there is one man who has helped us to believe in and to practice the mystery of these communicating vases, it is Allen Ginsberg, whose new book, Planet News, contains some of his finest poems. Between the planet earth and the planet Ginsberg, a banter of loves and disasters has been carried on; between this aging space of ecstasies, who insists aloud:

> I am that I am I am the > man & the Adam of hair in > my loins This is my spirit and > physical shape I inhabit
> this Universe

and that other jet-diminished globe, riddled with places: Warsaw, New York, Calcutta, Wales . . . titles of so many personal, gritty moments from which poems arise.

What Ginsberg forced us to understand in Howl, twelve years ago, was that nothing is safe from poetry. His argument was not for new poetic subjects, for speech rhythms, for more emotions, or for mysticism. Argument in fact, is not the word for the unsettling spell Ginsberg-as-shaman chanted, suffered and danced in Howl. In life, as in poetry, the shaman does not argue. He climbs the psychic hill, beyond the last familiar stone, and then disappears. Later the wind will blow disquieting noises back to us. Morality has pursued him like a clean razor and dismembered his body; his spirit has been assaulted by righteous chancres; rumors abound that he has been nailed to a tree, where the animals will play upon his bones forever, like a harp. But then the poet-shaman reappears, carrying the sick soul he had gone to save: anyone and everyone's soul, his own too, for the shaman must have suffered from all the ills he can cure. He comes back, but he is changed, for he has seen, played before him, all the fantasies of the hidden psyche, and all the possibilities of the will. He has learned the demanding truth that Montaigne discovered in his tower: "I am a man, and nothing human is foreign to me." Here, I think, lies the generous fantasy of Planet News. Ginsberg has brought back the sick soul—his own, mine, yours. In payment, he has received the gift of love. Now nothing human is foreign to him.

We know how much what we are is bound up in what, and how, we remember. Our character, and therefore what we do, depends upon—and is—the style of our remembering. I insist upon the word "style," for quantity, the sheer bulk of what we have been, has nothing to do with it. It is like stringing beads out of a huge box of beads. I work in reds, you in shades of green, and you in sharp edges. The "I" is selective, distrustful. And when, beguiled by travel, drugs or women, I recklessly string a rainbow stone, or a piece of turd, that too is part of the pattern. I have learned to be selectively reckless. On principle I open a certain third eye, let it flicker on the marvel of endless possibility, and then hurry it shut, afraid I will be convicted of "too much."

Ginsberg has made "too much" the affair of his life. Like Whitman, Blake, Traherne, Rabelais, he has enacted what it means to say: "I am the greatest lover in the universe." It is the mystery of seeing, and not judging, of understanding, and not discriminating. If such a life can have a program, then Whitman formulated it:

This is the meal equally set, this the meat for natural hunger,
It is for the wicked just the same as for the righteous,
I make appointments with all,
I will not have a single person slighted or left away,
The kept-woman, sponger, thief, are hereby invited,
The heavy-lipp'd slave is invited, the venerealee is invited;
There shall be no difference between them and the rest.

In Planet News, the quintessential poem of "too much," is "Television Is A Baby Crawling Toward That Death Chamber." It is a poem which, like electricity, is sustained by its own movement. And the movement arises from Ginsberg's magical ability to know all the beads, and yet select none, for he selects all. Here as elsewhere, Ginsberg opens a hot line to every recess of his roomy, endless body. Like the infinite interconnection of all phenomena in the physical world (when I spit into the ocean, it rises; when I blow, the wind changes direction), the tangled relationships of everything with everything speak in Ginsberg's poem. He has faith that this is so; that all fishing in the dark water is successful. When Ginsberg is at his best, his mad leaps of association are perfect; they imitate the ideal knowledge of a Monad linked, lovingly, to the whole planet: even to cat vomit, Peruvian skulls, disappointed old body, or LSD pastoral worships:

That's what I came here to compose, what I knocked off my life to Inscribe on my grey metal typewriter, borrowed from somebody's lover's mother got it from Welfare, all interconnected and gracious bunch of Murderers
as possible in this Kalpa of Hungry blood-drunkard Ghosts—

The shape of "Television . . ." is the shape of "too much," which is to say that it works against the very idea of poetic form. And yet, by creating the experience (or enchantment) of "too much," it claims for itself all the privileges of form, i.e.: the privilege of being this irreplaceable, absolutely achieved word-vision. Ginsberg, like Whitman, does not forget the place he occupies in the spectrum of cultural forms. He has the pleasure of knowing, from some shy Victorian refuge in his own psyche, that he is being a bit ridiculous. And so he acts out for us our temptation to judge his "too-muchness," and to contain it. What I mean is that Ginsberg, like his spiritual godfather, Walt Whitman, has a sense of comedy. He is an American humorist:

Dusty moonlight, Starbeam riding its own flute, soul revealed in the scribble, an ounce of looks, an invisible
Seeing, Hope, The Vanisher betokening Eternity
one finger raised warning above his gold eyeglasses—and Mozart playing giddy-note an hour on the Marxist gramophone—

. . . .

The Bardo Thodol extends in the millions of black jello for every dying Mechanic—We will make Colossal movies—
We will be a great Tantric Mogul & starify a new Hollywood with our unimaginable Flop—
Great Paranoia!

The humor is part of the generosity of Planet News. Ginsberg, in his expansive way, is trying to convince us to wade out from the moralizing beaches where we have learned too well to string our beads. The water is fine, he says. If only we could stop judging and disdaining, we would realize how simple it is to paddle around in the world (and in ourselves).

Often Planet News modulates from the glutted, sexual fantasy of "too-muchness," to a quieter, more intimate vision. When the Kalpas of extended space collapse momentarily, Ginsberg remembers himself: the citizen of an aging body, uprooted, humanly unhappy, and yet far from lament, for—and this is the peculiar strength of these moments—he has learned to love even his own aging despair:

Allen Ginsberg says this: I am a mass of sores and worms
& baldness & belly & smell
I am false Name the prey of Yamantaka Devourer of Strange Dreams . . .

. . . .

and I lay back on my pallet contemplating $50 phone bill, broke, drowsy, anxious, my heart fearful of the fingers dialing, the deaths, the singing of telephone bells

Ginsberg, in Planet News, has given us a music of angels. Not Christian holy angels, but the angels of which Rilke spoke: "those almost deadly birds of the soul." They are almost deadly, because they ask what is most difficult to do: to love even what is not lovable, to serve up the meal for everyone, to love fate while seeing with intelligent, discriminating eyes what fate is.

I have insisted on evoking the ancestry of Ginsberg's vision because there is in this poetry of "too-muchness" a tradition and a genre which deserve to be noticed. In "Journal Night Thoughts," for example, Ginsberg echoes a conventional form and uses it, with humor, to express his continuous fantasy. It is a poem of night images, traveling a path of the mind's peregrinations in New York. One thinks, inevitably, of Young's "Night Thoughts," of Whitman's lovely poem, "The Sleepers." Ginsberg has confidence that form, once rhetorical shapes have been discarded, can arise from life itself, referring backward and forward, in the fashion of a psychic genre, to a larger shape of human experience. Here Ginsberg writes the "night-ode" or whatever name we give it: a form more ample for our total needs than sonnet, epic, or other hanger for old clothes.

The Publishing Game

Henry Mayhew's monumental classic, London Labour and the London Poor, is a 19th-century study of the culture of poverty and the criminal classes. The 1861 edition described itself as "A Cyclopaedia of the Condition and Earnings of Those That Will Work, Those That Cannot Work, and Those That Will Not Work." Dover Publications has produced a reprint definitive edition which restores intact this most remarkable work. Their handsome, four-volume republication has a new introduction by John D. Rosenberg; it is generously illustrated with sketches, prints and photographs of the period and each volume has a cover illustration by Gustave Doré, taken from his graphic study of the same period, London: A Pilgrimage. Each paperbound book sells for $3.50.

Street Art Illustration, Depicting the Murder of Jael Denny, Victim of Thomas Drory
—London Labour and the London Poor

Mayhew set out "to publish the history of a people, from the lips of the people themselves—giving a literal description of their labour, their earnings, their trials and their sufferings, in their own 'unvarnished' language." To do this, he walked hundreds of miles of London streets in the 1840s and 1850s, gathering testimony about the colorful, comic and tragic lives of the underclass of London. Though his data has served primarily as a basic reference source for sociologists, historians and criminologists, it is also fascinating to read as literature. Thackeray wrote of Mayhew's masterpiece: "It is a picture of human life so wonderful, so awful, so piteous and pathetic, so exciting and terrible, that readers of romances own they never read anything like to it." It also contains some amusing and instructive parallels to our present times, as shown in excerpts below. They are taken from Mayhew's study on publishers, authors and hawkers (hawkers were divided into patterers, chaunters and ballad singers) of street literature, the popular reading matter of the period. The first excerpt is Mayhew presenting an aspect of the "profession;" the second is a hawker's account in his own words, of some of his best-sellers.

On Street Literature

The way in which a narrative or a "copy of werses" is prepared for press is usually this: the leading members of the "schools" [groups of hawkers], some of whom refer regularly to the evening papers when they hear of any out-of-the-way occurrence, resort to the printer and desire its publication in a style proper for the streets. This is usually done very speedily, the school (or the majority of them) and the printer agreeing upon the author. Sometimes an author will voluntarily prepare a piece of street literature and submit it to a publisher, who, as in the case of other publishers, accepts or declines, as he believes the production will or will not prove remunerative. Sometimes the schools carry the manuscript with them to the printer, and undertake to buy a certain quantity, to insure publication. The payment to the author is the same in all cases—a shilling.

Concerning the history and character of street and public-house literature, I shall treat hereafter . . . for the reader's better appreciation of the curious and important theme. I say, important; because the street-ballad and the street-narrative, like all popular things, have their influence on masses of the people. . . .

It must be borne in mind that the street author is closely restricted in the quality of his effusion. It must be such as the patterers approve, as the chaunters can chaunt, the ballad-singers sing, and—above all—such as street-buyers will buy. One chaunter, who was a great admirer of the "Song of the Shirt," told me that if Hood himself had written the "Pitiful Case of Georgy Sloan and his Wife," it would not have sold so well as a ballad he handed me, from which I extract a verse:

Jane Willbred we did starve and beat her very hard
I confess we used her very cruel,
But now in a jail two long years we must bewail,
We don't fancy mustard in the gruel.

The Hawkers Story

"There's nothing beats a stunning good murder, after all. . . . Daniel Good . . . was a first rater; and would have been much better if it hadn't been for that there Madam Toosow. You see, she went down to Roehampton, and guv [two pounds] for the werry clogs as he used to wash his master's carriage in; so, in course, when the harristocracy could go and see the real things—the werry identical clogs—in the Chamber of 'Orrors, why the people wouldn't look at our authentic portraits of the fiend in human form. . . . Then there was Rush, I was 14s. in debt for rent, and in less than fourteen days I astonished the wise men in the east by paying my landlord all I owed him. Since Daniel Good there had been little or nothing doing in the murder line—no one could cap him—till Rush turned up a regular trump for us. Why I went down to Norwich expressly to work the execution. I worked my way down there with 'a sorrowful lamentation' of his own composing, which I'd got written by the blind man expressly for the occasion. On the morning of the execution we beat all the regular newspapers out of the field; for we had the full, true, and particular account down, you see, by our own express, and that can beat anything that ever they can publish; for we gets it printed several days afore it comes off, and goes and stands with it right under the drop; and many's the penny I've turned away when I've been asked for an account of the whole business before it happened."

OF ME

I have a stone laugh that smashes the air rolls across your mind and crushes your thoughts into pieces of me.

CAROLYN M. RODGERS

Violence and Rhetoric

NONVIOLENT DIRECT ACTION: American Cases: Social-Psychological Analyses. Edited by A. Paul Hare and Herbert H. Blumberg. Corpus Publications. 575 pp. $10.

CHARLES HORMAN

Mr. Horman is a free-lance writer and film maker.

Hare and Blumberg's new anthology, entitled Nonviolent Direct Action, will not be received by the Left in a charitable mood. Before opening the book, I recalled an incident which occurred shortly after the demise of Resurrection City.

People from the different groups in the Poor People's Campaign were meeting in the Friends hall at 15th Street to figure out what had happened and find the common ground for a new human rights movement. There were Panthers from Oakland, Al the Ratman from Jersey City, two hillbillies from a welfare rights group in Chicago—organizers from all over the country. They spent several days talking; and a great deal of the talk dealt with violence and nonviolence. Two Quakers, who had made the conference room available, sat in on the meetings.

One black from Texas suggested that the movement be visible, political and nonviolent "so we can stay alive and out of jail and conduct business," but that a smaller faction "attend to that other business when necessary." One of the Panthers, a young man about 19 with a green beret and a bullet hung around his neck on a leather thong, said that on the West Coast they'd found the best organizing slogan was "get guns."

Finally, on the last day, the older of the two Quakers—a man in his 60s with a shock of white hair and a ramrod spine—spoke out for militant but nonviolent action. He talked about the courage and achievement of the early civil rights workers in the South. Most of the people in the small room shuffled their feet and said nothing. After a moment of silence, the old Quaker asked the Panther what he thought of nonviolent tactics.

"I am nonviolent," was the answer, "but if any of those motherfuckers mess with me, I'm gonna shoot them dead."

In rhetoric, at least, this is the year of the heroic guerrilla. In the East Village Other, a comic-strip commando named Trashman mows down the minions of the state. In the San Francisco Express Times, an adventure serial called "The Guns of Berkeley" recently ended with the summary execution of Roger Heyns, chancellor of the university.

There are many reasons for the new mood: the death of Martin Luther King, Jr., of Robert Kennedy, of Che Guevara. The failure to transplant a church-based, long-suffering civil rights movement to the Northern ghettos. Incessant bludgeonings in Selma, New York, Washington and Chicago. Six years of war in Vietnam.

The Left has become impatient with nonviolence. Panthers are telling black people in Oakland and Jersey City to "get guns"; and students at Phillips Exeter Academy dream, during algebra class, of joining the guerrillas in Venezuela. So far there's been much talk and a few incompetent fire bombs which fizzled out in police cars on the lower East Side of Manhattan; but a lot of people on the Left seem to be sucking in their bellies for the big shoot-out.

Thus it is a strange year to reread, in an anthology about nonviolence, the words that Martin Luther King, Jr., spoke to a crowded church in Montgomery, Ala.: "We must meet the forces of hate with the power of love; we must meet physical force with soul force. Our aim must never be to humiliate the white man but to win his friendship and understanding." Face it. Them's tough apples to sell in 1969.

Nonviolent Direct Action: American Cases: Social-Psychological Analyses was compiled by Prof. A. Paul Hare, chairman of the Department of Sociology and Anthropology at Haverford, and Dr. Herbert Blumberg, assistant professor of Psychology at Wilson College. The book is divided into two main sections.

The first presents "case materials" from the civil rights and peace movements. Among these are accounts by James Peck of the 1947 and 1961 freedom rides; by Al Bigelow of his attempt to sail a ketch into the atomic testing zone; by James Farmer of a terrifying night when the crackers hunted him down in Plaquemines, La. Although these "cases" are reprinted from other books and magazines, they remain fascinating and often deeply moving testaments to human courage, independence and idealism.

The second section contains classic and contemporary analyses of nonviolence. With customary insight and sensitivity, Erik Erikson examines Gandhi's leadership of the 1918 textile workers strike in Ahmedabad. An excerpt from Richard Gregg's 1934 Power of Nonviolence describes the tactic as a "moral jujitsu" which catches the assailant off balance. The other essays attack with varying competence a wide range of questions: who participated in the demonstrations? Why? Did the demonstrations work? When did they work best and how?

The mood of the collection is scientific, but hardly nonpartisan. Some of the authors are activists; most are clearly hopeful that their study will make nonviolent tactics more effective. Editors Blumberg and Hare seem to share this hope. The book is dedicated to "Mahatma Gandhi and Martin Luther King, Jr., and those who may follow to lead the nonviolent movement for human rights."

A. Paul Hare's introduction states that "the first order of business is to create more inclusive identities so that men may act towards each other as members of the same pseudo-species" —which is probably the most stirring proclamation for human rights and social justice I've ever heard from a noted expert on small-group interrelations.

In fact, despite such apparent limitations as the outrageous price ($10), the discouraging length (575 pp.), and distressing lapses into socio-psychological jargon, the book strains toward usefulness, and falls short. It finds intelligent, meticulously researched answers to the wrong questions.

One example of this is Hare's own essay, entitled "Nonviolent Action from a Social-Psychological Perspective." The essay uses an ingenious combination of Homans' "exchange theory" and "two and three dimensional approaches to the study of interaction proposed by Leary [yes, Timothy Leary in his former incarnation as a clinical psychologist] and Bales."

Hare's conclusion reads: "The nonviolent actors usually intend to take downward (submissive), backward (advocating social change), and positive roles in their confrontation with others, especially those in authority. When they can maintain this role they seem to be able to 'pull' a dominant positive response which may lead to social change. However, if they become negative, then they pull a hostile response. The most positive interaction probably takes place between demonstrators and others who are of equal status."

To render this in rough translation —the best nonviolent tactic is probably to get a lot of straight, middle-class people who want social change. Dress them in suits and ties and remind them to be loving even if someone hits them. If they forget and yell "pig" at the police, the police may well respond with hostility.

All right. People know that. The question is how to do it. Most people "of equal status" are too busy becoming people of greater status. Those people who do care enough about social change to turn out at demonstrations are more likely to be poor people, students, freaks and crazies.

To enter usefully the movement's dialogue, this anthology would have had to deal with violence as well as nonviolence—for violence is now very attractive to the Left. Many of the people who took part in the demonstrations described in Hare and Blumberg's "case materials" are already beginning to unsheathe the sword. For them, the new anthology will provide not a program but a post-mortem to the nonviolent movement.

Making a Million Under 30

LEWIS M. ANDREWS

Mr. Andrews is a graduate student at the Stanford Institute for Communication Research. He is preparing a book titled On Being a Behavioral Scientist.

The most successful myth maker in recent years has been bunny baron Hugh Hefner, exploiter of the Kinsey generation of the mid-1950s. Hefner grew up in a time when attitudes toward sexual behavior, if not the behavior itself, were becoming more liberal. It was fashionable to be conspicuously open-minded about sex. The Protestant work ethic was also changing. If a man worked hard to make some extra money, he felt he had the right to spend it playing hard. Hefner took these changing values and molded them into the Playboy myth. The Playboy was the affluent, sophisticated urban male who "got it" regularly from the most beautiful girls in town. Of course, no one, except maybe Hefner himself, could ever realize the myth, but people could pretend to be playboys by reading Playboy magazine or by joining a Playboy Club. Everyman dreamed while Hefner cashed in.

The past ten years have produced a new generation with different aspirations, values and anxieties. A growing number of young people—specifically college students—take for granted material rewards. They expect to make a lot of money and to have an opportunity to spend it, but they are also concerned about the quality of the work they will undertake.

Last fall the charter issue of Careers Today appeared on the newsstands. College newspapers carried impressive 4-page inserts announcing the magazine, and colorful posters decorated campus bulletin boards across the country. The proclamation, "Careers today are for people who want more than just a job . . . so is Careers Today!" appeared in Ramparts, Eye, The New York Review of Books and, appropriately, Playboy. The new myth had been created.

The Careers Today myth is of the iconoclastic adolescent who finds commitment and self-fulfillment within the corporate structure. The image is of a young man commuting to his job on a motorcycle (an expression of his freedom), working to 2 A.M. every day (because he loves his job), and being made a vice president at the age of 25 (because the boss is overwhelmed by his youthful dynamism). The mannequin from the "What Sort of Man Reads Playboy" ads now wears a string of beads, and the admiring girls in the background have been replaced by a cowering clique of awe-struck, middle-aged executives.

The alleged purpose of Careers Today is to provide confused and bewildered college students with information about the abundance of career opportunities available to them. "There is a serious information gap," claims editorial chairman Peter Drucker. "Most of our institutions from Wall Street to the public schools and the Omaha City Hall are still behaving in a way that was appropriate when college students were few—and few were needed. There was little need for information on jobs and careers." Careers Today, according to Drucker, is designed "as an instrument, a weapon, for people caught in this cultural lag."

The effectiveness of this new weapon is questionable. A Stanford guidance counselor has observed that few of the articles in the three issues published so far provide any real information of value. He termed the magazine "a disappointment." Instructional articles such as "Little Boys Don't Play the Insurance Game," "The Art of Résumé Writing" and "The Official Organization Watchers Guide" are written in such a flippant manner that some students doubt their validity. A recent Lehigh graduate remarked: "Using that magazine to find a job is about as helpful as using a computer to find a wife." A Princeton student was more critical: "The article on résumé writing was the most hypocritical thing I have ever read. The magazine claims to be honest, but it says, in effect, that you should lie in order to get a good job."

If Careers Today does not sell information, then what does it sell? Like Playboy—indeed, like all packaged myths— the magazine serves a kind of masturbation function (Playboy for the body; Careers Today for the mind). Each issue is dominated by spectacular stories of young men and women who have made it by breaking all the traditional rules. Making it is defined by the magazine as "doing things your own way," which freely translated means making a million dollars before you are 30 and having fun while you do it.

A typical hero is Peter Sprague, 29-year-old conglomerate chief, whose burgeoning financial empire includes such diverse interests as a multimillion-dollar electronics firm in California and a poultry farm in the Middle East. Sprague is depicted as the adventurer-businessman, a combination of Clark Gable and Tex Thornton, who at 17 covered the Hungarian revolution for UPI, at 21 became the third American to visit the Mongolian People's Republic since 1945, and at 24 began a business career by investing in chickens and mushrooms in Iran. "He's a curious blend of idealism and hard core practicality," writes associate editor Gay Boyer. "There is little doubt he enjoys his money. But," she adds (and this is crucial to the myth), "my guess

'THE PRESS
AND THE BAY OF PIGS'

A detailed study by

Victor Bernstein and Jesse Gordon

The role played by The Nation in breaking the Bay of Pigs story to the American public, reprinted from the Columbia University Forum.

Single copies—15c; 25 copies at 10c each
Orders over [illegible] at 7c per copy

THE NATION

333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014

KNOW CANADA BETTER!

See world affairs from a different perspective!

Read CANADIAN DIMENSION
Independent, lively, and original.
Canada's leading forum for radical thought.

$4.00 for eight large issues
Write to:
CANADIAN DIMENSION
P.O. Box 1413
Winnipeg 1, Manitoba, Canada

is that he'd still find life interesting without it."

Peter Sprague could be any college student—that is, any college student who goes to Yale and whose millionaire father is co-founder of the prosperous Sprague Electric Company. Myth making in Careers Today is as much the art of omission as the art of exaggeration. The editors do not emphasize the fact that most of the young tycoons who supposedly made it their own way had a lot going for them, such as family money, family connections, or an exceptionally impressive set of academic credentials. Nor do they mention that the largest group of dropouts today are recent MBA graduates who have discovered that they cannot find themselves in business. This problem is so acute that placement directors at top business schools refuse to discuss it.

Careers Today tries hard to be an expression of its own myth by boasting a youthful, free-wheeling staff. The charter issue introduces associate editors Ned Riley, 26, who "wears his shoes only when the occasion demands, cuts his own hair, and rides his motorcycles any chance he gets"; Gay Boyer, 24, a former UCLA journalism student; Brian Vachon, 26, a former ranch hand, bellhop, canoe instructor, etc.; and Arlene Van Breems, 22, a graduate of Barnard. But the glossy photos of these committed kids give a very misleading impression of the people who run the magazine.

Nicholas H. Charney is the financial wizard behind Careers Today. At 27 he is the chairman of CRM, Inc., a communications conglomerate of which Careers Today is only a part. Charney is the son of a famous meteorologist who developed computers for use in weather prediction. He took a pre-med degree at M.I.T. and a Ph.D. in biology and psychology at the University of Chicago. While a graduate student, he displayed a remarkable talent for making money. Instead of doing his laboratory assignments, which he contracted out to other students, Charney took some family money and purchased a tenement slum in Chicago's black ghetto. Between classes he rented and renovated his property, eventually selling it for a profit.

During his last year at Chicago Charney discussed with one of his professors, Dr. George Reynolds, the possibility of starting a popular psychology magazine. When Reynolds took a teaching job at the newly established San Diego campus of the University of California, Charney went along on a research grant from the National Science Foundation. He spent close to a year at San Diego, studying journalism more than psychology; then, together with Reynolds and Winston Marston, an old friend from M.I.T., he created CRM, Inc., and began piecing together the first issue of Psychology Today. Originally CRM stood for Charney/Reynolds/Marston; it now translates Communications/Research/Machines.

Charney did not have enough money to publish his magazine, so he sent a circular to psychologists across the country offering prepublication subscriptions for $15 apiece. He received 48,000 orders and the magazine was an instant success. In fact, it was so successful that Charney could not handle it alone. He sought help, and through family connections found John J. Veronis, a former publisher of two Curtis women's magazines and a corporate officer of Interpublic, a huge advertising-public relations conglomerate. Veronis joined CRM to eventually become publisher of Psychology Today and president of CRM. Working together, Charney and Veronis boosted the circulation of the magazine to upwards of 350,000 in less than a year and a half.

With Veronis came big money, bigger connections, and even bigger ideas, one of which was Careers Today. Veronis brought in two people to develop the magazine, Peter F. Drucker and T (no period) George Harris. Drucker, a 58-year-old management consultant and author of eight books including The Practice of Management, became editorial chairman of the magazine; Harris, 43, a former business and finance editor of Look, became managing editor.

The pilot issue of Careers Today first appeared as a special issue of Psychology Today. The pre-test was promising, and CRM went ahead with plans for a separate magazine. A staff was hired and the editorial board of this "dynamic new magazine" received two new members: Edgar H. Shein, a professor of management and psychology from M.I.T., and Herbert F. York, former chancellor of the San Diego campus and former Under Secretary of Defense. A 122-page charter issue was published last fall and 500,000 copies were mailed free to a computer-selected sample of college seniors. Issue number one, which was published this January, had a paid circulation of 300,000 college students.

Undoubtedly, there is, as Drucker maintains, a need for more career information. So why should Careers Today engage in myth making? The answer can be found by leafing through the magazine and counting the full-page ads by such corporations as IBM, Xerox, AT&T, General Telephone and Electronics, and Ford. These ads do not sell products; they sell the companies themselves. ("We're proving there's a worthwhile place at Chase Manhattan.") Careers Today is as much a medium for recruiting students into business as it is for informing students about business. The magazine has undertaken the difficult, but potentially very profitable, job of simultaneously capitalizing on the anxieties of two groups which have become increasingly mistrustful of each other: businessmen and students.

To students who fear being trapped in meaningless jobs for the rest of their lives, Careers Today poses as a reliable guide to the system; to corporations which are fighting hard for young talent in a seller's market, Careers Today presents itself as a communications link with the new student generation. The dilemma of the editor is to knock the system hard enough to convince students of the magazine's sincerity, but not so hard as to alienate advertisers. The solution: the promise of the myth. Yes, the economic system is corrupt and dehumanizing, but the new youth can bend it to suit individual goals. The established businessman, aware of the need to change, yet bewildered by modern ideas, will tremble before the young executive whose insight he both admires and requires. "Business needs new generation people because they are at home in the present environment, and sense the future."

The Careers Today myth has little appeal for the genuine radical; nor do the editors expect that it will. The message of the magazine—that it is both possible and desirable to find true happiness in Wall Street—is diametrically opposed to the radical doctrine that working within the system serves only to strengthen the evil exacted by the system.

But the radical viewpoint cannot be ignored. Just to the right of Students for a Democratic Society is a much larger minority (almost 40 per cent of all college students, according to Fortune that is sympathetic to many of the radical's complaints. The campus opinion leaders are concentrated in this group; they are the more intelligent students and the students most active in school organizations. They are the students whom major corporations want to attract and, therefore, the students whom Careers Today must win over.

The editors of Careers Today know this. They also know that being blatantly pro-business will not be a successful tactic with this critical group. Hence, they adopt a different attitude, concentrating on the sterility of the academic environment, the futility of dropping out, and the supposed new freedom of corporate life. For exam-

BIRD

Brown and delicate, she has come
As though called from a long way off,
And the great, plain-spoken tree
Wraps her in.

TIMOTHY BALAND

ple: "In New York a fellow with a red beard who goes barefoot to work is vice president of a commercial bank today," writes Drucker. "No university would dare hire him. And for a good reason. He talks so much about love that everybody would hate him." Sometimes the magazine goes too far, making statements about nonbusiness environments which are insulting as well as absurd: "I'm not surprised that kids riot," says Drucker. "I am surprised that they are so placid because they are so unspeakably bored. . . . (Freshmen) can drink in high school, and may have slept around, so college freedom is not terribly important to them."

It is doubtful that Drucker, Charney, or anyone else at CRM really believes that freedom is to be found in the corporation (imagine an officer of a major company taking a stand against the Vietnamese War, as many professors and university administrators have already done), or that the myth of Careers Today is any more real than the Playboy myth. But what they believe does not matter as long as those confused and bewildered students are willing to tranquilize their anxieties with dreams. That's what keeps myth makers in business.

ART

LAWRENCE ALLOWAY

I doubt that Thomas Hoving would have carried the Metropolitan Museum of Art so far from the acquisition, conservation and display of art if he had not been aware of a general problem facing museums at present. If this is the case, we may expect other shows like "Harlem on My Mind" from Mr. Hoving or other museum directors of ambition. Therefore, we might look at the idea of social service underlying the show.

Art museums have been making continuous efforts for more than twenty years to engage the public more directly. Earlier, it had been sufficient for museums to make, say, Titian and Vermeer available to the public; free of charge in the United States and England, for a small charge in France and Italy. Access was an end. The founding of museums in the 19th century transformed the distribution of art. Royal and private collections opened up; personal possessions became public culture. No museums founded in the 20th century that I know of have ever departed from this fundamental educational commitment, even if it is interpreted in terms of the democratization of aesthetic pleasure (art for all).

After World War II, museums everywhere updated and refurbished their collections, and modern art museums in particular moved to catch up with the neglected recent past and to incorporate the topical present in their exhibition schedules. The model museum for this kind of community involvement was the Stedelijk, Amsterdam, under Sandberg's direction. There was a postwar fervor for art in Holland, part of a celebration of national identity after the withdrawal of the Nazis; and Sandberg was supported by the Dutch resistance, just as in Italy the Veneto resistance appointed the Mayor of Venice who, in turn, appointed a new Secretary General of the reformed, post-Fascist Biennale. In this optimistic internationalist mood, lively exhibition programs, responsive to modern sensibility, were the index of liberty. At the Stedelijk there were literally hundreds of shows—of painting, sculpture, child art, everything.

In the United States as in Europe, there has been a perfect frenzy of exhibitions, big and small, majestic and improvised. This flow of temporary exhibitions seems to have slackened now. If my impression of abatement is correct, I suppose it could be attributed, variously, to shortage of good subjects, fatigued museum staffs, resistant collectors. Whatever the combination of reasons, the euphoric phase of international exhibitions is over; the parade is now only steady. We are in a situation, it seems, in which museum activity has lost something of its postwar combination of vigor and relevance, but certainly museum administrators have not lost interest in maintaining public contact, which can be measured, of course, by attendance. Until recently the museums' concern with the box office was fully compatible with significant shows; in fact, scholarship was sponsored by the museums' desire to fill their galleries with shows on new subjects. In Italy, for instance, postwar tourism financed searching exhibitions of the newly studied 17th century.

The Metropolitan, when James Rorimer was director, applied public relations techniques to the collection and exhibitions, long before Mr. Hoving's appointment; but until "Harlem on My Mind," the subject of promotion had been works of art. The "Mona Lisa" and the expensive Rembrandt had prospered as news, like a kidnapped co-ed or a State of the Union message. With "Harlem on My Mind" the object of the museum's promotional energy was not art but a documentary show of blown-up photographs with a rhetorical sociological angle. In justification, Mr. Hoving gave as his loophole a reference in the original constitution to the relation of "art to practical life and of practical life to art." There is no art in the exhibition and it appears that Mr. Hoving has some doubts about the educative value (which can be pleasure) of showing art. It is true that there is less publicity in just showing art, but it is not simply the confusion of education and publicity in Mr. Hoving's mind that is disturbing. What is damaging is his withdrawal of urgency and of authority from works of art and a corresponding overinvestment in "current issues" and "contemporary affairs." "Harlem on My Mind" raises the prospect that the director may be thinking of running the Met for those people least interested in the contents and purposes of the museum.

That Mr. Hoving believes that the display of art needs beefing up is clear from his calling the "Harlem" show "a confrontation," "a dialogue," adding ominously: "and today we better have these things. Today there is a growing gap between people. . . ." Does he think, in retrospect, that his exhibition bridged, narrowed, or even slightly filled in this gap? The show's main effect, outside the art world, has been to provide another site for black pickets. The show is, in a sense, an act of rejection toward the works of art that Mr. Hoving might have shown in the place of "Harlem." His position appears to be that social problems are more important than the display of art. There is nothing objectively wrong with this view, but there is everything wrong when it is held by the director of an art museum. Hoving has sacrificed, by his highly publicized gesture, the care for art which, over and above specific educational projects, museums perform, and symbolize, better than anybody else.

With the gradual constriction of exhibition programs, the recent coincidence of scholarly and public interests has weakened. In an effort to revive that postwar feeling of museological usefulness to society, Hoving has appropriated the problems of the ghetto. However, the earlier contact of museums with the community was through the medium of art, which Hoving finds inadequate. Social reform in the ghettos and curriculum change on the campus are the present areas of pressure in the knowledge industry (universities, museums, publishers). Evidence of Hoving's awareness of the problem is very nice, but not the way he risks opening the museum to those people most ignorant of and indifferent to its purposes. The conversion of a museum to a topical forum, as a defense against the possibility of future militancy, as a flashy show of institutional relevance, is damaging to a museum's cultural function. It devalues the main purpose of all art museums, the display of art and its preservation, not for everybody, but for that part of the public that wants it.

FILMS

HAROLD CLURMAN

In mid-March the 68th Street Playhouse will show a documentary film, Salesman, by the Maysles brothers and Charlotte Zwerlin, which has given me greater insight into America than all the Broadway shows I have seen this season. To some it will seem a comedy, to others a tragedy.

Nothing is invented: there is not a word in it which was not actually spoken by the door-to-door Bible salesmen the picture is concerned with and the folk to whom they sell or try to sell their $49.45 Holy Book. Seeing the picture one is ready to agree with Francis Bacon that "The contemplation of things as they are . . . without substitution or imposture is in itself a nobler thing than a whole harvest of invention."

"You can see," says the salesman, as he points to the illustrations in the Book, "how this would be an inspiration in the home," and then explains how to push the three plans of purchase: "Cash, C.O.D. and a Catholic Honor Plan" (so much a month). He continues: "The Bible is still the best seller in the world." The customers are Irish (as are most of the salesmen), Polish, Puerto Rican. They have been recommended by the local Church; the wares to be sold have the imprimatur or blessing of the high clergy. Many of the prospective buyers cannot even afford a dollar a week. The territories covered are New England (seen amid snow) and Florida.

This Bible is a hard sell ("Could you say if this would help the family. . . ? Could you see where this would be of value in the home? A gain to you?"). The sales manager for the company (of porcine countenance) assures his men at a sales convention: "Money is being made in the Bible business. . . . It's a fabulous business. . . . All I can say to people who aren't making the money, it's their fault. . . . The money's out there and go out and get it." One salesman announces he's going to make $35,000 this coming year. To best him another vows to make $50,000. One wants to push his face in. His pals applaud.

At another meeting in Chicago, the designer and theological consultant of the company, Melbourne I. Feltman, Ph.D., tells the assembled flock in an analogy with the Son of God himself that "the good that comes from the selling of the Bible . . . is definitely identified with the Father's business. Some of you, at one time or another, may or may not have had a higher income, but you have never held a higher position of esteem. . . . God grant you an abundant harvest."

In North Miami, Paul Brennan, the salesman on whom the film makers have concentrated, tries to find 118 Street in the town of Opa Locka (how terrifyingly hideous the architecture of the vicinity). The streets through which he drives are Sinbad Ave., Arabia Ave., Ali Baba Ave., Sesame St., Sharazad Blvd. He calls this "Muslim Territory." He makes no sale that day and we notice that he has become grim. A fellow salesman hopes to encourage Paul by reminding him of the firm's adage: "It's not the bum territory. It's the bum in the territory."

So it goes. We see them pushing, pushing, pushing, talking, talking, talking, telling jokes, exchanging confidences, making philosophical remarks, all to wear down the customers and lighten the embarrassed silences of indecision or resistance. A strained heartiness shields the salesman's anguish as it does the customers' mixture of discomfiture at not being able to reciprocate and an unconscious desire to mollify the salesman's hurt. Often the salesmen are not only depressed by their lack of luck but by the realization of the degree of unemployment and poverty they encounter as they make their pitch.

The salesmen play poker among themselves, do a lot of kidding, make long-distance calls to their wives at home, reminisce. Paul remembers his father who counseled him "to join the police farce and get a pinsion." He imitates the brogue of which there is still a remnant in his own speech. One senses a certain contempt for the accent, the admonition and the "Mickie" breed, mixed with a trace of regret at not having done as his father bade him. These fellows like one another, and when Paul finally prepares to quit the business their compassion is not without some foreboding that Paul's fate may some day be their own.

When we last see Paul mute, immobile and grave, his face is a tragic mask. He has experienced defeat. Through the laughter that the film provokes there runs an ever swelling vein of tragedy. How can these petty people be tragic, purists may ask, remembering Aristotle and his epigones. At most they are merely pathetic.

A pox on such aesthetes! The salesmen and their customers are tragic because we can recognize them as kin and they are legion. They are all of us. They are our countrymen caught in the vise of the prevailing religion: utility, business, success—a religion which erodes. We are unable to feel superior. In all of them we catch a glimpse of the presence or potential of something dear. I left the picture in a maze of sentiments and impulses: of suicide, murder, prayer, fraternal embrace.

The film suffers from a certain monotony—it is too long—but that is possibly part of its intended effect and meaning. We are worn out along with its "actors." They are all great, especially Paul Brennan. The stiffly drooping line of his mouth is a study in itself. There is something close to grandeur in his acrid humor, his self-mockery, his realistic perceptiveness, his ultimate stoicism.

The photography and editing are first rate. The producers, I am certain, would like the reviewers to emphasize the film's comedy. I have laid stress on its cutting dreariness, but that does not signify a defect. The combination of all its elements—including the view of its various landscapes—creates its own kind of catharsis. It is a picture for the brave.

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, ALgonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

The Best Way To Get THE NATION

THE NATION 3-10-69
333 Sixth Ave., New York 10014

☐ One Year, $10
☐ Two Years, $18
☐ 6 Months, $5

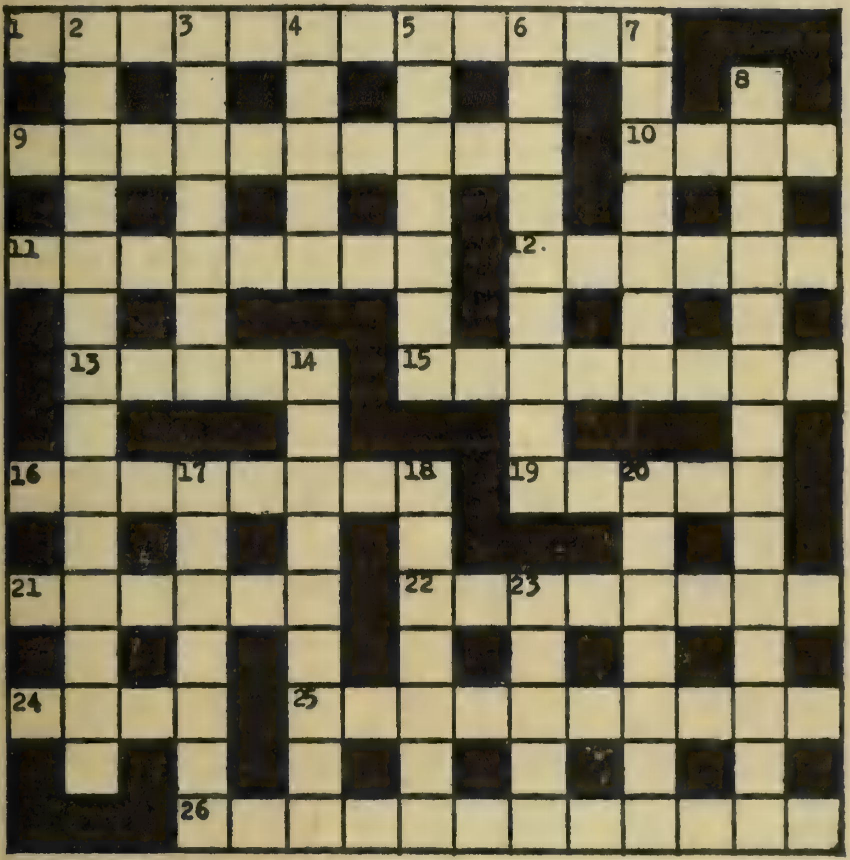
☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed

(Add $1 per year postage for Canada; [illegible] foreign)

Name ....
Address ....
City ....
State .... Zip No. ......

Crossword Puzzle No. 1288

FRANK W. LEWIS



ACROSS

1 Not exactly figured out to be subverted, and as DeGaulle might say, turned in. (12)
9 Tidy result, but it might have shattering consequences. (10)
10 Hurry with the translation! (It's not legal aid!) (4)
11 Stage requisites about the wrong people to ask for future advice. (8)
12 State briefly, when about to inquire of a much larger one. (6)
13 Possibly loses the deposit, if unstratified. (5)
15 Waves clear across it. (8)
16 Not exactly formal wear, and certainly not for climbers. (4,4)
19 What a door-to-door salesman might do not so as to be legal? (5)
21 A little way to go on wheels or walk? (6)
22 Is in contention. (8)
24 Bear north, in either case. (4)
25 Where such a problem as this might go, in a manner of speaking. (10)
26 They might help, to a degree. (12)

DOWN

2 What removes the effect of accidental past events isn't very systematic. (7,7)
3 Set to follow—obviously no longer sufficient. (7)
4 Proving a bird is better than a birdie. (5)
5 Implying a certain division with the basic body structure. (7)
6 Excellent type candy? (9)
7 Draw away (7)
8 Was Carroll's one of the evening? (4,6,4)
14 Crustacean for 3. (9)
17 One has to pull through the water with them. (7)
18 Possibly a telling experience. (7)
20 Game, but possibly not a fair one in Boston. (7)
23 Clementine's father, possibly. (5)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1287

ACROSS: 1 Pheasant; 5 Flower; 11 and 21 across Putting on the dog; 12 In store; 13 Sworn in; 14 Agents; 15 and 10 Enteric fever; 18 Address; 26 Audient; 27 Abstained; 28 and 7 On the wagon; 29 Oldest; 30 Jettison. DOWN: 1 Puffin; 2 Envisaged; 3 Sirloin; 4 Nippers; 6 Laid out; 8 Ringneck; 9 and 24 A Taste of Honey; 16 Roomettes; 17 Pago Pago; 19 Enneads; 20 Saying; 21 Twaddle; 22 Endmost; 23 Strewn; 25 Hosed.

Readers are invited to send for a free copy of Mr. Lewis' "ground rules." Address Puzzle Department, The Nation, 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014.

RECORDS

FREE [illegible] PAGE CATALOG offers hundreds of recordings of rare Renaissance, Baroque and Classical music. Some records priced as low as $1.00 each! All late recordings in stereo only. MHS RECORDS, Box 932 NA, New York, N. Y. 10023.

FOLK, JAZZ, BLUES. We specialize in hard-to-get LPs. Send us your wants. MONON RECORD SERVICE, Box 18221 BH, San Francisco, Calif. 94118.

PUBLICATIONS

SOCIALISTS WANTED—who realize it is an entrapment to try to reform this obsolete, exploitive, war-creating capitalist system—and see logic in a Republic of Labor with a life of plenty for all through production for use instead of profit—democratically attained and operated through the WORKERS' POWER of Industrial Unions for Socialism. SUBSCRIBE NOW to THE DeLEONIST, the official publication of the newly-formed DANIEL DeLEON LEAGUE. Send $1.50 for one year's subscription to Box No. 352, New York, N.Y. 10002.

My name is Richard, I write books—publish them myself, sell them for $1. Want one? Send $1 to: Richard Liebow, 948 Market, San Francisco 94102.

WORKERS WANTED

EXPERIENCED ELEMENTARY SCIENCE TEACHER with background in physical sciences, and physical science teachers, with M.S., needed. Write Edward Rubendall, Chairman, Physical Sciences, Towson State College, Baltimore, Maryland 21204. Equal Opportunity Employer.

PERSONALS

FUND-RAISERS: Enroll members in Public Affairs Book Club. High profit, no investment. Write: PABC, 128 C St., N.E., Washington, D.C. 20002.

DISCOVER an intriguing, fun way of meeting literate Jewish singles. FREE literature: OPERATION MAZEL TOV, 663 Fifth Avenue, N. Y. C. 10022.

BUMPER STICKERS—Apathy is terrorizing—Support your local pseudo intellectual. Give an hour of time, He will—Indifference breeds Fascism—Soul Power—Choice 3/$1.00, additionals 25c. Bulk rates. Box 367, Pensacola, Fla. 32502.

BLOW YOURSELF UP! 1½' x 2' Poster of anyone. Send returned snapshot. $3.00. Pierpoint Products, Box 678, Inglewood, Calif. 90307.

NUMBERS RULE THE WORLD: Numerology is one of the oldest psychic sciences. Know what numbers have power over your life. Know how to use them for more success and harmony. Send name, birth date, and $5 to Marguerite Mann, 6600 N. Oracle, Tucson, AZ 85704 for your personal numerology chart. Satisfaction Guaranteed.

SOCK IT TO ME—over 225 other underground buttons. 1/25c, 5/$1, 50/$5, 125/$10 and 1,000/$75. Bumperstickers, beads and peace jewelry, too. Free catalogue to all! Free sample to stores. A BIG-LITTLE STORE, 1077 Mission, San Francisco, Calif. 94103.

Advertising Rates

CLASSIFIED

74c a line (6 words) Three-line minimum

CLASSIFIED DISPLAY

$7.42 per inch (minimum)

The NATION

333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014

242-8400

Printed by Milford Publishing Inc., Milford, Conn.

THE NATION, 333 Sixth Ave., New York 10014

- ☐ Count me in the good fight for a new one-year (48 issues) subscription at $10, and send me also the new $2.95, 400-page The People's President for only $1 more. I enclose $11.
- ☐ I'll subscribe for one year (48 issues) plus four free bonus issues. I enclose $10.
- ☐ I'll subscribe for six months. Here's $6. N-3-10

*Name*______________________________

*Address*______________________________

*City*_____________ *State*_________ *Zip*_______

Subscribe to THE NATION now, and get THE PEOPLE'S PRESIDENT for only $1 more.

Estes Kefauver said it in 1961: "Every four years the Electoral College is a game of Russian roulette. Once its antiquated procedures trigger a loaded cylinder, it may be too late." Again and again, The Nation has warned of the ancient system's dire dangers.

Can this 18th century antique be "modernized"? Or shouldn't it be junked for direct voting by the people? Neal R. Peirce, of the Congressional Quarterly, covers a hundred such questions in lively detail in his milestone new book, The People's President.

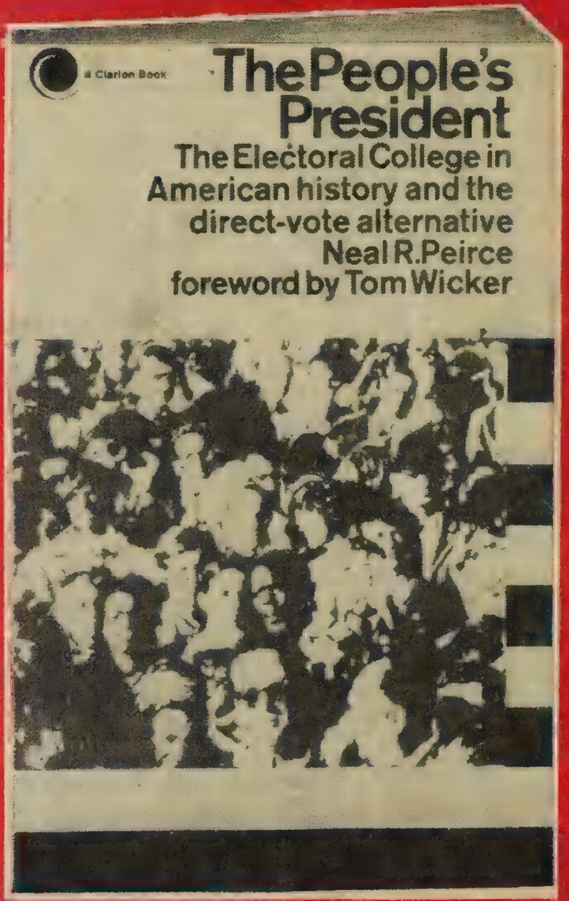
Want to rescue the White House from the System and give it to the people? Join the Good Fight now with a one-year new subscription to The Nation, and get this not-to-be-missed book for only $1 more.

UNSAFE IN ANY ELECTION YEAR!

Why after '68 we can't risk the 1787-model Electoral College design for disaster.

Now yours for only $1.00 with a new one-year subscription to

THE NATION



a Clarion Book
The People's President
The Electoral College in American history and the direct-vote alternative Neal R. Peirce
foreword by Tom Wicker

REMEMBER THE PUEBLO JACK ROBERTSON

THE NATION

MARCH 17, 1969 35 cents

SERIALS DEPT
UNIV OF COLORADO LIBY
BOULDER CO 80304

UNIVERSITY OF COLORADO
LIBRARIES
PERIODICALS RM
PERIODICALS RM

DEMOCRACY & THE CURRICULUM

CARL COHEN

New York Sweepstakes

Lindsay vs. the Field

JEROME WILSON

Salisbury's Leningrad

ALEXANDER WERTH

Celine's Castle

FREDERIC MORTON

Charney's Journey

T. B. BOTTOMORE

LETTERS

off course

Rockville Centre, N.Y.
DEAR SIRS: The Navy has not nearly come off as badly as your editorial [Feb. 17] on the Pueblo inquiry suggests. They have successfully deflected the inquiry from the vital question, "Did the Pueblo violate Korean waters, and if so, by chance or by design, and if by design, whose?" Instead, there is a mishmash of sentimental debate about whether Bucher was wrong not to resist. The disaster is that of those who believe in peace, civilian supremacy, and demilitarization. From Fulbright down, we missed the boat. (Pardon that metaphor.)

Howard N. Meyer

selective anger

Madison, Wis.
DEAR SIRS: The following is quoted, with one alteration, from Eqbal Ahmad's article, "How We Look to the Third World" [The Nation, Mar. 3]:

> The violence which has been practiced against the [Palestinians] is not genocidal in intent; it is instrumental, political and ethnocentric. It is seen as a natural vehicle for the attainment of societal goals, especially when it involves confrontation with culturally and racially alien groups who are often perceived as inferior and expendable. . . .

Precisely. Only, the original read "the Indians or the blacks" instead of "the Palestinians"; the former are groups whom The Nation's righteously selective indignation is capable of noticing, while the latter are not. You've been far too uncritically pro-Zionist for far too long.

Aaron Leibowitz

Hagerstown, Md.
DEAR SIRS: The last paragraph of Anne Tuckerman's "Defusing the Powder Keg" [The Nation, Feb. 17] surprised and dismayed me. She writes that "the answer to that question" of whether the coming Big Four meeting on the Middle East will produce results "lies primarily in Jerusalem."

Not in France or Russia which are arming and supporting the Arabs to the hilt. Not in the Arab capitals which have openly proclaimed their support for the terrorists and their undiminished hostility toward Israel. Not in the United States which is trying desperately to retain its strategic and economic interests in the Middle East. It is in beleaguered Israel, in Jerusalem, Mrs. Tuckerman says, that the question of the peace of the area lies. And what must Israel do to satisfy the wishes of its enemies? The answer is clear: the country must make enough concessions to insure its eventual destruction.

H. T. Keats

Woodhaven, N. Y.
DEAR SIRS: Herbert Krosney's "The Crossroads of Jerusalem" [Feb. 3] is the most offensive article I have ever seen in The Nation. Such statements as "The whole of Jerusalem fell into Israel's hands through the stupidity of King Hussein. . . ." and "The Arabs can't do anything well. . . . It's lucky we have Arabs here; otherwise we might be in trouble," while not the author's own, are allowed to pass without rebuttal, setting the article's blatantly pro-Israel tone.

